with the wool on. These are quilted together, and form the bed-clothes. Now, they are certainly inferior to those in use among our work people; with this small difference, we apprehend, that the Norwegians have a full supply of the inferior article, while the reverse is the rule among our poor. In every house, or rather cluster of houses—for every homestead consists of many buildings—there is an apartment where the females card wool, spin, weave, &c., under the superintendence of the mistress of the family, or her deputy, the upper servant or housekeeper, who is regarded quite as one of the family. Substantial, if coarse, woollen cloth, excellent bed and table linen, and checked or striped cottons or linens for female wear, form the home manufactures. The farm-proprietor is thus indebted for little to the town-shop, save his Sunday hat. The Norwegians seem, in many respects, in the condition of the farmers of New England, and some of the northern States of America. They boast little finery, but all classes are well-clothed; boots, gloves, and greatcoats being in bad weather worn by the labourers, and a person in rags is rarely seen. Every one possesses a set of clothes for Sunday's wear. Indeed, the chief distinction in the nation is in the difference of dress. All classes of the proprietors, in house-furniture, food, gig-keeping, and style of entertaining, are much alike, each family living on the produce of the farm; but the wealthier may purchase finer clothes, and, perhaps, consume a little more coffee, sugar, French brandy, and wine. The farms vary from the maintaining about twenty cows, a score of sheep, and another of goats, and four horses, which is about the average, up to the maintenance of forty cows, with a corresponding number of other animals; and descend so low as four cows; but these are generally the small farms held by fishermen, housemen, or woodmen. But the range from four to forty cows is not great. Mr Laing contrasts the dwellings of the labouring class with those of Ireland and Scotland; and he might have included much of rural England, and also the cellars, and squalid, huddled apartments of many of our manufacturing towns. "The squalor, dampness, darkness, and total want of accommodation and comfort of the sod-built hovels which disgrace the face of the earth in Scotland and Ireland, are unknown. The meanest habitation has wooden floors, windows, apartments for the family to sleep in, besides their sitting room; also fit places for keeping the food." We blush while we read—"It is highly characteristic of Scotland, that, within sight of its Parthenon, human dens may be found in which whole families—father, mother, and grown-up daughters and sons—are lodged under one roof, without other division into apartments, for the decent separation of the sexes, than is made by the wooden bedstead, placed in the middle; without other floor than the raw earth; the wall of stones, and sods, not lined inside; the roof a mass of damp, rotten straw and decayed vegetable substances, supported by a few sooty rafters; the windows, a single pane or two of glass, stuck in a hole in the thatch or the wall; the family provisions of meal, salt meat, herrings, milk, butter, all huddled together in the single room." But we need not introduce the wet stockings, the sweaty linen, and the family cookery going on; and, fortunately or otherwise, we may add that the family stock of animal food is seldom in a quantity that can permanently affect the atmosphere of the Scottish cottage. Mr Laing himself, in describing the superior diet of the Norwegian labourers, remarks truly, that those of Scotland have, with their allowance of meal, neither butter, bacon, nor fish. The increase of luxury—that lamentation as old as society itself—is often complained of by the most intelligent men in Norway. The small proprietors are blamed for using too much coffee and sugar, for keeping carioles, and buying harness of a costly kind, and maintaining more horses than are required for farm-work, while all are in want of dollars—money being the scarcest, or the only scarce needful commodity in the country. Mr Laing considers that the taste for luxury is not carried beyond the safe and just point—that which proves a spur to industry, and refines manners. But the people of Norway appear so happy and independent in their present state of primitive simplicity, that, looking round on the more luxurious communities of Europe, it is not surprising that men of intelligence and reflection dread any innovation, which, with change of manners, might tend to undermine the foundations of national well-being. It is not from the work on Sweden, but from that on Norway, that we borrow this description of a race of men, whose condition change from without would hardly improve:—

The Bonder, or agricultural peasantry, each the proprietor of his own farm, occupy the country from the shore side to the hill foot, and up every valley or glen as far as corn can grow. This class is the kernel of the nation. They are in general fine athletic men, as their properties are not so large as to exempt them from work, but large enough to afford them and their household abundance, and even superfluity, of the best food. They farm not to raise produce for sale, so much as to grow everything they eat, drink, and wear in their families. They build their own houses, make their own chairs, tables, ploughs, carts, harness, iron-work, basket-work, and wood-work; in short, except window-glass, cast-iron ware and pottery, everything about their houses and furniture is of their own fabrication. There is not probably in Europe so great a population in so happy a condition as these Norwegian yeomanry. A body of small proprietors, each with his thirty or forty acres, scarcely exists elsewhere in Europe; or, if it can be found, it is under the shadow of some more imposing body of wealthy proprietors or commercial men. Here they are the highest men in the nation. . . . The settlers in the newer States of America, and in our colonies, possess properties of probably about the same extent; but they have roads to make, lands to clear, houses to build, and the work that has been doing here for a thousand years, to do, before they can be in the same condition. These Norwegian proprietors are in a happier condition than those in the older States of America, because they are not so much influenced by the spirit of gain. They farm their little estates, and consume the produce, without seeking to barter or sell, except what is necessary for paying their taxes and the few articles of luxury they consume. There is no money-getting spirit among them, and none of extravagance. They enjoy the comforts of excellent houses, as good and large as those of the wealthiest individuals; good furniture, bedding, linen, clothing, fuel, victuals, and drink, all in abundance, and of their own providing; good horses, and a houseful of people, who have more food than work. Food, furniture, and clothing being all home-made, the difference in these matters between the family and the servants is very small; but there is a perfect distinction kept up. The servants invariably eat, sleep, and sit apart from the family, and have generally a distinct building adjoining to the family house.

There is another class of peasantry or yeomanry not so fortunate as the Bonder, though their condition is superior to that of the peasantry of other northern countries. These are the Alpine proprietors, the inhabitants of the forests and glens of the Fjelde, that extensive mountain ridge which in many places divides Norway from Sweden. These, however, possess land in absolute property, and have small but comfortable houses, with wooden floors and glass windows. The severity of the climate, where the night frosts set in early in August, and where winter remains till about the end of May, preclude them from raising good grain crops. They live by the produce of their cattle, by felling timber, which they float down the mountain-streams, and by the sale of game carried in a frozen state to the winter fairs of the lower country. The ground bark of the pine, mixed with their ill-ripened oats, form their bread, and the salted trout of the Fjelde lakes a considerable part of their winter provision. A great part of their labour must be performed in winter, when the snow permits their sledges to be brought into use, and when the lowlanders are enjoying themselves. They form in condition the link between the Laplanders and the Bonder of the low regions or zones of the country; and, if a hard-living, are a fine and interesting, though a rough race. With all the hardships of their condition,

"They see their little lot the lot of all." They are independent and contented. "They retain the dress, manners, character, and athletic forms which we imagine as belonging to ancient times. Each district and valley has some peculiarity of costume, pronunciation, and even character; and intermarriages of the isolated groups of inhabitants with those of the neighbouring valleys or the lower grounds, are rare." There are stanch enduring families of peasant nobility in those glens, which can boast a much older lineage than that of the French or English nobility.

The Laplanders of Norway are, in their own way, as interesting a race as those sturdy Scandinavian peasants and mountaineers. In Norway there are parochial schools in what appears sufficient number, there being eleven in the parish in which Mr Laing resided, to a population of five thousand persons. The schoolmasters have houses, and are supported by a tax levied on every householder, besides a personal payment from each adult. Even servants, male and female, contribute to the schoolmaster's support. Hence "the almost mechanical arts of reading and writing" are generally understood; but education otherwise is at a low ebb, as classical and university education are comparatively expensive, and learning not in demand. Books are scarce, though the great demand for newspapers and periodicals must whet the appetite for more extensive reading. Mr Laing, whom sound philosophy makes an ardent admirer of dissent, imputes the limited mental cultivation of the nation to the total absence of religious controversy. His opinions are worthy of regard. If not original, their utterance is well timed. "A difference of opinion upon religious doctrines among a people is the most powerful stimulus to the human mind to investigate, to obtain knowledge, to exert the mental power. The spirit of religious controversy adds nothing certainly to their domestic happiness, but much to their intelligence, acuteness, desire for education, and value for religion. Scotland and England, without their Seceders and Dissenters, would have been countries in which the human mind slumbered. A land of universal conformity is necessarily one of universal apathy as to religious matters, or else of gross superstition." And both apathy and superstition may certainly be observed in Norway, and much more conspicuously in Sweden. The Lutheran form of religion which is found in Norway, is nearly as ceremonial as the unreformed Roman Catholic faith. Its stated observances are consequently attended with a certain degree of expense. The priest has his embroidered velvet robes; the altar is decorated, candles are lighted, and there is a clerk to repeat the responses, and an organist. As the bulk of the parishioners are persons of property, a greater sum is required to maintain the clergyman in his proper place, relatively to his flock, than would be required in a Scottish or English parish, where the many are the poor, and the few, or the one, so rich that the minister cannot pretend to vie with the grandee, and probably absentee patron. The average of the income of the rural clergy of Norway is 800 dollars, or about £170; but the bishops have 4000 dollars. In the towns, the incomes are larger. In country parishes, the stipends arise from a small payment in grain, amounting to two or three bushels from the largest farms; the grain may be converted into money as in Scotland, and there are fars prices struck for this purpose. Several farms in every parish belong to the living, besides the glebe; and a third source of income is the Easter dues and Christmas offerings, and pretty high dues for marriages, christenings, and funerals. The Easter dues and Christmas offerings, are in one sense voluntary; but opinion or vanity may tax a man more highly than fixed regulations, and the Bonder feel pride in making handsome offerings to their clergy. It is proposed, instead of these ancient modes of begging, to make a fixed rate of payment; and the sooner the better. There is one feature of the system deserving of imitation, where a compulsory-paid clergy are recognised at all. In every parish, one of the farms allotted to the living is appropriated to the minister's widow during her life.

But the political institutions of Norway, since the establishment of its admirable Constitution in 1814, are more especially deserving of attention, as centuries in advance of its ecclesiastical scheme. The government is purely representative; nor could Bentham, in the present state of the country, have objected to its elective machinery, save, perhaps, to the number of intervening steps placed between the constituency and the representative, and the absence of the ballot; which, however, in a country like Norway, where every one has a competency, and no class depends upon another, is scarcely required. Every native Norwegian, of twenty-five years of age, who, as the owner or liferenter of land, has for five years paid scat, that is, direct taxes, or who is a burgher of any town, or who possesses there a house or land of the value of £30, is entitled to elect, and, when he reaches the age of thirty, to be elected, provided he is neither in any department of the state or court, nor on the pension-list, nor yet in the counting-house or bureau of any placeman or courtier. We cannot here detail the full process of electing, which is rather complicated; though a trifle to our endless registries, and non-registries, and disqualifications for this tax and the other, unpaid. The Parliament, or Storting, is chosen every three years, and sits for three months, or till the public business be despatched; and their meeting is not by virtue of the issue of the King's writ, but of constitutional right; though, on any great national emergency, as a war, or the demise of the Crown, an extraordinary Storting may be assembled by the royal edict; but then such extraordinary Storting can only pass interim acts, which remain to be ratified or set aside by the next regular Parliament. The Storthings are in every respect independent of the Executive; nor is the royal assent necessary to give effect to any Bill which has passed the Chambers in three different Storthings. Thus the abolition of hereditary nobility, proposed and first passed in the Storthing of 1815, and again in that of 1821, but vehemently opposed by the King in 1824, when the capital, where the Parliament was sitting, was invested by a Swedish army to overawe the legislative body, passed into law in despite of the royal opposition, by the fiat of the Storthing, exercising, for the third time, its constitutional right. In the differences which have arisen in consequence of the attempted encroachments of the executive power, and the constitutional resistance of the Storthing, liberal opinions have hitherto triumphed; for the Norwegian people seem wide awake to every attempted stretch of prerogative. In Norway, the press is entirely free; and unbounded freedom in discussion is sanctioned by opinion and custom, every man being responsible for what he publishes to the world; though defamation, or libel on private character, must be proved false, open, and intentional, to involve punishment. In Sweden, the press is under a strict censorship, though, as in France, it maintains a constant, lively skirmishing with the Executive, and generally has the best of it. The Storting of 1836, whose sittings Mr Laing frequently, or rather daily attended, consisted of ninety-six Members. The franchise is not connected with this town or that county, but is regulated by the true principle—the number of electors in the district—and, from time to time, varies with that. When a Member is elected, a substitute is elected at the same time, in case of his death or resignation. The Members are paid two dollars and a-half (at most 9s. 7d.) per diem, while the Storthing is in Session; and they are allowed a small sum for travelling expenses. They consist of all descriptions of persons. In the Storthing of 1836, one Member was a rector of a school; four were parish clerks; the mercantile towns naturally send merchants, and the rural districts Bonder; and the aggregate Assembly appears probably very like the State Assemblies of America. Mr Laing says the assembled Members of the Norwegian Storthing look like the respectable farmers or merchants one sees assembled in Edinburgh or Haddington on a market-day. They meet at nine in the morning, and maintain a much more decorous and simply dignified exterior than certain legislative bodies that we could name. The first business is to choose a Speaker and Secretary, and this is repeated once a-week. Other preliminary business being gone through, the Storthing elects one-fourth of its Members to form the Upper Chamber or Lagthing, in which the deliberative functions of the legislative body are invested. No Bill can be first proposed in the Lagthing or Upper House, which can only receive measures proposed from the Odelsting or House of Commons, and then deliberate, oppose, reject, or send back with amendments. The Odelsting may impeach Ministers of State in the Lagthing. When a motion is to be first made and discussed, both Chambers sit together in an united House; but, as the business proceeds, they divide, and each assumes its separate special functions. But we must refer for the minute details to the work, merely quoting this sentence for the edification of the admirers of a House of hereditary noble legislators. "The composition of this House, which does its business quite as well as a house of Bishops, Dukes, and Barons, may," Mr Laing says, "be an object of curiosity to every British Radical. It consists, in the present Storthing, of eight persons in civil offices, five in clerical functions, two lawyers, and nine Bonder or peasants—in all, twenty-four. They are not elected to the Lagthing with any reference to profession or rank, but simply from the opinion their fellow-members of the Storthing may have formed of their judgment, knowledge, and fitness for deliberative functions. Of the whole ninety-six Members of the Storthing, forty-five have sat in one or more former Storthings; the rest are new Members."

There are no Ministerial nor opposition benches in a Parliament to which the whole Government influence cannot send even one member. It is felt an inconvenience that no one Government functionary can be present to answer questions or bring forward propositions; but the Norwegians wisely submit to it. The style of speaking and debating is plain and business-like; there are no Emerson Tennents, with set-speeches got by heart, no young D'Israelis, nor flashy declaimers of higher name, to spout orations, and waste the time strictly devoted to national business, in that homely little senate; but there is what seems infinitely better, even in taste, and more morally august—at least in the eyes of those who can look below the surface. "There being no demand for oratory, there is no supply; but for plain and clear statement of argument or fact, there are several members of the Storthing who are equal to any of that class of our public speakers"—that is, to our Humes, and Warburtons, and Villierses.

It is not exactly known to whom Norway is indebted for its constitution. It was ostensibly drawn up by a committee of the National Assembly in four days, and laid before the assembly at the time the allies chose to transfer the kingdom from Denmark to Sweden, as a bribe to the latter power to desert Napoleon; and the confederation allowed it to pass in the haste or inadvertence of the moment. This Constitution was solemnly ratified by the King of Sweden and the Norwegian nation, and exists under the guarantee of the allied powers, though probably an eye-sore to each of them. A free Constitution, framed in quiet, and solemnly established in the midst of perfect public tranquillity, and of which upwards of twenty years have now proved the strength and adaptation to the people, was, it is conceived by Mr Laing, the fair fruit of the previous state of property in the fortunate country where it arose. Property was diffused, and in the hands of the whole body of the people; and the ancient laws and institutions were conceived and administered in the very spirit of liberty. There was no rich, arrogant, and rapacious aristocracy—no domineering state-paid church—to oppose the free spirit of the new constitution. It emanated as if spontaneously from the bosom of the nation. May it long remain to bless it!—It is more than time that we returned to Sweden.

In June, last year, Mr Laing set off from Christiania on his projected tour in Sweden; taking the inland route, by Kongsvinger, on the Glommen River, to Carlstad. The country soon loses the characteristic features of Norway, alternate ridges and glens; and, on entering the valley of the Glommen, he found a flattish corn-country, which he calls the Lothians of Norway. On one of his days of travel, he stopped at a place called Strand, on the extreme frontier of Sweden, and tells—

I was kept awake all last night by a tipsy Norwegian bonder in the next room, who was boasting that he was only a simple Norsk bonder, and asking the Swedes if they had any such bonder among them. I suppose, that in some point or other, he thought himself far superior, although in dress or appearance I could see no difference. The Glommen had drifted some of his timber towards the Wener, and he had been down the country to look for it. His superiority probably consisted in being the owner of land and wood.

In Carlstad, a thriving trading town at the head of the Wener Lake, with a population of 2300 persons, there was an unusual number of idle, well-dressed people to be seen. Two booksellers' shops and a musiceller's were found, but not one butcher's shop. This would, in both instances, be remarkable in any small town in Britain, and equally so in Ireland, where, though meat is not plenty, books on sale are too often altogether unknown. The traveller imagines that here, as in Norway, the people kill and salt their meat at the beginning of winter. This part of Sweden, and, indeed, most of its territory, is better soil than Norway. It is likewise better farmed, and possesses the great advantage of water transport for its staple product, timber. This part of Sweden, and much of its surface, is also divided among small proprietors; and the country enjoys every physical capacity of supporting its inhabitants in greater comfort; yet it struck Mr Laing that the condition of the middle and lower class is worse even in this fertile tract of Sweden than in the adjoining parts of the sister kingdom—a fact which can only be explained by their social and political condition. He gives the following reasons, among others, for this alleged inferiority in Sweden:—

The trifles I judge from are these: the houses, out-houses, and all about them appear out of repair, as if they had been built twenty or thirty years ago, and never touched since; not one in twenty of the dwelling-houses of these places has ever been painted, which these wooden walls require. In Norway, every little estate not so large apparently, nor of so good soil in general as these, has the main house, barn, cow-house, and all the valuable offices painted red, often orange, pink, or some colour which says little for the good taste, but much for the good condition of the peasant, and for his spirit of conservation, keeping in order, and in a neat state, all his property. I observe that not one house has runs or water-spouts at the roof, and very few porches with benches at the door, for the house-father to sit on and smoke his pipe in the evening. No cottage in Norway is without these appendages. The windows here are broken, the dunghill is not under cover, the collars and bells about the necks of the favourite cows, to direct the cowherd to find the cattle in the woods, are not polished and bright as in Norway. There is a want here of those little outward signs and tokens of a spirit of comfort, of a disposition to have things in order, to repair and renew, from which I infer an inferior state of well-being among the rural population here. These are trifles; but they may indicate the condition of a peasantry as truly as more important circumstances. In this land of wood and iron, the roughness and imperfection of all workmanship in these materials, must strike the most unoberving. In the houses on the road at which travellers stop, and which being privileged, must belong to the more respectable of this class, the window and door frames are nailed to the walls with clumsy nails, of which the heads are not sunk into the wood, the floors and ceilings are boarded in the same rough way, the doors are without any handles, but the key on one side, and, on the other, a piece of clumsy iron to pull it open by, and no stoves, but only hearths in the common rooms. I infer from these circumstances, that many of the useful arts, and a taste for comfort and neatness, are but in a low state in this part of Sweden, notwithstanding the steamboats and book shops. My cariole wheels are very much admired wherever I stop; they are, no doubt, well made; but are such as in almost every country parish in Norway, are made by the wheelwright for two dollars. Bedsteads are universally used in Norway by the poorest people. They are clumsy, to be sure, not unlike seamen's chests in shape; but still they are moveables, having a value as furniture. They are taken out to the green before the door in summer, and washed and scoured, and the rugs or skins forming the bedding are hung out all day, as regularly as bedding on board a ship of war. Here the common people sleep in fixed berths in the wall, one tier above another, as in a ship's cabin. This can neither be so clean nor so decent; as, from the much smaller size of the dwellings, there are not always, as in Norway, separate sleeping apartments for men and women. These may be thought very unimportant matters of observation, but they indicate, I conceive, a different degree of development of civilized habits, and modes of living in two countries, under circumstances nearly alike—and shew, as in the comparative condition of the Scotch and the English people, that the best educated and most intelligent may have made the smallest advance in the habits and modes of living that denote civilization. There must be causes, altogether independent of education, which, in this richer and better educated country, keep back the development of those habits, as compared to its poorer and more ignorant neighbour.

The rickety, decayed condition of the grey, water-soaked, wooden houses, unpainted and unrepaired, and the disorder of everything in the house-yards, gave the impression of thriftlessness and reckless poverty.

It is the best in the country for many miles round, yet, in the course of thirty-five miles through this tract, I saw not one new house building, no repairs of the old houses going on, and the steadings and outbuildings very crazy. There is some cause for the want here of those outward signs of the well-being and prosperity of the country people. The wages of common country labour are much less than here in Norway—the only travellers, indeed, I met on the road, were labourers going to seek work in Norway. If labour sells at a lower price, it is evident that both the labourer and the persons who live by supplying the labourer, can abstract less of it from the simple necessities to bestow on the gratifications of life. But why are wages less in this richer country? Here are canals, steamboats, iron works, inland trade, and a great extent of land in cultivation in estates of all sizes, and towns to consume the produce. Why is the supply of labour greater here than the demand; while, Norway, with a few or none of those advantages, is under supplied? I can only conjecture that, from the division of property in Norway, few are so entirely unconnected with it, and totally destitute, that they must sell their labour at any price. From the want of competition for work at any price, labour is both dear and bad in Norway; while in Sweden, there is a greater supply of that class who must live by work, and execute it well to get employment. This is good for the class of employers in Sweden; but there must be some unseen pressure in the social arrangements of this country upon the lower class, for it is not a natural state of things, that where employment is most abundant, wages are lowest, and the labouring class worse off.

In Sweden there is a mode of travelling enforced by the government, which ranks among the worst oppressions under which the peasantry suffer. They are compelled, at all hours and seasons, to furnish horses to travellers at a very low rate—about a penny the English mile—and at whatever inconvenience to their most important agricultural operations. A similar system we believe, exists in Russia and some of the German States; but this does not lessen its hardship in Sweden. Mr Laing fancies that this arrangement has a considerable effect in retarding the prosperity of the country; and that the practice of the servants, and also the sons, and even daughters of the farmers being compelled to lounge about the station-houses, at all hours, waiting a call, or taking their regular turn of duty, has an injurious influence on morals. The posting stations are called Skyds houses. The description of that at Orebro may give an idea of the state of the accommodations on the road. It is believed to be in much the same state as in the days of Gustavus Vasa.

It is built round a court-yard, in which horses, peasants, carts, boys, dogs, and travellers, with a few pigs, and servant girls half undressed for heat, and scudding to and from the kitchen, are mingled in glorious confusion. The bed-room, however, which I got, was much cleaner than I expected; but, for dinner, I was referred to another house, in which people keep food but not beds for travellers. Here you order a portion, according to a card or list of dishes; but, in country towns, the card seldom tells of more than three sorts of dishes, of which only one generally is of any sort of meat. If you want anything to drink, except it be anise brandy, or ale, which in general is very good, you must go to a third house, the Kallare or town's cellar, where you may get wine. Should you want a desert, you must go to a fourth, the conditor's or confectioner's, where you get pastry, coffee, and liqueurs. The Swede comes home at last to take his siesta, which all classes enjoy as regularly as in Spain or Italy at this season. The labouring people regularly sleep in the shade for an hour or two; and the middle classes go to bed after dinner during the summer.

The system of posting is evidently very oppressive. The rate paid for each horse is one-third of a dollar hence, or about 7d. sterling for the Swedish mile, equal to seven English. This is one-third less than is paid in Norway for the same distance; but neither rate can indemnify the husbandman for the loss of a day's work of horse and man, in seed-time or harvest. It is, besides, an infringement of the sacredness of property, to impress it against the owner's will, for the convenience of his fellow-subjects.

Private people of fortune, noblemen, or gentlemen not in trade or public office, do not reside in the towns. The mansion-houses of the gentry, which I have seen from the road, are large, and apparently all connected with large farms in the hands of the proprietors, the farm offices and ploughed land being close around the main dwelling, and generally an iron foundry close to it.

The Swedish nobles, when in foreign countries, boast of their constitution, and the ease and cheapness of posting in their own country; and both certainly "work well" for them.

Mr Laing has not failed to observe, what strikes every Scottish traveller, the similarity of the Swedish language to that spoken on the east coast of lowland Scotland. This similarity he accounts for by the received hypothesis of a common origin, and the circumstance of so many Scotch soldiers of fortune having repaired to Sweden in the wars of the sixteenth century, as well as from numerous Scotch travelling merchants, whom he most uncourtously terms pedlars, frequenting the great Swedish fairs. Many Scottish names are found among the Swedish nobility of the present day, such as Hamilton, Montgomerie, Seaton, Bruce, Murray, &c. In some points of traditionary and antiquarian lore, Mr Laing appears to partake largely of the scepticism of his family. The Saga themselves, the venerable and sacred Saga, he treats with as little deference and ceremony as ever his brother did Macpherson's poems of Ossian. We are not, however, disposed to enter into a controversy very shrewdly raised. "Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise."

A curious feature of Swedish political arrangements is the Indeldta system of maintaining soldiers, originated by Gustavus Adolphus. Besides the regularly enlisted troops, and the conscription or land-defence, which may be called out when required, and which is regularly trained and exercised, there are the Indeldta troops, which, in numbers, quadruple what we should call the standing army, the royal guards, &c. The Indeldta troops are established in a sort of military colonies, and maintain their families by the produce of their little farms, which consist of crown lands. When absent on duty, they receive pay. Their officers have also houses and farms proportioned to their rank. On Sundays, the Indeldta soldiers of each parish are mustered under their officers, and there is what we should call a weapon-shaw. The seamen of the royal navy are supported in the same manner, by little farms on the coast; and the cavalry horses are provided and maintained by those who farm a certain quantity of land. The farmers, however, have the use of these war-steeds under certain restrictions, and are compensated for the time they are taken away from labour. Breaches of the contract to pay the farmers, occur frequently on the part of the Government, and was one of the greatest grievances of Sweden under Gustavus III., when the country was oppressed with conscriptions. Our traveller thinks that soldiers with wives and children, cabins, and cows, and pigs, may, in cases of merely national defence, be found quite as efficient as garrison-bred troops; and, as Sweden has no colonies, and no business whatever with continental or aggressive wars, that this kind of force, which helps to maintain itself, is quite as suitable. Near Westeraas, he remarks of these soldiers, and before he was acquainted with the system—

The best of the habitations of the lower class, are little farm-houses, with some land—enough to keep a family in bread, potatoes, and milk, which appear to be a kind of military colonization scattered over the country, each house having a shield affixed, with the name of the occupier, his regiment and company. These are not retreats for worn-out soldiers, the occupiers being fine young men with families.

At Westeraas he witnessed a striking and picturesque custom, whatever its moral effect may be, which was introduced by the great Protestant leader, Gustavus—

A company of soldiers, as I thought from their appearance, of the foot guards, marched into the town yesterday, and the captain and six men were billeted upon my landlord. They were remarkably fine-looking grenadiers, well dressed in white round jackets, with yellow epaulets, and blue trousers, and all their appointments seemed substantial, clean, and soldier-like. . . . Their evening parade upon the street before our door, struck me very much. After the roll was called, and the reports and orders delivered, the commanding-officer called one of the soldiers out of the ranks, it appeared to me without turn or selection, and the whole company taking off their caps at once, this man repeated the Lord's Prayer, after which they all sung a hymn very beautifully, and the parade was dismissed. This morning early, about two o'clock, the company mustered before the door again, to march to the next halting place before the heat of the day set in. Between sleeping and waking I heard the same service repeated—the Lord's Prayer and a morning hymn sung, before they marched off. The service was not hurried over. I lasted from fifteen to twenty minutes, and was gone through as slowly and solemnly as in any religious meeting.

To the anomalous moral condition of Sweden, as brought out by statistical reports, we have already adverted, and have no wish to return to the important, though melancholy theme; so we shall, in preference, follow our tourist in his picturesque coasting voyage up the Gulf of Bothnia, and in his subsequent eccentric perambulations in the interior. He embarked at Stockholm in a nice-looking steam-vessel, which goes up the Gulf as far as Umea once a-fortnight, touching at all the intermediate ports, and which, once in the season, goes the length of Tornea, that the curious or sceptical may, with their own eyes, see the sun above the horizon at midnight. The scenery in the first part of the voyage is exceedingly beautiful, and, among the channels of the Aland isles and uninhabitable rocks, wild and unique. The coast scenery of the whole peninsula, the Skär-gård as it is called, differs from all other sea coasts. Gefle was the first place of note at which they halted. It is a thriving place, and is already of considerable maritime importance. It contains 8000 inhabitants. The houses have all gardens; and now, in July, peas and beans were in blossom. It was late, to be sure, but still they were coming, and better things were present.

The common people appear well off in this town; they keep cows, and goats, and have a considerable extent, for the size of the town, of adjoining land cultivated in garden husbandry. These are advantages of great weight in a poor household. The people evidently have employment in this town; and several large vessels on the stocks show that this place is thriving. After discharging a great deal of goods, our vessel proceeded through the same maze of islets, and, towards sunset, went up a long and beautiful sound or inlet for several miles, and stopped for the night near a little town called Sodrenhamu. We take fire-wood on board at those halting-places; coals are more expensive than wood in this quarter.

A very important fishery is carried on here—namely, the Stromming fishery—to which all the coast towns owe not a little of their rising prosperity. The stromming is a very delicate fish, about the size of a sprat, and is cured like the herring. A barrel of salted stromming is considered a necessary in every household on the coast, and over all Finland and the north of Russia. The natural craving for salt, in places where it is scarce, and very dear, is thus gratified, while a relishing article of food is obtained. From the troublesome navigation of the narrow sounds and islet channels of this coast, it is often necessary for the steamers to halt, especially if fogs come on to make night where otherwise at this season there would be no darkness. The steam-vessel accordingly halted at Hernosand, and put on shore the bishop, who had been a passenger from Stockholm.

In all the places we touched at, the people shewed a respect and interest which only a good man in any station could receive; for it was voluntary, and from all ranks of people, not merely from the clergy who came to wait on him. Bishop Frantzen is one of the most distinguished poets this country has produced. He asked me to pay him a visit on my way back. I wonder if ever an English bishop asked a Swedish traveller whom he met in a steamboat, to visit him? Yet, in talent and social influence, our bench of bishops can certainly produce no individual equal to the Bishop of Hernosand. The rest of our passengers are gentlemen in business, one or two students from Upsala, and two German shipmasters going to purchase a vessel.

It does one good to hear of so apostle-like a bishop, were it but for the rarity of the character. One more snatch of manners is thus given as the traveller touched on Umea.

Last night, before the gale came on, we sat on deck; and a lady, who in any country would have been called beautiful, played the guitar, and sang Italian airs as we glided over the smooth sea in the evening sunbeams. Can this be the road to Lapland, I thought, or am I coasting on the Adriatic? It is rather ridiculous, when we consider on the spot the false impressions which travellers give us of distant places—innocently, no doubt, because these are their real impressions received in an excited state of mind. This Umea, and all the towns I have passed, are, in sober reality, very like our own coast-side towns of the same population. The people earn their living in the same way, by the fisheries, the trade of ship building, and the supplying the neighbouring country with ware. The people are clad in the same way—the peasantry very like our own Scotch country people. In some respects the difference appears to me in favour of the little towns here. They are more open and airy, the streets better paved and cleaner; the houses more roomy and nice, the meanest with window-curtains and blinds, and flower-pots in the windows, and much better washed and scoured. The inns are better. I am here in a more comfortable, cleaner house, than any of our smaller towns in the north of Scotland, excepting, perhaps, Inverness, can boast of. In this little town of 1100 inhabitants, at the distance of 470 miles from the capital, there are two booksellers' shops, in which I found a good stock of modern books, among others the "Life of Columbus," by Washington Irving, in English. All the comforts, conveniences, and, to judge by the appearance of the ladies and gentlemen, the elegancies of a refined life, are to be found in as great abundance as in our small towns, and perhaps even extending lower in society, from the daily mode of living being less costly. In the appearance or habits of the people, there is nothing to give you the idea of ignorance, rawness, or a low state of manners. There is nothing of Lapland here, except, perhaps, in the food. I had seen graf lax, that is, rough salmon, or, in other words, raw salmon, on the carte of a restaurateur in Stockholm; and, seeing other people eat it with relish, I called for a portion of it too, but could not bring myself to swallow a slice of raw fish. Here it was put down for breakfast, along with slices of smoked salmon, and slices of smoked reindeer flesh; but none of these articles had ever been on the fire. The two German shipmasters breakfasted at the same time, but could make nothing of these raw materials. I determined to try, since such is the food of the country—and I must live like the people of the country to know how they live—and with oil, vinegar, and pimento, which is used here instead of black pepper, I found graf lax, not a bad a thing. I can understand that a taste for it may be readily acquired. . . . Dinner was well dressed; and, except that custard over the spinage is not our way of using these eatables, presented nothing different from Stockholm. The linen, beds, and every article in the household being clean, nice, and in order, the servant girls very neatly dressed, and the kitchen as nice and bright as in any English house, the difference between this town and the chief towns, for instance, of Ross-shire or Caithness, in the comforts or refinements of civilised life, do not strike me as marking any balance against the capital of Umea Lapmark.

Steam navigation has already conferred immense benefits on this coast. Where a sailing vessel could formerly make only three voyages in the year from Umea to the Baltic, people now get all they want once a fortnight by steam.

This is the frontier capital of those scattered colonies, consisting of people from the more southern parts of Sweden, who have formed numerous settlements in the wilds and forests of Lapmark. Mr Laing resolved to visit those remote and solitary clearings, as far as he could find a road through the forests. He went first to Degersfors, a town of about 1200 inhabitants, and afterwards inspected several of the insulated clearings in remoter spots in the woods. The settlers seem in much the same condition as those in the worst parts of Upper Canada, or of Nova Scotia, but one to which a very inferior soil and climate denies the hope of that improvement which must take place in America. Amidst the general poverty, the log-cabins of the settlers were clean, which can hardly be affirmed of the shanties of the Scotch and Irish emigrants in Canada; and those who had been here for some time were drawing comforts around them. It is the custom of this thinly-populated region for travellers to stay at the manse or parsonage when one is to be found; but, as our traveller wished to remain for some days, instead of throwing himself upon the hospitality of the clergyman, he found lodgings with one of the settlers; where he obtained milk and fish, and "everything remarkably clean." The settlers manufacture saltpetre, which is received by the government in payment of the direct taxes levied on all the Swedish peasantry. They also make potash; and tar promises to become an important article of manufacture were restrictions once abolished and roads opened. Mr Laing gives an account of the process. The labour of transporting the barrels of tar out of the forest to the river side is at present a great and serious drawback on this branch of industry: and tarmaking is therefore at present a very poor trade. Flax and hemp are grown on most of the farms, and spinning-wheels and looms for weaving the woollen and linen clothing of the family, are found in every cottage in the north of Sweden. There follows on this information some sound remarks on national economy.

The rule in every family in Sweden, high or low, is to do as much as possible by household industry, without going to market. It is impossible that trade or manufactures can be in any very flourishing state, where, from habit, want of money, and distance from towns, this has become the prevailing mode of living. People only buy what they cannot possibly exist without, and cannot make any substitute for themselves—and these are but few articles. It is quite as necessary to train a people to consume as to manufacture, to exchange rapidly industry for industry. The want of this home market, in which a man can sell his own products, and buy such as he requires, and the want of any desire to do so, are the natural consequences of the selling and buying being restricted to privileged persons and places. A people in this state never can make any advance of importance in trade or manufacture; and Sweden is in this state.

It was while at Degersfors that Mr Laing discovered those out-door worshippers, forming the germ of religious dissent in Sweden, whom we have already noticed. To these poor settlers he gave some useful lessons in fly-fishing. Though their living depends so much on fishing, their apparatus is exceedingly rude and ill-constructed. Mr Laing says they are behind the Highlanders in their fishing-tackle; but they seem even behind the despised aborigines of Australia. They were quite delighted with their own success when practising Mr Laing's mode, and will doubtless long remember their benevolent instructor. The poorest of the new settlers had no other bread than that made of bark-meal; but it is probable that their small crops might, by the end of July, when Mr Laing visited them, have been exhausted. Those who have rye use half and half, and the bread of mixed rye and ground bark is far from being uneatable. "The ruddy cheeks of the country girls prove that it is no unwholesome food, qualified, no doubt, as it is, with plenty of milk and butter, and hard work." A thin-skinned, fine-haired, delicate, small-boned animal like the Alderney cow, either white, or dun and white, is the cow of this cold region. It is a finer breed than any Mr Laing saw in his over-land journey back to Stockholm, and the cows were also good milkers.

The population of these Lapland parishes has increased rapidly of late, in consequence of emigration. The land is ceded by the Government on easy terms; but our traveller believes little advance can be made towards prosperity, here or elsewhere, until the system of exclusive privilege in trade and dealing, be abolished all over the kingdom, and the drudges in the manufacture of tar, saltpetre, and potash for the benefit of the privileged mercantile class, the kings of the country, are free to labour for themselves, and able to secure the whole fruits of their industry. Provision is made by the state for the education and religious instruction of the people; but, among a population so poor and scattered, it is necessarily scanty. Every third Sunday is observed with more solemnity than the others; and, as the worshippers have to travel very far to church, they also very naturally transact their secular business before or after service. There are booths around all the churches for the shelter of the horses and the accommodation of the people; and, bringing fodder for their horses, and provisions along with them, they make themselves at home. The law of Charles XI., which makes it imperative on the clergy to have every Swedish subject taught to read, and that which prevents every man and woman from marrying who has not taken the Lord's Supper, and from communicating until they can read and are instructed in their religious creed, has kept up education even in these wildernesses. Besides the fixed and ambulatory schools of these wide parishes, children are taught at home by their parents. Laestadius, the missionary already mentioned, was the son of one of those poor and lonely settlers in the forest, placed at forty miles distance from any other habitation:—

"Yet, with all their poverty," he says, "and all their striving for the most pressing necessities of life, our parents never forgot or put off the teaching us to read. Before we could well speak, our father taught us our prayers; and these were the first thing in the morning and the last at night. Our mother spared no pains to teach us to read in a book; and at five years of age, I could read any Swedish book, and at six could give reasonable answers to questions on the head points of Christianity." This, too, was the house life of the poorest of the poor among new settlers; for fish, the making glue from the reindeer's horns they could gather, and a little dairy produce, were all the means of subsistence which the parents of Petrus Laestadius had. I find, from the same interesting work, that here in Norland, learning is held in such respect, that students, who have concluded their course of education at the Gymnasium in Hernösand, but want means to follow out their studies at the university, receive recommendations from the consistory, and a permission to collect a viaticum for themselves within certain parishes; "and every peasant thinks it a duty to give them something, generally twelve skilling; and the poor scholar will thus collect from 300 to 700 dollars." These are curious traits of ancient manners—

—And of existing manners likewise. These students are exactly the same as the hedge-scholars which form the great body of the priests and schoolmasters of the Roman Catholics of Ireland.

Returning to Umeå, Mr Laing began to set his face towards the more civilized regions. The farther behind he left Umeå, the more the soil improved, and the growth of the trees became more luxuriant. The country was again not a forest, but one of ridges and cultivated hollows, occupied by little lakes, sometimes connected with narrow arms or sounds of the Baltic. He was now in Angermanland, which somewhat resembles a primitive manufacturing district in England. The loom was heard going in every house, and the banks of every rivulet had webs of linen spread on them to bleach. The manufactures are entirely domestic; the whole is carried on upon the little farm on which the flax is grown, and is managed by the females of the family, save the ploughing and the sowing of the flax seed:—

It is not, however, confined to linen for household use, or for the family clothing. The linen is sold all over the kingdom; and at one little inn, Borsta, there was a table laid out, as we sometimes see in manufacturing districts in England, with products of the place. I was shewn linen which appeared remarkably fine, at one dollar forty skillings per ell, about three shillings sterling, and was told the whole piece of seventy-seven ells weighed only eight pounds. . . . The people of these two countries, north and south Angermanland, seem to unite, on a small scale, all the advantages of a manufacturing and agricultural population, more fully than any district I have ever seen. The land is all in small estates in the possession of the peasants. The men do the farm business: the women are driving a not less profitable branch of industry. There is full employment at the loom or in spinning, for old and young of the female sex. Servants are no burden. About the houses and inside, there is all the cleanliness and neatness of a thriving manufacturing, and the abundance of an agricultural population. The table linen laid down even for our glass of milk and piece of bread, is always clean; the beds and sheets always nice and white. Everybody is well clad, for their manufacturing is like their farming—for their own use in the first place, and the surplus, only as a secondary object, for sale; and, from the number of little nick-nacks in their households, such as good tables and chairs, window-curtains and blinds—which no hut is without—clocks, fine bedding, papered rooms, and a few books, it is evident that they lay out their winnings on their comforts, and that they are not on a low scale of social well-being, but on as high a scale as such of our artisans as have a clear view of constant living by their trades. This is Sweden. It is here in the northern provinces, that what a country may justly be proud of, is realized.

This is the character of manufactures in which the moralist and the philanthropist delight—this natural union of agriculture with the congenial branches of domestic industry. Mr Laing hopes that the spinning-mill and power-loom might not deteriorate the condition of this happily-situated manufacturing and agricultural population. We look back to certain parts of Lancashire and Cheshire, and other English counties, only half a century since, and tremble at the idea of change in Angermanland. This appears the best part of Sweden for the lower and middle class. As the traveller proceeds southward, their condition deteriorates, and domestic manufactures, with a surplus for sale, are much less frequent. The houses are also inferior, the fences ragged, the roads or paths in the hamlets bad and dirty; yet a certain rude plenty in the mode of living approximates the peasantry here to those of Norway. "Five meals a-day are regularly taken, even by those using bark meal. Fish, meat, cheese, milk, and gruel—that is, meal with milk, or with meat-soup, (not meal-and-water gruel)—are the articles of diet. Dried rein-deer meat, smoked salmon, mutton, and game are the solid articles of food." The mid-day sleep is as regularly taken by all ranks at this season as in Spain or Italy. But the mid-day sleep was, not very long ago, the practice of the agricultural parts of England. Crabbe gives an amusing account of the domestic life of a primitive family of proprietors in Suffolk or Norfolk, (we forget which,) with whom he was connected, where, after the hall was swept and the fires made up, on the conclusion of the noon-day meal or dinner, mistress, master, and servant retired for an hour to bed!—after which the lord of the manor—for it was a manor-house—resorted to his cool tankard and pipe, and the females recommenced their domestic occupations.

Mr Laing notes a trait of national manners very characteristic of the two countries, in which he travelled: the one free, hearty, and independent; the other polished by a court extending its influence to the lowest grades of society. The boys who take back the horses used by travellers in posting, receive a small gratuity—

If you pay the Norwegian boy a little more than he expects, he hawls out Tak! Tak! (thanks, thanks) like the clapping together of two deal boards; seizes your hand, and gives it a squeeze and hearty shake, which makes your bones ache; the Swedish sighs out his Tak omdyggest (thanks most humbly) kisses the back of your hand, and retires, making his obeisances with a grace which many a country gentleman at Queen Victoria's court might envy. In Norway, if you give a penny to a child, or alms to a beggar, you can scarcely get off without a shake of the hand: the more polished Swede kisses your sleeve or the skirt of your coat. You always get clean sheets and nice bedding at the poorest inn in Sweden; and our road-side inns in Scotland, even in the south, in many burgh towns, are not to be compared to the Swedish. At this season strawberries and milk, eggs, fish, raw salmon, which you may get roasted for your own eating, are to be found every where, and excellent coffee; but the fare generally is scanty, and travellers who are particular, should bring a provision basket with them, well stocked. The gæstgäfvärd, which formidable word is expressed by our three letters—inn, has generally a separate building for lodging the guests in, apart from the family house, and which, like a manse, is built by the parish. The innkeeper is a kind of public parish officer, having jurisdiction in disputes about post horses, turns of duty, and so on; and must keep regular lists of these, which are inspected and countersigned by the local functionaries once a month. He is also authorized to examine the passports of all travellers, and must enter them in his day-book. Sweden has all the trammels of the French system of passports, upon the internal communications of the natives. The artisan and labouring man cannot move from one place to another without passports and waste of time.

Travelling over so much of the scene of the wanderings of Gustavus Vasa—over a country as remarkable in the history of Sweden as are Banckburn and Culloden, or the isles and fastnesses where Bruce and Charles Edward found shelter, in Scottish story—gives rise to long historical reminiscences, and to speculations, to which we cannot advert, contented with the following description of the brave and loyal Dalecarlians, which is both interesting and instructive:—

The Dalecarlians—the men of the dales and valleys—take the same place in the Swedish population, that the mountaineers or Highlanders do in other countries. They are the most simple, hardy, and unchanged in their mode of living. The dales or valleys are the two great river-basins, with the many side branches of the Vesterdal and Osterdal rivers, which unite in the neighbourhood of Fahlun, and form one called Dal river, running into the sea at Elvcarleby, about ten miles south of Gefle. The family of valleys, straths, glens, dales, might perhaps be divided with advantage into two classes—those formed and divided from each other by parallel ridges of mountains or connected hills, and those which are depressions in a table land, without any ridges of mountains, and independent of them. The Dals are of this character. Unlike towards the Norwegian Fjelde, no chains of mountain elevations divide the branches of the Dal river from each other, or the Clar river on one side, and the J.ynne on the other. This land of valleys is inhabited by a people, in number 133,895 individuals, who retain much of the ancient simplicity of manners, mode of living, and dress. The Dalecarle still thinks himself, as our Highlanders do, of a superior caste, and adheres proudly to his white wadmal coat, his breeches with huge buttons and knee buckles; his hose gartered below the knee; and his wife to her red stockings, high-heeled shoes, and yellow cap. Every parish or dale, however, has some peculiar colour or stripe, but all the women use this shoe with a high-heel or prop under the hinder part of the foot. It has given them a peculiar kind of gait, from the back sinews not being so much exerted, and the fore sinews more. When they are walking barefoot at this season, they bring the fore part of the foot first to the ground, as soldiers of old used to be drilled in vain to do. I can distinguish a Dal woman walking barefoot by her gait. It is an evil attending this adherence to their ancient dress, dwellings, and modes of living, that they have acquired no tastes or habits counteracting the tendency to over-multiplication; no expensive wants, rendering marriage incompatible with habitual gratifications, or with social standing. They have, from want of these checks, married and multiplied, and divided their little properties, to an extent similar to what, from the same cause, takes place among tenantry in Ireland. Government, under different reigns, has attempted to check this subdivision of property, by laws establishing a minimum; but such an arbitrary interference with the rights of property of course has failed, for what law can come between buyer and seller, or parents and children, in family arrangements? If government had elevated the tastes and habits of the people, by giving them free access to the objects of expensive gratification (by a free trade,) the checks to a too minute subdivision of property, would have been implanted in the people themselves. People accustomed to cotton and linen, would not marry to be clothed in wadmal, or to beget children who are thought suitably clothed in a sheep-skin, with the wool inwards. The contrast between this people and the Norlanders, the people of Angermanland, is very striking and instructive. Both are, in general, proprietors of the land they live on; but the latter, probably from living nearer to the sea coast and the small towns which supply their wants, have acquired those tastes and demands for objects of luxury, or rather civilisation, which prevent their subdividing their lands into portions too small for a subsistence, according to their ideas of what is necessary for a family. There is no over-multiplication in the north, because the most indigent household must have a house of two or three rooms, a good bed, linen, a kitchen, with several copper vessels, and plates and dishes, a clock, a loom, and many other articles which cannot be gathered together without time and money, and without which, people, according to their ideas, could not set up as married housekeepers. Here the ancient frugality keeps the people to the ancient simple wants of what will satisfy the cravings of nature for food and warmth. A single room hut, a slip of land, a few goats, and the ancient dress, the finery inherited perhaps from former generations, satisfy these. They are not worse off in their squalor than their neighbours; their forefathers lived so. On these therefore, as on a sufficiency, they marry, and multiply and deteriorate. A royal proclamation, or edict, of 1827, fixed a minimum for the subdivision of estates, by ordering that each distinct possession should be sufficient for the maintenance of three working people, reckoning for that an extent equal to foddering, summer and winter, one horse or a pair of draught oxen, three or four cows, and five or six sheep or goats. Experience has proved, that from nine to fifteen tunneland, or seven one-third to twelve one-third imperial acres, would be the average size of such lots. But the Dalecarlians had a special permission from Charles IX. to divide their lands as they pleased. It would be dangerous to tamper with the ancient rights or prejudices of such a people, and besides, however well meant, such an interference of a government with the rights of owners to sell their properties in such parcels as they please, is opposed to all principle, might be adopted in Turkey, or in France before the Revolution, but is a century behind the spirit of our times, even in the most absolute kingdoms. . . .

The valleys—Dalarne—is a name applied to this district of country, as appropriately as the Highlands with us, to a district of an opposite description. The tract from Fahlun to the little town Hudemora, is a chain of small valleys, or depressions in the ground, filled in the bottom generally with a little lake, and divided from each other only by gentle elevations, and very frequently by those sandy aases, which I have before mentioned, running across them. The houses and soil improve, and properties apparently are much larger the lower down the country I come. High up in the valley-country there is unusual distress, as the crops for seven years successively, have been very scanty all over Sweden, and in the northern districts and these high above the sea level, have been total failures. On the roads, one meets little children of six or seven years of age apparently, from their starved and stunted growth, carrying bundles on their backs, and seeking a living for themselves, with hunger in their looks. I have met to-day, ten or twelve families of these primitive looking Dalecarlians in their white woollen clothing and slouched hats—their dress resembling, and perhaps originally copied from, that of the monks and nuns—some with carts conveying the old people and their goods, emigrating to the coast side, to buy or beg their bread, until their crops at home are ripe. These people are not habitually beggars, nor do they ever ask for charity. They are, on the contrary, very ingenious workmen, and many of the peasantry carry about basket-work, garden tools, wooden clocks, and even watches of their own making, for sale, and in this way earn a living for the summer half-year, when the crops of their own little patches of land do not suffice to keep them. The restraints upon the exercise of trades and sale of wares press heavily upon these people, whose wandering traffic in summer is absolutely necessary for their subsistence, as their portions of land could not keep them all the year round. It is winked at by the authorities, as a matter of necessity, and complained of by the privileged tradesmen and dealers, as inroads upon their rights and means of living.

The press is under a rigid censorship in Sweden, and the government is perpetually and capriciously interfering with it; while the editors, upheld by public opinion, are dexterous in eluding its mandates. Mr Laing found the inhabitants of Gefle in great excitement on his return there, from their newspaper having been suppressed. This was attended with serious inconvenience to advertisers, or it might not have been so much heeded. The only effect of the suppression was the editor sending round a humorous card, at the usual time of delivery of the paper, announcing the death of his first-born, and recommending his second paper under a new name. In Stockholm there is now in circulation the "Twenty-fifth Aftonblad," twenty-four having been suppressed. These petty skirmishes and feuds, in which the government is sure to be beaten in the long-run, are inconceivably silly; for there is, in fact, much more difficulty in commencing a newspaper in this country, where the press is said to be free, than in Sweden. The giving in the names of every proprietor, and the security to be found to the Stamp-Office, are all so many heavy obstructions to publication, which we owe to the Pitt period. On reaching Stockholm, it was found in yet greater excitement, in consequence of the rigorous prosecution of Mr Crusentolphe—a gentleman connected with the press—for the publication of a pamphlet in which he betrayed an attempt which had been made by the Government to purchase his silence. He made other accusations against the Ministers, and it was held that to asperse the Council was to asperse the King! He was tried by a packed jury, and condemned to three years' imprisonment in a fortress. Yet Berzelius, the celebrated Swedish chemist, was on this jury; and Mr Laing hopes that the law only may be bad, and that the case was fairly tried. But the general impression was, that Mr Crusentolphe had suffered gross injustice under legal forms; and, in consequence, a great assemblage of well-dressed people, of the middle class, attended him on his committal to prison; and, by their cheers, testified their disapprobation of the sentence and the Government. There was considerable agitation. The windows of the minister of public justice were broken by the people; and, on the other hand, cannon were planted in the streets, the palace was protected by troops, patrols were everywhere in motion, and cavalry was posted in the squares, and other places, as if a general insurrection had been apprehended. And this in a quiet capital of only 80,000 people! Mr Laing imagined this much-ado-about-nothing a ruse of the Government, to create alarm, to excite sympathy, and to produce a display of loyal feelings, by an affected demonstration of fear.

From Stockholm, the traveller visited one of the most interesting points in the past history of European civilization, and one which may probably again become of nearly equal importance—the island of Gothland. He went in a small steam-vessel, and was two days of reaching the dilapidated, but ever-interesting town of Wisby—"a city of the middle ages," and the mother of the Hanseatic towns. The appearance, from the sea, of this ruinous northern Tyre is very striking, from the numerous remains of churches, and other ancient structures, huddled together in a very small space. The tourist remarks—

I counted thirty-five towers, spires, or prominent ruins. On landing, the aspect is equally novel. Ancient streets, well paved, cross each other in all directions, and the causeway-work, with two or three parallel bands, or stripes of larger paving stones, running lengthwise through the streets, looks ornamental, or at least regular. I have seen such paving about some cathedral in England. The houses on each side of these ancient streets, are in general poor cabins, with gardens, potato-ground, and corn crops, all huddled together, among ruins of churches of very extraordinary beauty and workmanship, and, as ruins, in very picturesque preservation. The whole city is surrounded by its ancient wall, with towers—square, octagonal, and round, as they stood in the thirteenth century, and with very little demolition. The wall is entire, and above thirty feet high, for the greater part, and is in no place demolished. Of forty-five towers upon it, the greater part are entire; some are roofed in, and used as magazines, a prison, storehouses, or workshops.

This curious city (which might accommodate within its area and along its paved streets 30,000 or 40,000 people) contains at present only 4,268 inhabitants, badly lodged in little tenements, under edifices of great cost and magnificence, which the former inhabitants reared with the superfluity of their wealth. You scarcely see a human being moving in streets once crowded with the wealthiest merchants of all countries. In the earlier part of the middle ages, and before the Hans towns were heard of, Wisby had long been the great emporium of commerce in the north of Europe: the market, in which the productions, even of the East, brought by caravans to Novgorod and across the Baltic, met the furs and metals of the north, and the buyers of the south of Europe.

Wisby was, in the tenth and eleventh centuries, (two hundred years before the establishment of the Hanseatic league, in 1241,) one of the most important commercial cities in Europe. Its mercantile laws were regarded as the most perfect, and they were transferred to France by Saint Louis, whose code of the Isle of Oleron was copied from the constitutions of Wisby; and these contain the principles of maritime, mercantile, and international law, as now adopted in all civilized countries. Wisby had a population of 12,000 burghesses, besides labourers, tradesmen, women and children, in the thirteenth century. The foreigners in the eleventh century were so numerous, that each nation had its own church and house of assembly.

Wisby declined as Lubeck gradually became the seat of the Hanseatic power. It was stormed and sacked, in 1361, by Waldemar of Denmark, and afterwards became alternately the prey of the Lubeckers and Danes, until it formed, in the middle of the fifteenth century, the robber-nest of Eric, the expelled King of Sweden. The churches are described as the most interesting Gothic edifices in Europe; and Wisby is pronounced the Rome of those who would study Gothic architecture in its purity. The island of Gothland is a table of limestone, between 80 and 150 feet above the sea level, 77 miles in length, and 35 in breadth. The population is about 40,000, spiritually taught by 93 clergymen; and, in this detached or isolated community, morals are in as low a condition as in the continental part of the kingdom. In 1837, one person in every 277 of these happy islanders had been condemned for some offence; and 84 out of the 147 condemned were convicted, for what, in any civilized country, would be punished as moral offences, or one in every 484 persons of the whole population; and, of these, 41 were convicted of crimes of great moral turpitude. This is certainly a much higher average than in any part of Great Britain, or even in poor Ireland; and Mr Laing returns to his former charge, or to his solution of the difficulty, and again avers—

That bad government, bad legislation, bad social arrangements, are the great demoralizing agents in human society; that drunkenness and ignorance are but secondary causes—often effects as well as causes, of a low moral sense—and that there is gross inconsistency in the conduct of the many sincere and good men, who wish to diminish immorality and crime, yet oppose all reform or change in political or social institutions.

In Sweden he had previously contended, that one main cause of crime was

To be looked for in the great pressure of the upper privileged classes upon the time, labour, and property of the lower; in the servile condition, in a word, of the mass of the population. Their low civil condition—their state of restriction and pupillage, in all that relates to the free use and enjoyment of their industry and property—works out of a low moral condition, which even religious knowledge and education cannot elevate. If this suggestion be correct, it brings out, in a clear light, the true value of reform in civil institutions, and of giving every man in a community, his just and natural political rights, where these have been invaded and appropriated by fictitious divisions, classes, and social arrangements of darker ages, as the only foundations for a truly religious and moral condition of society: it shows the intimate connection between morals and politics, and that the principles which are called liberal or radical, are closely united with the cause of religion and morality, and their influences upon human conduct; and that the many pious and good men, who boast themselves conservative in all existing establishments, and opposed to the principles of reform, are involved in a contradiction, are upholding social arrangements which render the diffusion of knowledge and religion among mankind altogether nugatory. It is clearly no defect in the physical condition of the Swedish people, that produces this extraordinary moral state. It is a defect in their civil and political condition. Compared to the cottier or labourer in Scotland, the Swedish peasant is better provided with physical comforts: he is far better lodged, better fed; his access to fuel and food better in general; but his property can scarcely be called his own; he has it nominally, and has it not really, for it is withdrawn from him by exactions, of so old standing, and so involved with rights of great classes in the community, that, like our tithes, they have become a property. He has no freedom of mind, no power of dissent in religious opinion from the established church; because, although toleration nominally exists, a man not baptized, confirmed, and instructed by the clergyman of the establishment, could not communicate in the established church, and could not marry, or hold office, or exercise any act of majority as a citizen; would, in short, be an outlaw: he has no freedom of action, for the system of passports, as it existed in France after the conscription was established, as a necessary branch of that system for preventing the escape of conscripts, is, together with the conscription, established over Sweden in full force.

They are subject to corporal chastisement from their masters, for negligence in their duty; and this house discipline is sanctioned by law (5 cap. 14, Hundels Balk), of the present reign. It reduces this class to the state of serfs, who may be cudgelled at pleasure.

The condition of married agricultural labourers is very inferior to that of the Norwegian housemen; yet they are, in point of mere food and shelter, as well off as the agricultural labourers of Great Britain, or better, allowing for the difference in the established standard of living in this country. "It is," concludes Mr Laing, after having elaborately dissected their social condition—

It is evidently not owing to any defect or inferiority in their physical condition, in their food or comforts, but in their civil condition, in their want of self-respect, from the want of self-direction, and of equal law, under a meddling and arbitrary system of government, that this mass of the population is demoralized. These two classes of labourers pay a direct tax to the state, a poll-tax on each male and female above seventeen years of age. The torpare's landlords have to pay the taxes affecting their portions of land, as part of the hemmans, but reckon with them for it; and all have to pay the various dues to the clergy and parish functionaries, and are subject to the very onerous conscription, or military exercise during the summer, to the able-bodied men, which is a grievous tax upon the time of the labouring class, and from the system of passports, necessarily connected with it, an impediment to the free circulation of labour. The corn-laws also press severely on this class. It is a fixed duty on corn imported, and therefore upon a sound principle; but the rapacity of government and the class of landowners have fixed it one-half too high, so that when crops fail, government is obliged suddenly to reduce the duty. In consequence of this frequent interference, the merchant is afraid to import a stock of grain, when prices are moderate; and the country has, therefore, to pay the alarm price. Grain, for instance, has been this year about three times the average price, or twenty-one dollars for what usually costs seven dollars. It has now, before any new grain can be in the market, fallen to fourteen dollars. With a more moderate duty, requiring no abatement, and a steady adherence of government to it, the country would have been supplied ever since last crop, at or under fourteen dollars, instead of paying one-third more to the foreign merchant.

The elective system in Sweden, and the Constitution of the different Chambers of the Diet, is vicious in the extreme. The clergy, who form one Chamber of the Diet—elected by themselves, from their own body—are declared, notwithstanding their dependence on court-favour, for appointments and provision for their families, to be the most independent of the four Chambers. Poverty prevents many of the nobility from attending the Diet at all. One of their many privileges is exemption from taxes, which, in the land-tax alone, throws a burden of from 54 to 225 per cent. on the taxed lands. This gross abuse has been extended by the pretended remedy, which leaves all formerly privileged lands exempt from the impost, although the purchasers should not be noble.

The last Chamber of Burgesses consisted of 47 members—of whom 15 were burgomasters, appointed such by the crown; 10 counsellors; and 4 counsellors of commerce, all under the influence of the crown. But, of the entire Diet, in its four Chambers—consisting of 718 members—no more than 18 in the house of nobles, 25 in the house of burgesses, and 122 in the house of peasants, were not visibly connected by office with the executive, or the court. This is quite conclusive. The house of nobility represents about 13,000 persons, and property valued at 75,000,000 of dollars; the house of clergy, 14,000 persons, and 1,000,000 of dollars; the house of burgesses, about 66,000 individuals, and about 35,000,000 of dollars. Yet these three Chambers have each as much influence as the house of the people, representing 2,000,000 of a population, and 175,000,000 of dollars. Another class—described as people of condition, not nobles, nor yet burgesses, but amounting to 72,417 persons, having property taxed for 59,000,000 of dollars—are not represented at all. Upon the whole, it does not appear that the Swedish representative system need be the envy of surrounding nations. The constitution abounds in those beautiful counter-movements denominated checks. There is a plentiful supply of the means of justice in Sweden; and Mr Laing believes that, however faulty the system of legislation may be, the machinery for its administration has much in it to be commended. We find here a complaint which is becoming frequent in countries nearer home. The alienation of Finland has lessened the business of the courts; and, as the same number of individuals have to live by the profession, forms and writings are needlessly multiplied, under the appearance of doing something, by those who, failing of business, want bread. But much ado about nothing naturally pervades all the public departments of a country which has so many noble and semi-noble cormorants to feed. To return to Gothland, Mr Laing predicts that—

This island will some day be considered the most important political point in the north of Europe. From its geographical position, it is a padlock upon the gulfs of Finland and Bothnia, which, in the hands of an effective power, would lock up the Russian navy as in a pond, and secure the free navigation of the Baltic.

Much sagacious political speculation follows, and is wound up by the assertion that Russia will speedily possess herself of this important outpost, to which seizure the Gothlanders may not be very averse. The climate of this island is remarkably mild. In favourable seasons and situations, the grape, the white mulberry, and the walnut ripens; and the winter is of short duration. Land is very cheap; and could foreigners be assured about the tranquillity of the island, and who are to be its future lords, agricultural emigrants might be tempted to settle in Gothland. Mr Laing visited one farm on sale, consisting of 854 acres of good land—much of it, however, not yet cleared of wood—of which the price was £580 sterling. Another, of 367 English acres—40 of them fine loam, producing wheat and rye, six returns; 50, in natural grass for hay; 120, in three fields, for pasturage; and 150 underwood, giving fuel and fences—was valued at £375. There were suitable and convenient farm and cotter houses on these estates. Another farm, with the houses not so good, was valued at £200. These farms are situated only a few miles from the town. Cattle, horses, and wages are proportionably cheap.

There may be persons who will like to im-pute the low morality of the Gothlanders to the following circumstance. The church tithe is not here paid to the Crown, but directly to the clergyman, and always reasonably settled; for this good reason, that the parishioners are entitled to choose one of three candidates sent them by the consistory; and it is a fixed custom to elect him who bargains to be the most moderate in his future demands! One can hardly blame the tithe-payers.

Mr Laing spent the winter of 1836, and great part of the year 1837, in Christiania; and, at the end of his Swedish tour, he returns, in idea, to Norway, the land of his love and admiration, to conclude his work. He may like Norway all the better for so closely resembling Scotland in the appearance, manners, and dress of the higher orders. Save the absence of the marble chimney-piece, the cheerful, open fire, and the bright-coloured hearth-rug and carpet, a traveller, he says—

Transported by the fairies some fine winter night across the north sea, from an evening party in Prince's Street, in Edinburgh, to one in Prindsen's Gade in Christiania, would scarcely know, if he had caught cold enough in his flight to be deaf to the difference of language, that he had changed the scene.

Perhaps the description of the condition of the middle and lower classes in Christiania, in which, we regret to say, no such striking similarity with the Scotch exists, will be as pleasing to our readers as the spectacle of their enjoyment was delightful to the traveller:—

Their tastes and social enjoyments come close up to those of the higher classes, and are the same in kind. Visiting each other, drawing, music, cards, assemblies, do not, either in England or Scotland, enter into the usual social enjoyments of our lower or even middle class; there is neither time or reliab for them in the poor man's family, nor even in the thriving man's. But here all follow these enjoyments from taste; these classes have their public balls, entertainments, and even masquerades. With us, such meetings of the lower orders would be scenes of tumult and riot, frequented only by the idle and profligate; the peace-officer would, in the end, be the master of the ceremonies. Here young persons of both sexes, of unblemished reputation, belonging to the middle and lower classes, frequent them as freely and innocently as those of the higher class do their public entertainments; decorum and propriety are as strictly observed, and improper characters are carefully excluded. There is no evil peculiarly attached to these enjoyments from the low rank or conduct of the parties: if evil there be, it is common to all such enjoyments, whether followed by high or low. Is this community of tastes among the different classes of society, of good or bad tendency? If these enjoyments be good for one class, they must, I conceive, be good for another: they have, undoubtedly, their humanising effects on the character and manners;—their diffusion among all, serves to knit together the different classes by one common mode of living. It is a dangerous fault in the structure of society in Britain, that the higher and lower classes have too little in common with each other—too few points of contact: their enjoyments, occupations, modes of living, and amusements, are so distinct, that they live like different tribes, accidentally inhabiting together the same land. It is perhaps the weightiest objection to the late alteration in the administration of the poor laws, and to the proposed alterations in the establishment of the grand juries, and of the local unpaid county magistracy, that these three links—bad as they are said to be, alone connect the upper with the lower classes in England, by some kinds of common business and interests. Cut these away, and perform such business by paid functionaries, and the whole body of English gentry might fly up to the moon some evening in Mr Green's balloon, and not be missed by the other classes. A participation in the same tastes, and the same kinds of social enjoyments and modes of living, would raise the lower class to a higher level in the scale of civilization, and connect the parts of the social body more firmly together. The evil of such an improvement in the tastes and habits of the lower class is, that, in the unhappy condition into which the financial difficulties of almost every government has plunged the great body of the people, the expense of what is necessary for the bare existence of a family is so great, that the most innocent enjoyments must be restrained, and even rare and moderate indulgence on the part of the labouring man is imprudent. This evil, however, does not belong to the diffusion of refined tastes and enjoyments, but to the effects of excessive taxation, and of a faulty distribution of property in society;—the mass of the community is obliged to make it the main object of life merely to live, not to enjoy. It is a curious and lamentable truth, that, in this poor country, not producing, even in ordinary years, the corn it consumes by 200,000 quarters, there is, by the better distribution of property, and the better financial state of the government, a much greater share of the enjoyments of life, and of a more refined kind, among the middle and lower classes, than in Britain, with all her wealth.

This is a passage which statesmen should ponder. We may remark here, that, under its new constitution, the public debt of Norway is hastening to extinction; and that taxation, in consequence, is already lightened.

Larger acquaintance with the north of Europe did not increase the traveller's esteem for the King of Sweden, who, instead of imitating the policy of Vasa and his heroic descendants, and placing himself in the front of a rising interest in Europe—civil liberty and constitutional rights being now, what freedom of conscience and religious liberty were to them—has been, by the whole character of his reign, opposed to the spirit of the age. He remarks—"It will be considered among the singular inconsistencies of this age, by its future historians, that the two sovereigns who hold their crowns without any pretence to hereditary right, but simply by the will of the people—Louis Philip and Carl Johan—are the two princes who most anxiously suppress popular rights, and the free expression of public opinion."—It is not in the least singular, nor yet inconsistent, but exactly what might have been anticipated.

Let us hope that, besides crossing the Atlantic to discover why the mass of the people in a Federal Republic are in so much better a social condition than under old monarchies and virtual oligarchies, travellers and philosophers will also turn to Norway and to its sister kingdom, and political and social contrast—Sweden. Both countries are monarchies—nay, under the sway of the same sovereign—yet look on this picture and on that! In this good work of investigation, Mr Laing has led the way with a power and depth of thought, and with discrimination and sagacity, which entitle him to take a high place, and, as we think, the first place, among modern travellers.

TO A LADY ABOUT TO EMIGRATE.

And wilt thou leave thy native land,
Fair maiden, for a stranger clime?
And wilt thou leave the merry band
Thou playedst with in thy girlhood's prime—

The merry band that danced about,
And met thy wildly fond caress,
When from thy young warm heart welled out
The gush of holy tenderness?

The sunny South has brighter skies;
But thy own clime hath hints for thee,
Familiar as the bright blue eyes
That laughed with thine in childhood's glee.

Far to the South a nobler stream
May wander through a richer mead;
But wilt thou leave for it the gleam
And murmur of the silver Tweed?

The summer breeze, 'mid Southern trees,
May float wild music rich and clear;

But when will breathe the summer breeze
A kindlier welcome in thy ear?

To list the harp thou lovest well,
Whose strings are thrilled to Scotland's story;
How Wallace fought and Douglas fell,
On Scotland's hills, for Scotland's glory.

And trust me, maiden fair! the soul
Of patriot music highest swells
Where rocks are rough and torrents roll,
And bloom on high the heather bells.

No Southern harp hath tones so sweet,
When love's the burden of the song;
No tones so thrilling as when meet
Old Albyn's clans her hills among.

Then wilt thou leave thy native land,
Fair maiden! for a stranger clime?
And wilt thou leave the merry band
Thou playedst with in thy girlhood's prime?

MAY.

This was a merry month! the days gone by!
Our ancestors and their festivities
Must come to recollection with the rise
Of May Day's sun; and Fancy joyously
Eyes the green earth and the cerulean sky,
The mirth of olden May, and all its witcheries.
But nature is unchanged. The melodies,
The flowers, perfumes, and the vitality

Of May, are still the same. The hawthorn throws,
As heretofore, its odour on the breeze;
The woodbine sweet in every hedge-row blows;
Oaks still put forth their apples 'neath May's blue;
Larks people every cloud, as erst; and trees,
Still choir the same May songs our forefathers listened to,

WILD SPORTS OF THE FAR WEST;

OR, A FEW WEEKS' ADVENTURES AMONG THE HUDSON'S BAY FUR-TRADERS.

Nothing worthy of remark occurred during a tedious ride of about two hours across the prairie, on our return to the forest, except that, on our way, we overtook a few of the hunters, who were engaged in dragging and goading on their struggling captives, the two buffaloes. Several times, these powerful animals succeeded in getting their limbs partially freed from the ropes, composed of twisted thongs of raw hide, with which they were entangled; but their efforts at complete extrication were of no avail; for new thongs were, by the aid of the dogs distracting the animals' attention, again and again more securely fastened. It was found, however, that it would be impossible to convey them through the woods alive, without great trouble and loss of time. Mr C——, therefore, gave orders for their slaughter as soon as we arrived at our breakfasting place.

Here we found the rest of the party, all apparently in high glee at the result of our bison hunt, having killed, as I now for the first time ascertained, thirteen of these ponderous animals, besides the two which were taken alive. Having tethered our horses, and given directions for the collection of dried grass for their refreshment, we joined the hunters, who were seated, in small groups, around smoking heaps of damp sticks and leaves—this being the method usually adopted in the woods, of scaring those intolerable nuisances, mosquitoes. For my own part, I think the cure is as bad as the disease, as the smoke and smell produced is insufferable; and, unless one sit directly in the current of smoke, he cannot reckon on being free from the attacks of the insect. However, our horses seemed to enjoy the protection of the smoke more than we did.

In the meantime, the poor buffaloes were undergoing the last sentence of the law, at a little distance, much to the satisfaction of the hunters who had had the arduous task of conveying them so far on their way; though, I confess, I felt sick at heart when I saw the poor animals writhing under the torture of the knife. However much pleasure the chase and subsequent death of the quarry may give to the true sportsman, he cannot fail to recoil from witnessing systematic butchery, particularly when applied to those animals which, from their peculiar disposition and habits, are denominated game; but, among the North American trappers, sights of this kind are by no means uncommon; and he who takes up his residence with them, must make up his mind to witness their frequent recurrence. During the subsequent partition of the still warm beef among the hunters and Indians, our attention was called to the condition of three of the dogs, which had been so terribly gored in their encounter with the old bull during the day's hunt, that Mr C—— was reluctantly obliged to order them a brace of bullets a-piece.

By the time these, and sundry other items, were disposed of, the day was so far advanced that Mr C—— thought it would be more prudent to make preparations for our accommodation during the ensuing night, than run the risk of mistaking the path, and falling into swamps while crossing the woods to the Fort in the dark. His proposition met the unanimous consent of all concerned; and it was agreed, that a party, headed by Mr C——, should reconnoitre the woods on the edge of the prairie, in search of a more sheltered situation for an encampment than had been chosen by our advanced-guard in the morning; while those who felt so inclined, should, with the dogs, scour the forest in search of some of the larger game. Charles and I avowed our intention of proceeding with the latter party; and, having agreed on mutual signals, once more mounted our horses, and rode off through the more open parts of the forest, towards a small lake, to which we were guided by a couple of Indians on foot, who assured us that we would without fail meet with game of some sort in its vicinity, as they had never been near it without observing the recent trails of deer and wolves, which had come to drink, and the latter began their evening prow about the time we would reach it. On our way, Charles introduced me to Jaques Cousain, one of the half-breed hunters, who formerly was in his own employ, but had been obliged to leave him, on account of a quarrel with some of the Indians in his neighbourhood, who had sworn, by the shades of their fathers, to take revenge for some fancied injury. I had observed this man before; he seemed a sort of chief among both his Indian and half-caste companions. He bowed gracefully on our introduction; and as, on the way, he boasted of the deeds and disposition of his favourite hound Vivant, his dark eyes sparkled with enthusiasm, and his well-formed features were lighted up with an expression of intelligence but seldom noted in the otherwise handsome and athletic race to which he belonged. His father was a French Canadian, and his mother one of the Omahaw beauties.

* Six months have elapsed since the first part of this exciting narrative appeared—a somewhat long interval; but our readers must remember that the shores of Lake Superior and its tributary rivers are not within a quick return of post. To some of them, Mrs Jameson's "Ramble," in nearly the same scenes, will have agreeably supplied the lapse.

He, Charles, and I, kept together, a little behind the main party; and we soon became very intimate. I found him well acquainted with the manners and customs of various Indian tribes—having been a chief among the Omahaws (a branch of the Sioux nation, whose territory is situated near the sources of the Missouri) for several years, and prisoner, for various short periods, among other tribes. I obtained a promise from him that he would, during our stay at the Fort, give me a sketch of his life and adventures, which, I hope, when inserted, my readers will find interesting.

Having heard the repeated call of wild turkeys very near us, I expressed a wish to obtain a shot at them. We, therefore, diverged from the route the hunters were pursuing, and soon found ourselves alone in a part of the mighty forest, where the heaps of broken branches and decayed leaves clearly proved that no human foot had passed over its surface for many years—perhaps centuries.

While making our way—slowly, and with great difficulty—through these encumbrances, a flutter was heard among the branches under our horses' feet; and, with a screaming and cackling which the horses did not seem to relish at all, a fine hen-turkey, with a numerous and well-grown progeny, flew, or rather scrambled, from the tops of the branches and underwood to the nearest tree. Charles immediately fired, and brought down the hen; and I had just drawn the trigger, with equal success, at a couple of the brood, which were preparing to fly, when a large wild cat, or grey lynx, appeared from behind a fallen tree; and, after eyeing us, for an instant, with the most consummate impudence, darted on Charles' turkey, flung it over his shoulder, and was immediately lost to our view among the brushwood. This was intolerable—to be thus cheated of our game; but it was too late to grumble, though each blamed the other for not having fired at the intruder. But the fact was, we were all so amazed at its boldness, that no one thought of shooting it till too late. However, I have no doubt each mentally resolved to look better after fallen game for the future.

After having picked up my game, and examined the underwood around the spot where the lynx disappeared, without again seeing it or any vestige of its prey, we were proceeding in search of more turkeys, when, on a sudden, we heard several shots in quick succession, apparently at a considerable distance, which we set about lessening as fast as the closeness of the trees and the inequalities of the ground would permit. Again the reports reached our ears, seeming as distant as before, and we almost despaired of being able to make up with the hunters. My companions being better acquainted with the nature of the soil, from its appearances, were soon out of sight and hearing; and I was left alone, plunging and floundering among deep beds of leaves, which concealed, under a dry and equal surface, holes, probably occasioned by the uprooting of one or more trees, containing trunks, roots, branches, and leaves, mingled in a particularly soft and unpleasant state of decomposition. In these treacherous deposits, my horse, after sinking a foot or two, stuck so firmly that I was more than once obliged to dismount beside him, and keep in a state bordering on perpetual motion, to preserve, in any measure, a footing on the sounder fragments of timber mingled with the mass—meanwhile, jerking the bridle; and coaxing the horse, to cause him to exert himself vigorously in his own and my extrication. After spending above an hour by myself in this manner, I began to feel considerable uneasiness at the unpleasant prospect before me; for the shades of evening were coming on; and, as I could neither see nor hear anything of my companions or their path, I felt morally certain of having to spend the night in the dreary wood; and my anxiety was very materially increased when, after a few minutes' more riding, my poor horse became exceedingly lame. I dismounted beside him; and, by coaxing, contrived to get him on a few hundred yards, when he lay down, and would, notwithstanding all my efforts, make no farther attempt to proceed. For some time I stood beside him, in hopes that he would again rise; but, poor animal, he seemed to be getting gradually worse, and, from the nature of his symptoms, I had reason to believe that he had been bitten by a rattlesnake, or some other equally venomous reptile. I could not ascertain the situation of his wound, being apprehensive of bodily injury were I to approach too near to him while rolling in agony; I therefore left him to his death-bed reflections, and looked round for the highest neighbouring tree, hoping that, if I could reach the top, I might see the reflection of the camp-fires, and thereby discover my distance from, and route to them. With considerable difficulty I reached the top, and was much gratified to find my expectations more than realized. Instead of the distant and faint illumination which I had expected, a lurid glare was diffused through the atmosphere, appearing most intense over a partially open space about a mile to the westward. I also observed, that, between me and this spot—which I felt sure could be no other than Mr C——'s camp—there extended a considerable space, but thinly covered with large trees, probably a cedar swamp. After making these observations, I prepared to descend, previously however firing one of the pistols which had been dangling from my belt all day, in the vain hope of being answered by some of my more fortunate companions. I was indeed answered, but in a manner suited to remind me of my lonely and dangerous situation; for, as the numerous echoes, awakened in the gloomy recesses of the silent forest, became fainter and fainter until they utterly died away, a starving wolf sent up a series of the most mournful howls from beneath, while numerous members of the fraternity filled the air on all sides with the same unmusical cadences. I hastened to descend; and having repossessed myself of my gun, which I had left leaning on an adjoining tree, proceeded, as quickly as I could, to the place where my steed was lying, intending, should I not find him already dead, to put an end to his misery at once, rather than leave him to be torn piecemeal, while yet alive, by the hungry brutes whose yells were still ringing in my ears. The daylight was by this time nearly gone, but the wood was not so dark as I should have expected. I could still, with a little groping, find my way to the spot where the horse lay moaning and tumbling, but apparently in the same state as when I left him. Poor animal! I shall never forget the mournful looks I fancied he gave me when he saw my intentions towards him. My first hall not giving him immediate relief, I was forced to send him a second; and in the interval my feelings were so painful that I could scarcely steady my hand whilst I gave him his quietus. While removing his various trappings previous to suspending them on a tree, that they might not share the fate of the carcase, I discovered that my two young turkeys had disappeared, having been probably taken by the wolves as a gout, preparatory to their supper of horse-flesh.

While ascending a tall pine at a little distance, to deposit the saddle, &c., out of reach, I could hear the rustling of the bushes below, as the greedy animals arrived from all quarters, to take possession of the spoil. This alone would not have given me any serious alarm, as, being well acquainted with the cowardly disposition of wolves in general, I knew that, after shewing myself, I had only to raise a shout or fire a shot amongst them, when they would immediately disperse in all directions; but presently a low growl grated on my ear, and, looking down, I saw the dark form of a large bear snuffing about my gun, which was lying near the foot of the tree. I dared not move, lest he should observe and endeavour to reach me, for I was not ten feet above him. After twisting and scratching my gun, and grunting like a hog all the time, he was kind enough to shuffle off towards the banquet, probably more tempted by the crunching of the bones, (which I could hear most distinctly,) than inclined to pay the attention to me which, under other circumstances, he would undoubtedly have done. Having witnessed his departure with sincere pleasure, I made my way down, and, having loaded my gun and pistols, with a brace of bullets in each barrel, set out in as good spirits as I could muster on my difficult and dangerous walk, hoping that, could I reach the edge of the morass before-mentioned unmolested, I should be able, from the thinness of the wood, and the light afforded by the camp-fires, to find my way round or across it, and ultimately reach my destination. I met with no interruption farther than frequently stumbling over fallen trees, falling headlong into holes, thereby occasionally nearly shooting myself, with numerous similar inconveniences on the way; besides being annoyed by a pertinacious wolf, which was continually presenting himself before or on either side of me, gurring most viciously, and probably anxious to distract my attention from others of the species, whose glaring eyes were most distinctly visible around, and who probably intended to make an attack as soon as this object was gained. But I was up to them; and, seizing a favourable opportunity, fired at my annoying attendant, sending him and the rest of the pack away, yelling like a dozen trampled-on curs. This, however, was the last annoyance I met with on this occasion, for, within five minutes after I fired at the wolf, I was jogging leisurely along on Charles' horse, while he and a couple of Indians accompanied me on foot, listening to a brief account of the various adventures which had befallen me since Jaques and he had so unceremoniously left me. After which, Charles gave me the following account of his own mishaps, which were nearly as dangerous as mine. "Jaques and I," said he, "kept up with each other for some time after we left you. We soon got on the trail of the hunters, (and I wish I had kept on it;) but, hearing distant reports in an almost opposite direction from that we were pursuing, I left Jaques, and turned off at right angles from the track, hoping thus to save a long circuitous ride; but I soon found out my error, for, coming to a very thick part of the forest, I dismounted, and led my horse through many winding paths, till I once more reached the open wood, when, to my dismay, I found I was utterly ignorant in which direction I had come, or how to proceed. I wandered about, amusing myself by shooting turkeys, hoping the hunters might pass within hearing of the reports; but in this I was grievously mistaken. However, after some time, I once more got on the trail, and, immediately after, came upon four Indians, who had been left by the hunters to flay the carcasses of half a dozen wolves, shot out of a pack of a score or more, which had been surprised by the hunters while devouring an elk. From this party, I learned that it was useless to proceed in search of the hunters, as I could scarcely expect to make up with them before the night came on, when I would undoubtedly lose the tract. I therefore, guided by one of the Indians, who are never at a loss, even in the most intricate parts of the forest, as to their route, set off in this direction. We had reached the opposite end of this cedar swamp, and could see the illumination from Mr C——'s watch-fires, when, by a singular want of caution on my part, I found myself unexpectedly in a situation of the greatest danger. The Indian had, by imitating the cry of a species of owl, succeeded in discovering several turkeys on their roosts.* I dismounted, and, having

tethered my horse, proceeded to bring them down one by one. I had killed three when the Indian pointed to a tree at a few yards' distance, on which several were perched. I got my gun in readiness; and, desiring my companion to stay with the horse, I made my way as noiselessly as possible among the thick brushwood, and having reached a suitable hiding-place close to the tree, I fired both barrels, and brought down two splendid turkeys, being all I could discern from my retreat. I then left my gun, without loading it again, leaning against a tree, and proceeded towards some bushy underwood, among which both birds fell. After forcing my way through numerous obstacles, I found that, before I could reach the desired spot, I should have to creep below a large fallen branch. I did not hesitate, but knelt down; and had got my head out on the other side, when I was startled by hearing a ferocious yell, uttered apparently close alongside. I looked cautiously round, and through the interstices of the leaves above me, but nothing was to be seen. Again the yell thrilled on my ear, seeming nearer, if possible, than before; while, at the same instant, the Indian uttered a warning-cry. I now felt that I was in rather a serious scrape, and heartily repented having ventured so far for the sake of two paltry turkeys. Shutting my eyes, I expected every moment to feel myself torn by the fangs of some large and ferocious animal. Being completely under the branch and its incumbent bed of leaves, I knew I could make no attempt at defence, unless the assailant should commence operations in front, when I could try the effect of a pistol-ball on him. Comforting myself with the latter suggestion, I was about to raise myself (for I had fallen flat on my face through fear) and once more look about me, when suddenly I felt a warm but fetid breath pass over my face, followed by the well-known gurr of a wolf, close to my ear. Turning my head to see the full extent of my danger, my eyes met the glaring pupils and white fangs of the animal. A few seconds passed, and it was still gazing on me, no doubt calculating the extent of the meal it would have when it commenced operations, and, in the interim, employing the time in sharpening its teeth, and gurring hideously; another second elapsed, a gush of blood spouted from a wound in its breast, and, with a deafening howl, which completely hushed the report of a rifle, fired at a little distance, it rolled over, and expired. An Indian trapper for Mr C——'s party immediately after made his appearance; and, having assisted to extricate me from my uneasy posture, told me that, having been sent out by Mr C——, along with several others, to shoot turkeys on the swamp, he had wandered about without discovering any game, until he fell in with my guide, who acquainted him with my whereabouts and occupation, and mentioned that he had heard the cry of a wolf in the direction I had gone; but, as he knew I was well armed, he had no fear of me. 'At this moment,' added the trapper, 'we both heard the cry of the animal, and simultaneously shouted to you. I then forced my way among the brushwood in search of you; and, hearing the often-repeated growl of the animal, concluded you must be in some danger. I beat the bush all round, without seeing either you or the wolf, for some time. The moment I saw the brute, I fired; and it is well for you that the wound proved immediately mortal.' You may well believe," concluded Charles, "I returned grateful thanks to the Indian trapper for his timely assistance; and having picked up the turkeys, we made the best of our way to the spot where I left my horse, (leaving the grim carcase of the wolf as a supper for some of his hungry companions,) and set off in this direction, determined to let nothing tempt me to more adventures until I had procured a good night's rest."

By frequent repetition of this sound, the turkeys are kept in such a state of alarm that they dare not fly; so that, if the hunter be careful to shoot those on the lowest branches first, he may frequently secure a flock of twenty or thirty.

I, having some time before come to a similar determination, was not sorry to reach the camp soon after Charles had concluded his narration. I wish I could give the reader an adequate description of the scene which presented itself before us as we emerged from the ever-gloomy wood into a space bordering on the prairie, selected by Mr C—— as being the driest and most sheltered spot within several miles. The most prominent object was a huge fire, composed of several large trees, which had been hewn so as to fall across each other. The carcase of some large animal—which I afterwards heard was a moose, shot by some of the Indians while reconnoitring the woods in search of a suitable spot for a night encampment—depended by some ingenious contrivance (somewhat similar to that described in the first number of this narrative) amidst the tall column of lurid smoke and sparks which seemed to unite the brilliantly illumined atmosphere above, with the roaring conflagration below us.

As soon as our arrival was observed, Mr C—— came up and informed us that the hunting party had just before made their appearance, and finding that Charles and I had not yet arrived, were about to disperse through the woods in search of us. Fortunately they had staid to refresh themselves. Had they set out at once, they would probably have missed us, and searched all night. I went with Charles to see his horse accommodated for the night, before going with Mr C—— into a shanty which had been hurriedly erected for our reception. Charles and I found the hunters all busied with their horses. These were tied within twenty yards of the camp fire, side by side, to a rope of twisted hide, stretched between two trees, eating, apparently with great relish, a quantity of prairie grass, which had been collected during the day. Smoking heaps of wet leaves were placed at short distances behind them, to prevent their being annoyed by mosquitoes. The hunters were all much grieved at the fate of my beautiful horse; and one old Indian, after uttering many unintelligible lamentations, desired Jaques to tell me that, when he returned to the Fort, he would send one of the young men of his tribe with a message to his squaw, desiring her to send him his best and fleetest horse as a gift to the white stranger. I declined his offer; but presented him with my hunting knife, as an acknowledgment of his disinterested kindness.

On returning with my cousin to Mr C——, we found him seated on the ground in the log-hut, anxiously waiting for our assistance in discussing a hot roast turkey, (grievously burnt on one side,) a fragment of cold roast bison hump, some biscuit, and a large flask of spirits—all which articles were stuck in various crevices of the partially decayed root of a tree, which, on the present occasion, served as a table. The hut itself consisted of three sides, composed of logs piled anyhow on each other, while the roof was nothing but a heap of the larger branches of the trees which formed the sides. At a little distance before the open side, was a smoking fire, which, together with others, completely prevented the appearance of a single mosquito. But I must confess, that, when Charles and I joined Mr C——, we paid more attention to the discussion of the various eatables before us, than to the nature of any other arrangements for comfort or convenience. Having fully satisfied our craving appetites, and emptied the afore-mentioned flask among us, meanwhile relating to each other all the adventures which we had had since we last met, we rolled ourselves in buffalo robes, and, lying with our feet towards the fire, soon fell fast asleep.

On awaking next morning, I found that my companions were up and out, having evidently partaken of the remains of last night's supper, some stray fragments being all I could discover as left for my breakfast. While making the most of these, Mr C—— entered, and congratulated me on having had such sound sleep, as my cousin and he had been very soon awakened by the noise made by the Indians and hunters, as they got jovial over their cups. Having gone out to put an end to this disturbance, they returned, and again lay down, but were soon roused by a more serious commotion, which was supposed to have had the following origin:—One of the horses had broken loose, and wandered into the woods. There he had attracted the attention of some hungry wolves, (probably lured by the widely-diffused scent of our roasting operations;) these united into one pack, and gave chase. The poor animal, seeing his danger, attempted to return to our protection, and had nearly reached the other horses, when his pursuers made up to him, and, before an Indian, who was roused by the scuffle, could give the alarm, had overcome his desperate attempt at defence, and were gorging themselves with his vitals. "We loosed the hounds immediately; and I," said Mr C——, "sent out a few Indians on foot after the brutes, with directions not to return until they had discovered your trail, and followed it to where you left your horse-trappings. These men have just returned, with all the articles you left, but without being able to make an example of any of our pillaging neighbours."

It was now about nine o'clock, and Mr C—— proposed we should rest ourselves for an hour or two, and then set about making the necessary preparations for our return to the Factory; as, however much he enjoyed an excursion like the present, he could not conscientiously be longer absent from his post. As no one openly dissented, the matter was settled; and, while the hunters were feeding their horses, cleaning their guns, or sitting smoking, I went in search of Jaques, and with him strolled over the neighbouring prairie, listening to his account of the previous day's hunt.—They had, after killing seven wolves, got on the trail of a bear, which, after a long chase, climbed into a tree, and was brought down by a round of balls. Nothing else worthy of note occurred until they reached the camp.

On returning to Mr C——, we found him engaged in superintending the packing of beef, turkeys, skins, &c., &c., and loading several of the horses with these bundles as fast as made up. The hounds were coupled, and each pair put under the charge of an Indian. These preliminary arrangements being made, the fires were put carefully out, and, having our guns and rifles in the best order, Mr C——, Charles, and I, accompanied by Jaques and ten hunters, mounted our horses, and rode after those who had the pack-horses and hounds in charge, along the edge of the prairie, in search of a convenient passage through the forest. As the wood appeared very dense, we did not attempt to force our way through it, but skirted the edge till we reached the Fish River. Here we had good shooting at wild swans and geese, which were paddling over the surface, or nestling among the reeds at the margin of this beautiful, winding stream. The wild fowl seemed quite unconscious of our approach, until we fired on them; and then, instead of our seeing but a few here and there, the air seemed to be filled with myriads of these birds, which had risen out of the reeds around, while the rocks and woods echoed and re-echoed their discordant screams. For some time I was utterly bewildered by the tumultuous confusion of tongues, accompanied by the loud whizz of so many wings in action above us. After wheeling round us at a great height for some minutes, they gradually descended; and, when they were within shot, we poured a destructive fire upon them. They again rose high in the clear air, screaming as loudly as before; but, so soon as their wounded and dead companions were perceived in the hands of the Indians, they uttered a loud, mournful cry, very different from the harsh and angry scream before uttered, and probably indicating that they understood that, where man asserts his dominion, the inferior animals must give way, and that, even in this lonely and lovely spot, they must not expect to remain undiscovered—as, with outstretched necks and broad pinions, they soared through the higher regions of the atmosphere, in search of some distant and unfrequented stream or lake.

Leaving the Indians to dispose of our new booty among themselves, our party rode on before, and soon entered an open glade of the forest, when, not observing any game, we pushed on till we reached the Factory.

Everything seemed to have gone on well since we left it. The builders had made great progress, and the clearing was considerably enlarged. In short, Mr C—— was so well satisfied with the amount and execution of the work, that, when the Indians made their appearance, he requested us to assist him in distributing a part of the game and beef brought home among the Sioux, together with an allowance of spirits, (plentifully diluted with water,) and ordered them to stop their labours for that day, and, while their supper was preparing, enjoy themselves with their companions. Each of the Sioux who had accompanied us was a hero in his own estimation, and told, according to Jaques' interpretation, most astounding stories of the cunning and prowess with which he attacked and destroyed numerous wild animals. According to their own account, each had destroyed more game than had been obtained by the whole party collectively. None of their anxious auditors appearing to doubt, in the slightest degree, the veracity of these statements, we did not conceive it prudent or necessary to contradict them.

The sum-total of the slain being at length determined, Mr C—— proposed that the red men should take their bows and arrows, and compete for a prize. All who possessed these arms were eager to take advantage of this opportunity of distinguishing themselves as marksmen; but, as a great majority appeared dissatisfied—having left these and all their other weapons to the care of their squaws, knowing that, while employed in the formation of a fur-trading establishment on their own territory, they could have no real occasion for their use—Mr C—— offered the same premium to each of four Indians, who should, by a council of twelve of the oldest Sioux present, be considered the best dancers. As, after this last proposition was fully interpreted to all present, they seemed perfectly satisfied with it, the ground was cleared, smoothed, and tramped hard. A few logs were rolled together at one end of the allotted space, on which the prize council, and a number of the hunters and servants, took their station; and, lastly, the prizes—each a yard of scarlet blanketing—were brought out and exhibited to the admiration of all the candidates. When everything had been arranged, Mr C—— gave the signal; and immediately several young men stepped out from their companions, and, placing themselves at certain distances from each other, began the dance by leaping and clapping their hands; after which, they commenced a series of the most ludicrous capers imaginable, keeping time by flourishing sticks—representing tomahawks—and every now and then blending their deep voices with the beat of their moccasins, on the hard, dry soil. The first set being at length tired, or, more probably, having exhausted their list of bodily contortions, rejoined their companions; and two other sets, of about the same number, appeared successively, and performed their antics in much the same style.

Feeling somewhat wearied with the sameness of these performances, I was making my way across the clearing towards the house, when I was overtaken by Mr C——, who requested me to return for a few minutes, when I should have an opportunity of witnessing the celebrated Sioux war-dance. I immediately retraced my steps; and, on reaching my former position, found all the Indians who were to join in the next dance, (supposed to be in commemoration of a victory,) standing in small circular groups, apart from each other. In the centre of each group stood one of the half-caste hunters, representing the devoted prisoner of war. At a signal from the prize-council, each group began its gyrations round the victim in the centre, chanting, without much harmony, the deeds of their warriors, and jeering the puny attempts of their opponents' warfare, alternately with making the woods re-echo the shrill war-whoop of their powerful tribe, while brandishing their imitation tomahawks within a hair-breadth of the scalp of their prisoner. In the confusion attendant on the movements of so great an assemblage of dark-skinned beings, aided by the increasing darkness—for it was now getting late—I could not discern all the evolutions of the dancers; but saw enough to make me feel thankful that there was no probability of my falling into the hands of blood-thirsty Indians as a prisoner of war. I remained a spectator of this and another war-dance, and then left the Indians to enjoy themselves in these or any other noisy ways they pleased, while I hastened to place the log-walls of the factory between me and the deafening sound of their caterwauling chant and savage war-whoop. On entering the house, I met Mrs C——, who informed me that Charles had just come in to announce to her his intention of departing next day for the coast. She had requested him to remain for a few days longer, when she would be glad to avail herself of the opportunity of returning, with her daughters, to Fort Madeline. My cousin, however, was fearful lest he had already exceeded his instructions; and was intent on sailing across the lake towards his own post, having been absent from it nearly six weeks. Mrs C—— urged me to prevail on Charles to remain, at least, over another day, which would give her time to make the necessary arrangements for their return home. This, with the timely assistance of the Misses and Mr C——, I managed; and it was finally agreed that we should start by day-break on the morning after next.

After disposing of this matter, I accompanied my friends and cousin to see the Indians at their supper: this was laid out, or rather cooked—for each laid out his own portion, preparatory to bolting it, in the most expeditious and dog-like manner possible—in the cleared space behind the factory, mentioned before, which served as a kitchen. We assisted in measuring out an allowance of grog to each individual; after which, seeing that all were as comfortable and enjoying themselves as much as present circumstances would permit, we returned to the house, and sat down to a substantial meal of elk venison, turkey, bison-hump, bear ham and tongue, &c., with a plentiful dessert of wild strawberries. The liquors as usual.

Next morning I was roused by the noise of the choppers, as they began their several tasks with renewed energies. It was barely day-light; but, feeling very wakeful, I got up, and, finding that none of the family had as yet left their sleeping apartments, I went out to superintend the logging. I think I mentioned before that the Sioux were under the immediate direction of twelve experienced lumberers, who had been engaged by the Hudson's Bay Company, to fix on the situation for, and assist in the erection of several new forts and factories, including the present.

On the present occasion, I felt much surprised, as I walked leisurely among the Sioux builders, at the readiness which they manifested in obeying the orders of their directors, and the skill and perseverance with which, notwithstanding many difficulties, they applied each tool lent them to its appropriate use, while universal good humour prevailed around. I could not have believed it, if I had not had this opportunity of ascertaining the fact, that the haughty Indian would be induced, by the prospect of remuneration, to lower himself, for the time being, to the station of a servant, and submit to the control of the usurping "pale faces;" but, on mentioning the subject to my kind host at breakfast, he informed me that it required the utmost caution on his part, as well as on that of the subordinate members of the establishment, to prevent the red men supposing that they were considered as servants to the whites. "If," said Mr C——, "we did not frequently mix with them, and endeavour, in various ways—as you have seen since you arrived here—to entertain them more like friends than subjects, they would, long ere this, have decamped, taking with them everything they could lay their hands on: but you see that, by a judicious mode of treatment, they can be made, for the present, very useful members of our society; and I am sure they are more willing to oblige us than a set of 'helps,' hired at enormous wages in the States or Canadas, would be."

After breakfast, I went out in search of Jaques, intending to ask him to accompany me in a walk along the banks of the river, when I could listen to the account he promised me of his life and adventures among Indians. I found him, with a fellow-hunter, engaged in felling a magnificent oak, and remained to witness the last efforts of the doomed tree to maintain its erect position. The separation of the massive trunk from the root was nearly complete; but still—with the exception of slight quiverings in the ends of the smaller boughs—it gave no indication of yielding to the ringing blows applied by the nervous arms of the half-breeds. Observing this, they shifted their point of attack, and plied the axe, with new vigour, on the opposite side. For a few seconds, only pellets of bark were detached; but, when the axes had reached the tougher fibres of the inner wood, every blow seemed to accelerate the work of destruction. Presently the groaning of the branches—as they swung heavily to and fro, followed by the loud rending of the trunk—announced to us that the last tie was dissolving: we retired a few paces, while the gigantic tree gradually inclined, and at length came to the ground with a thundering crash, causing the soil around to tremble, and the neighbouring trees to reel, and bow their lofty heads as if anticipating their own doom, and bidding farewell to their prostrate companion.

After giving place to several red-skins—who had been directed to chop the branches off this and many equally large trees, which had been felled since daybreak, and now lay, shorn of their leafy honours, across the space so lately cleared for the dancers—Jaques accompanied me back to the house, from which, after procuring our guns and ammunition, we set out on foot, followed by the hound Vivant. Having reached the Fish River, we proceeded along its banks, towards the spot whence the flock of wild-fowl had been scared during our previous day's sport. On the way, I informed Jaques of my principal object in asking his company on the present occasion; and he promised to gratify me by a faithful recital. We had passed the part of the stream alluded to without seeing a single living creature, when suddenly Jaques caught my arm and pointed to a large bird soaring majestically far above our heads, like a passing mote on the clear blue sky. I could not, at the time, account for the ecstasy expressed by my companion, as, with strained and unwinking eyes, he eagerly followed the flight of the bird, which, after getting considerably ahead of us, turned, and wheeling gradually downwards, hovered a few hundred feet above the stream, and then, as suddenly as if shot, darted headlong below the bank. We made all possible haste to reach the spot where it had disappeared; but, ere we had gone many yards, it rose, with a succession of harsh but exulting screams, from among the reeds, bearing a wild duck in its talons; and, skimming lightly through the air, apparently unincumbered by the size or weight of its prey, alighted on the top of a high rock, about a quarter of a mile farther off. We again pushed on, keeping a strict watch on the object of our pursuit, which Jaques, in his eagerness, hardly found breath to tell me, was the black, bald-headed eagle—a species very rarely seen east of the Rocky Mountains, and in general so difficult to kill or capture that, among the Indians, he who has the good fortune to obtain a specimen, is either murdered by some of his nation, who envy his success, or raised by them to the station of petty chief. The head and talons, with the pinion feathers, are considered the most valuable ornaments that can be worn in the head-dress of a chief, and are frequently handed down as heir-looms from father to son. Jaques had several times met with these birds in the course of his peregrinations; but had never, as yet, had the good fortune to shoot one.

As we approached the hitherto untrodden situation, chosen by our magnificent quarry to discuss his prey, we had to pass over a small hillock; and, while on the top of it, notwithstanding Jaques' fears lest I should scare the eagle, I could not resist the temptation to remain, for a few moments, a spectator of its movements. We were now not more than a hundred and fifty yards from it; but it did not appear to have observed our approach. The whole surrounding scene, as I hastily glanced over it, was exquisitely lovely: but the rock, on the summit of which the noble bird stood—shrieking, and flapping his immense wings, while his powerful beak and talons were buried in the flesh of his victim—attracted my especial attention. In the distance, it appeared like a colossal figure of a Syren, clothed in sea-green drapery, and presiding over the beautifully clear and sparkling water that, with an unceasing and sweetly harmonious gurgle, laved its fish-like extremity. But, hark! what's that? The report of a rifle. The sound reverberated from rock to rock, until caught up by and returned, in deeper notes, from the mighty forest. The eagle rose heavily from his prey, by powerful efforts, flew a few yards, while large drops of blood pattered thickly on the surface of the water; then, tumbling over in the air, the feathered monarch fell dead on the opposite bank, while the dying echoes of the report still sounded in my ears like deep moans from the inmost recesses of the woods. While I had been gazing on the beauties of unassisted Nature displayed around, Jaques had crept softly along the bank, until within ninety yards of the game, when, finding a suitable resting-place for his rifle, he had taken his unerring aim, and fired with deadly effect. Immediately after observing the fall of the bird, he leaped into the water, swam across, and, ere I left my post of observation, returned, and flung his weighty prize at my feet. We sat down together on a large stone—almost buried by the long prairie grass which grew luxuriantly on both sides of the river—and, while Jaques expatiated on an Indian superstition with regard to the origin of the race of black bald eagles, (which I have unfortunately allowed to escape my memory,) I took out my note-book and pencil, and prepared to write in short-hand the autobiography of my companion, when, to my amazement, he suddenly stopped his narration, and, uttering a scream of horror, leaped off the stone, and seized his rifle. Although perfectly bewildered by the suddenness of this extraordinary movement, and without the smallest conjecture as to the occasion, yet, perceiving that danger was to be apprehended close at hand, I instantaneously grasped my gun, and followed the hasty steps of the hunter. When we had gone about five and twenty yards, Jaques stopped, and pointed to the seat we had just left. A large rattlesnake was coiling itself on the top of the stone, while two others were proceeding to examine the dead eagle, and the head of a fourth protruded from a hole under the stone—we had, in fact, been seated over a nest of these reptiles. Our danger was not, however, very great. The quick-eared half-breed had detected the rattling sound which, by a wise provision of the Creator, they are compelled to make when advancing to the attack; and, on looking downwards, he perceived two large snakes winding through the long grass behind him. I cannot, however, account for his excessive fear at the sight of these creatures, (as they are as frequently met with as almost any other species in North America,) but by supposing that he inherited from his mother, or derived during his long residence among the Indians, the superstitious dread—almost amounting to horror regarding this species of serpent as the embodied appearance of the bad spirit—with which many tribes of red men are impregnated. But, whether this was the case, or whether Jaques really was (what he afterwards professed himself to have been) afraid lest the serpents should try the much disputed power of fascination upon him or not, I cannot say; but he quickly recovered from his alarm, and joined me in firing at them, which obliged them to retire to their hole, while we picked up the dead eagle, which, to my companion's delight, was uninjured. We then proceeded in search of a safer spot to rest on. Of our success, and Jaques' promised narration, I shall give an account on a future occasion.

INFANCY.

I LOVE to gaze upon an infant's smiles,
While o'er its cheeks a thousand dimples break,
Like zephyrs dancing on an inland lake
In visible beauty: such a sight beguiles
The weary child of earth, from thought of toils,
And gulf, and loneliness, and things that make Life wearisome. Baby, thine innocent wiles

Take from my heart a load, and bid me wake
To thoughts of happy import; thine it is,
Unconscious laughing cherub, to impart
Thine own pure joy to me. So much of bliss,
Though transient, hath effaced from my heart
A thousand harsh remembrances, which care
And life's monotony had fixed there.

Incidents of Travel in Greece, Turkey, and Russia. By G. Stephens, Esq. Curry: Dublin.

THESE travels are written by a clever, good-humoured, and lively American, who has a marvellous faculty of "getting along," and putting a great deal into little room; and one, moreover, who interests and entertains his reader exceedingly, by telling exactly all the little adventures and gay nothings which a learned or grave traveller would keep to amuse his private circle, if he did not entirely suppress them, as below his personal dignity, as well as the dignity of printed travels. Here is an example. The Americans have a Mission school in Athens, and Mr Stephens being ardently and amiably national, wherever there was an American to be found, there went he. In the boys' school he shook hands with a little Miltiades, and Leonidas, and Aristides, and so forth, looking in features and intelligence worthy of their illustrious names; but there was one boy whose appearance startled him—the son of the Maid of Athens! That aerial and fanciful creature—that "gay creature of the elements"—to be the mother of a sturdy little urchin! But, alas! it was so. "The Maid of Athens is married. She had a right to marry, no doubt," says Mr Stephens, "and it is said there is poetry in married life; and, doubtless, she is a much more interesting person now, at thirty-six, than the Maid of Athens could be. But still the Maid of Athens is married! married to a Scotsman. She is now Mrs Black! wife of George Black! head of the police! and her son is called — Black—[probably Sandy Black]—and she has other little Blacks! Commentary is unnecessary." We sympathize with Mr Stephens. He is equally free-and-easy and pleasant wherever he goes; but the Old World has heard so much and so often of late years about Greece and Turkey, that we imagine his Russian adventures will be more acceptable. They are fresh and vivacious, and go over comparatively untrodden ground. He went from Constantinople to Odessa in a steam-vessel; and from this point we think the interest of the travels commences. He travelled over the wild and nearly desert Steppes of Russia on to Moscow, and thence to Petersburg, and, finally, through Poland into Prussia. His companion from Odessa to Moscow was a sulky, capricious Englishman; and their guide, a rascally Frenchman, an old soldier of the Emperor, who spoke continually of "mon honneur." This scene we select for its novelty.

At daylight we awoke, and found ourselves upon the wild steppes of Russia, forming part of the immense plain which, beginning in northern Germany, extends for hundreds of miles, having its surface occasionally diversified by ancient tumuli, and terminates at the long chain of the Urals, which, rising like a wall, separates them from the equally vast plains of Siberia. The whole of this immense plain is covered with a luxuriant pasture, but bare of trees like our prairie lands, mostly uncultivated, yet everywhere capable of producing the same wheat which now draws to the Black Sea the vessels of Turkey, Egypt, and Italy, making Russia the granary of the Levant; and which, within the last year, we have seen brought six thousand miles to our own doors. Our road over these steppes was in its natural state; that is to say, a mere track worn by caravans of waggons: there were no fences, and sometimes the route was marked at intervals by heaps of stones, intended as guides when the ground should be covered with snow.

At about 9 o'clock we whirled furiously into a little village, and stopped at the door of the posthouse. Our wheels were smoking with the rapidity of their revolutions: Henri dashed a bucket of water over them to keep them from burning, and half a dozen men whipped them off and greased them. Indeed, greasing the wheels is necessary at every post, as otherwise the hubs become dry, so that there is actual danger of their taking fire; and there is a traveller's story told (but I do not vouch for its truth) of a postillion, waggon, and passengers being all burned up on the road to Moscow by the ignition of the wheels.

The village, like all the others, was built of wood, plastered and whitewashed, with roofs of thatched straw; and the houses were much cleaner than I expected to find them. We got plenty of fresh milk; the bread, which to the traveller in those countries is emphatically the staff of life, we found good everywhere in Russia, and at Moscow the whitest I ever saw.

Resuming our journey, we met no travellers. Occasionally we passed large droves of cattle; but all the way from Odessa the principal objects were long trains of waggons, fifty or sixty together, drawn by oxen, and transporting merchandise towards Moscow, or grain to the Black Sea. Their approach was indicated at a great distance by immense clouds of dust, which gave us timely notice to let down our curtains and raise our glasses. The waggons were short, ugly-looking fellows, with huge sandy mustaches and beards, and black woolly caps, and sheepskin jackets, the wool side next the skin; perhaps, in many cases, transferred warm from the back of one animal to that of the other, where they remained till worn out, or eaten up by vermin. They had among them blacksmiths, and wheelwrights, and spare wheels, and hammers, and tools, and everything necessary for a journey of several hundred miles. Half of them were generally asleep on the top of their loads, and they encamped at night in caravan style, arranging the waggons in a square, building a large fire, and sleeping around it. About mid-day we saw clouds gathering afar off in the horizon, and soon after the rain began to fall, and we could see it advancing rapidly over the immense level, till it broke over our heads, and in a few moments passed off, leaving the ground smoking with exhalations.

Late in the afternoon we met the travelling equipage of a seigneur returning from Moscow to his estate in the country. It consisted of four carriages, with six or eight horses each. The first was a large, stately, and cumbersome vehicle, padded and cushioned, in which, as we passed rapidly by, we caught a glimpse of a corpulent Russian on the back seat, with his feet on the front, bolstered all round with pillows and cushions, almost burying every part of him but his face, and looking the very personification of luxurious indulgence; and yet, probably, that man had been a soldier, and slept many a night on the bare ground, with no covering but his military cloak. Next came another carriage, fitted out in the same luxurious style, with the seigneur's lady and a little girl; then another with nurses and children; then beds, baggage, cooking utensils, and servants, the latter hanging on everywhere about the vehicle, much in the same way with the pots and kettles. Altogether, it was an equipment in caravan style, somewhat the same as for a journey in the desert, the traveller carrying with him provision and everything necessary for his comfort, as not expecting to procure anything on the road, nor to sleep under a roof during the whole journey. He stops when he pleases, and his servants prepare his meals, sometimes in the open air, but generally at the post-house.

We have then a lively description of the old city of Chioff, once the capital of Russia, and now hardly known even by name to the rest of Europe.

It stands at a great height, on the crest of an amphitheatre of hills, which rise abruptly in the middle of an immense plain, apparently thrown up by some wild freak of nature, at once curious, unique, and beautiful. The style of its architecture is admirably calculated to give effect to its peculiar position; and, after a dreary journey over the wild plains of the Ukraine, it breaks upon the traveller with all the glittering and gorgeous splendour of an Asiatic city. For many centuries it has been regarded as the Jerusalem of the North, the sacred and holy city of the Russians; and, long before reaching it, its numerous convents and churches, crowning the summit, and hanging on the sides of the hill, with their quadrupled domes, and spires, and chains, and crosses, gilded with ducat gold, and glittering in the sun, gave the whole city the appearance of golden splendour.

We passed the morning in riding round to the numerous convents and churches, among which is the church of St Sophia, the oldest in Russia, and, if not an exact model of the great St Sophia of Constantinople, at least of Byzantine design, and toward evening went to the emperor's garden. This garden is more than a mile in length, bounded on one side by the high precipitous bank of the hill, undulating in its surface, and laid out like an English park, with lawn, gravel-walks, and trees; it contains houses of refreshment, arbours or summer-houses, and a summer theatre. At the foot of the hill flows the Dnieper, the ancient Borysthenes, on which, in former days, the descendants of Odin and Ruric descended to plunder Constantinople. Two or three sloops were lying, as it were, asleep in the lower town, telling of a still interior country, and beyond was a boundless plain covered with a thick forest of trees. The view from this bank was unique and extraordinary, entirely different from anything I ever saw in natural scenery, and resembling more than anything else a boundless marine prospect.

At the entrance of the garden is an open square or table of land overlooking the plain, where, every evening at seven o'clock, the military band plays. The garden is the fashionable promenade, the higher classes resorting to it on carriages and on horseback, and the common people on foot; the display of equipages was not very striking, although there is something stylish in the Russian manner of driving four horses, the leaders with very long traces and a postillion; and soldiers and officers, with their splendid uniforms, caps, and plumes added a brilliant effect.

Before the music began, all returned from the promenade or drive in the garden, and gathered in the square. It was a beautiful afternoon in June, and the assemblage was unusually large and brilliant; the carriages drew up in a line, the ladies let down the glasses, and the cavaliers dismounted, and talked and flirted with them just as in civilized countries. All Chioff was there, and the peasant in his dirty sheepskin jacket, the shopkeeper with his long surtout and beard, the postillion on his horse, the coachman on his box, the dashing soldier, the haughty noble and supercilious lady, touched by the same chord, forgot their temporal distinctions, and listened to the swelling strains of the music till the last notes died away. The whole mass was then in motion, and in a few moments, except by a few stragglers, of whom I was one, the garden was deserted.

This is all gay and agreeable, though the hotel afforded the travellers no better bed than two settees, stuffed with straw and covered with leather. They proceeded to Moscow.

At daylight we arrived at a large village, the inhabitants of which were not yet stirring, and the streets were strewn with peasants—grim, yellow-bearded fellows—in sheepskin dresses and caps, lying on their backs asleep, each of them with a log of wood under his head for a pillow. I descended from the diligence, and found that the whole village consisted of a single street, with log-houses on each side, having their gable-ends in front; the doors were all open, and I looked in and saw men and women with all their clothes on—pigs, sheep, and children strewn about the floor.

In every house was the image of the Panagia, or all holy Virgin, or the picture of some tutelary saint, the face only visible, the rest covered with a tin frame, with a lamp or taper burning before it; and regularly as the serf rose, he prostrated himself, and made his orisons at this domestic shrine.

About noon we passed the chateau and grounds of a seigneur: belonging to the chateau was a large church, standing in a conspicuous situation, with a green dome, surmounted by the Greek cross; and round it were the miserable and filthy habitations of his slaves. Entering the village, we saw a spectacle of wretchedness and misery seldom surpassed even on the banks of the Nile. The whole population was gathered in the streets, in a state of absolute starvation. The miserable serfs had not raised enough to supply themselves with food, and men of all ages, half-grown boys, and little children, were prowling the streets or sitting in the doorways, ravenous with hunger, and waiting for the agent to come down from the chateau and distribute among them bread.

I had found in Russia many interesting subjects of comparison between that country and my own; but it was with deep humiliation I felt that the most odious feature in that despotic government found a parallel in ours. At this day, with the exception of Russia, some of the West India Islands, and the Republic of the United States, every country in the civilized world can respond to the proud boast of the English common law, that the moment a slave sets foot on her soil he is free. I respect the feelings of others and their vested rights, and would be the last to suffer those feelings or those rights to be wantonly violated; but I do not hesitate to say, that, abroad, slavery stands as a dark blot upon our national character. There it will not admit of any palliation; it stands in glaring contrast with the spirit of our free institutions; it belies our words and our hearts; and the American who would be most prompt to repel any calumny upon his country withers under this reproach, and writhes with mortification when the taunt is hurled at the otherwise stainless flag of the free Republic. I was forcibly struck with a parallel between the white serfs of the north of Europe and African bondsmen at home. The Russian boor, generally wanting the comforts which are supplied to the negro on our best-ordered plantations, appeared to me to be not less degraded in intellect, character, and personal bearing. Indeed, the marks of physical and personal degradation were so strong, that I was insensibly compelled to abandon certain theories not uncommon among my countrymen at home, in regard to the intrinsic superiority of the white race over all others. Perhaps, too, this impression was aided by my having previously met with Africans of intelligence and capacity, standing upon a footing of perfect equality as soldiers and officers in the Greek army and the Sultan's.

The condition of the Russian serfs is minutely described; but that is already tolerably well understood in Great Britain. It is, or ought to be, a condition superior to that of the negro slave, though such is not always the fact. The Russian serf cannot be sold except with the estate. He is required to labour only three days of the week for his lord, having the other three to cultivate his own portion of land; and Sundays, and the numerous holidays of the Greek church, are his own. But he is a slave, and so he labours grudgingly for his lord, and clothfully for himself, without an idea above the clod which he turns over. The traveller states—

A Russian nobleman told me that he believed, if the serfs were all free, he could cultivate his estate to better advantage by hired labour; and I have no doubt a dozen Connecticut men would cultivate more ground than a hundred Russian serfs, allowing their usual non-working days and holidays. They have no interest in the soil, and the desolate and uncultivated wastes of Russia shew the truth of the judicious reflection of Catherine II., "that agriculture can never flourish in that nation where the husbandman possesses no property."

It is from this great body of peasantry that Russia recruits her immense standing army, or, in case of invasion, raises in a moment a vast body of soldiers. Every person in Russia, entitled to hold land, is known to the government, as well as the number of peasants on his estate; and, upon receiving notice of an imperial order to that effect, the numbers required by the levy are marched forthwith from every part of the empire to the places of rendezvous appointed.

The journey from Chioff to Moscow occupied seven days, though performed in a diligence—the first ever started—and on its first trip. They travelled hundreds of miles without seeing a hill or a rising ground. The traveller resided a considerable time both in Moscow and St Petersburg, where his personal adventures were amusing and numerous. He seems to have a knack of bustling himself into the current of life, and is always quite as much an actor as an observer. In Poland his adventures threatened to become serious. Though it was now 1836, the jealousy entertained by the Russian authorities of all foreigners, seemed little abated. Our traveller gives an animated account of the terrible battle of Gorkow, and of the last fatal but heroic attempt of the Poles to recover their national independence. It is impossible to read this simple statement, heightened by many little anecdotes collected on the spot, without—if the heart cherishes one spark of patriotic feeling—being kindled to indignation, and melted to pity. At Cracow the traveller closes his lively and entertaining narrative, which we cordially recommend, both for information and entertainment.

Hints to Mechanics, on Self-Education and Mutual Instruction. By Timothy Claxton.

The author of this sensible little volume is a mechanic, self-educated, and a disciple of the school of Franklin. His first acknowledged advantage was obtaining a very little schooling, through the kindness of a lady, who kept six boys and six girls at school, for two years each. This he confesses was a piece of good luck, though he has no reliance on luck; and, on the contrary, places entire faith in good conduct. The good luck instanced would no doubt have been of small account without the accompanying diligence and perseverance in self-culture: besides, he partly owed the lady's patronage to the good name which his previous industry and diligence had acquired for him. From the time of being at school, until when at thirteen, he was apprenticed for seven years to a whitesmith, Timothy Claxton spun wool, tended sheep, and assisted in a market garden. There were older apprentices in the shop when he entered it, but not one who could keep an account of the work delivered to the saleshop from the workshop; so he was employed by the foreman for this purpose, and thus improved himself in keeping accounts. He was sometimes called to attend in the ironmongery shop, and here he saw something of the world, and, by observation, laid up stores for thought. His first money was laid out on a new Bible and a good thick cyphering book. He began arithmetic again by himself, and went through it more carefully than when at school; and he reaped the fruits of this diligence and redeeming of time ever afterwards. He scouted the notion of any mechanic ever wanting time for useful purposes. A journeyman carpenter, who possessed several books on the mensuration of superficies and solida, communicated both his books and instructions to the diligent apprentice. It was now that he first attempted to practise both mechanical and ornamental drawing; and he made good proficiency, much to his future benefit in life.

He began early to throw his thoughts on paper, in acting as the secretary of his father, who could not write; and he subsequently experienced the greatest advantage from facility in expressing his thoughts. He was also a great mechanist and an ingenious experimenter; and by his mother's cottage hearth, in the winter nights, when his apprentice labour was over, he constructed, among lesser things, a clock which kept time tolerably well, and required winding up only once in four days. We may notice, by the way, that the mechanic gives himself the very best of characters, though we make no doubt that he deserves as much. His pains in contriving and executing, while a boy, seems to have been quite as delightful as those described by Cowper as belonging to very different studies. That may, by varying the phrase, be as strongly affirmed of every man of genius, whatever be his particular pursuit.

"There is a pleasure in poetic pains, Which none but poets know"—

At the end of his long apprenticeship, he was, by the original bargain, to receive £10 from his master; and, having served out his time, "duly and truly," the money was paid—the indenture given up—and his master enquired of Timothy what he meant to do; but he shall tell that himself:—

"Go to London, sir," answered I, for I had made up my mind. "Well, Tim," said he, "keep your right hand forward, and you will do well enough;" and he gave me a hearty farewell.

I reached this great city in April 1810. From the circumstance of having lived in a rural district, I had then never seen so much as a steam-engine, or heard a lecture on anything, or read a book connected with the arts and sciences, save what I have mentioned, and a poor geography borrowed for a short time. The reader will bear these things in mind. He must make allowances for the generation of mechanics of that day, which are not to be made for those of this. A man, or a boy, then, might possibly talk with some plausibility of the lack of opportunities. Nothing had then been done to cheapen, and circulate, and simplify useful knowledge for the mass of the people. There were no Mechanics' Institutions—no popular libraries or reading-rooms—no lectures which we operatives could get at, or understand if we did. A worthy printer, largely engaged in useful publications, lately said, in giving evidence before a committee of the House of Commons—"It is a great satisfaction to consider that we set three hundred and sixty thousand of these works in circulation every Saturday morning." Satisfaction indeed! But there was no such thing then—no Family Libraries—no Penny Magazines. There was not so much as a coffee-room, suitable for a mechanic, in all London, when I entered it. The first was established, where it still remains, in 1811; whereas there are now over one thousand, besides two thousand eating-houses, in all which these publications are to be had gratis by the customers, in addition to the great economy which they are enabled by these establishments to practise in other respects, to say nothing of the snug comfort and decent society which most of them supply. For a London mechanic, especially, to talk now-a-days of having no chance to improve his mind or his manners, is the merest nonsense in the world. He has hardly a chance to avoid it. He must almost be a decided sot, a glutton, a gambler, a thief, or an idiot, to do so.

Of course, the metropolis was full of novelty for me. But I had business in hand, and went about it. I soon got work; and here I will remark that I have never, from that day to this, in any city or country, been without it, save when I travelled for my own pleasure or improvement; nor do I believe much in the necessity of a mechanic, in tolerable health, being destitute at any time of regular employment.

His first leisure in London was spent in going about seeing and learning all that was to be seen and learned; but shortly he bought a lathe, and married a wife, and began to draw again, as the cheapest and most useful of pastimes. We suspect that marrying so very soon might not have been altogether approved by Malthus; but, as Mr Southey says in the case of John Bunyan, who married at eighteen, "he had a trade, and could afford to marry." We do not at all object to the mechanic's early marriage, though we wish he had let us a little more into his confidence as to his ways and means. He does not seem to have repented the step, or, at least, it was no bar to his future self-education. He still dabbled in mechanics, and invented a very clever and original mouse-trap. But a new era dawned on his class. He was just twenty-five when he chanced to attend a course of lectures on natural philosophy and chemistry. He took notes, and drew sketches of the apparatus; and in this his old practices of drawing and writing served him well. But this was still but the dawn. He says,

Going home, I sat up very late to write out all I could remember of the lecture; and here my juvenile practice helped me again, even the tiresome copying I used to do for my father. So I went on, from October 1815 till the next April. Then I got a book on natural philosophy, and followed the subject up, for there's nothing, I found, like "striking while the iron is hot." Then I made various articles to try experiments with, which my mechanical practice rendered easy work. I went to a second course, and then to others given by other persons.

Finally, I applied for admission to a philosophical society; but, alas! one wanted friends at court in those days. Never discouraged, however, what should I do in such a case? Let any mechanic of this generation imagine himself living twenty years ago and consider. "Why," thought I, "I am a mechanic; and though that is the very reason I wish to be admitted, and why I should be, it is the very reason, also, why I am not." It is clear, then, the mechanics must look to themselves, and to each other. Well, a number of us having talked it over, I wrote a circular, dated June 24, 1817, (it was well I could write one,) got it printed, and sent it round town. From this paper I make the following liberal [literal?] extract, for I think it worthy of being put on record, and, indeed, something of a curiosity, as it will be seen that even at this early date, six years before the London Mechanics' Institution was formed, and when none of us had even heard of what had been done at Glasgow, or elsewhere, the circular, nevertheless, embraces substantially all the important principles recognised by modern Mechanics' Institutions.

We pass the circular; but the result of the appeal was the formation of a small society, which lasted from 1817 until 1820, when Mr Claxton went to Russia, being engaged by the government to put up gas-works. He had acted as secretary to the society, which, as they had no books, subscribed two guineas a-year to Horne's library, and obtained twenty volumes a-day—a good hint.

He saw a good deal worth noticing even among Russian workmen, and especially in Russian machines and domestic contrivances and appliances, of which he gives an intelligent account. From Russia he went, in 1822, to the United States, studying engineering on the voyage. He was engaged to work in a machine-shop, at a cotton-factory, thirty miles from Boston, (probably Lowell?) where he remained for three years, and again established a society for mutual improvement:—

Two discourses were delivered on a fast-day by the minister of the village: that in the afternoon was on the importance of knowledge, and the facility with which it can be obtained, by a judicious arrangement of our time, and our associating together for mutual benefit. In fact, he expressed my views on the subject so well, that I felt confident of a kind reception, and accordingly waited on him the same afternoon. After stating my views, and presenting him some papers on the subject, I was informed that a small society for reading had existed about five years in the village, but was at a very low ebb at that time. He was pleased with my proposals, and invited me to attend the next meeting of the society. I attended, and found a considerable number of both sexes assembled at the house of one of the members. They were engaged in reading by turns from Whelply's "Compend of General History;" and the president put questions to them as they proceeded, which made it interesting.

At the close of this exercise, he asked me how I liked it. "Very well," was the reply. I then inquired what other exercise they had. He told me that was all, excepting an annual address, which he delivered himself. I asked him if it would not be well to try the debating of questions, and familiar lectures on science and the arts. He said he thought well of it, but they felt very cautious how they ventured from the shore, lest they should get into deep water. I told him I thought they need not be afraid, for I had seen persons engaged in such exercises, whose opportunities for intellectual culture were inferior to theirs. I was asked if I could give them a lecture. I said I would try, and prepared myself accordingly. I had brought a small air-pump from Russia with me, which I made of a piece of gas tubing, with a ground plate on a mahogany stand. I bought a few glass articles, which were ground, to fit the pump plate, with a little sand and water, on the hearth-stone of my room. I also procured a small wash-tub, and fitted a shelf to it for a pneumatic cistern. In this way I succeeded, with a very simple apparatus, in explaining the mechanical, and some of the chemical, properties of the air.

This put new life into the society: its constitution was revised so as to include a library and apparatus. Debating was also adopted with success; and the ladies handed in compositions, which were read at the meetings. The reading exercise was pursued only occasionally. Several of the members who had not studied any particular branch of knowledge were prevailed on to give lectures on subjects connected with their professions. More than one case occurred, however, in which gratitude was felt by those who had been thus roused into action.

The society went on flourishingly, and finally built a hall of meeting at an expense of twelve hundred dollars. Mr Claxton was also an instrument in establishing the Boston Mechanics' Institution, the parent, according to him, of the Lyceum, there, and of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

Since that time, several minor societies have been formed, not to mention the Franklin Lectures, which have been got up particularly for the accommodation of mechanics: so that Boston is now well supplied with societies for the improvement of the mind.

Now, all or much of this, according to Mr Claxton, the Bostonians owe to the diligence and perseverance of the little boy to whom a considerate and charitable lady gave two years' very cheap schooling—and here ends his scanty autobiography; for, we are sorry to say, he teaches more by precept than example. We also regret to find so intelligent and observing a man entertain so very low an opinion of the class from which he has sprung, and to which he still belongs; and taking no cause into account, in severely animadverting upon the bad habits, the misery and brutish stupidity which he vituperates, besides the ignorance and sensual propensities of the workmen themselves. Neither their misery nor their ignorance are, we apprehend, altogether voluntary or self-incurred. But the exhortations of their friend are not the less well-intended; and there is no doubt whatever, that, even in the worst circumstances, much might be done by the workman to improve his mind, and thus better his condition. Cleanliness, ventilation, knowledge of the best processes of cookery and baking bread, &c., &c., to which he is exhorted, are certainly, to a certain extent, in his own power. The concluding chapters of the little volume contain many valuable Hints, illustrated by well-selected extracts from the best recent writers on the subjects elucidated, whether these be scientific, educational, moral, or economical. On the whole, the Hints form a good addition to the popular Franklinean Code, and we trust that they will be extensively circulated. Our author, by the way, in his pride of learning, falls among other small and trivial blunders into one about Cobalt. Rebbold or Cobalt, long before it assumed the secondary significance by which it is now generally known in this country, was the common appellation of a spirit or goblin of the mines. When the German miners pray to be preserved from Cobalt and Evil Spirits, they are not so stupid as to mean the ore from which we make paint or varnish—but from the swart goblin. Probably Mr Claxton may fancy the one as senseless as the other; but, at any rate, he will see his own mistake, and also that men are not always so ignorant as they may be supposed.

Shelley's Poems.

The third volume of Shelley's collected works, contains "Rosalind and Helen," "The Masque of Anarchy," "The Sensitive Plant," and a few more poems of considerable length; but it is mainly filled by his shorter pieces, and a few of his gem-like lyrics, consisting of a stanza or two, and containing the rich and subtle essence of volumes. In notes on the short poems of 1819—for they are all printed in chronological order—we find a passage connected with "The Masque of Anarchy." It was written shortly after Shelley heard of the Manchester Massacre. He was at that time composing "The Cenci," and residing near Leghorn. The intelligence of that brutal trampling upon the souls and bodies of his fellow-creatures, by their fellow-citizens—that affair more revolting to the spirit of liberty and humanity, than the worst passages in the history of the Civil Wars of England—"roused in him violent emotions of indignation and compassion." Inspired by these feelings, he wrote to teach his injured countrymen the great law of combination, and the strength of passive resistance—lessons since practised, and which we need not describe. It is added—"Shelley loved the people, and respected them as often more virtuous and always more suffering, and therefore more deserving of sympathy, than the great." He believed that a clash between the two classes of society was inevitable, and he eagerly ranged himself on the people's side. He had an idea of publishing a series of poems, somewhat in the manner since adopted by the "Corn-Law Rhymers;" and a few pieces of this kind were written at the time, but withheld from the public, from the certainty of prosecution for libel. Of these are the "Ode to the Assertors of Liberty," and the "Song to the Men of England." As poetry, they are inferior to the general strain of Shelley's writings; but for that day, they were rare productions. We copy the latter:—

"Men of England, wherefore plough
For the lords who lay ye low?
Wherefore weave, with toil and care,
The rich robes your tyrants wear?"

"Wherefore feed, and clothe, and save,
From the cradle to the grave,
Those ungrateful drones who would Drain your sweat—nay, drink your blood?"

"Wherefore, Bees of England, forge
Many a weapon, chain, and scourge,
That those stingless drones may spoil
The forced produce of your toil?"

"Have ye leisure, comfort, calm,
Shelter, food, love's gentle balm?
Or what is it ye buy so dear,
With your pain and with your fear?"

"The seed ye sow another reaps—
The wealth ye find another keeps—
The robes ye weave another wears—
The arms ye forge another bears.

"Sow seed, but let no tyrant reap—
Find wealth, let no impostor heap—
Weave robes, let not the idle wear—
Forge arms, in your defence to bear.

"Shrink to your cellars, holes, and cells—
In halls ye deck another dwells.
Why shake the chains ye wrought? why see
The steel ye tempered glance on ye.

"With plough and spade, and hoe and loom,
Trace your graves and build your tomb,
And weave your winding-sheet, till fair
England be your sepulchre."

Hymns and Fireside Verses. By Mary Howitt.

To those acquainted with Mrs Howitt's writing, this new volume does not require to be particularly described. It contains every characteristic of her genius and of her manner. The principal poem, which fills more than half the volume, is a religious allegory, in which Christianity, in the guise of a little child, goes a pilgrimage over the earth, carrying everywhere her gentle and child-like influences, and dispensing consolation, fortitude, and peace. We should fear that, from the simple structure of the verse, this long poem may, to some readers, become monotonous. But this objection may not be felt by the young reader. The poem contains passages of great tenderness and beauty, conceived in a pure, holy, and truly child-like spirit. From the short pieces, we select the following stanzas:—

CORN-FIELDS.

"In the young merry time of spring,
When clover 'gins to burst;
When the blue-bells nod within the wood,
And sweet May whitens first;
When merle and mavis sing their fill,
Green is the young corn on the hill."

The corn passes in all its stages—it shoots into the ear, it whitens, it ripens, it is shorn; and then—

"I feel the day; and see the field,
The quivering of the leaves;
And good old Jacob and his house
Binding the yellow sheaves;
And, at this very hour, I seem
To be with Joseph in his dream.

"I see the field of Bethlehem,
And reapers many a one,
Bending unto their sickle stroke,
And Boaz looking on;
And Ruth, the Moabitess fair,
Among the gleaners stooping there,
"Again I see a little child,
His mother's sole delight;
God's living gift of love, unto
The kind, good Shunamite.
To mortal pangs I see him yield,
And the lad bear him from the field.

"The sun-bathed quiet of the hills,
The fields of Galilee,
That, eighteen hundred years ago,
Were full of corn, I see;
And the dear Saviour take his way
'Mid ripe corn, on the Sabbath day.

"O golden fields of bending corn,
How beautiful they seem!
The reaper-folk, the piled-up sheaves,
To me are like a dream;
The sunshine, and the very air,
Seem of old time, and take me there."

Among the sweetest of the poems is this to

LITTLE CHILDREN.

"Sporting through the forest wide;
Playing by the water-side;
Wandering o'er the heathy fells,
Down within the woodland dells;
All among the mountains wild—
Dwelletb many a little child!
In the baron's hall of pride,
By the poor man's dull fireside—
'Mid the mighty, 'mid the mean—
Little children may be seen,
Like the flowers that spring up fair,
Bright and countless everywhere!"

"In the far isles of the main;
In the desert's lone domain;
In the savage mountain-glen,
'Mong the tribes of swarthy men
Wheresoe'er a foot hath gone;
Wheresoe'er the sun hath shone;
On a league of peopled ground,
Little children may be found!"

Blessings on them!—they in me
Move a kindly sympathy
With their wishes, hopes, and fears;
With their laughter and their tears;
With their wonder so intense;
And their small experience!"

Among the hymns, we find this one highly to prize—
It is well adapted for singing in an Infant School.

THE POOR CHILD'S HYMN.

"We are poor and lowly born,
With the poor we bide;
Labour is our heritage,
Care and want beside.
What of this? Our blessed Lord
Was of lowly birth,
And poor toiling fishermen
Were his friends on earth!
"We are ignorant and young,
Simple children all;
Gifted with but humble powers,
And of learning small.
What of this? Our blessed Lord
Loved such as we.
How He blessed the little ones
Sitting on his knee!"

"Mabel on Midsummer Day"—a legend or story of the olden time, when kindness and humanity, industry and neatness, were especially rewarded by "the good people"—is one of those sweet and simple legendary effusions in which Mrs Howitt delights and excels. We hope the Germans are becoming acquainted with these, her most characteristic writings, such as this same little Mabel—for the German heart is quite fitted to receive and cherish them.

The little volume is most beautifully embellished with wood engravings.

Little Derwent's Breakfast,

is a set of nursery verses, the pap and panada of poetry, written by a mother for her darling boy, and that boy the grandchild of Coleridge. Some of the rhymes are lively, and all are meant to convey instruction, though more of the Useful-Knowledge sort than Grandpapa would have liked. He must be a very proud young gentleman who finds a volume of verse written and published, all for or about himself, before he was seven years old; but other young gentlemen may reap the benefit of it if they please. An Inquiry into the Propagation of Contagious Poisons. By S. Scott Alison, M.D.

On the main point of this discussion, Dr Alison of Tranent, after stating the evidence, seems to arrive at the safe conclusion "that much might be said on both sides," although he rather seems to incline to disbelief of Atmospheric Contagion. He has, however entire belief in the evil effects of Malaria, which comes to nearly the same thing. In a popular view, the concluding chapters of his treatise, those on other causes of pestilence, such as famine, or unwholesome or insufficient food and drink, filth, want of proper shelter and clothing, anxiety and depression of mind, are the most important. Poverty is, beyond doubt, a far more general and active cause of the fevers named contagious, in this country, than all other causes combined. From the eleventh chapter we shall borrow a passage, embodying facts and reasonings which ought to be dinned in our ears till they sink into our hearts, and actuate our conduct.

Much of the continued fever which infests the poorer classes of our countrymen, and almost all the pleurisies, colds, and consequent consumptions, which prevail more or less among the various ranks every winter, are in a very great degree dependent on the extreme cold of the season which suddenly sets in, and against which the dress of the inhabitants of these islands is insufficient to provide. The labouring classes suffer much, more particularly from the action of cold and the inclemency of the weather. They are generally very scantily clothed, nay, they are sometimes scarcely covered, and the consequence is, that the cold makes a strong and lasting impression, the circulation on the surface is suddenly impeded, the perspiration is checked, and the whole fabric involuntarily shivers. Now these are the very first symptoms of fever, and unless the constitution is possessed of stamina to remove those symptoms without loss of time, and to establish the circulation in its vigour again upon the surface of the body, that disease, or some other, will undoubtedly be established.

The clothes, the house, and the diet of the working man, are insufficient to protect him against the action of the cold, and to resist its operation when once it has fastened upon him; and thus it is, that to comparative want and to many privations, there is often conjoined so much disease.

But it is in vain to expect any other result as long as our most deserving labouring population is worked in an inordinate degree—so long as they labour beyond what their limited energies will, with impunity, permit—so long as they are often unable to obtain a diet sufficient for the maintenance even of an idle person—and so long as their very breasts, from very want of clothing, are literally open and exposed to the fiercest blast that blows, and to the most searching and chilling rain that falls from heaven.

Observe the industrious labourer at his work; behold his powers are taxed to the utmost, his energies, his capabilities, are put upon the stretch, and the entire fabric, God's most complicated and most delicate creation, is actually labouring and heaving with protracted exertion. His blood distils the dew of labour, and his clothes, such as they are, are moistened with perspiration bursting from a thousand pores.

It frequently happens that, the labour of the poor man being over, sorely fatigued, too exhausted even to enjoy the consciousness that his hour of rest has arrived, with a heavy and unwieldy gait and hanging head, he seeks his comfortless abode, his scanty board, his dreary, dark, scarcely furnished apartment, with its faint and glimmering embers.

He swallows his spare repast and falls asleep at his fire-side; but having no change of clothes, and those which he has on being wet with perspiration or with rain, are allowed to dry upon him. In the meantime the heat of the fire proves sufficient to create a steam on the side next it, and the house of course being open to the wind, currents of air, chillingly cold, pervade the apartment, and strike upon that side of the poor inmate which is most remote from the fire, and thus he of a thousand misfortunes and privations is actually steamed on one side, and perished with cold on the other. Persons placed in such a situation can scarcely, for any length of time, escape disease; and it is consonant with my knowledge to say, that the condition of a great proportion of the labouring classes is not one tittle better. Fever and many other diseases will continue to assail our labouring population as long as their food is insufficient, as long as they are barely covered during the inclement season, as long as their habitations scarcely own a roof or a door, as long as the wind and rain enter at a thousand crevices; and while the cheerful and salubrious light of heaven is denied admittance by the old hats, bunches of straw, and rubbish which so frequently, in the absence of glass, fill up the space originally intended for a window. Yes, so long as every energy is exerted, and every moment that can be cheated from rest, to obtain that wherewith a supply of the necessities of life may be procured, and when every other consideration sinks and gives way to the more pressing wants of nature, will disease prevail.

Such is the destitution among many of the labouring class, and the vast amount of disease which prevails among them, is the necessary consequence.

The following facts illustrate well the influence which scanty food, insufficient clothing, and the privations attendant upon poverty, exert in the production of disease.

During the last three months, (10th February 1839,) the fishermen and potters living in Prestonpans have been in a very destitute condition; the former, partly from the very boisterous weather which has prevented their going regularly to sea, and the latter from the closure of the potteries at which they were employed. During that time, these two classes of people have been suffering much from fever, about ten of their number having died in that short period; while the people, amounting to 750, including children, connected with Prestongrange colliery, who are well employed, well paid, and well fed, though inhabiting the same locality, and the houses stretching from Preston-pans to Musselburgh Links, have been almost entirely free of that disease, fever having affected two of those families only, in the course of the same time; and while fever is still prevailing extensively among the potters and fishermen, the people connected with the colliery have been entirely free of that disease since about the 7th of last December. On these facts I am well informed, being the medical attendant of the colliery.

The thirteenth chapter contains some valuable hints upon the prevention and correction of vitiated air. To the facts which Dr Alison has collected, we may, in passing, add one, mentioned in Mr Symons' book on the conditions of the artisans of Great Britain and the Continent—namely, that in Lyons, with its numerous and miserable manufacturing population, Cholera never appeared; and that the absence of that scourge, and, in general, of epidemic diseases, is to be attributed to the large lime-kilns in the suburbs, the exhalations of which perceptibly impregnate the atmosphere.

Notes of a Wanderer in Search of Health, through Italy, Egypt, Greece, Turkey, up the Danube and down the Rhine.

The author of these Notes is Dr Cumming, late a physician in the East India Company's service, and apparently a descendant of the Wolf of Badenoch. In India he lost his health—not so much, we are led to imagine, from the climate or the severe malady by which he was attacked, (acute dysentery,) as through the activity and energetic practice of his physicians. In pursuit of health, he travelled in the United States and Canada, and lived for a considerable time in France, before commencing this rambling and eccentric tour in search of the capricious goddess. We must own that it is his professional or medical heresies which have impressed us with a favourable opinion of his judgment in other matters which fell under his observation. In ascending the Nile in his gallant bark, christened the Findhorn, from affectionate reminiscences of Auld lang syne, Dr Cumming was, in December 1836, attacked with the horrible disease from which he had suffered so much, in 1829, at Cawnpore. He was alone in every sense of the word; his boat's crew, consisting of natives, and a guide or interpreter, being his only companions. He had taken with him nothing whatever in the shape of medicine. Too little of the apothecary may, at times, be inconvenient; but is certainly not worse than too much. Dr Cumming, with intervals of remission, suffered so severely for about a week, that he fairly gave himself up, and so did his attendants. As a forlorn hope, he ordered his guide to sponge him with hot water; and this simple remedy, with fomentation of the abdomen, was the only treatment employed. After it had been for some time persisted in, he felt relieved. A little wine and water remained on his stomach; he became drowsy, slept for a short time, felt his skin less hot and burning, and, in brief, began to recover, and that rapidly. In short, in about a week from the crisis of his disorder, which was accelerated by the simple applications mentioned, he writes in his journal.

My recovery is now almost complete, and the rapidity of my convalescence leads me to contrast my late attack with a precisely similar one which I had at Cawnpore, in the autumn of 1829. On that occasion I was largely bled at the arm—had fifty leeches applied to the abdomen, and, during the first four days of the disease, in addition to extensive mercurial frictions, I swallowed 216 grains of calomel! True, I recovered, or rather, I did not die; whether in consequence of, or in spite of the above heroic treatment, I will not venture to say. My face was swelled to an enormous size, every tooth was loose in my jaws, and for six or eight weeks I could eat no solid food. My constitution received a shock from which it never fairly recovered; and I was finally obliged to come to Europe on furlough. On the present occasion, fortunately for me, the "vis medicatrix nature" was my sole physician, and I am now almost as well as before the attack commenced. British medical practice, in my humble opinion, deals too much in heroics. We laugh at the French, for the expectancy of their treatment; but if they do too little, we assuredly do too much. On first visiting the hospitals of Paris, I was astonished at the want of energy in the practice of the physicians; but experience and observation soon taught me, that the sick could recover without the ocean of drugs that is wont to be administered in England. Although no disciple of Broussais, I think his country is much indebted to him for having, in a great measure, put down the drugging system in medicine. A pharmacist of Paris once remarked to me, that Broussais had ruined the apothecary business; so it would appear, for I verily believe there are fewer druggists' shops in the whole city of Paris, than in the town of Bath.

We confess a prepossession for a traveller capable of rising so clearly above the bigotry and bias of education and professional habit as Dr Cumming does on this and other occasions, and, indeed, as often as by the nature of his subject he is led into medical discussions. This is the guarantee of that independent opinion and sound judgment, which we look for in a traveller, and which he discovers throughout the whole course of his wanderings. Great originality in going over much of the beaten track which he followed, is not longer to be looked for; but his impressions have freshness, and they are, moreover, those of a sensible and well-educated Scotsman, in whom experience and ill-health has tempered without quenching the fire and enthusiasm of youth, and who always contrives to interest the sympathies of the reader, not more in the course of his strange adventures, than in his personal feelings and opinions, from a certain happy knack of talking of himself, and letting us into his confidence without the smallest suspicion arising on our parts of conceit, pretension, or egotism. He is neither, as a traveller, an Antiquary, an Artist, nor a raving poetical Religionist; but his professional acquirements and previous accumulation of knowledge, give him immense advantages over the ordinary run of gentlemen, who, with malice prepense, sit down to bestow their travels on the public. The spirit of enlightened philanthropy which pervades the book will farther recommend it to many. This is not found in showy, flowery passages and elaborate gettings-up, but comes naturally, and in its own place, with the flow of the narrative. The state of the hospitals interested Dr Cumming wherever he went; and in no country in the world are they in so deplorable a condition as in Egypt. The lunatic asylum in Cairo must be the most horrible den of human misery and debasement to be found upon the face of the earth. From the madhouse the traveller one morning went to the slave-market, and thence to a very different scene. Dr Cumming is not an admirer of Mahomed Ali.

Our next visit was to the citadel, where a number of workmen are busy with the erection of a mausoleum, destined to receive the body of his Highness. The sole beauty of the building consists in the slabs of alabaster with which its interior is lined. An extensive quarry of this beautiful stone has been discovered on the eastern shore of the Nile, and the Pacha is robbing it of its treasures, to ornament the intended receptacle of his vile carcass. It would do him more honour as a man, and credit as a ruler, were he to expend the money thus uselessly lavished, on the erection of an hospital for the treatment of his poor blind subjects. It is a fashion with persons in England and other parts of Europe, to laud Mahomed Ali to the skies, as an enlightened ruler and a successful conqueror. To the latter appellation I do not dispute his claim, but as to his paternal anxieties for the good of his people, let the thousands of blind in the streets of Cairo bear mournful witness. For myself, I feel nothing but abhorrence towards the man who squanders the lives and properties of his subjects, in the conquest of remote countries, which he will probably soon be forced to re-

Enquire; while he neglects the easy and attainable means of conducing to their domestic happiness, by an endeavour to remedy an evil as sweeping in its extent as afflicting in its effects. He has, indeed, formed a large and expensive military college; but this is in keeping with his schemes of aggrandisement and conquest. But is there even one general hospital in Cairo open to all? I have heard of none such, and yet the population of the city is said to amount to 400,000 souls: So much for his paternal care of his subjects. . . . Nothing is more common than for young men to disqualify themselves from being soldiers, by chopping off a fore-finger, knocking out their cartridge-teeth, and even putting out one of their eyes. All military service is compulsory. I have frequently seen wretched recruits, just kidnapped, marched in chains, or with their hands stuck through wooden stocks, to the various barracks. Little fidelity can be expected from such an army. Nevertheless, it serves the purpose of the Pacha, and no more is cared for or required.

At the Falls of Niagara, Dr Cumming had some years before cut himself a sturdy staff, christened Niagara, and which did him yeoman's service in his voyage up the Nile. At the ultimate point of his discoveries, we find a passage, which we present to our readers as a specimen of a work which we heartily recommend to their attention, regretting that our narrow space denies us, in the passing month, the pleasure of telling them more about it.

Second Cataract of the Nile.—Nubia, January 15.—Light airs and calms all yesterday. I did not reach Ouadi Halfah until seven p.m. This morning I was towed to the foot of the cataract, and set out after breakfast, accompanied by Mahmood and the pilot, to gain a high rock (about four miles from my bark) which overlooks the cataract, and commands an extensive view of the rapids. We were on the Lybian shore, and our road lay along the skirt of the desert. It is surprising what a variety of feature the desert presents. The prevailing characteristics are certainly nakedness and sand; but the eye is not wearied by the monotony of a long stretch of ocean. Here is a hill of black and crumbly stones—there a valley of loose sand—in other places a plain as flat as a bowling-green. We traversed large masses of white sandy rock, rising out of the desert. On our right was the tomb of a saint in the shape of a "cairn" of stones standing on a little knoll, on passing which my companions made a profound obeisance. The only living thing we saw, was a superb eagle, who fled on our approach, from a feast of carrion, on which he was regaling; all around were scattered large bones, bleached by the sun to the whiteness of snow: from their size they must have been those of the camel. A rough ride of an hour and ten minutes brought me to the rock, which I hastened to ascend, to enjoy the prospect from its summit. The view from this position is one of great interest, and of a character altogether unique. The river is divided and broken into innumerable streams and eddies, by an infinity of islands of a black, smooth, and shining rock. These are of every size and shape; some forming mere specks rising out of the stream—others small, circular, or rugged islets, either altogether barren, or having merely a solitary thorny shrub, deriving its support from a handful of soil deposited in a cavity of the rock. There are others pretty thickly covered with a kind of stunted tree, and two or three towards the bottom of the series, with groves of palms and cultivation. These last are inhabited. Looking upwards, as far as the eye can reach, a similar appearance presents itself: indeed so thickly clustered are the little isles, that the view of the river at a distance is almost intercepted, excepting here and there, where its muddy waters may be seen stealing smoothly along, or broken into foam by opposing rocks. There is nothing to convey the idea, or to merit the appellation of a cataract: indeed the rapids make but an inconspicuous appearance. The river Findhorn, in a flood, has hundreds far more swift and terrible. Looking across the Nile, eastward, the horizon is bounded by a tedious and uninteresting view of the desert. . . . To me, perhaps, the knowledge that I was above a thousand miles from the shores of the Mediterranean, and on a spot but rarely frequented by travellers, was not its least charm. It pleased me to reflect that I was the only European (so far as I knew), thus high on the course of the Nile; and, although no friend of monopolies in general, I was not sorry to have the whole of the beautiful landscape to myself. The presence of a stranger would have been no small bar to my enjoyment.

Having remained for an hour on the top of the rock, I descended to the river, in the hope of cutting a stick from one of the trees near the edge of the cataract. Mahmood had proceeded on a similar errand, to a group of palms, about half a mile higher up; it was not long before I desoried a portly staff in the midst of a thorny brake, which after some toil and many scratches, I succeeded in cutting and disengaging, as a mate for "Niagara." This done, I descended to the edge of the rapid, and plunging it into the torrent, duly christened it Nilus; bathing at the same time the weather-beaten trunk of Niagara; and thus, in a manner, wedding the St Lawrence to the Nile! My labours over, I seated myself on the rock, and drank a glass of brandy and water to the health of many a distant friend, not in Europe only, but in Asia and the New World also; for all these continents contain persons who have held out the right hand of fellowship to me. I now washed out the remains of the brandy, and stretching the bottle as far into the rapid as my arm could reach, filled it with the rushing waters of the fruitful Nile. Although the breeze was fresh and cool, the sun felt powerful and hot. By aid of a small lens, I contrived to light a cigar, and, stretching myself at full length on the black and glossy rock—the smoke ascending in fantastic wreaths from my mouth, I mused on Scotland and on dear lang-syne.

To invalidate this work is important. Egypt, thanks to steam, is now nearer to us than lately were the South of France, Portugal, Italy, or Madeira; and, by Dr Cumming's report, Egypt, in winter, must be the paradise of those affected or threatened with pulmonary affections.

Beginning of a New School of Metaphysics.

By B. H. Smart.

Here is an ingenious man, an original thinker, who complains that he has nearly fallen another victim to "the False Medium." Nay, after he had escaped the Scylla of the publishers, he has been almost wrecked in the Charybdis of the reviewers. Six or seven years since, zeal for the interests of science, and perhaps a little of the natural pride of discovery, led him to publish a work, which he entitled an "Essay on Sematology," a name which was probably fatal to his object, as not one individual in a hundred thousand could have guessed that he meant to discuss under this name, grammar, logic, and rhetoric. Accordingly, none of the literary Tribunes took the least notice of his book. The subject of which it treats he had revolved for twenty years; and he published at last anonymously, in the hope "of being mistaken for a Lord, or a Doctor high in university repute, or a political leader trying his hand on a by-subject;" but the great critics would not bite. No bookseller would risk the expense of launching "Sematology" into the world; nor was there any literary clique to back it when it came forth. One or two newspapers treated it with their wonted civility and kindness. Discouraging as was this reception, the author was not dimayed. He was sustained by the consciousness of a good purpose and the hope that, if his Essay could be forced upon public notice, it would indicate an opening for much improvement in one department of science. We are not judging of the truth or of the originality of the theory evolved in his treatise, but we cannot help admiring his fortitude and perseverance. He has re-published his original treatise with considerable additions, and a number of shorter Essays upon subjects allied to his favourite studies. He will this time at least receive more attention, whatever acceptance his speculations may find among the learned.

A New Epistle by the Apostle Paul.

This epistle, recently discovered among manuscripts of remote antiquity, and translated out of the original Greek, is humbly dedicated to the English and Irish Bishops. Some of the verses make good sharp hits. We cull three or four:—

CHAPTER III.

24. And whereas I did once write to the saints which are at Corinth, that I would not suffer a woman to usurp authority in the Church over the men; yet there is now a new commandment.

25. And this new commandment, that ye allow women to have even the chief authority in the Church; for the days will come when a virgin shall sit upon the throne.

26. Therefore let her be your chief; and albeit she is of tender years, yet must she appoint the bishops, when, by reason of their death, their habitation is desolate, and their bishopricks another has to take.

27. But if wicked men do gainsay this, saying, that if a woman may fill the highest station in the Church, being the head thereof, and appointing to office therein, and sit on benches in the Lord's House, in stalls and in pulpits of wood, take no heed of the word that is spoken.

28. And without respect for truth—for the fashion of the Church passeth away—let all Princes, even though they do evil in the sight of the Lord, be solemnly pronounced most religious and gracious persons.

29. I will also that ye never speak of us as labourers in God's vineyard, nor yet as fishermen of Galilee, but that such things straitway be forgotten, and that we be denominate the College of the Apostles.

CHAPTER IV.

12. There may be archbishops, who shall take the oversight of the bishops, having the largest share of the one thing needful; for money answereth all things.

26. The Church of Rome greeteth you, whom ye ought to love as one of yourselves; for no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but loveth it and cherisheth it.

28. They of Babylon (which is called Rome; but this is a great mystery) salute you, specially the man of whom it was said, "He shall be revealed in his time, and who as God sitteth in the temple of God."

30. May wealth, and dignity, and honour, and splendour, and pomp, and power be with you all evermore. Amen and amen.

These are not the best things in the Epistle, but they make its object apparent. It goes on, in the same sarcastic strain, to expose whatever Dissenters or Puritans consider unscriptural in the doctrines, ritual, and discipline of the Church of England.

Roscoe's London and Birmingham Railway Guide.

We noticed this work when it first appeared in Parts. It is now completed; and will form a useful and entertaining companion to the traveller, from its direct information, as well as the sketches of the many interesting places, either upon the track of the Railway or in its vicinity, and from the numerous local descriptions, traditions, and anecdotes which the author has picked up. A good, coloured map is a desirable accompaniment to the traveller; and the numerous engravings of the more remarkable scenes in the route are much better executed than in ordinary guide-books. They are, indeed, pretty landscapes and views. There is but one omission. Why, Mr Roscoe—or Mr Peter Lecount, if the utilitarian department be yours—do you not, like the "Birmingham Guide," tell travellers what is to pay by the different trains, and to the different stations? It is of far more consequence what our own tickets are to cost than the contract price paid by the proprietors for forming the road. Among the anecdotes is one of a landed proprietor who charged enormously high for a piece of ground needed by the company, upon the plea that the Railway would injure his property. It was completed; and the company required another piece of his land for buildings, and other purposes; and for this he demanded much more, on the opposite ground, that his land had been greatly enhanced in value by the Railway!

Sickness and Mortality in the West Indies; a Letter to the Secretary at War. By Sir Andrew Halliday.

Sir A. Halliday here suggests many practical reforms for promoting the health and general well-being of the troops in the West Indies. He is a believer in atmospheric contagion. He thinks it suddenly arises from the combination of moisture and heat; and he also believes that it causes all the epidemic and endemic fevers of the West India colonies. He says he is convinced, that the subtle poison generated by this combination, does not enter the system by the lungs, but through the medium of the stomach, and that it does not consist in any vitiated quality of the air itself, but in some poisonous matter which that air carries along with it; and which it is now proved, it will not elevate to a greater height than 2500 feet above the level of the sea. These are curious and nice questions; but the results are plain and practical. A specific for the fever of these colonies, or something approaching one, is mentioned here with great approbation. Dr Warburg's Fever Drops, prepared from plants, whose virtues had been made known to the Doctor by the Indians of Demerara, have been tried by our military surgeons in the regimental hospitals, "with the most perfect success." The Fever Drops are about to be tried in the fevers of Gibraltar and the Mediterranean stations. We should not have mentioned the circumstance, save that Sir Andrew Halliday is not at all likely to patronize quack remedies. Other diseases of the troops nearly as fatal as fever, those of the stomach and bowels, have been prevented by additional rations of fresh meat—a remedy in which we would have great faith in similar cases, were it duly administered at home. The work-house unions have furnished some satisfactory recent proofs.

Jamaica Plantership.

Sodom and Gomorrah must have been places distinguished by humanity, mercy, and purity, in comparison with Jamaica, if we are to believe Mr Benjamin M'Mahon. This gentleman details his eighteen years' experiences in its various plantations, Pens, and coffee mountains—eighteen years, during which he must have had nearly double the number of employers; who, with those in their employment—and overseers, attorneys, medical men, special magistrates—were nearly all alike monsters of cruelty—unredeemed, brutal ruffians. We hope they may not all be quite so black as they are called; but the author gives name and surname, and makes no mystery about his shocking statements.

Women Physiologically considered, as to Mind.Morals, Marriage, Matrimonial Slavery, Infidelity, and Divorce. By Alexander Walker.

This author is much more successful in pointing out existing evils in the condition of women, than in propounding such remedies as would either improve their social condition, or elevate the morals of society. While he professes to feel great indignation at the injustice systematically inflicted upon the sex by their masters, his opinion of woman is debasing, and his suggestions for elevating her social position, far from ennobling to the beautiful animal of fine instincts and no intellect, or intellect extremely circumscribed, which he depicts. The work does not, in our judgment, deserve the approbation of the sex for whose sake it professes to be written. There may be many anomalies and injustices to women in the existing relations of the sexes; but this author is not to be their redressor, nor is he either a very judicious or delicate expositor of the wrongs of women.

The Eccaleobian.

Among the many sights and shows of London, there is one, at present, under the above learned name, the object of which is to exhibit the artificial hatching of chickens. After the eggs attain a certain stage in the process, they are sold to amateurs, at one shilling each—not to eat, but to hatch out, and watch at home till the animal comes to life. There are also portable eccaleobians, for the amusement of evening parties in their own houses! The exhibitor of the machinery for artificial incubation has written a treatise on the subject, which, with a considerable quantity of puffing, contains some curious matter.

Modern Art and Living Artists.

A very meagre work this, when we compare the smallness of the performance with the magnificence of the title. Yet it contains just opinions and clever remarks, and proves that a better taste in art is advancing among us.

The Youth of Shakspeare. 3 vols.

"Shakspeare and his Friends" rose to sudden fame by general acclamation. This new romance, by the same author, errs in nothing so much as appearing after that popular fiction. If inferior, its inferiority would not have been found out. It is composed in the same joyous and genial spirit, and cannot fail to delight nine out of ten of those devouring readers whose daily bread is fiction. Nothing can be better than the opening festive scenes in Stratford, Shakspeare's courtship of Anne Hathaway, and his early London adventures.

The Book of Bon-Accord.

What Southeron could guess that this title signifies a history of Aberdeen, and a Guide-Book to the same "Brave Town?" Bon-Accord is the motto, and was the ancient watchword of Aberdeen. The volume will be precious to the sons and daughters of Bon-Accord, and their descendants; and amusing to all men north of the Tweed. It is high-pressure-full of curious and queer Aberdonian information of all kinds; ranging from the qualities of Finnan haddocks to those of learned professors, native poets, and of the stalwarth provosts and bailies of the fighting times, when Aberdeen, with the clans upon the one hand, and the turbulent Lowlanders on the other, was kept in continual turmoil. Bating some slight prejudice against Puritans and Covenanters, indigenous to Aberdeenshire, the author has displayed impartiality, care, learning, and ability for his task, and produced a good history. A few more characteristic and amusing anecdotes of the Aberdonians, the Yorkshire men of Scotland, might be desirable from the abundant stores afloat; but might, perhaps, have been below the dignity and gravity of history. In lieu of this, we have many traits of the manners of the olden times—the burning of witches, the branding of harlots, the torture of Quakers, the punishment of Sabbath-breakers, and, above all, the persecution of those who dared to speak evil of dignities in the person of "their Wisdoms," the bailies.

English Stories of the Olden Time. By Maria Hack. 2 volumes.

We entirely approve the reasons which have led this ingenious lady to adopt the ever-attractive story-telling medium, in initiating young persons into the study of history. She has also made a moderate use of the interrogative form, or of dialogue, the better to attain her purpose. The work shews extensive and careful reading and sober judgment, and may be made very useful to many besides the juvenile class for which it is principally intended. This class is not mere children. Young persons, from twelve to fourteen, may, in this forward age fairly rank in information with what their grandfathers and grandmothers were at from fifteen to eighteen. The stories come down to nearly the close of the reign of Elizabeth: the book is neat, and even handsome, and appropriate to all private school-rooms and parlours, where children read, for improvement, with their friends.

SERIAL WORKS.

PART I. of a work entitled THE FATHERS AND FOUNDERS OF THE LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, including Memoirs of the more distinguished founders and leaders of the Methodists, has just appeared. The work is from the pen of the Rev. Dr Morison, the author of some moral and religious treatises with which we are not acquainted. This conjoined history and biography is calculated to interest the religious world, and appears to be well executed. No thinking man, whatever be his theological opinions, who is acquainted with the moral and religious state of the people of England during the greater part of the last formal, dead, or apathetic century, can fail to appreciate those truly apostolic labours of the early Methodists, which this work sketches, before it passes to its more general objects. Previous to all foreign missionary labours whatever, was the great and arduous "excavation" of the British heathen, undertaken by Wesley and Whitefield, and their disciples; and we are inclined to believe that the results of that movement still remain of far more importance than all other missionary efforts put together. This Part is embellished with exceedingly good medallion-sized portraits of such men as Haweis, Eyre, Bogue, and Burder.

Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines,

Is just completed, by the publication of Part X. The last three Parts are peculiarly rich in information. They contain, among other things, Paper-making, Pit-coal, Pottery, Printing, Plating, Refining, the Silk and the Woollen manufacture, Stills, Stoves, Sugar and Sugar-Refining, Soap, Soda, Wine, &c. &c. The treatises on the Woollen and Silk Manufactures, and those on the Potteries, each important branches of national industry, are ample and minute, and are fully illustrated by numerous engravings. Of these, the work contains upwards of twelve hundred.

The Pictorial History of Napoleon

Has reached Part II., which is stuffed with wood-engravings to repletion. Some of them are clever and characteristic, others indifferent enough. The letter-press comes down to the eve of the Consulate. Let us hope that the writer of the history is not about to be dazzled by the false glory of his hero. It has been many an able man's fortune.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

In our Magazine for June 1836,* we pointed out a safe way of making fictitious votes, by declaring the price a real burden on the property, and we also suggested residence as a check to such votes. The Whigs, after floundering about, and having many of their votes struck off the roll, have at length, in making votes this year, adopted the plan we three years ago proposed; and the Lord Advocate, with the view of stopping the creation of such votes, has brought in a bill to make residence a condition of the exercise of the suffrage. There is certainly no ordinary degree of inconsistency in the Whig lawyers in Parliament pretending to be anxious to stop the creation of fictitious votes, while not only their nearest relations, but their most intimate political connexions, and, in truth, the whole Edinburgh Whig clique, have been as busy as possible in making votes all winter. But perhaps the explanation of the matter may be, that the desire to extinguish future fictitious votes arises out of that very activity; for the Whigs may have discovered that they have obtained a majority of such votes, and, as all already on the roll will be safe, on the ground of vested interest, they may wish now to shut the door against the Tories. That the attempt to carry the bill through Parliament will fail, nobody doubts. This is, however, a mere Whig and Tory question, with which the people have little to do; and we confess that, with the present limited constituency, we have some doubts whether the making of votes is an evil of any great turpitude; for, perhaps, a fictitious voter is better than no voter at all. Another bill, which his Lordship has introduced, is one for establishing an Appeal Court in Edinburgh, to ensure uniformity in the decisions of the Registration Courts. Such a court is imperatively called for; but, if it is to consist of Sheriffs, who owe their situations to nothing but political partisanship, it will prove a failure. Any one who has attended the Registration Courts, whether primary or of appeal, will require no evidence of our assertion. The bill for suspending the Constitution of Jamaica, whether so decisive a step be called for or not, being a coercion bill, is, of course, certain of passing both Houses, as fast as the forms of Parliament will admit. It is plain that our expenditure for black-slave emancipation has only begun, and that our armed force in the West Indies will require to be augmented; for both the white and black population will require watching, in the present state of matters in North America. We wish that some sympathy could be spared for the white slaves at our own doors—we mean the shopkeepers, and particularly the druggists' and grocers' clerks and apprentices, many of whom have fourteen hours' labour a-day, without their excess of labour doing any good, either to their masters, or to any one else; for it is obvious, if all the shops were shut at one time, no one would lose. A Ten-Hours' Shopmen and Tradesmen's Act is as much required as that for the factory children; for, until the hours of labour are abridged by law, and under penalties which any common informer can recover, the hour of shopshutting will never be materially abridged. But relief is hopeless; because the shopmen and apprentices are too near at hand. If personal charity begins at home, experience teaches that public charity begins abroad and ends there.

ENGLAND.

THE LANDLORDS AND THE LABOURERS.—The landlords were highly indignant, when they were lately told in Parliament, by Sir George Strickland, that they ground the faces of the poor, and that rent-rolls could be maintained at their present rate, only by the continued misery of the working man. They, of course, denied the assertion, affected the greatest sympathy for the farmer and labourer, and asseverated that the repeal of the Corn-Laws was a question in which the farmer and labourer had a much greater stake than themselves. Disinterested landed-interest! It appears that, in the South of England, agricultural labourers are in a much worse condition than among ourselves. Until the recent rise in the price of provisions, their wages were six shillings a-week; now, the best workmen may earn nine shillings, but not on constant employment; so that when all prices have risen one hundred per cent., wages have, in some few instances, increased fifty per cent. On such a pittance as nine shillings a-week, a man, to support himself, his wife and children, must live much worse than his neighbour's pig, at least if his neighbour ever expects to convert his pig into eatable pork. The people employed in manufactures are unquestionably much better paid, much better fed, much better lodged than the agricultural labourers; as any one will soon convince himself who will go to any cotton-mill, such as New Lanark or Dranstoun, and look into the matter, and then examine the miserable hovels of the ploughmen, with damp earthen floors; windows hardly a foot square, and which cannot be opened, and perhaps a pig or cow under the same roof.

Yes, the landlords grind the faces of the poor, and consider themselves entitled to use them in the manner which contributes most to their own benefit. Out of a labourer's wages of nine shillings a-week, at least two shillings go directly to the landlord and farmer, in the shape of bread-tax, and other two are expended in the increased price of commodities the bread-tax occasions. The British landowner, therefore, participates as much, though indirectly, in the wages of the working man, as the Russian landlord does in those of his serf, who has to pay over to the owner of the estate on which he was born, a fixed proportion of the wages of his daily toil. And, talking of serfs, how long is it since the poor were slaves in Scotland? Not much more than fifty years. It is hardly more than half a century since colliers and salters were sold along with the colliery and salt-work, in the same manner as the gin horse, or rather gin itself, and salt-pan. It required various statutes, in the period between 1770 and 1790, to put an end to the practice; yet it was only a remnant of the old law and custom of Enrope, which gave the same right to the lords of the soil, in all the men, women, and children who were born upon it, as in the wild beasts or in the game which was found on it; and indeed they asserted, and the law gave them, a much higher right. A hare or a partridge might migrate from the estate of one landlord to another, and could not be reclaimed; not so a collier or a salter. The proprietor on whose estate he first drew the vital air, or to whose colliery or salt-work he was once assigned, was his owner, the proprietor of his bones and sinews, and was entitled to repledge or claim him back, from every one in whose possession he was found, in the same manner as the landowner could repledge his horse or dog; and the records of our Courts of Law, up to within these seventy years, shew that the right was exercised without hesitation and without shame, whenever there was occasion.

NEW POOR-LAW.—It certainly must require some "powers of face" to talk, in England, of the sympathy of the landed interest with the working man. Why, the new Poor-Law has already transferred four millions per annum from the poor to the landowners, though it has not been in operation four years; and both Whig and Tory joined in carrying it through Parliament. We should hardly have complained of this law, had the starvation laws been repealed at the same time. But we cannot see how there is anything like justice in tying a working man's hands behind his back, sending a troop of dragoons, or a detachment of the London police, to watch that he does not get his hands loose; and, when he complains of hunger, and that his wife and children are starving, tell him—separate yourself from your family, come into our bastille, and your soul and body shall, in some way or other, be kept together all better times come. We think any one in such a situation is fairly entitled to say—"It is you who prevent me working. The Prussians, the Poles, millions of foreigners, are willing and ready to take the workmanship of my hands. There are thousands of master manufacturers here ready to employ me, and give me wages on which I could live in comfort, could my handicraft be freely exported, and if you, the landed interest, would allow us to receive from these foreigners what they have alone to give in exchange—corn, butcher meat, cheese, butter—of all of which I am greatly in want. If, therefore, it is for the interests of you, the lords and landlords of the country, that I should be kept in idleness, I have no objection; but, in fair justice, you must not make me suffer for your benefit; you must share with me the good fortune you enjoy, and keep me, not in your bastille, or under any state of coercion, but give me, and my wife and family, in our own humble dwelling, all those comforts which I could have commanded, were not the fruits of my labour sacrificed for your advantage."

If, therefore, the starvation laws are to be maintained, the Poor-Law must be repealed. To keep up both—to insist on keeping a man in idleness by sheer force, and to refuse to maintain him in comfort—is nothing else but downright tyranny, to which the people of England neither will nor ought longer to submit.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—After sixty years of agitation, and after we have expended millions upon millions in attempting to suppress the Slave Trade, and in freeing our own slaves, the traffic is carried on to a greater extent than ever, and with increased atrocities and sufferings to the slave. In a work recently published by Mr. T. F. Buxton on this subject, it is stated that, fifty years ago, the annual exportation of negroes from Africa was 80,000; it is now, at least, 200,000. Instead of the old regulation, which allowed five persons to three tons, the slaves are now packed more like bales of goods than human beings. In 1834, a slaver was captured, of only seventy-five tons burden, with 350 slaves on board; and another, of 202 tons, with 521 slaves on board. The mortality formerly was from one-fourth to one-sixth; at present, if one-third of those embarked are landed, it is considered an excellent voyage, and very few instances have occurred of one-half being landed. Sometimes the whole die, or are thrown overboard when there is a risk of the vessel being captured by our cruisers; for the vessel cannot be condemned unless slaves are found on board. This nefarious traffic is carried on under the Spanish and Portuguese flags.

As to the negroes in our own colonies, it appears very doubtful whether their condition will, in the end, be improved by their liberation, and the expenditure of the twenty millions of the people of this country. The planters of Jamaica have set themselves so obstinately to work to thwart the Emancipation Act, that it has been found necessary to suspend their constitution for five years. Should we have a war, we suspect it will be necessary to keep a strong force in the West Indies, to prevent the colonists from revolting, and, after laughing at the simplicity of the people of Britain in so simply parting with their twenty millions, from again reducing the blacks to slavery, perhaps to be again sold to our posterity. In a book lately published by Captain Hodgson, of the 19th Foot, the atrocious conduct of the planters to their slaves, and the manner in which they were used during the apprenticeship system, are portrayed in vivid colours. In twenty-two months from the coming into force of the abolition act, no less than 574,175 lashes had been inflicted on the bodies of the apprentices, besides punishments of other descriptions, to the number of 104,165. But the number was indeed much greater; for the records of punishments in several of the islands had been in a great measure suppressed, on the pretence that they were lost. The Stipendiary Magistrates sent out from this country, seem to be quite unable to repress the atrocities of the planters. If they attempt to do their duty, they are harassed and persecuted, in every possible manner; and several of them have fallen victims to the persecution to which they have been exposed. Although the apprenticeship is now at an end, the condition of the negro seems little improved. The whole power of the colonies is in the hands of the planters. There are very few judges who will act impartially; and the negroes are thus exposed to the most severe punishments for trifling offences. For example, although the forging of the gold or silver coin in Britain is punished only by imprisonment or transportation for seven years, the West Indians are in the practice of punishing capitally the forger of a few tin half bitts, worth a quarter a farthing the piece! Slaves were imported from the foreign West India islands to such an extent at the time that the compensation money was to be divided, that there were more than 2000 such slaves in one island, for whom £100,000 were paid. The twenty millions have evidently been expended for very little purpose.

SCOTLAND.

EDINBURGH CHURCH-SEATS.—If we are not much misinformed, there are several of the clergy of Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, who do not hesitate to express their opinion, that, in so far as this city at least is concerned, the Church Extension Scheme has been already carried a sufficient length. The new churches have had the effect we all along predicted, of emptying those already built; and their efficacy in inducing a church-going habit, as was so confidently foretold, has not been, as yet, in the smallest degree perceptible. It may easily be conceived how annoying it is for a clergyman who has always done his duty, to see his church becoming more and more deserted every Sunday, merely for the purpose of forwarding a scheme which is indebted, for any small success it may have attained, to the activity of a set of individuals thirsting more for notoriety than for the propagation of sound religion, and forcing him to the adoption of measures which he cannot but feel must circumscribe the boundaries of his own justly acquired influence. It appears, from a return, dated 20th February 1839, that of the total sittings in the thirteen city churches, being 14,852, no fewer than one-third are unlet; and what, as we have before noticed, is remarkable, it is the lowest-priced seats for which there is least demand. Thus, of 1502 at 2s., 948, or 62 per cent., are unlet; of 1351 at 15s., 16s., and 17s., only 186, or 13 per cent., are unlet; of 1552, at from 19s. to 30s., 73 or 4 per cent. only are unlet. Some years ago, the Edinburgh clergy refused a fixed stipend of £500 a-year, secured in the most ample manner. How many, out of the thirteen city churches, do our readers think produce £500 a-year of gross revenue? Just three; although the cost of the city churches must have exceeded, in all, £200,000. We see here a very sufficient ground for the dislike of the establishment to Voluntaryism. The clear revenue of the whole established churches in Edinburgh, after deducting annual expenses, is £2956; which would not yield each of the ministers £170 a-year, after making a present to him of his church. When would the established clergy repay the original cost of the erection of the churches, or the interest for one year, (£10,000,) out of their revenue? Yet the Dissenters are sneered at because some of their chapels are in debt, when out of their seat-rents they have not only to erect the chapel, keep it in repair, but to pay the clergyman, preacher, beadles, &c.

OLIVER CROMWELL'S OPINION OF THE SCOTTISH NOBILITY.—The estimation in which the Protector held the Nobility, may be judged of from the instructions regarding them he gave to the justices of the peace, in the year 1655. The ninth article bears, that "the said Commissioners of the Peace, shall put the laws and acts of Parliament to due and full execution against wilful beggars and vagabonds, and noblemen, and women without calling or trade, drinking in ale-houses, tied to no certain service, reputed and holden as vagabonds, and against those persons who are commonly called Egyptians; and they shall punish and fine their receptors, and setters of houses to them, accordingly, by such competent pains as is proper to them to injoin."

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

SILK TRADE.—We are told that we have decisive proofs of the pernicious tendency of free trade in several instances, of which the alleged distressed state of the silk trade is generally held out as the most prominent. Now, what is called free trade in silks, is allowing their importation loaded with duties from twenty-five to forty per cent. Before 1824, foreign silks were altogether prohibited, and so far was the silk trade from being in a flourishing state, that meetings were constantly held for the relief of the operatives. At one of these meetings, held in London, on 26th November 1816, the secretary stated that two-thirds of the Spitalfields weavers were out of employment, and in a state of utter destitution. Not only has the removal of the prohibition not diminished employment, but it has greatly increased it; for, while the total quantity of raw silk imported during the three years immediately preceding the removal of the prohibition was considerably under two millions of pounds weight, in the three years 1831, 1832, 1833, it considerably exceeded three millions of pounds weight; in 1833, indeed, which is the last year for which we have a return at hand, the quantity was 3,834,244 pounds, double what it was in 1822. In 1823, the total declared value of British silks exported was £351,409; in 1833, more than double, £740,294. Of this upwards of £75,000 is annually sent to France! So much for the alleged pernicious effect of free trade in the silk trade!

SUGAR.—The scarcity of sugar, owing to the unwillingness of the blacks to work in the sugar plantations—a kind of labour which is peculiarly associated in their minds with slavery—is likely to increase. The export from Jamaica has been falling off for many years: in 1833 it was 1,256,991 cwts., in 1837 only 903,933 cwts. Estimating the whole produce of the West Indies and the Mauritius at 180,000 tons in 1838, it is expected by good judges that there will be a falling off of one-sixth in the present year. Considering that the wholesale price of the sugar annually consumed in the United Kingdom is fourteen millions, it is high time not only that the heavy duty imposed on it should be lowered, but also that the prohibitory duty on sugar the growth of foreign plantations, should be removed. In consequence of the equalization of the duty on East Indian sugar with that on West Indian, the consumption has increased fifty per cent. last year over 1837.

AGRICULTURE.

COMPETITION FOR FARMS.—Though it is generally admitted that the recent discussions in Parliament, and the agitation throughout the kingdom, must, ere long, give a death-blow to the restrictions on the importation of food, the Scotch farmers do not shew the slightest symptoms of alarm, but are entering into long leases of farms, and bidding against each other as eagerly as during the time of high war prices. The truth is, that the Corn-Laws themselves are the cause of the great competition in farming, as in every other trade and profession. A farmer, finding all professions and trades overflowing with candidates for employment, is forced to keep his sons beside himself, as long as he can find anything for them to do; and, when they begin to rebel at being kept as servants, he has, in general, no alternative but to endeavour to scrape together as much stock for them as will establish them in a farm. Hence the competition for every farm which comes into the market, and the high rents which are contracted, to be paid under circumstances by no means favourable to the prospect of the tenant being able to fulfil his obligation for the long period of nineteen or twenty-one years. Were trade free, no such competition would exist; for many who are now forced to become farmers would betake themselves to manufactures and commerce. Rents might no doubt fall in nominal amount; but we suspect the landlord would find, at the end of the lease, that he had received as much money under a free-trade system as under the present excessive competition. We are, in truth, beginning to retrograde to the state of Ireland, where, to the great body of the population, the possession of a piece of land is essential to the support of life, simply because there are no other means by which the people can support themselves. Whatever, therefore, the "Landed Interest" may think of the present desperate competition for farms in Scotland, we regard it as anything but a sign of general prosperity. It shews that profits are very low, and consequently that capital, if accumulating, must be accumulating at a very slow rate; and, as the population is increasing rapidly, the condition of the people must deteriorate.

THE FIARS.—The crop of last year has turned out just as we stated many months ago, when the papers were filled with accounts of its great abundance. In the best districts it is only an average crop; and in the high and mairland districts, that is, in three-fourths of Scotland, it is almost a complete failure. The quality is proved by the fiars to be very various. In East Lothian, the best wheat was 78s.; in Mid-Lothian, only 65s., being 8s. lower than the second fiars of East Lothian. In the western counties, 59s., 56s., and 54s., are returned as the fiar prices. We have, on former occasions, directed attention to the mode of striking the fiars, which varies in almost every county. It is high time that an uniform system should be adopted; for much injustice, we are convinced, is done at present. The original purpose of the fiars was merely to ascertain at what rate the grain feu-duties payable to the Crown were to be converted into money; but now that the stipends of nearly all the established clergy, and a great proportion of the rents of lands, are regulated by them, it is of much importance that they should be struck on a proper and uniform principle. We have long been convinced that the East Lothian Fiars are always too high; and we think that what we have stated above that we have some room for our opinion.

TILE DRAINING has extended all over the country, from Caithness to Kirkcudbright. Even the farmers in the neighbourhood of this city, who hardly every drained at all, have extensively resorted to it; and the benefit of it is already apparent to any one who contrasts the wet uncomfortable state of the undrained fields, with the dry condition of those which have been drained. It is easy, indeed, after a few hours' rain, to point out the furrows in which a drain has been placed, from those which have been missed.

Owing to the continued wet weather in March, sowing was much interrupted. On the 1st of April, it had hardly begun in this neighbourhood. The cold weather during April has seriously retarded vegetation, and we never saw the wheat crop looking so backward and indifferent; so that we have already the probability of a late harvest. At Gifford Fair the sheep market was unusually small, and prices rose five per cent. above last year's prices. Cheviot ewes brought from 24s. to 27s. 6d.; black-faced, 17s. to 20s. 6d. Hornes, of which there was a small show, and none of the first quality, brought from £20 to £35. The best milch cows were sold from £12 to £14. Corn markets, after a temporary depression, are rapidly rising. Those who expect so much cheap wheat from abroad, will be surprised to learn that the price quoted at Dantzic on the 5th March, and at Dunbar on the 20th of the same month, were precisely the same for wheat of the same weight—61½lb. per bushel—viz., 60s. a quarter, and that at Cracow the price has risen 150 per cent. in a few months. The Chartists will have hunger to their hearts' content before next harvest.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

JUNE, 1839.

WHAT SORT OF GOVERNMENT ARE WE TO HAVE?

CRISES of all magnitudes, Whig, Tory, and Irish, have occurred as frequently within the last eight years as eclipses in a Belfast almanac—that is, about one to each calendar month. They have, of late, one after another, passed away so rapidly, that latterly they became rather objects of ridicule or contempt than of interest. Now, however, the case is altered. By a concurrence of what are generally and erroneously termed fortuitous events, the Reformers are once more fairly involved in a National Crisis; and wo to the Radical leader who shall be found unequal to its demands. The course of Radicals of all grades, and especially of those possessing influence, is so plain and direct, that a suckling might guide them. They have merely to apply their long experience of Whig shuffling, duplicity, and inertness, and that knowledge of the Whig determination not to move an inch, which Lord John Russell has taken such anxious pains to impress upon the country, to existing circumstances, and to act with promptness, decision, and firmness. If the Radical leaders are really alive to their duty in the present emergency, little more than passive resistance being required from them, we should see grounds of hope. The first gleam of a better day seems visible through the mist; but we have so often been deceived, that suspicion is inevitable that neither may this prove the true dawn; and that the great cause of National Improvement may once more be either betrayed by the self-seeking, or injured and shamed by credulous persons. Surely at this seventy-and-seventh trial of the Whigs there can be no mistake. There is not a vestige of foundation for any. It would be affronting Lord John Russell to imagine him capable of suddenly abjuring those infatuated Finality doctrines, which, within the last few weeks, he has again elaborately expounded, as if the Reformers required further confirmation of the obstinately Conservative nature of his opinions, and of his inflexible purpose of adhering to them. We do not, so late in the day, mean to enter into a refutation of those opinions. That has been often ably and effectually done; but we must regret, even thus late, and when about, we trust, to see Lord John and his opinions part in peace from the national body with which he was once believed to be identified, regret that he had not promulgated his creed somewhat earlier; and, at any rate, prior to his second resumption of office with Lord Melbourne. Such a line of conduct is what we should have called manly, and not that bold avowal of Conservative purposes which Reformers construe as the after-thought of an imagined impunity. This early avowal, we repeat, is what we should have called sincere and manly, and not Lord John keeping his Finality opinions in his pocket, until the time arrived when he would safely, and with some ulterior object, make the experiment of bidding for Conservative support, hoping to become—there was no saying—the Minister of those “improved Tories,” which his policy had tended to create. These things are past, but they leave the inevitable conclusion, that whatever sort of rulers we may obtain, Lord John Russell has incapacitated himself for being a member of any Ministry which supports were it but one of those great measures upon which all Reformers are agreed. He has taken his position upon Finality, and can no longer be accused of deluding or hoodwinking any man who does not seek a pretext for being duped. Lord John is, therefore, in our opinion, to be held as disposed of. There may be more respect entertained for the individual than for some of the more liberal of his colleagues; but a Government, of which Lord John Russell, with any regard to his own character, can now form a member, is undeserving of the support of any consistent Reformer. He is fairly out of the field. Were he even to recant his wantonly gratuitous declarations, his future usefulness would perish with his sinking character. His last act before resigning office, was, gravely and advisedly, along with Lord Melbourne, to bequeath the public interests, the cause of Reform, the peace of Ireland, and their reversionary interest in the Court, to those same Tories whom they had so shortly before taught their creatures and their party journals to yell against; which lesson is repeated at the present hour, with an enormity in lying, an effrontery in humbug, which fairly distances the basest period in party annals. But Lord John is hors du combat in any Liberal Government; and although his testamentary dispositions were so kindly made in favour to the Tories, he has since obtained, on one topic, a new light.

After the very decided part which Lord John has taken in counselling the Queen to resist the proposition of Sir Robert Peel for the remodelling of the household, as derogatory and unconstitutional—an indignity to her station, and cruelty to her youth and sex—he surely could not, a second time, make over both Queen and country to the harsh and tyrannical sway of Sir Robert; who, like another inflexible John Knox, could see “Fair Mary weep in vain;” nor yet to one resembling that stern veteran, (the prototype of all oppressors of princes,) who was once heard to say, “Better that bairns greet than bearded men.” But from this severity and insolence, unconstitutional assumption of power, or whatever else the Whig organs may please to term it, there is no immediate hope of the Duke or Sir Robert Peel receding. What then becomes the duty of Lords John Russell and Melbourne to their royal mistress, should they find, within a few weeks or days, that they are exactly in the same position with Parliament as when they informed her Majesty that, having lost the confidence of the House of Commons, they could no longer, in accordance with the principles of the British Constitution, act as her advisers? They are surely bound, in every view of honour and consistency, to uphold her Majesty in the course which they have gravely sanctioned, and deliberately justified, as strictly constitutional, as well as in accordance with her dignity and her amiable womanly feelings for her favourite ladies. They are for ever tied up from ever again consigning their young and confiding mistress to the tender mercies of the Tories, if the churlishness of the Radicals, or any other cause, should deprive them a second time of the felicity of serving her themselves. They can no longer, without offence and insult, give the Queen what the Tory papers, during the Three Days’ Government, so often lauded as “the manly and honourable advice of Lord Melbourne and Lord John,” to send for Sir Robert Peel and the Duke, and to set her face against the Liberals. Failing themselves—and they may fail—they are bound, by every feeling of loyalty and of self-respect, to co-operate in the formation of a Government in harmony with her Majesty’s wishes and feelings. They have voluntarily placed themselves in this position, and cannot shrink from it. They are bound to counsel the Queen to send for Lord Normanby, or Morpeth, or Brougham, or Durham, or any noble Lord who can reconcile his public duty with due consideration for her Majesty’s wishes; or, haply, for Mr Hume or Mr Grote. Any policy must be preferable to giving pain to the Queen. “Keep out the Tories,” “Rally for the Queen,” must henceforth be the war-cry in high places, as well as among the masses; and, though out themselves, the leaders of the present Government will, beyond all doubt, most lustily join in it.

These considerations would warrant the hope of an improved Government, and at no distant day—the hope of a Ministry that should deserve the confidence of the nation, and be in accordance with the predilections of the Sovereign, were our slippery, shuffling friends, who are all-powerful at Court, to be judged of as ordinary men, having the common principles of honour and honesty.

That Lord John Russell can form a permanent member of any Liberal Administration, is, we have said, wholly out of the question. Lord Melbourne, with all his faults, is composed of more yielding material. Our opinion of that noble person has never been concealed nor mined; but he is a more practicable individual, and a more flexible politician; and one is tolerably assured that he will not obstinately persist in acting the part of the dog in the manger—neither do himself, nor let others act—were he properly balanced. The Reformers might, in short, at this time, better spare a better man. Britain is a monarchy, and courtiers have their uses. But in the event of his retiring, he also is bound to give the Queen counsels very opposite to those which preceded his late resignation. He (and indeed the whole Cabinet) has identified himself with that high-spirited conduct in her Majesty, which has roused the sympathies and enthusiasm of the nation “for our young and insulted Queen!” It was by the advice of the whole Melbourne Cabinet, that her Majesty so summarily dismissed the Three Days’ Tory Government. We reserve our opinion as to the constitutional soundness of that advice, or the wisdom of the prevalent clamour. With the smallest hope of a Liberal Government, or a greatly improved Whig Ministry succeeding, far be it from any Reformer to lament the Tory downfall. The exultation and delusion of the country, is one more proof of the inveterate hostility of the people to that party. Anything is welcome, and everything is justifiable in the eyes of a vast majority of the nation, which thwarts and puts down the Tories. The Queen is, by sudden reaction, at this moment, we believe, much more popular than in the week of her accession, or that of her coronation. Her Majesty has not, like King William, professed any inclination towards Liberal opinions; but she has displayed symptoms of a right princely self-will in what is at present deemed the right direction. She has vanquished the veteran victor of Waterloo—she has dismissed the Tories “! Hurrah for the Queen!” shouts O’Connell. “Rally for our Queen!” respond the place-hunting or place-keeping Whigs; while many disinterested persons of generous feeling, and no great power of reflection, are caught by the melting and exciting picture of youth, royalty, tender womanhood, roused to resist indignity and oppression. But if the Reformers of a former age were contented to hail gospel-light even in so doubtful a source as “Boleyn’s eyes,” it is quite pardonable that the Radicals should exult in the advancement of their righteous cause, through the generous and amiable attachment of Queen Victoria to “the friends of her childhood,” and the ladies of her bedchamber. It is not their part to long to see the young Queen made over to Tory surveillance, and Tory arts of all descriptions. One set of courtiers at a time is quite enough for the strongest and most experienced princely head.

And now that the Tories are shut out from the palace, probably for a considerable period, What sort of Government are we to have? Her Majesty must be aware—for she has learned it in sorrow, within these few weeks, and from their own mouths—that her advisers, though they enjoyed her support and favour, had lost the confidence of the House of Commons, and were, consequently, compelled to resign. She has restored them by her royal prerogative, but have they regained the confidence of the country?

A loyal People and a dutiful House of Commons will, no doubt, make very considerable sacrifices to gratify the wishes of their young female Sovereign, and to defend her from Tory encroachment, perhaps even to the length of stretching a constitutional point, that can by any ingenuity be construed in her favour; but if the Ministry, overthrown by the House of Commons, accidentally restored, and holding office merely through the favour of the Queen, persist in the same policy which forfeited the confidence of the Representatives of the People, while the original cause and the attendant circumstances of their restoration must have further exasperated the alienated Upper House, what then is to be the result? It requires no prophet to foresee it. If the Whigs choose to become Reformers, in deed as well as in profession, and cordially unite with the Radicals for the advancement of those objects, which alone make it of consequence to the People which set of men is in power, a hopeful struggle may still be maintained, and a triumphant result predicted. But a mere Melbourne and Russell Ministry can only be reorganised to work further mischief for the brief space it continues to hang together; to distract and sow further dissensions among the Reformers, and ultimately either to leave the Queen to the unavoidable domination of the Tories, or precipitate her into the arms of wild and extravagant Revolutionists. Were it possible for the Whigs to overmaster this present crisis in the strength of official patronage, the delusion about the Queen, and mere Whiggery, the chances of Reform would be worse than ever. Some persons, after all the pains Lord John Russell has taken in the demonstration, are still indignant at being told that there is not now an iota of difference between Whig and Tory; but there would be no doubt in the matter then. The Tories would, in process of time, become the Whigs or Liberals of the reign of Victoria, and we should have the reign of her grandfather over again, with merely a change of names. A third man has, however, come into play; and whether the People be consulted or not, they must be heard—and perhaps the more loudly that they are not consulted.

But—What sort of Government are we to have? Parliament dismissed the Whigs; the Queen dismissed the Tories; and, if the opportunity offered be seized and improved, the People may obtain an improved set of rulers superior to both—to defend the just prerogatives of the Crown—to unite the Reformers once more on a fair and definite basis, and for fixed objects—and to promote the true interests of all classes and parties. The Tories will not challenge the power of the Queen to choose her own servants; the Whigs will not deny, what they have just confessed, that they have lost the confidence of Parliament, and cannot longer carry on the Government. There is, therefore, no alternative. Tories cannot get in—mere Whigs cannot stay in. The time is singularly propitious for the accession of a really Liberal Government, or of one composed of fresh Liberal elements. It has come earlier than could have been anticipated, and without that fiery trial of Tory domination, to which every reflecting Reformer had made up his mind rather than longer submit to the deadening effects of Whig laxity and trickery, budding, as we have seen, into Whig effrontery, and to be consummated, if possible, in the bright perennial flower of undisguised modern Whiggery—i. e., Finality—flourishing throughout the long reign of Queen Victoria. Was this a state of things to be desired? And are we ensured against it? It is the game of the Whigs to turn every incident to their own advantage. If a little lip-liberalism may serve the turn, they will in this pinch suffer a little to escape them, while their underlings and hirelings deal it forth by daily columns. Yet who has forgotten the many civil speeches made by Lord Melbourne to the Radicals? But a few weeks—even since the opening of the present Session of Parliament—it did require a considerable stock of courtly assurance in this same noble individual to convey to Mr O'Connell the information that the kindness and graciousness between himself and that gentlemen was all on one side. "If the Radicals and Mr O'Connell support my Government, I am sure I have always treated them with the proper degree of contempt," has been the plain import of Melbourne's language. It will be the fault of Mr O'Connell and the Radicals if any future Whig Minister shall ever venture to act, with regard to them, in that touch-and-go, swaggering style, vibrating between shuffling, braggadocio and insolence, to which they have so often submitted. It is not, however, precisely for their personal feelings that we are concerned, but for the interests which they represent, and which are injured by tame submission to indignities. To use plain terms, the Reformers will have great cause of distrust in any Government of which Lord Melbourne is the head. We do not exactly repudiate him; but it would require an extraordinary infusion of Liberal feeling and of steady principle in the Cabinet; definite measures of reform, and tried men to support them,—to overmaster the vicious influences and lax principles which have been displayed there for the last few years. Nor are these qualities wanting, and of a kind which will command the respect of the nation. Lord Normanby enjoys the confidence of the Irish People, which of itself is a mighty consideration; Lord Durham may be roused from his lethargy, and may, perhaps, vindicate the opinions formed of him by his zealous admirers; and the whole tenor of his life warrants us in saying, that Lord Brougham may be surely reckoned upon, as soon as he can, with efficiency, hope to serve the People by resuming office. There is nothing in these names to alarm the most sensitive Conservative, save the certainty that Reform would then be set about in earnest—that the Whig “talkee, talkee,” which served Tory purposes, was at an end; that the Reform Bill would be reformed, the Suffrage extended, the duration of Parliament restored to the old and constitutional period, and the Corn-Laws abolished, if the efforts of Rulers and People were simultaneous. Those persons, whether Whig or Tory, who dread these things, would certainly have cause of apprehension. Lord Brougham’s accession to the remodelled or renewed Cabinet, would, of itself, be more alarming to the Tories than that of any other individual whom we can pitch upon. In the same degree would it be a guarantee for the fulfilment of the hopes of the country. He has said that it must “be a very, very Liberal Government to which he can accede.”

To come more directly to the point—No man pretending to the name of a Liberal, even in the most Whig-ridden communities, can longer hold up his face to give the Melbourne and Russell Cabinet an unqualified support. “Open Questions,” at the least, are required on three leading measures. But who, in the present Cabinet, are to hold to the Liberal side? The Whig adherents have the sagacity to discern that mere Whiggery, the old machinery, wont work. Formerly we had “Liberal Measures,” “Justice to Ireland,” a “Municipal Irish Bill,” an “Appropriation Clause,” and so forth. Now we are to have “Open Questions,” demanded by the same individuals who denounce Mr Hume as “traitorous,” and Sir William Molesworth as “unprincipled,” because they have given one vote which has shaken Whig supremacy, and brought us the poor length of “Open Questions.”

We have headed this paper, “What sort of Government are we to have?” The more accurate question would be, “What sort of Government ought the Radicals to take?” admitting they have any scope of choice. Without a change of men to some extent—and the farther pushed the better—“Open Questions” will prove as pretty a trading fallacy as any of those with which the Reformers have hitherto been gulled. “Open Questions” in a Cabinet the leaders of which the other day solemnly made over Queen and country to the Tories! And is even this much secured? Let us hope the best; but be fully prepared for disappointment. The narrow demand of THE TEN “Open Questions,” on three leading measures, will, much more probably, not be conceded. TEN righteous would have saved Sodom, had warning been taken; but the Ten Radical Members will hardly be able to save the Melbourne Government.

LA SAINTE ALLIANCE DU PEUPLE.

SUNG ON THE OCCASION OF THE EVACUATION OF THE FRENCH TERRITORY, IN THE YEAR 1818.

(From the French of Béranger.)

I SAW the descending of Peace from afar:

Flowers, corn-blades, and gold in her pathway arose;
The air was serene, and the thunders of war

Were quenched at her feet, in a harmless repose;
And she said—“Noble equals in prowess, advance,
Men of England, Spain, Germany, Muscovy, France!
O peoples, forgetting all by-gone defiance,
Join hands in the bond of a Holy Alliance!

“Ye are worn by long ages of hate and distrust;
Your rest is a night-mare where sleep is undone;
Apportion your globe in a spirit more just;
Let each have his place in the light of the sun.
To the car of Ambition all harnessed ye stray
From the true road of happiness blindly away.
O peoples, forgetting all by-gone defiance,
Join hands in the bond of a Holy Alliance!

“On your neighbours ye burst with the torch and the brand,
And the storms bear your roofs in a blaze to the skies;
When earth has grown cold, from the war-wasted hand
The plough pauses idly, and rusts where it lies.
Near the bourne whence all states have gone forward, we find
No corn-blade sustained with the blood of mankind.
O peoples, forgetting all by-gone defiance,
Join hands in the bond of a Holy Alliance!

“Mid the blaze of your cities the potentates proud,
With the point of their insolent sceptres, will dare
To mark, and count over the popular crowd
By some blood-spilling triumph accorded them there.

Poor flock, still exposed to the tyrannous stroke,
From the heavy, ye pass to the merciless yoke.
O peoples, forgetting all by-gone defiance,
Join hands in the bond of a Holy Alliance!

“Nor broken in vain be the torch and the sword;
Let Justice bear away in the lands of your birth:
No more let your life’s-blood be uselessly poured
For the Kings that requite not, and victors of earth.
Denounce the false glare of the planets that start
To scare us to-day, and to-morrow depart.
O peoples, forgetting all by-gone defiance,
Join hands in the bond of a Holy Alliance!

“Oh! yet let the nations in freedom respire;
Cast a veil o’er the past—let its history cease.
Sow the seed in your fields to the sound of the lyre,
Let the bright arts be glad round the altar of Peace!
And Hope, lapped in plenty, will smile to behold
The young race that rises succeeding the old.
O peoples, forgetting all by-gone defiance,
Join hands in the bond of a Holy Alliance!”

Thus sung sweetest Peace; and the words that she sung
Were pronounced after her by our governing Powers:
As tho’ in her spring-time, all Nature looked young,
And hearts again woke to see Autumn in flowers.
Let thy wine-cup, my country, flow freely to-day,
For the bands of the stranger are marching away.
O peoples, forgetting all by-gone defiance,
Join hands in the bond of a Holy Alliance!

THE MAIDS OF HONOUR.

"No scandal about Queen Elizabeth, I hope."

THERE are certain words current in the world which convey to the mind the most uncertain and indefinite ideas. Every man has his especial notion of an angel; every man his especial notion of a maid of honour. Albeit in the reign of Queen Charlotte, of prudish memory, he may have seen that exquisite title borne by Honourable Misses of three-score years, with wrinkled visages and equally defeated reputations, he persists in believing a maid of honour to be the epitome of girlish graces and virgin virtues; a lady resembling the renowned one whom the incantations of Comus failed to fright from her propriety—

Chaste as the icicle

That's curdled by the frost from purest snow,

And hangs on Dian's temple;

A diphthong of Venus and Diana;

A plurality of perfection.

Nevertheless, if we have writ our annals true, if history have not fabled, nor memoirs set down in malice matters which it was their cue to extenuate, there has been more than one historical epoch in which the poet's ejaculation of

"Frailty! thy name is woman!"

might have been aptly modified into

"Frailty! thy name is maid of honour!"

Grammont, for instance, has recorded the recreations of the high-born maidens of his time, who, disguised as orange girls, escaped from the purlieus of the palace of Whitehall, to frequent those of the theatres; and St Simon acquainted us on what offence the Duchess de Noailles, mother of the Maids of Honour of Anne of Austria and her royal successor, was forced to have double iron bars affixed to their chamber windows. The Queen of Scots had her Maries; and she who recorded in song, that

"There was Mary Seyton, and Mary Betoun,

And Mary Carmichael, and me,"

hath also bequeathed to posterity the confession of her fault. Queen Elizabeth was forced, by the incontinence of her fair attendants, to find them occasional lodgings in the Tower of London, even when so great a man as the gallant Raleigh was the avowed author of the mischief; and Pope and Lady Mary Wortley have told tales of the honourable maidenhood of Queen Caroline's Court, which the world will not willingly let die.

It strikes us, therefore, with no great surprise, that, amid the finical idleness of modern palaces, a scandal should have arisen injurious to the reputation of one of its fair inmates, occupying a post so perilous. As a stagnant pool engenders malignant vapours and noxious reptiles, the dull monotony of royal state is sure to beget crawling parasites and slanderous reports. The back-stairs of a royal cabinet is the natural atmosphere for these monstrous growths. Pope, in describing prudery (to a maid of honour) as Seen with youth and beauty seldom;"

"A beldam

plainly proves, by adding

"'Tis an ugly, envious shrew,

Who rails at dear Lepel and you," that the "dear Lepel"—"youth's youngest daughter"—the fairest of the maids of honour of the time when Lady Suffolk was lady of the bed-chamber both to the King and Queen—had been made a mark for the ill-nature of the Court. Yet Pope's was an era when there were wars and rumours of wars to occupy the whispers of Kensington and Hampton Court—when there was a King to squabble with his Ministers, and afford public news to keep in movement the private echoes of Windsor Castle. Had "sweet Lepel" been railed at during a period of petticoat government, when the back-stairs, instead of being haunted by Herveys, Walpoles, and Chesterfields, had been the resort of mantua-makers and milliners, "black, white, and grey, with all their trumpery," Pope would have known that the "railing" was an inevitable concomitant of the "post" of—Maid of Honour. He would have rather addressed the future Lady Hervey with

"Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, Thou shalt not escape calumny!"

We confess ourselves of opinion, that these are things too slight to be made a matter of political discussion. The giants of a high-minded party ought not to stoop and arm their slings with pebbles. Let the Hastings' family settle their differences with the Queen, without attempting to bias majorities and minorities. Every one who has familiarly examined the interior of a convent, or even of a female boarding-school, may have noticed the peculiar privileges assigned to the visiting doctor or apothecary; the jactant self-importance assumed by the cock-pigeon of the dove-cote. The gentle baronet of railroad renown, has recently proved that a court physician resembles no other physician—nay, that he scarcely resembles any other man—being privileged to abandon a dying friend, in order that his dinner may not be kept waiting. It is easy, therefore, to conceive, that the pet physician of a dozen ladies of the bed-chamber, women of the bed-chamber, maids of honour, dressers, chamber-maids, &c., &c., &c., may have been inspired, by the genius of the place, to see things double; and, among so many double faces and double tongues, adventure a surmise, which a young and inexperienced girl, in the first shock of wounded delicacy, fancied herself called upon to visit with exemplary severity.

But no sooner was the Doctor (unhappy blunderer!) compelled to write himself down an ass, than the illustrious lady whom his misrepresentations had misled, hastened to acknowledge his errors, and offer every apology suggested by a generous heart; and had the Queen and her Maid of Honour been left to settle their grievances, all had soon been well again. A blameless young woman, too secure in her own virtue to apprehend injury from such an imputation, would have treated the vulgar gossip of the Court with silent contempt; and, at the period pointed out by discretion, have retired from a spot so unfavourable to the decencies of life, and an office which we should conceive no woman of feminine disposition would be at any time desirous to fill.

But things were otherwise appointed. The crisis of the hour required that the sympathy of the nation should be appealed to. With a thousand more legitimate sources of dissatisfaction against her Majesty's Ministers, it was judged advisable to drag forward the spectacle of Lady Hasting's grey hairs; and, by way of appeasing the sorrows of the unhappy Lady Flora, to promulgate the Court slander to the uttermost ends of the earth.

[We cannot go farther. Our contributor, who is abroad, goes on to tell that the whole Continent laughs or sneers at this new "Battle of Hastings." We are sorry for it. Injustice has been done to the Queen in this unpleasant affair, but great blame lies somewhere; and we cannot help sympathizing in the generous feelings that have been excited even by what at a distance may seem so trivial a cause.]

THE ALEHOUSE TAP.

A Parody on "The Isles of Greece."

THE alehouse tap! the alehouse tap!

Where Rob and Jemmy roared and sung;
Where knuckles beat the sharp, quick rap,
Where gills were toss'd, and coppers rung;
Eternal mugs pant to be wet,
But all except thy sign is set.

The stolen sip—the hurried booze—

The cup quaff'd at the door on foot;
Leave cats and dogs to bark and mews,
In the deserted chamber—mute
To boisterous voice of Robby West,
Shouting, like Stentor, for—"The best!"

The mutchkin-stoup looks o'er the gill,
The gill looks o'er the glasses wee;
And, musing o'er the one I fill,
I dream not of—a cup of tea;
For, while my cronies round me rave,
Could I be a Tee-total slave?

A lecturer stood on the slope

That rises to our village wall;
He hector'd fierce the brandy shop—
His audience gaped—he trapp'd them all.
He counted them at six that day,
And, when ten struck, ah! where were they?

And where are they?—and where art thou,
"Pale Brandy?" O'er thy watered strength

The jocund stave is silent now—
"Glenlivet" takes thy place at length;
And must thy praise, spirits divine,
Degenerate into hands like mine?

'Tis something, in the dearth of wine—

Tho' cast among a taxed race—
To kneel, at least, at whisky's shrine,
And bear grog-blossoms on my face:
Yet what is left the boozier here,
Since gin is gone—since brandy's dear?

Must we but grudge the heighten'd price?

Sit greetin'-fou? Our fathers fought:
Death! render, if but for a trice,
A couple of them plagued with drought;
But if, perchance, thou grant us three,
I tremble lest they drain the sea.

What!—silent still?—then silent bide:

Ah! no; the voices of the drunk
Sound like an empty barrel's side;
And, hiccup, "Though we here are sunk,
Let one be tapp'd—we come! we come!—
'Tis only fools who shirk their tum."

* A cant name for tumbler.

In vain—in vain—breach other casts,

Fill high the glass with British Gin;
Leave "Hollands" to the spoon who asks
A bottle from the oldest bin.
Hark!—answering to the summons rough,
How flies Will Tapster with the stuff!

You have Scotch whisky, potent yet;

But where has fled Jamaica rum?
Of two such spirits, why forget
That which could almost move the dumb?
The lush which Brewer Noah gave
Is not for the Tee-total slave.

Fill yet the bowl with "gude Scotch drink,"
(We will not think of rum and wine;)
To Burns' thoughts it formed the link
That bound them in a chain divine:
Burns, our pride—tho' gifted—lost,
Cramp'd, crushed, 'neath gauger's paltry post.

The quaffer of the "cup of sack"

Was jollity's undimching friend;
That quaffer was the "queer Sir Jack:"
Oh! that the present hour would lend
To us his head, so strong and sound—
His paunch, so dome-like and profound.

Fill yet the bowl with "gude Scotch drink!"

By Ferintosh and Islay's shore
Swagger the coosers who never wink
At tipping off a quart or more;
And there, perhaps, some seed is sown
The jolly god might not disown.

Trust not for cheap gin to the Whigs—

For taxes low;—the taxes rise.
In smuggling sly the Schiedam kegs
The only chance of cheapness lies.
But cruel force and iron rule
Would break your pot, however full.

Fill high the bowl with "gude Scotch drink!"

Our lasses dance beneath you trees;
I see their figures rise and sink,
But, gazing on the sign-ery,
I weep to think they should be tools
For suckling of Tee-total foals.

Place me on hoghead's lefty top,

Where nothing, save the rum and I,
May hear our mutual gurglings drop,
There, landlord, let me tap and try!
Cold water drink shall ne'er be mine,
Restore—repaint—you faded sign!

* Sir John Falstaff.

BLANCHE DELAMERE.

CHAPTER XI.

Coming of Age.

THE prayers of many grateful hearts were granted—the hopes of many young and joyful bosoms fulfilled—when the sun rose in unwonted splendour upon that June morning which beheld the young Countess of Delamere complete her twenty-first year, and obtain, with the uncontrollable possession of her princely fortune, the mastery of her own actions. Before the sun had risen, the village girls were in their cottage-gardens, gathering the earliest roses and the latest valley lilies—sweet as their own innocent breath—for the welcome holiday. The music of the rustic band was already heard afar off, in the avenue leading from the Stoke Delamere gate to the stately mansion of the Holy Cross. The gleesome children, and their mothers, had assembled in troops, equipped in their neatest dresses, each carrying flowers and floral decorations, in the long procession which, at a very early hour, picturesquely defiled upon the lawn, and under the magnificent beech and walnut trees, where it was joined by the young Countess, and her female friends and attendants. Before partaking of the breakfast, arranged on long flower-decorated tables, spread in the Berceau walk, the Countess Blanche and her rustic neighbours—matrons, maidens, and children—were to join in a social meeting, rather than in solemn worship, in the ancient chapel of Delamere. It was Blanche who presided at the organ, and led the cheerfully-pious and simple hymn, in which the Universal Father was thanked and adored by His assembled children for His bounty and goodness; and, in which, earnest supplication was made for light and energy to fulfil His will, and to accomplish the high ends for which the beings here assembled had been called into existence. When, at the close of this simple celebration, the young Countess had shaken hands with the women, and caressed the children—each bashful or brisk urchin who, confident of her kindness, pressed forward to seek her notice—she whispered her Quaker gouvernante, now her maternal companion, to leave her in the chapel for a few minutes to solitude and her own thoughts. And, although hers was not a ritual religion—a ceremonial faith—it was with a soothing sense of peace and consolation stealing over her that Blanche rose, with tearful eyes, from the altar-steps, where, kneeling in mute devotion, she had silently thanked the gracious Providence which had sustained and guided her friendless youth through the many trials, perils, and snares by which she had been beset; and implored the same gracious guidance and protection from this new era in her life, when, with privileges which the world esteems so high, came duties which she had long contemplated as imperative, difficult, and solemn.

“For many years have I been looking forward to this day,” was her observation to the friend waiting her at the door of the chapel; “yet it still finds me, if neither weak nor wavering, unprepared.”

“Thou wouldst lay too much on thyself at once, dear child: give thyself time to accomplish the good thou designest.”

“No time—no time. Let me work whilst it is called to-day! For what have I desired this unsatisfying riches, assumed, yea, battled for, suffered martyrdom, to attain these barren honours—sought this great, this awful responsibility—save to work out those benevolent schemes of wiser, more thoughtful heads, which my own heart and conscience sanction? Thinkest thou, dear companion, that I might not have been happier—ay, happier far—as the wife of Frederick Leighton, the village surgeon, than the solitary, loveless, joyless possessor of all this unvalued wealth and grandeur? Had the base attempts of others to defraud me, not alone of my rights, but of my intellect, of my personal independence, my freedom, not roused my spirit to the combat, I sometimes feel that I should have been most thankful to abdicate my sovereignty to the next heir, and get me, not to a nunnery, but to a happy, humble home.”

“In vindicating your rights, you took the course which God and man approve. Need your friend say how much, were it but for the sake of humanity, she exalts in your escape and triumph?”

“Yet I shudder as I look back, and wonder whence I derived the strength of spirit which has borne me through that terrible ordeal which exposed me to the real wreck of those poor wits I was accused of wanting. Staunch kinsman as Sir Jervis Yates is, and ever will be to a countess-cousin—zealous as the house of Fanfaronade has been for a noble heiress, who may yet be converted into a nearer relative—and, though to both I feel all due gratitude—what, save for your sympathy and affection, and the noble, the generous devotion of Frederick—what, save for his consummate knowledge and ability, must have been my fate in those dreadful investigations? Now I could almost bless my past trials. Have they not revealed to me the true nobility, the unimagined beauty of one human heart, and that one devoted to me with all its untold treasure of love and goodness. You press my arm—I know well the meaning of that gentle check,” continued the young Countess, smiling; “yet you shall not, on this morning of jubilee, grudge me the proud happiness of knowing that I am beloved—loved for myself alone; and that the only heart I ever sought is my own! Can I ever forget what sustained me throughout those torturing, degrading, maddening trials! Had my enemies triumphed—had I been proved a lunatic, an idiot, unfit to enjoy the commonest rights of the species—his love would not have failed me. We should have fled together beyond the reach of cruel and tyrannical, because blind laws; and, though pronounced unfit to enjoy the honours of the heiress of Delamere, mine might have been a more blessed lot."

The maternal friend wished to lead the mind of the young Countess from a course of thought to which it was morbidly prone, and to fix it upon present duty. . . . We must look back for an instant. The complicated transactions of Mr Grimshaw, the steward of the late Countess, and her confidential man in all her affairs, had left him, as all the world believed, greatly her debtor. And, though the destruction of account-books and vouchers of all kinds in the mysterious burning of the left wing of the Abbey of the Holy Cross had involved affairs in inextricable confusion, Mr Grimshaw looked forward with apprehension to the period when the young Countess should act under the counsels of her clear-headed cousin, Sir Jervis Yates, whose talents for business and accounts were famed throughout the country, and who had been heard to say, that the long widowhood of Countess Marguerite, and the prolonged minority of Lady Blanche, must have made the Delawares the greatest monied aristocratic family in the north. Before the death of the old Countess, Mr Grimshaw having made, as was alleged, a safe preliminary bargain with the next heir—that young Irishman of whom the reader has formerly heard—began to hint doubts about the soundness of mind of the eccentric or half-mad heiress, born to destroy the estates, and disgrace the house of Delamere. Mr Grimshaw, the young man, and those of his friends who acted by the steward's instigation, and under his guidance, would have been better contented had the young Countess, on coming of age, quietly agreed to leave them the sole management of her fortune, promising not to marry, and to have spared themselves the scandal and difficulty, and her the pain of the investigation. But Mr Grimshaw too well knew her high spirit to entertain any hope of so desirable an arrangement; and a case, most carefully drawn up, was accidentally shewn to Dr Frederick Leighton, by an eminent physician in London, which revealed the deep-laid scheme of villany. It was shewn to Leighton as a professional curiosity upon a discussion accidentally arising about insanity, and its strange and varying symptoms. The young female, A. B., had been born, it was stated, in an eastern country, was aged eighteen, handsome in figure, and with regular Grecian features; but of a raised and distracted look and wandering eye; complexion dark, temperament melancholic; liable, from childhood, to sudden, wild bursts of passion, sometimes amounting to frenzy; apt to be amorous, and, at one time, when very young, had almost formed a matrimonial connexion with a young man living in the family in a half-menial capacity. The hypothetical case tallied in so many minute particulars with what Leighton knew of the history and opinions of Blanche Delamere, that he could not doubt the identity of A. B. Nor could he help admiring the ingenuity with which trivial facts and circumstances had been perverted and distorted, to make out the case of a young lady, always remarkable for eccentricity of conduct and opinion, falling into partial insanity, which certainly made her unfit to manage her own important affairs, or to contract marriage; and compelled the next of kin to come forward. Indelicacy of manners, superstition alternating with infidelity, contempt and outrage of public opinion in matters which, by women of honour, are held sacred, were among her alleged vices of disposition and, above all, rebellion against the authority of the most indulgent of grandmothers. A number of illustrative anecdotes, which, it was said, could be established by evidence, closed this remarkable case, among which were an exaggerated version of the story of Phoebe Waterton, and of Rosamond Weston. Much stress was laid upon the influence held over the mind of this unfortunate lady by an artful attendant, who, it was believed, intended, as soon as she was of age, to marry her to one of her own connexions, who, in birth and fortune, was every way beneath the rank of the patient. The brow of the young physician burned as, by this odd coincidence, he read of the designs imputed to himself and his aunt upon the fortune and person of the imbecile or lunatic heiress. He had, however, sufficient presence of mind to suppress his indignation at the complicated villany laid open.

"Little doubt about the frail wits of this poor damsel," remarked his friend. "Here is absolutely one of those cases in which law steps in with advantage, to protect the weak, and baffle villany; for there are, I fear, men to be found base enough, for filthy lucre's sake, to marry a creature in this pitiable condition; and she may give heirs to a rich and noble house."

Dr Leighton answered, that the case was indeed singular—very singular. They had, however, seen but one side of it. They were not in a condition to judge of the motives of the relatives of this young lady for depriving her of personal liberty, and the control of her own affairs; and he craved leave to copy over the singular case, which was at once conceded.

Painful, most painful, had it been to Frederick Leighton to communicate to the Lady Blanche the discovery he had made; and for a long night had he ruminated upon withholding it, at least until the matter took shape. But this idea was abandoned. He felt the urgency of the circumstances. He relied upon the fortitude and strength of mind early displayed by Blanche, and the importance of instant warning, while those around her might be hourly on the watch to misconstrue her every word, and misrepresent her every action.

This was but the first of a long series of services as effectively as delicately rendered, during the torturing investigation, to which the Countess Blanche had been privately subjected, and under which her pride, her firmness, nay her intellect, she believed, must have given way, save for his unflinching sympathy, and heroic devotion. For her sake, he had, for the time, abandoned his professional views, and every immediate hope and advancement in life; for her sake, to secure her from further indignity and persecution, had he forborne to accept the rich and passionately coveted gift almost proffered him—the hand of her, whose heart had been ever and only his, and whose love no longer brooked, nor sought concealment.

“Had they made me out mad,” continued the Lady Blanche, as she walked with her friend from the door of the chapel towards the happy festive groups, waiting her presence under the trees, “then had I been blest. Oh, so blest!—Frederick would have fled with me—you would have accompanied us to Syria—to my own dear childhood’s land. There might no longer have existed a Countess Delamere in the peerage; but how blest a Blanche Leighton, in some safe and humble home—blest and making blest!”

“And hast thou not now power to bless?—unthankful lady!—to whom hundreds look up for the happiness which, largely imparting to others, cannot long fail thyself. There is but too much reason to fear that the first whisper of alliance with one whom the world deems so far below thee, would be the signal for the renewal of those base schemes, which degrading to thee, might forever deprive those hundreds of thy dependant fellow-creatures of thy generous and considerate care. Thou hast already a large family—ties enough to occupy and fill even thy expansive affections. Look, lady, to the small part of thy expecting assembled English family which yonder await thee. Thou hast high duties—doubt not in their fulfilment to find happiness. Is not our Heavenly Father the Just One?”

The young Countess sighed, and strove to be contented.

“I endeavour to think in this manner—to look only to the bright side. I have triumphed over villany, and possess what seems a boundless power of doing good. Would that society were so constituted, that no one, however generous and well-inclined, possessed power so ample and dangerous. But I will make the best of it; and, some day, perhaps—some far distant day—the sense of the benefits I may have been able to confer on others shall sooth this weak, fond heart, and quiet this human yearning, which now cannot be appeased. There is but one man in this whole world whom I can marry; and I know that our union is at present all but impossible. But I will not desert the post in which Providence has placed me. I will not—I dare not risk throwing those poor people, who have no hope save in me, upon the tender mercies of those who have no mercy. But why dally? Have I not work enough for a long life before me?”

In cordially doing the honours of her rustic fête, in reciprocating kindnesses, and breathing, as it were, an atmosphere of love and gladness, surrounded by the objects of her love and her bounty, the spirit of the young Countess recovered its elasticity. Before the festival of the women and children had closed, a procession of men and boys, with banners and music, arrived—a spontaneous demonstration of regard and respect for their young lady, “who was so good to their Misuses and little ones.” There was also to be a dinner of farmers and country neighbours at the George and Dragon; and already was the antique Market-Cross over against that hospitable hostelry decorated with evergreens and banners. A more delicate compliment was paid to the Countess by some unknown person, who had privately adorned with flowers the windows of her grandfather’s humble parsonage. The indignant refusal of the farmers to have their festival dinner presided over by Mr Grimshaw, who volunteered for the purpose, marked the general feeling towards that gentleman. He had not, indeed, come ostensibly forward in the late delicate investigations respecting the understanding of his mistress; but not only was the affair well known throughout the country, but his share in it. Some talked of a sound pelting with stones, if the steward presumed to shew his face abroad that day; and it was remarked that the Guy Faux which suffered incrimination at the Market-Cross, amidst loud rejoicing, wore the exact costume of the steward, and looked his twin-brother, both in redness of nose and sinister cast of eye.

From dispensing and receiving simple gifts and memorials of the day, offered by her morning guests, the young Countess was summoned to important business. Mr Grimshaw was there—the lawyers were already met in array—the guardians assembled—Lord Fanfaronade was come—and, as a friend and relative, Sir Jervis Yates took post by his kinswoman. The business formalities were happily dispatched, so far as was possible; for something yet remained to be done, both by the Lord Chancellor and the steward; but the Countess was free, uncontrollable, in word or action, and with grace and dignity she received the congratulations of her company; with touching softness, she whispered congratulations of her old friend, Dr Hayley, whom, to the confusion of Lord Fanfaronade, and the displeasure of Sir Jervis, she requested to take the place of honour at the dinner-table where she first publicly presided as mistress. As Blanche arose from the table, where she was the only lady present, she addressed Lord Fanfaronade.

“Your business is happily accomplished, my Lord—mine is but beginning. May I even at this unusual hour request your presence, with that of my cousin, Sir Jervis—and as many of the gentlemen assembled as will do me the honour—as witnesses to the completion of a part of mine. My own agent and people of business are already in the library.”

His Lordship and the other gentlemen bowed, as she glided away, each fancying what this business might be.

“I should not be surprised if she were about to betroth herself to that Frederick Leighton, who has been galloping about to Ireland and the West Indies on her affairs—all the settlements ready cut and dry,” whispered Sir Jervis to the Peer, who drew up in offended majesty.

“I shall remonstrate strongly—I never will consent to my cousin throwing herself and her fine fortune and connexion away in this manner ; she who might make the first match in England."

Lord Fanfaronade bowed his reply—he was unable to speak.

"I have backed her out and out against the heir-at-law instigated, it is said, by Grimshaw—and would again ; but I cannot stand this. Your son, Mr Devereux, who, I understand, did the Countess the honour to pay his addresses to her, when she was a mere child, has not, I hope, changed his mind ? There is a connexion to ensure the protection she so much wants ; and the Countess cannot be insensible to the importance of such an alliance in her present delicate circumstances, nor to the kind interest your Lordship and your family have always taken in her and in her affairs.

"You are extremely obliging, Sir Jervis. My family—my wife and daughters—who have known the Countess from her childhood, and who are much attached to her, did, at one time, certainly, desire the alliance. That my son Horatio was attached to Lady Blanche, I am also aware. His present sentiments I do not pretend to know. But when a young man of fashion—who might form the most brilliant matrimonial connexion—remains for years unmarried, in his peculiar circumstances—the inference is fair that he has his reasons. Some cloud did intervene between the young people, years ago ; but I have no doubt that my son Devereux remains attached to your charming relative. Can you have any good reason to believe that she meditates a connexion so unsuitable, so extremely derogatory, I must say, to her family, as that which you suspect ?"

"In faith, I fear it, my Lord !" returned Sir Jervis, becoming familiar, upon the strength of a reciprocal confidence, and a common object. "Leighton, who is a most intelligent fellow, has made himself extremely busy, and not a little useful to my fair cousin ; and I know, from good authority, that there have been far more paper-drawing work and documenting, going privately on, than a young lady should be concerned in, without the advice or knowledge of her friends : but these people have, from childhood, got so round her ! She has always had too much of her own way, that's the truth of it—but she is a fine creature !—a noble creature ! were she once properly settled down."

Lord Fanfaronade bowed and hemmed. He would not repulse Sir Jervis ; he would not commit himself. He had gone far enough, and abided the issue ; but hope or pride wrung forth this remark as they passed to the library.

"The Countess would scarcely have invited so old a friend of the Delamere family as myself to remain to witness an act which I must be pardoned for regarding as degradation to herself and her noble order, were her purpose what you suppose."

"We shall see—we shall see !" rejoined Sir Jervis. "And if it be my countenance she seeks to such a connexion, I promise you, my Lord, she shall see the blackest side of it."

"The champagne has affected that person," was Lord Fanfaronade's thought. "Vulgar, no doubt, but a shrewd man—perhaps ambitious in his way."

When the gentlemen entered the library, they saw a table covered with written papers and parchments ; the modest Quakeress in her best grey silk gown, and her gentlemanlike nephew, Dr Leighton, in his professional black. He had just arrived from Ireland, with the agent on the Countess's Donegal estates, and two gentlemen of the law, with whom he seemed on very intimate terms, and who had met him, by appointment, at Stoke Delamere.

"Hey-day ! here is an array for a birth-day drawing-room," cried Sir Jervis, briskly ; "what, my fair Countess, is about to be played off for the amusement of your guests, and in honour of the day ?"

Blanche suppressed her rising disgust, while she replied—

"I owe, Sir Jervis, as some of my guests must be aware, my life—or all that gives life value—my health, to this dear friend, who has, for twelve years, watched over me with a mother's care. How much more I owe to her than mere life—for that which far transcends its dearest interests—which exists above, which endures beyond life, it is not for me here to tell. But I cannot suffer even one day of my hard-bought independence to elapse, without rendering her all the compensation within my poor means."

"Certainly, certainly !" said Sir Jervis Yates, relieved, and concluding that "compensation" to the aunt must mean an annuity, or a good sum in hand, and not marrying the nephew.

"A service of tea-plate, perhaps," thought Lord Fanfaronade—"a small touch of the innate plebeian ostentation, in taking so many witnesses to the mighty reward—were it no more." But he hemmed, and said sententially, that "faithful and useful service acquired all the rights of humble friendship, and could neither be over-valued nor over-rewarded."

"I am glad your Lordship thinks in this manner—I seek not to enrich my friend—she requires neither my gifts nor my money—she is rich enough already for her wise and modest wants. But I seek to increase her happiness. It was she who early inspired my childish mind with the deepest horror of slavery—of man holding property in the blood, the sinews, and the free-will with which the Creator has gifted the meanest of His creatures. Nor could I, upon this the first day of my power, lay my head on my pillow in peace the owner were it but of one slave. I have taken measures to ensure the safety and comfort of the emancipated negroes on the West India estates of my family, in the enjoyment of their new-born freedom ; and also, for the protection and improvement of my property, I hasten to sign their manumission, and thus to discharge, so far as it may be discharged, my weight of obligation to my maternal friend."

Before Sir Jervis could recover his astonishment, or Lord Fanfaronade dispose of his pinch of snuff, Blanche had started to the table, and rapidly signed several sheets of paper, the leaves of which Dr Leighton turned over.

"Softly, my dear Madam," cried Sir Jervis, at last; "are you aware of what you are about? or the number of your slaves? above three or four hundred!"

"So many more hundreds of reasons against the delay of justice. Will you, Sir Jervis, do me the kindness to sign as a witness. Dr Leighton give me your name. Nay, my Lord, I do not despair of your Lordship also humouring me and honouring me."

Lord Fanfaronade was taken by surprise; and the dignified FANFARONADE figured before simple Frederick Leighton, in the act of emancipation, which drew moisture to the eyes of the Quakers, as she silently pressed the hand of her late charge, and retired.

"I have nothing to say to so extraordinary a document," said Sir Jervis Yates. "It is not alone the amount of property rashly thrown away, but the example. I don't understand it. Was this the reward which your nurse requested? The idea might be quite natural to a Quaker, yet not the most proper for a young, unmarried lady of title and fortune—eh! my Lord?—who might, at least, have been expected to consult her friends in so important a step."

"My young friend, the Countess, if I may have the honour of calling her so, has graced the day of her majority by a gracious deed," said Lord Fanfaronade, who was compromised by his signature. "Let us not damp the pleasure which the glow of benevolence sheds over her bosom, and let us hope that the poor wretches whom she has released, may never abuse their freedom, nor disgrace her goodness."

"I fear it not, my Lord. I have, with warm love to my kind, great faith in the human race—in all God's creation, and especially in my fellow-creatures, whether black or white."

Lord Fanfaronade had quickly recourse to his unfailing snuff-box, and the contemplation of the diamond-encircled stately Maria Theresa pictured on its lid. He doubted, after all, if this singular young woman, against whom insanity had lately been so plausibly alleged that even his mind was shaken, could be a fit wife for Devereux, great as were her extrinsic advantages. Her "kind," her "fellow-creatures," "God's creatures." Why, what was all this but a sort of Radicalism in disguise; and the worse because disguised under the cloak of Christianity—Christianity which some blasphemous dissenting preacher had lately styled "the highest and purest form of democracy?" He had heard the young Countess herself quote those shocking expressions so repugnant to social order, decency, and religion.

"I could not sleep in peace the owner of a slave," continued Blanche; "but neither can I remain the mistress of a race of miserable serfs, whose degraded existence must be a constant pain and reproach to me, and a curse to themselves. My second act of independent sovereignty, my Lord, shall be to raise the Irish peasantry on the family estates to the dignity of industrious, independent labourers and farmers."

"This will require mature consideration," said Lord Fanfaronade, with more quickness than his ordinary manner—"I mean, totally changing the management of those valuable estates."

"I have not been rash. Your Lordship is aware that I was indulged in making a long visit to Ireland last summer. I was not idle; and, then, if I felt with my girl's heart, I also saw with my own eyes, and judged by my own and by more enlightened understandings of the condition of the people on these estates and on those of neighbouring properties. Dr Leighton has since devoted some months to the same examination. He has just returned from Ireland. All that I desire, and am bound to attempt, cannot be accomplished in one day, nor in one year—no, nor perhaps in one lifetime. Yet, knowing my duty—having taken anxious and humble pains to learn it—I will not suffer an hour to elapse without commencing the work of amelioration—of atonement."

"Your Ladyship having kept yourself as poor as a rat, during your minority, in throwing away your personal allowance on those Irish incorrigibles, would now throw your landed property after it," said Sir Jervis Yates, in a tone which somewhat ruffled the temper of the young Countess, though she checked the retort which rose to her lips. "Come, my Lord—come, Mr Grimshaw—we must form a council-board on these Irish affairs of my cousin's," continued Sir Jervis. "We must not allow the generosity of the Countess to be altogether imposed upon, and advantage taken of her inexperience to deprive her of the power over her Irish property before she has for four-and-twenty hours enjoyed it."

"Who seeks such advantage, Sir Jervis?" inquired Dr Leighton, firmly, on seeing the eyes of the baronet fixed on himself.

"No one, I hope, my good Doctor; but, at all events, if they should, English good sense is able to resist Irish or any other encroachment.—Eh, my Lord?"

"With all deference," observed Mr Grimshaw; "so complete a revolution as my lady meditates in the management of the Irish estates would not only require deliberation, but I have doubts if, by the family settlements, any proprietor be entitled to perform acts which go to the virtual alienation of the estates from the family; for what less are perpetual leases?"

"Alienation!" ejaculated Lord Fanfaronade.

"Alienation!" repeated Sir Jervis Yates. "And in whose behalf, pray?" and his eyes again involuntarily sought Dr Leighton.

"In behalf—if alienation it be—of those who, I believe in my conscience, have the best right to these wild lands—of the people reared upon the cultivated portion of these rack-rented absentee estates, of those whose industry has given them whatever value they possess," replied the Countess; "and," she proceeded, "I have not been, even in idea, a rash innovator. My power over that property is unquestionable. It is that by which alike the King holds his crown and the cottager his copyhold—LAW. And, while I retain that power, I am resolved to exercise it independently and to the best of my judgment, and with, I trust, a profound and ever-present sense of my responsibility. The lands already under some kind of cultivation, however imperfect, amount to nearly two-thirds of the whole range. Of these we—my counsellors and myself,"—and she smiled and bowed to her new Irish agent,—“propose to give long leases, preferring the present tenants, unless some insuperable objection exists—and at greatly reduced rents. I shall deem it wise for both parties—landlord and tenant—to encourage the spirit of improvement and industry by every proper means; and by making advances for improvements on a much more liberal scale than has been usual, where the principle is to draw and screw all away and to return nothing. I will not be an absentee, though I hope my Irish tenants will soon be very well able to do without me. The world does not offer more delicious summer retreats to the true lover of nature than are to be found in the bays opening on the Atlantic, on the shores of the Delamere, and of many other Irish estates, which the owners never see. 'Tis to such places my friend, Dr Leighton, says he would send invalids, in preference to the more fashionable haunts of the Continent. And there shall be my summer station. The mountain lands—those lying in a state of nature since the Deluge, but quite susceptible, I am informed, of cultivation, and at present of little or no use to any one—we propose to allot in small farms, held by perpetual leases, and at first at merely a nominal rent. We shall build good cottages and offices, and provide for the comfortable settlement and maintenance of the mountain farmers for the first years of their hard but hopeful struggle:—and from the first hour it will be hopeful; for they shall not feel that they are wearing out their strength, and encountering distress and privation, merely to pay a rack-rent to an absentee, but to improve their own little possessions, and increase the comfort and wealth of their families. It is my wish that every remaining poor family, that has been ejected from the estates of my ancestors, shall find a refuge in these mountain-farms. This is a justice which I owe to them and to the memory of their former landlords. Can their spirits rest in peace, while these poor people, driven out in their misery, are wandering as beggars on the face of the country which their toil has enriched.”

“And therefore your ladyship’s wise counsellors would have you generously open pauper-warrens to receive them all in your wild lands?” inquired Sir Jervis, sharply, and looking hard at the mute new Irish agent.

“Pauper-warrens! pardon me, cousin; but what has my grandmother’s Irish estate been, for fifty years back, save one large and increasing pauper-warren, if you will name it so. My projected mountain-farms—and would that law gave me the right of disposing of them, out and out, to all whom industry might stimulate to labour to redeem them!—my mountain-farms shall, in the first place, not be too small, and one main condition of the tenure provides against subdivision. The rent—at first, nothing—like that of all the other farms, can only increase with the productiveness of the farm, and the consequent ability of the tenant; and it will be limited by being paid in kind—or as a grain-rent. We intend that a considerable portion of it, in the new lands, shall at all times go to maintain parish roads, mills, and such new improvements as the progress of society may introduce into agriculture; and also to maintain the school-houses, the chapel, the parish library, the infirmary, and other useful institutions.”

“The Papist Chapel, madam?” inquired Lord Fanfaronade, solemnly.

“Whatever kind of place for Christian worship the householders of the new township choose to have, my Lord; and any sort of school they approve. Where can the patronage and care of such institutions be so well placed as in the hands of those seeking religious instruction and consolation for themselves, and useful learning for their children?”

“In the hands of ignorant or bigoted Roman Catholic peasants, madam?”

“They are men, my Lord, endowed with like faculties as other men. Give them freedom, and motive to exercise those faculties under the stimulus of their dearest interests—whether as intelligent, responsible beings, or as fathers and neighbours—and my life upon the quick access of knowledge and liberal feeling among my Irish farmers. Your Lordship does not like the Roman Catholic religion; neither, abstractly, do I admire it; yet I please myself in thinking that my new mountain-farms—my emigration-colony, going only the short distance from the plains to the hills—may form a sort of atonement for the cruel hardships inflicted on the poor people of those estates through the harshness or the culpable negligence of my predecessors. My mountain-farms shall be a perpetual Mass for the repose of their spirits; and, I trust, not an unacceptable one.”

Lord Fanfaronade knew not what to reply to this wild talk; or what final opinion to form of the character and sentiments of so singular, so decided, or so over-bold a lady. Meanwhile he wished to get away. He required the counsels of his lady, and of his daughter, Lady Blande; of whose talents for penetrating character, and managing high-flown, and, indeed, all kinds of people, he had a great opinion.

On taking leave, he expressed a hope that Holy Cross and Fanfaronade Park should ever maintain their ancient amicable relations; and he mentioned the intention of his lady and her daughters to drive over to congratulate the young Countess to-morrow, as they knew that business engagements, and entertaining the tenantry, must occupy all her hours on this important day. Some county business remained to be discussed between his Lordship and Sir Jervis; and, as their roads lay in the same direction for a few miles, the latter, with evident pleasure, from the condescending invitation, accepted a seat in the Peer's carriage, though, amidst the multifarious business of the day, one little affair of his own was still left unsettled. For this, he invited himself back at an early day. Sir Jervis Yates had recently withdrawn his now illustrious name from the vast concerns of the mills, but he was so far from having surrendered his pecuniary advantages to the ostensible partner, that the majority of the Countess had been impatiently waited for to obtain a lease, resolutely and angrily refused by her grandmother, of a piece of ground commanding a fine water power, where he proposed erecting new and very extensive cotton-mills.

"You know the terms," said the young Countess, smiling, when, at parting, he drew her aside to remind her of the request.

"I am ready—our house is—to pay not merely a good, but an enormous rent for that small reach of the river," replied Sir Jervis.

"I do not want—I would not receive an enormous rent—and I have none of my grandmother's repugnance to the neighbourhood of manufactories. I see their value, especially to the people of Stoke Delamere; perhaps I may yet find an asylum for some of my Irish families, or their off-shoots, in your new mills down the river. But you know the only conditions on which I can grant you a lease, not merely of these falls, but of the adjoining farms, for your establishment."

"Oh, flower-plots before the white-walled cottages, I believe. Was not that it, my lady?" And he laughed.

"Yes, flower-plots—but much more—neat, roomy, substantial, and fairly rented cottages—each with its large garden or paddock as well as the flower-plot; common greens and public walks; school-house and library; washing and cooking establishments; baths, brewery, store, and surgery. And these are but the husk—the beggarly elements of social happiness in my well-ordered, imaginary factory of Beau Ideal. You kindly warn me against forming a pauper-warren in the Donegal mountains; but, with every wish to forward your project, Sir Jervis, neither shall I be in any way accessory to establishing a worse sort of warren almost under my own eye. There are forms of misery still more squalid than those of the Irish peasant—a civilized lot still more dehumanizing—more soul-stunting than the peasant's in his worst cabin of the bog. But I am not merely willing, but anxious to facilitate this scheme of you and your partner; if, in so doing, I can be assured that I shall help to lay were it but one little stone to the sure foundations of a firmer and happier social system than that which is growing up around us."

"We have no doubt about satisfying your Ladyship's men of business, and also meeting your benevolent views," replied Sir Jervis, "about the dame's schools and the flower-plots."

There was a little good-natured sneer conveyed in the tone of the last words; but Blanche was not offended with her millionaire relative, who she understood to be at least as considerate about the instruments which produced his wealth as the most of his brethren in England. It was agreeable to see them clean and looking tidy, if not healthy; and his interest that they should be industrious and temperate. He, therefore, encouraged Temperance-Societies and Savings-Banks among his partner's work-people—for he rarely saw them himself—and had no objection to a game at ball or cricket on a Christmas afternoon, if the amusement never interfered with the regular hours of working the machinery, which they, however, somehow always did.

It was with a sense of relief that the young Countess saw her guests depart; and the longest day of the year, and of her life, come to an end in the dispatch of business, which assumed the nature of important duty. She had signed her will, which was ready prepared, and also a deed, which secured for her natural life £1000 a-year to the next heir to the estates, beyond her own power of revocation.

"This is, indeed, to heap coals of fire upon the head of the ingrate," said her friend, as the deed, hitherto kept secret, from motives of delicacy, was witnessed by Dr Leighton and the Irish agent.

"It is an act of mere justice, and, perhaps, scanty justice. Can I approve the law which leaves this young man to languish in absolute poverty, while it enriches, to prodigal extent, a girl who has chanced to step between him and the large possessions which our common ancestors have gathered together—it will not do too curiously to inquire how. I have provided for every domestic and dependant who might have been disappointed by the sudden demise of my grandmother, I fancy, not what will be called nobly or munificently, but fairly. My few maternal relatives—those who have lately, in the most remote and unsuspected localities and degrees of consanguinity, made me aware of their existence and of our relationship—I shall endeavour to treat with becoming kindness and tenderness; but fortune is not given me to enrich them. I have an impression that it is temporarily intrusted to my stewardship for more expansive objects. With those abuses of public charities with which we are all conversant, I almost fear to complete the endowment of my pet plan—my schools in Stoke Delamere, and asylum, and annuities for poor lonely widows and destitute spinsters; but we have been so wary—our lawyers so skilful—that surely, for some generations, our scheme will not be vitiated. So let us to work on this—and then my birthday star may set when it will."

"I fear you have exhausted yourself already," said Leighton, looking anxiously on her eyes of preternatural brightness, and her flushed cheek. "The excitement of benevolent enthusiasm may proves wearying as that of fashionable dissipation—and, for these many months of preparation, you have been suffering under the philanthropy fever;—shall we not, therefore, for this night, sweep away agents and lawyers, parchments and doctors, and leave you to repose?"

"Not till my task be accomplished; I should not else taste repose.—Could a Howard, a Wesley, a host of glorious men, devote their whole lives and energies to the most fatiguing labours in the service of their suffering fellow-creatures, and shall I drop in a day?—Don't think so meanly either of my mental or physical powers, I am ever strongest in trial. Let us finish our business."

There was more signing and sealing. The schools were founded and endowed—the asylum for destitute age, and respectable poverty, established—with all legal formalities; and the funds for their support provided partly from the rents of those lands which were intended to surround the manufacturing village; which lands, it was believed, must rapidly increase in value.

"And now," said the Countess, laying down her pen, "I do confess fatigue, for which the remedy shall be a soothing drive in the twilight to witness the rejoicings in my honour in Stoke Delamere. I am bound to return the visits paid me this morning. Where are our children?" And the little daughter of Mr Devereux, and the lost Rosamond, to whom Blanche felt as a tender mother, and kept constantly with her, and the boy now at home from school attended her to enjoy the spectacle of the night, as they had done that of the morning.

The first rocket of the fireworks, which were to render the natal day of Blanche Countess of Delamere brilliant and illustrious over all the surrounding country, announced the arrival of her landau in the little antique town; and loud were the huzzas, and hearty the cheers. It was with some difficulty that Dr Leighton was able to prevent the young men and lads from unharnessing the horses and taking their places themselves; and only his positive assurance that the Countess would be frightened, angered, and disgusted by such an attempt, prevented the degrading proceeding.

Among the most active of the volunteer beasts of draught was the husband of Phoebe Waterton, who, now that his wife's patroness had come to her kingdom, was convinced that his fortune was made, and huzzaed accordingly. The son of old Jacob Goodridge, keeper of the Bucks-hound gate, would be turned out at once, to make way for him. It went to the heart of the heiress, on this day of power and rejoicing, to deny the humble petition of her old friend and playmate; yet, even under the menace that Phoebe would be harshly treated or beaten by her disappointed and angry lord, she resisted importunity to perform a deed of injustice, which would have made fifty discontented, and one ungrateful; and thus allayed the murmurs of the maidens, and gammers of the Goodridge faction, who had whispered that a fair face, though faded, and an oily tongue, went farther with great folks than good will and faithful service.

"I shall never be popular," said Blanche to her friends, as they drove from the town, immediately after she had dismissed, with something like severity, the second petition urged upon her by the tearful Phoebe. "When I consider the many preposterous, unreasonable, and impossible petitions and requests that have been made to myself from my earliest childhood, and which pour in upon me now, I could pity a harassed statesman in office. I must be content to be imagined hard and cold, though it wounds me—to deal impartial justice to all, and be understood and loved by few—how few! One by one, all will forsake me; and I shall be alone—alone!"

Her tremulous, desponding tone, and low-breathed sigh, revealed the depth of the sentiment which these few words embodied. The Quaker matron looked at her lady, as if tenderly deprecating and pitying, while she chided this desponding spirit; and the strong emotion of the young physician, overcoming his habitual self-command, was betrayed by an involuntary expanding of his arms, while the mute eloquence of passion, in his kindling eye and animated gesture, seemed to say—"Come to this heart and be cherished—come, if its life-long devotion may suffice thee." The full import of the slight involuntary movement on both sides, as Blanche, for an instant, seemed to bend towards her lover, as if about to throw herself into his arms, and to shed her grateful and rapturous tears on his bosom, was mutually understood; and to her heart, this self-betrayal of one usually so provokingly guarded and sage, so inflexible in purpose, was a triumph and a solace. A thrill of delight shot through her whole frame, to the exalting thought—"Although he so often imagines I may never be his, although thus ever-guarded, he loves me—he loves me! and I am happy!"

The twilight of the lovely evening had reached that point when, about midsummer-time, in England, twilight seems to kindle and brighten after the setting of the sun, and to shine with a splendour that seems all its own, unborrowed of the departed luminary.

"How balmy and refreshing is the air to-night. What a luxury only to live and breathe this sweet air," said Blanche, after a long pause. "I do confess something like collapse of spirits after the varied excitements of this day, and can fancy no restorative equal to a stroll home through the woods, and coffee under the beech trees—with the dearest friends of my childhood about me."

"Command your slaves," said old Dr Hayley, gallantly. "Coffee shall appear at the touch of my fairy wand; and my friend, Frederick, will give you his arm through the shrubberies. That is a felicity and honour which a small twinge of my old enemy prevents me from disputing with him to-night."

The Countess had alighted, and the last gleam of her white dress, as she disappeared among the trees, leaning on the arm of Leighton, enabled the Doctor to remark with impunity—

"Our Countess is at last her own mistress, and how deserving of every happiness. I do not, ma'am, affect ignorance of the state of her affections—but Grimshaw and the heir-at-law?—would they commence their schemes again? What do you think, ma'am? I wish I could make Dr Leighton a prince to-night for her sake!"

"Would she value or like him more?" remarked his companion, quietly.

"The poor, dear child, I could lay down my life to give her happiness; but another conspiracy, and no one to support her this time?" He shook his head. "But come, let us make her as happy as we can, ma'am; let us get supper arranged under the trees. Dr Leighton leaves us to-morrow morning, I believe. Come to-day, gone to-morrow—he is unkind to his friends."

The good Doctor really liked Leighton, and was not insincere, though he at this time certainly wished the young man well away and on the high seas. No shadow of insincerity found favour with the single-mind of the Quakeress, however innocent or speciously veiled it might be by kind motives, or so-called politeness. She drily answered—

"Frederick goes to-morrow, or haply this night. He will embark for the West Indies on Friday. He is pledged to see the experiment, which he heartily approved, fairly made. He will remain for the approaching cane-harvest, and probably the next."

"I hope it may answer," returned the Doctor, in a doubtful tone, "for the sake of our Countess, whose kind heart was set upon the thing."

"For the sake of humanity, of justice, I pray it may—and for her sake also."

They drove on in silence, much less embarrassing than that which was as solemnly kept on the wood-paths threaded by the lovers.

"I fear you have suffered much from the great exertions of this day," was the whisper which at last fell on the ear of Blanche, as she silently seated herself on a rustic bench, to rest for a few moments, after ascending a winding steep.

"I shall have abundant leisure to recover from fatigue," and she proceeded in a more impassioned tone—"Oh, Frederick! when you know that these are the last hours, the very last, we may ever spend together—the last moments that we may freely talk to each other—that I have to endure the anguish of seeing you depart to the perils of the sea, of climate, of all that may intervene, ere our far-distant meeting, if indeed we shall ever meet again—can you talk to me of personal fatigue?"

"Should I try to keep alive that anguish, dearest Blanche? Yet I confess I should be wretched to see you perfectly easy under this long and most painful separation. Am I selfish?"

"Not more than I would have you," she replied, now faintly smiling. "But sit down by me. I could forgive a little more of this kind of selfishness, Fred. A little less philosophy, and even more suffering at our separation than you are likely to display, whatever you may feel. Oh, I am myself very selfish in this sort. I can conceive no true and strong affection without it. I remember when I was wont to be delighted to see you a little miserable under my caprices. That is past—yet, to say truth, I do not desire to be very reasonable to-night. I wish you to suffer.

... And I shall find time enough to be rested, and to be rational, in four long years. Four years! how shall I endure them!"

"Are they nothing to me?" was said in a tone of tender reproach.

"Forgive me, Frederick, if I indulge to-night in the luxury of complaining. While you are by my side, what is repining but another form of happiness. But, oh, the cold, dark, heavy days to which I look forward—the unappeasable anguish of the aching and yearning heart—to be endured in silence ere we meet again—if we shall ever meet:—and unchanged? How my heart sickens and misgives me at times. So large a portion of life given away a sacrifice to the world, to pride—a sacrifice which never will propitiate the spirit that tyrannizes over us, and imposes bonds which our Heavenly Father never laid upon the creatures whom he has made to love and to be blessed." She was weeping without an effort at control.

"Tempt me not too far," replied the soothing lover, "lest I, too, in turn become the tempter. Can I thrust from me the nearer prospect of bliss? Shall we risk all—brave all? We have been prepared for worse. Say, dearest, shall we give up our plans, and part no more? How easy it were to-night, inflexible as you upbraid me with being, were it to overset my firmest resolutions. ... And should our dearest hopes ever be realized—however distant the time—you must still be prepared for many saying that I have been aspiring, sordid, and worldly-minded. I make up my mind to this sort of censure—content with having done all that honour and manhood require of me to vindicate your choice."

"Oh, more! far more, Frederick!—unkind as you have sometimes seemed to me; yet, for that very repelling unkindness, I only loved and honoured you the more. It was the true fruit of your generous and delicate feelings for one whose best claim to your regard was, comprehending your noble character, and loving you for yourself. And surely mankind are not all ungenerous; your motives will come out, clear as your truth and your love."

"While you believe so, dearest—having done all that we can to propitiate the just opinion of society—I shall be indifferent in my own regard. Nor, philosopher as you call me, am I able to wish you less noble, less beautiful, less rich. The accidents of wealth and title—while the world continues to see them dispensed in such unequal measure—well befit my own Lady Blanche, who boasts yet higher nobility—well befit my promised wife;" and he clasped her towards him. "My soul's comfort and stay in every stage of our blended existence—for Time and for Eternity!"

"I am better able to part with you now, Frederick," sighed Blanche, as she withdrew from the embrace in which she had gently sobbed away her rapturous emotions.

"Thank you, for speaking so to me. We have lived in love—such as few can understand—but how seldom have we spoken its language; and yet, now, I think I am less able to let you go. Oh, I am as fickle as the wind to-night—yet, in spirit so much lightened. O Heavens! the exulting and abounding joy that this one interview, these few words exchanged between us to-night, would have given me but one short year since—and I dare still repine."

"Our love has indeed stood fierce storms of adversity—will it, Lady Blanche, endure a severer test? I care not for the world—but, you—will you never repent—never regret—never look back."—

"Nay, Frederick," she interrupted quickly, "I have a right to be offended now. I do not, with all my faults, deserve this. The qualities are intrinsic, not accidental, which can ever change my feelings to any living thing, were it but to a dumb brute, that I had once loved. How long have we known each other, now?"

"Is your memory so frail, or so indifferent? It is now exactly ten years, since I, a bashful boy, saw the little Lady Blanche, sitting, à la Turque, in the window of that small parlour in the old laundry, reading the 'Pilgrims' Progress.' I should have dreamed of you ever after, as a Peri—the creature of an Oriental fairy-tale, save for that dear, old, quaint book."

"I remember it all now—though less distinctly than many other times;—as that burning, and your broken arm. I was not in love with you till that night—not quite," and she smiled. "Then my tenderest feelings were excited by your accident. We are kind creatures, we poor women, Fred. We will never make great mathematicians, I suppose; nor, they say, write tragedies or epic poems, like you men—but a much easier process might raise us into ministering angels than would be required with many of you of the nobler sex. . . . I should be sure you loved me to-night, Frederick, if I had before doubted."

"By what new token, dear Blanche? I fancied I had exhausted them all."

"That your thoughts carry forth my image—the idea of our blessed and blended existence, into Eternity," she said, in a very low and solemn voice. "Oh, this is true—this is exalted love."

"It is thus I have ever felt then—even in childhood—for my turtle doves, which I would have been unhappy not to take to heaven with me—

how much more for you, that sacred, that indestructible love which ever burneth,

Which came from Heaven to Heaven returneth.

Courage, dear lady! It will exalt and sustain our souls to endure this long probation. Like the youthful patriarch, my years of bondage shall seem but as a day. Were they spent beneath your eyes—cheered by your smiles, soothed, charmed by your sympathy—as a rapturous day.

. . . I must not let my thoughts dwell on this, but the blessings, I can only win by deserving them—And you, my own Blanche?"

"I shall strive to follow your example. I am not insensible to the many, many great privileges of my lot; to the far greater blessings I possess and hope for. What woman's loving pride—what woman's unbounded faith in man, can be equal to that which I feel, and am justified in feeling? Forgive my querulousness and seeming want of fortitude; and do not grudge the relief of weeping with you, to one who must so often weep alone. I do not shrink from our resolution—yet suffer me to repine a little, were it but for the dear delight of finding your strength taxed to sustain my weakness. I have told you I am not always quite rational in my deeper feelings, and to say truth, I do not desire to be so. It is enough that the burden shall be unshrinkingly borne—we may surely adjust the load so as to fit the back." Such desultory talk, with many a pause, many a broken whisper, fond interrogatory, and soothing promise, brought the lovers within sight of the noble beech trees on the lawn in front of the Abbey; under which, by the prompt orders of their friends, the servants had already set out tables with refreshments—fruit and wine.

"How like a glow-worm, seen through the foliage, is the lamp on which the coffee is simmering," said Blanche.

"And how grandly and proudly the noble old house looks out from the ancestral woods in the twilight, as if it carried its head the higher to-day, because the Lady Blanche is every inch its mistress."

"There remains a prouder day for it and for her—that on which she can tell it to hold its head higher still, for a noble master; or bid it farewell for ever, and follow him to as happy although a much humbler home."

A long and silent embrace was the seal of this parting covenant, and unbroken silence brought them to their waiting friends. If suffering from their approaching separation, the young pair were yet too happy in their own feelings, not to feel with kindness and complacency for all things around them, animate and inanimate.

VISITS TO REMARKABLE PLACES.

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

NO. II.—VISITS TO POETICAL SITES.—BOLTON PRIORY.

THE man of genius is often looked upon as a being that shuts himself up and knows little of what is going on in the real world around him. He is supposed to live in a fairyland of his own creation—often a very barren and profitless one—delusions. In reference to him men of arts and full of all manner of enchantments and magical sciences, the men of spinning-jennies and steam-engines—nay, the naturalists, and many other writers—talk of themselves as practical men. They often smile at the poet and the romance-writer, as men of the world affect to do, and say—“Oh! a very clever, a very clever fellow indeed; but as ignorant of actual life as a child.” But the poets and romancers of late have proved themselves both to be profitable fellows and practical ones. To say nothing of vast sums coined from the brain of Scott and of Byron, look at the comfortable nest which Moore has feathered for himself. Very pretty sums he has fobbed now and then. See old George Crabbe going down to his parsonage with £3,000 in his saddle-bags at one time. Look at the poet's house at Keswick: it has a library in it which has cost a fortune; and the poet and historian sits there now, what with salaries, pensions, Quarterly Review articles, and residuary legateships, as no inconsiderable man of substance. There is that “old man eloquent” too, his neighbour, at Rydal Mount, who, if he have not amassed a mount of gold on which to build his palace, has got a poet's bower on one of the most delicious little knolls in Europe, warmed by as much affection and domestic peace as ever crowned one man's hearth; and having no mark or stamp of poverty about it. Yes, and spite of Edinburgh and Quarterly, and a host of lower critics who echoed their owl-notes, his poetry is become fashionable! Only think of that—“The Idiot Boy” and “Betty Foy,” “The Old Wanderer” in his worsted stockings, and “Michael” and “The Wagoner,” become fashionable, so that every critic who knows no more of poetry than he did ten years ago, now cries “glorious! divine! inimitable!” at every new edition of his poems. Yes, and so they shall cry—for such is the ultimate triumph of general sense and taste over professional stupidity. His poetry is become golden in all senses; and, if Government only act in the matter of copyright as a British government ought to act,* it will flow on in a golden stream to his children's children, to the third and fourth—ay, to the fortieth and four hundredth generation.

These are your dreamers and thriftless poets of the present days! But they are not merely the profitable, they are the really practical men too.

We ask, where would your Watts and Boltons be, if it were not for them? Why, it is they—it is the men of poetical genius—who build your steamboats and steamcoaches. The man of genius is not now merely a scrawler on paper, a writer of poems or of tales; but his pen is become a magician's wand, the most potent one that was ever wielded: and, while other men think that he is merely inditing some pleasant lay, or matter for a winter-evening's fireside, they who see farther into a millstone know that he is actually building ships and boats, steamengines and steamcarriages; launching new and splendid packets; laying down railroads, and carrying them through mountain and forest; erecting inns, furnishing them with hosts, and guests, and waiters; spreading tables with every delicacy of the season—as witness, ye grouse on many a heathery hill, ye herrings of Loch Fine, and salmon of countless lochs, and rivers running like silver from the mountains—spreading them for thousands who run to and fro in the earth, not merely increasing knowledge of one another, but the good luck of landlords, and the employment of whole troops of poor and deserving men. The man of genius does this, and more: he creates joint-stock companies, he invests large capitals, he makes captains and stewards of steamers, clerks, coachmen, and sailors—these, and many other creatures after their kind, are of his creation.

Does any one doubt it? Why, Sir Walter Scott has done more than this, of his single arm. See what he has done for Scotland. See every summer, and all summer long, what thousands pour into that beautiful country, exploring every valley, climbing every mountain, sailing on every frith and loch, and spreading themselves and their money all through the land. And what roads and steamvessels, what cars and coaches, are prepared for them! what inns are erected!—and yet not half enow!—so rapidly does the spirit of the poetical and picturesque spread—so wonderfully do the numbers of its votaries increase, seeking a little easement of their swollen purses, a little outlet for all their taste and enthusiasm. No less than nine hundred persons, on a daily average, pass through the single city of Glasgow, chiefly of this class of persons, set astir by this great spirit which has of late years sprung up, the work of our poets and romancers. In summer all the inns there are filled jam-full; trains of omnibusses, or omnibis, are flying down to the Broomielaw every hour, to discharge the contents of the inns into the steamers, and return with the living cargoes of the steamers to the inns. Every hour, the bell of some packet, bound to the Highlands, the Western Isles, Ireland,^c Wales, and all such places, attractive as the ver-^dle land of the Genii to poetical imaginations, is heard ringing out its call to the picturesque and pleasure-hunters; and that call is obeyed by swarms of eager tourists, to the height of all human astonishment.

And when did all this grow up? "Oh," say the mere mechanic heads, "why, when steam created such facilities." Yes, since the steam of poetic brains created it! Where would your steamboats and your railroads have been leading us, do you think, if Bishop Percy had not collected the glorious ballads of nature and of heroism that were scattered over Scotland and England—the leaves of a new Sybil a million times more fateful and pregnant with wonders than the old; if Bishop Percy had not done this, and set on fire the kindred heads of Southey, of Wordsworth, and of Scott; if the Border Minstrelsy had not been gathered by Scott; if ballads and eclogues of a new school, if poems full of a pensive beauty and a pure love, had not been framed by Southey; if Wordsworth had not—stricken, as he confesses, by the mighty power of nature through this very medium—gone wandering all over the mountains of Cumberland, filling his heart with the life of the hills, and the soul of the over-arching heavens, and the peace or passion of human existence hidden in glens and recesses where poets had ceased to look for them; if the first of these great men had not come forth again in a fresh character, with Metrical Romances, and with Historical Romances in prose, pouring a new spirit through field and forest; bringing down from the mountains of the North a clan life, and race of fiery warriors, with their pride, their superstitions, their bloody quarrels, their magnanimity of mutual devotion and fatal loyalty, such as we should otherwise never have known; and, besides this, peopling mountain and glen, palace and cottage, garrison and town, with a host of characters which live and move before us, as if they were not the offspring of a mortal brain, but of the earth and the heavens themselves? I say, where would these steamboats and railroads now have been leading their passengers? Why, dully enough, to the market—to purchase cottons and printed calicoes in Glasgow, Paisley, and Manchester; ashes and indigo in Liverpool; teas, and a thousand other things, in London. They would be going, not the packhorse, but the railroad round of dull and wearisome commerce, wearing out its own soul by its over-drudgery; and, even of these, there would not have been a tithe of the present outgoers. But now, the soul which has been crushed under the weight of daily duty, has felt a spark of this great spirit, has felt an indefinable impulse, which is, in fact, the nascent love of nature and of out-of-door liberty; and, in the summer months, the weavers and spinners, the thumpers and bumpers, the grinders and shearers, the slaves of the desk, the warehouse, the bank, and the shop, leap up, and issue forth—as bear witness Sir George Head—by undreds, and by thousands, in all directions, to a pleasure that their fathers, poor old fellows!

never dreamed of on the most auspicious night of their lives. O boats, whether on canal or river, driven by steam or drawn by horse! O ships, on loch, or frith, or ocean, propelled by engines of three hundred horse power! cabs and cars, omnibuses and stages, inns and lodging-houses, wayside rests and fishing taverns, Tom and Jerries, Tillysues or Kidley-Winks! bear ye witness to the tribes set on fire by this Walter Scott, these poets, and even these naturalists—Bewick, Walton, Gilbert White, and that class of quiet agitators—tribes who have gone forth, to scramble up hills, and tumble down them, to sport parasols amongst frightened sheep, and scream on precipices, that they may fall into the arms of careful lovers; to eat beef-steaks, and drink ginger-beer and soda-water, with open windows, and under trees, in boats or in booths—bear witness all of you in all quarters of these islands! Let us hear no more about the poets not being practical men: they are the men practical and promotive of public wealth and activity; they are your true political economists, your diffusers of the circulating medium; in fact, your ship-builders, house-builders, smiths, black, white, or copper; your tailors and clothiers, your very hosts, cads, waiters, and grooms—for, to all these, they give not merely employment, but life and being itself.

And yet, it is a curious fact that the poets and the mechanists struck out into a new and bolder line together; that this new growth and outburst of intellect and ideality, this revival in the world of mind, indicated its presence at once in the imaginative and the constructive crania. It is curious that steam, mechanism, and poetry, should have been brought simultaneously to bear in so extraordinary a degree on the public spirit and character. The love of poetry and nature, of picturesque scenery and summer-wandering, no sooner were generated by the means I have here stated, than, lo! steamers appeared at the quays, and railroads projected their iron lines over hill and dale. Impulse was given at the same moment to the public heart, and facility to yield to it. Had the one appeared without the other, there must have been felt a painful restraint, an uncomprehended but urgent want. Had the poetic spirit come alone, it would have lacked wings to fly to the mountains and the ocean shores. Had the mechanic impetus arisen without this, it would have wanted employment for its full energies. Their advent was coincident; and their present effect is amazing, and their future one, a matter of wild speculation and wonder.

But there is yet another feature of this subject that is worthy of notice; and that is, how cunningly our great masters have gone to work. Call them dreaming and improvident! It is the most absurd abuse of language ever committed. There is no class of men more notorious for saving and care-taking than that of your great geniuses. Accordingly, as we go through the country, propelled in the human tide by the double power of poetry and steam, what is one of the first facts that seizes on your attention? Why, the ingenuity and tact with which these thoughtless poets and air-dreaming romancers have laid hold not only of the most glorious subjects, but the most glorious scenes. They know that, next to a popular theme, is the popular allocation of it—and what beautiful spot is there now, from Land's End to John O'Groat's—what spot known for its loveliness, or sacred for its history, or made mysteriously interesting by traditions—on which they have not seized? The monks were said, of old, to have pounced upon all the paradisiacal valleys and rich nooks of the country; but the poets have pounced upon them now. The ancients were accused of having robbed us of all our fine thoughts and spirit-stirring topics; but the modern poets have taken away our very mountains and cattle-fields, our fairy haunts and our waters, lying under the beautifying lights and shades of love, and heroism, and sorrow. They have preoccupied them before our very eyes. There is nothing which has impressed me so much with the prescience and deep sagacity of our great modern geniuses as the care with which they have perched themselves on every pleasant nook and knoll all over the land. It reminds me, ludicrous as the illustration is, of the nursery-tale of the young bears that came into their house; and one said, "Who has taken my fork?" and another, "Who has eaten of my bread?" and a third, "Who has sat in my chair?" and another, "Who is this sleeping in my bed?" Every spot of interest has this Scott, this Wordsworth, or this Campbell appropriated—and who does not admire their policy? The grandeur and intellectuality of a subject may, of themselves, give it a great charm; but it is better to have two strings to your bow—a subject noble and beautiful in itself linked to noble and beautiful scenery; not confined to the library or the fireside book, but thrown, as it were, in the way of the public, cast before the summer wanderers, where natural beauty and traditional romance exert a double influence. What a fine effect it has, both for poet and reader, when, as you stop to admire some lovely landscape, some sublimity of mountain or sea-shore, you hear it said—"This is the scenery of Marmion—this is the Castle of Ellangowan—this is the spot where Helen McGregor gave her celebrated breakfast—here fought Bailey Nicol Jarvie with his red-hot ploughshare—this is Lammermuir—or this is Atornish Hall." What a charm and a glory suddenly invest the place! How deep sinks the strain of the bard or the romancer into your soul! The adroitness with which great names have thus been written—not on perishable paper, but on every rock and mountain of the land—is admirable. To compare great things with small—it is like the handwriting on the wall, of Warren, or of Meehi; it is seen everywhere, and who shall possibly erase it from his mind? But, admirable as the plan is, who shall now adopt it? The day and the opportunity are past. Did the same ability exist to inscribe places at once to the glory of the poet and their own name, it is too late; the field is preoccupied. The clan regions and the Borders of Scotland—ground rife with matter—are all Scott's, by right of discovery, and by the mighty hand of the conqueror. If you go to the isles—Shetland, Hebridean, or Orcadian—he has been there too; and Campbell has there placed his name, in Runic cipher, with that of Reullura and the "dark-attired Culdee." Wordsworth is

"Sole king of rocky Cumberland."

Scott, again, extends his influence over Durham, Derbyshire, and Warwickshire; and southward tradition becomes more faint—all, at least, which Shakespeare has not appropriated, and what he left to his proper heirs. We cannot, indeed, say what genius may yet draw from material which still lies unseen or unregarded—for its power is boundless; but, in the meantime, let us wander over a few spots of consecrated ground, and admire what has been done by "the giants that have been in the land."

SCENERY OF "THE WHITE DOE OF RYLSTON."

We visited this scenery much in the order in which it is introduced to our notice in Wordsworth's poem. First, the White Doe is seen at Bolton Priory; then you have a glimpse of the history of the Shepherd Lord, and his residence, Barden Tower; lastly, the poet takes you to Rylston, and enters, with earnest heart, into the fate of the Nortons. We took the same course. We walked from Skipton Castle to Bolton Priory, on the morning of the 6th of July. The country had nothing very remarkable in it, if we except the wild aspect of Rumbold's Moor—a corruption of Romilley's Moor—on our left as we went; nothing which bore any relation to that exquisite scenery which we looked for in the neighbourhood of Bolton. As we drew near, indeed, we could not help saying repeatedly—"We fear we shall be disappointed in this place." Presently, however, a valley filled with dense wood appeared below us, stretching away northwards. We came to a few cottages in their gardens, to a high stone wall; and, passing through a small arched gateway, the valley and ruins of Bolton Priory lay before us; one of the most delicious and paradisiacal scenes which the heart of England holds. The effect upon our spirits was one of profound and soothing delight. We sat down on a rustic bench, placed just within the gateway, and contemplated it in silent enjoyment. We were on a green elevation somewhat above the valley, and the scene lay before us in all its loveliness; a vale in which all the charms of peaceful variety which poetry delights to combine in some fairy paradise, were concentrated. It was a splendid morning; and the freshness of the greensward, of the trees, the glittering dews, the cheerful voices of birds, the profusion of blossoms around on bush and bank, made the scene perfect. There were the gables and pinnacles of the Priory, appearing amongst a wilderness of trees in the open bosom of the valley; there was the Wharf, sounding on his way, with a most melancholy music, under the cliffs opposite; there was the silver line of a waterfall, thrown from a cliff of considerable and nearly perpendicular height, a cliff of rich purple hue, facing the eastern end of the Priory ; there were the parsonage, and other houses shrouded in their trees ; beyond, lay the deep and densely-wooded vale ; on the northern slope above it, the ancient oaks of the park ; and, still farther, the fells and rocky distances of Barden and Simon-Seat. Whittaker, in his " History of Craven," says well, that, for picturesque effect, the site of this Bolton Priory has no equal amongst the northern houses, and perhaps in England.

As we descended and walked towards the Priory, the parsonage presented a very inviting aspect. Its garden, crimson with roses ; its ivied porch, in a sort of tower, with an ancient escutcheon emblazoned on it—I believe of the Clifford arms ; its pleasant shrubberies, and its little garden gateway up a few steps, overhung, on each hand, with drooping masses of yellow fumatory, made it one of the most perfect little rural nests we ever set eyes upon. As soon as we passed this, the Priory broke upon us with a fine effect. We need not attempt to describe it ; it is a fit subject for the pencil only ; and the pencils of many of our artists, particularly that of Turner, have made it familiar to the public eye. The magnificent ash-trees, however, which grew about, deserve especial mention. One, in particular, secured with iron hoops and stays from the effects of storms on its mighty limbs, shewed that their beauty was felt and appreciated ; and indeed, the ashes about this place generally, have an extraordinary stateliness and grandeur of growth.

The nave of the Priory church is now used for a parochial chapel.

" In the shattered fabric's heart
Remaineth one protected part—
A rural chapel, neatly drest,
In covert like a little nest ;
And thither young and old repair
On Sabbath day, for praise and prayer."

Whits Doe, p. 8.

But the most singular feature of this beautiful structure, is a tower, or western entrance, built like a screen before the old western entrance. This was begun by Prior Moore, the last prior, before the dissolution, but never finished. It possesses a fine receding arch, and is embellished with shields, statues, and a window of exquisite tracery. Amongst others on this part of the work, is the statue of a pilgrim, with a staff in one hand, and a broad, flat, round hat in the other. The buttresses are surmounted with figures of hounds. Within this, partly darkened and partly hidden by it, appears the old front, with its lancet windows and slender columns—a work equally exquisite of its kind. The sculpture and carvings of the Priory altogether, its running trefoils and fleur-de-lis, have preserved their sharpness and distinctness most remarkably.

Opposite to this western entrance, stands the Duke of Devonshire's house—a small castellated building—a mere nut-shell to his other houses—Chatworth, Hardwicke, Chiswick, or Devonshire House. In fact, it is formed out of the original gateway of the Priory—the principal room being the gateway itself, with walls run across it. It serves, however, for a sporting-box, when his Grace comes hither in autumn to the moors, and contains a marvellous number of beds for its compass. The walls of the principal apartment are adorned with pieces from classical subjects ; with horns of stags and antelopes, and with some paintings, the most interesting of which are, one of the boy of Egremont about to leap the Strid, with his dog in a leash, and a puppy at the dog's heels—a circumstance that I do not recollect as forming part of the tradition. A portrait of Sir Philip Sidney, and a curious picture of the seven sons of one of the Earls of Burlington. There is one of the celebrated Earl and Countess of Derby ; some family portraits of the Cliffords and Burlingtons ; and several of the Charleses and Jameses, and their Queens, of little value.

But our attractions lay out of doors. We hastened down to the Wharf, and crossed it, by a row of stepping-stones, into the woods on the opposite side. These stones are solid square blocks, of considerable size, and require some courage in the passer ; for, though the river is not deep here, it is very rapid, clear, and broad, and rushes on with an awful sound, especially after heavy rains, as had been the case then ; so that the water flowed, in some places, over the stones. Immediately after us, came across two young ladies, whom we found to be the clergyman's niece, Miss Kitty Crofts, and her young friend, Julia Somebody. They had their rural dinner in a basket, and were going to spend the day in the woods. They accompanied us about a mile up through the woods, and very kindly pointed out the striking points of the scenery, and gave us directions for our course to Barden Tower, which every now and then shewed itself up the valley.

Nothing can exceed the beauty and delightfulness of these woods, which run on each side of the sounding Wharf ; and the public owes much to the worthy clergyman, Mr Carr, for having rendered the forest banks of the Wharf accessible, opening up the turns and reaches of the river, and the views of the Priory downwards, and of Barden Tower upwards, with the most admirable taste and effect. All through the woods, for three miles on each side, run winding walks ; and wherever seats are placed, there you may be sure is some new view of river, ruins, forest, or fell. The woods themselves would form a delicious visit for a pleasant party, on a summer's day ; they present such perfect sylvan seclusion ; such dark and shadowy nooks ; such mossy slopes, where spring throws out by thousands her primroses, and summer her delicately-veined flowers and green leaflets of the oxalis ; such wildernesses of heather and bilberry, of pines and polypodies ; such dim chaos of craggy masses or uplifted grey cliffs, hung with ivy, and overshadowed with boughs. But then, the river below !—such a dark brooding stream at one place ; such a wild hurrying torrent at another, sending up its softened roar all through the woods. I never saw a stream that so vividly brought before me the descriptions of rivers flowing through American forests, with their foamy rapids, and their dark woodland steeps, and wild boughs overhanging the stream.

About a mile from the Priory we came to the celebrated STRID.

"The pair have reached that fearful chasm—
How tempting to bestride!
For lordly Wharf is there pent in,
With rocks on either side.

"This striding-place is called THE STRID—
A name it took of yore;
A thousand years hath it borne that name,
And shall a thousand more.

"And hither is young Romilly come;
And what may now forbid
That he, perhaps for the hundredth time,
Shall bound across THE STRID?

"He sprung in glee, for what car'd he
That the river was strong and the rocks were steep?
But the greyhound in the leash lung back,
And checked him in his leap.

"The boy is in the arms of Wharf,
And strangled by a merciless force;
For never more was young Romilly seen,
Till he rose a lifeless corse."

The Force of Prayer. Wordsworth's Poems.

The Strid is not so much a waterfall as a narrow passage, torn by the river through its bed of solid rock, through which it rushes with tremendous fury and a stunning din. Many people who go expecting to see a sheer cascade, are at first disappointed; but no one can stand long by it without feeling a sense of its power and savage grandeur grow upon him. It is indeed a place "most tempting to bestride;" and, notwithstanding the repeated fatalities which have occurred there since that of the boy of Egremont—one of a young lady, in the very presence of her lover, but a few years ago—I felt an intense desire to take the leap, and should have done so, had it not been for the earnest dissuasion of my companion. I am, however, very sensible, that, narrow as the opening appears, its real width is much greater than its apparent one; and very dangerous, both on that account, and from the slipperiness of the rocks. One slip of the foot, and the leap is into eternity.

As we stood here, we were delighted to see the various parties that came up, or that were to be seen glancing here and there in the woods—gay, young spirits, full of the enjoyment of fresh life, of social affection, and natural beauty; another proof of the manner in which all places of natural or historical interest are now visited—the happy consequence of the spirit of our modern literature; and we were, perhaps, most pleased with the sight of a party of Friends, in their dove-coloured robes and drab bonnets. If you cannot see them at places of artificial amusement, there are no people whom you now more frequently meet at places of natural amusement—a satisfactory evidence that the spirit of modern literature has extended itself to them too; that the Wiffens, the Bartons, the Stickneys, the Hewitts, and other writers of the society, are not exceptions, but merely indications of that love of poetry, polite literature, and the fine arts, which a puritanic zeal in some of its founders unhappily banished from it for a time.

We now advanced to Barden Tower, the walk thither being still up the valley, along the banks of the Wharf, and through the most delightful scenery. The splendour of the day, and the beauty of the place, filled us with delight and admiration. We crossed a fine bridge to Barden, and soon stood before the ruined tower of the Cliffords.

It is a singular circumstance, out of what peaceful, profound, old-fashioned nooks, have gone forth some of the stormiest, sternest, and most ambitious characters in history. Whittaker says—"The shattered remains of Barden Tower stand shrouded in ancient woods, and backed by the purple distances of the highest fells. An antiquarian eye rests with pleasure on a scene of thatched houses and barns, which, in the last two centuries, have undergone as little change as the simple and pastoral manners of the inhabitants." The place, in fact, seems to belong to a past age of English history; to make no part of bustling, swarming, steamengine, and railroad England; but of England in the days of solemn forests, far-off towns, and the most peaceful and rustic existence. The tower stands a mere shell; but the cottages about it are those which stood there in the days of its glory, and are peopled with a race as primitive and quiet as they were then. We inquired for a public-house to get a lunch; there was no such thing; but we procured bread and butter, and milk, at one of the cottages; and, as we sat looking out of its door, the profound tranquillity of the scene was most impressive. It was a sultry and basking noon; around were lofty, ancient woods; on the opposite slope, a few cottages half-buried in old orchards, and gardens, with their rows of bee-hives; and an old man at work in one of them, as slowly and gravely as an object in a dream, or a hermit in his unpartaken seclusion. Yet, from this place, and such as this, issued

"The stout Lord Cliffords that did fight in France"—ay, and in Scotland and England too—conspicuous in all the wars, from the time of the Conqueror to that of Cromwell; the "Old Clifford," and the "Bloody Clifford," who slew the young Duke of Rutland, and afterwards the Duke of York, his father—of Shakspeare's "Henry VI." Thence, too, went out the great seafaring Lord Clifford, George, third Earl of Cumberland, of Elizabeth's time, who made eleven expeditions, chiefly against the Spaniards and Dutch, and chiefly, too, at his own expense, to the West Indies, Spanish America, and Sierra Leone. But the most remarkable characters connected with this place are—the Shepherd Lord Clifford; the heroic Countess of Derby, daughter of Henry, second Earl of Cumberland, and grand-daughter of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, and the Dowager Queen of France, sister of Henry V., whose romantic history is known to all readers.

of English history ; and especially Anne Clifford, Dowager Countess of Pembroke and Montgomery, of famous memory : for the others made only occasional visits hither, from their more frequent residence of Skipton Castle, to enjoy field-sports at their lodge here ; but Anne Clifford has placed her memorial on the very front of the house, as its restorer ; and the Shepherd Lord constituted it his principal abode.

Anne Clifford has justly been termed one of the most extraordinary women which this country has produced. She was a woman of a high spirit, a determined will, of many good and magnificent qualities, and of a very commensurate consciousness of them. She did great works, and took good care to commemorate them. Two such builders of houses and of families, perhaps no nobleman of the present day can reckon amongst his female ancestry, as the Duke of Devonshire—Anne Clifford, and Bess of Hardwicke. The first thing which strikes your attention in front of Barden Tower, is this singular inscription :—

THIS BARDEN TOWER WAS REPAIRED

GOD'S NAME BE PRAISED !

The text referred to is—"Thou shalt build up the foundations of many generations, and thou shalt be called the repairer of the breach, and the restorer of paths to dwell in."

When she came to her ancestral estates, she found six castles in ruins, and the church of Skipton in a similar condition, from the ravages of the Civil War. She restored them all ; and upon all set this emblazonment of the fact. One of the first things which she built was a work of filial piety—a pillar in the highway, at the place where she and her unhappy mother last parted, and took their final farewell. She erected monuments to her tutor, Daniell, the poetic historian, and to Spenser—the latter in Westminster Abbey. She wrote her own life—of which the title-page is indeed a title-page, being a whole page of the most vainglorious enumeration of the titles and honours derived from her ancestors. Spite of her vainglory, she was, nevertheless, a fine old creature. She had been an independent courtier in the court of Queen Elizabeth, possessing a spirit as lofty and daring as old Bess herself. She personally resisted a most iniquitous award of her family property by King James, and suffered grievously on that account. She rebuilt her dismantled castles, in defiance of Cromwell ; and repelled with disdain the assumption of the minister of Charles II. "She patronised," says her historian, "poets of her youth, and the distressed loyalists of her maturer age ; she enabled her aged servants to end their days in ease and independence ; and, above all, she educated and portioned the illegitimate children of her first husband, the Earl of Dorset. Removing from castle to castle, she diffused plenty and happiness around her, by consuming on the spot the produce of her vast domains, in hospitality and charity. Equally remote from the undistinguishing profusion of ancient times and the parsimonious elegance of modern habits, her house was a school for the young and a retreat for the aged ; an asylum for the persecuted ; a college for the learned ; and a pattern for all." To this it should be added, that, during that age when such firmness was most meritorious, she withstood all the arts, persuasions, and all but actual compulsion of her two husbands, to oblige her to change the course and injure the property of her descendants ; and, therefore, it must be confessed that she was a brave woman, and one whose like does not often appear. It is, however, her celebrated letter to Sir Joseph Williamson, the secretary of Charles II., who had written to name a candidate for her borough of Appleby, that has given her name a Spartan immortality :—

"I have been bullied by an usurper ; I have been neglected by a Court ; but I will not be dictated to by a subject—your man shan't stand.

"ANNE, DORSET, PEMBROKE, AND MONTGOMERY."

The history of the Shepherd Lord is one of the most singular in the Peerage. When his father, Lord John Clifford—the bloody or black-faced Clifford—fell at the battle of Towton, which overthrew the house of Lancaster, and placed Edward IV. on the throne, his mother was obliged to fly with him, for safety, into the wildest recesses of Yorkshire and Cumberland. She afterwards married Sir Launcelot Threlkeld, of the latter county, who assisted to keep him concealed from the knowledge of the York family—to whom the Clifford blood was, for notorious reasons, most especially odious ; but, to effect this, he was obliged to be brought up as a shepherd, and so lived for twenty-four years. On the ascension of Henry VII. to the throne, the attainer against his father was reversed, and he succeeded to his ancestral honours and estates. At this period, it appears that he was as uneducated as his fellow-shepherds ; but he was a man of strong natural understanding, and had, it would seem, learned much true wisdom in his lowly habit, up amongst the hills.

"Among the shepherd-grooms no mate
Had he—a child of strength and state !
Yet lacked not friends for solemn glee,
And a cheerful company,
That learned of him submissive ways,
And comforted his private days.
To his side the fallow-deer
Came and rested without fear ;
And both the undying fish that swim
Through Bowscale Tarn did wait on him—
The pair were servants of his eye,
In their immortality ;

They moved about in open sight,
 To and fro, for his delight.
 He knew the rocks which angels haunt
 On the mountains visitant;
 He hath kenned them taking wing;
 And the caves where fairies sing
 He hath entered; and been told,
 By voices, how men lived of old.
 Among the heavens his eye can see
 Face of thing that is to be;
 And, if men report him right,
 He could whisper words of might."

WORDSWORTH.

These verses allude to the studies for which he became remarkable; for he resorted to this Barden Tower, and put himself under the tuition of some of the monks of Bolton. With these he appears to have contracted a strong friendship, and to have passed a life of what must have been a very delightful prosecution of the popular studies of the time. They applied themselves to astronomy; and, it seems equally certain, to astrology. In the archives of the Cliffords have been found manuscripts of this period, and supposed to belong to the Shepherd, which make it more than probable that alchemy was another of the fascinating pursuits of Lord Henry and his monkish companions. Some of these verses conclude with the usual declaration, that the writer could not disclose the grand secret.

"Hie wer accursyde that soo wolde done.
 How schold yow have servants then,
 To tyll your lande, and dryffe your plughe?
 Yff ev'ry mane to ryches came,
 Then none for oth'r owght wolde dowghe."

There is matter for a fine romance in the life of this Lord: the stirring nature of the times when he was born; the flight of his family; his concealment; his life on the mountains; his restoration; his secluded mode of existence, and mysterious labours; and then, his emerging as he did, after he had so spent the whole of the reign of Henry VII., and the first years of Henry VIII., at the age of nearly sixty, as a principal commander of the victorious army of Flodden; shewing, that the military genius of the Cliffords merely slumbered beneath the philosophic gown. There is something very picturesque in the description of his followers, in the old metrical history of Flodden Field.

"From Penigent to Pendle Hill,
 From Linton to Long Addingham,
 And all that Craven coasts did till—
 They with the lusty Clifford came;
 All Staincliffe hundred went with him,
 With striplings strong from Wharfedale,
 And all that Hanton hills did climb,
 With Longstroth eke and Litton Dale,
 Whose milk-fed fellows, fleshy bred,
 Well-browned, with sounding bows upbend;
 All such as Horton Fells had fed—
 On Clifford's banner did attend."

Before leaving Barden Tower, we must just notice the singular old chapel which bounds one corner of the court-yard. You enter at a door from the court, and find yourself in a dwelling-house; another door is opened, and you find yourself in the loft of a very old chapel, which remains in the state in which it was centuries ago, except for the effects of time, and where service is still performed by the clergyman of Bolton.

We now directed our course to Rylston; but, hearing that the common way was circuitous, and being curious to pass over the very track of the white doe, we determined to cross the moor, contrary to the earnest dissuasion of the villagers, who declared it was perfectly trackless, and that a stranger could not find his way over it. And, sure enough, we found it the most untracked and impracticable waste we ever traversed. The distance was six miles; not a track nor a house to be seen, except a keeper's lodge, standing in the brown heathery wilderness, about a mile from Barden, with a watch-tower annexed to it, whence he might look out far and wide for depredators on the moor-game. We had the precaution to take a young man with us as guide, and on we went, plunging up to the waste in the heather, and sinking in deep moss at every step; now in danger of being swallowed up by a bog, and now put to our contrivances by some black ravine. A weary way of it the poor doe must have had every Sunday from Rylston to Bolton Priory; and well, we thought, might the people deem it something supernatural. Our guide himself found it no very easy matter to steer his course aright, or to pursue it when he thought it was right. He directed his course by certain crags on the distant hill-tops, called the Lord's Stones; and, when we gained the highest elevation, whence we had immense prospect, we came to a track cut through the moorland for the Duke to ride along on his shooting excursions. He told us to follow that, and it would lead us to the Fell gate just above Rylston. Here, therefore, we allowed him to return; but we speedily repented the permission, for the track soon vanished, and before us lay only wild craggy moors with intervening bogs, which extended wider and wider as we went. The moor game, ever and anon, rose with loud cries and whirring wings; the few sheep ran off as we made our appearance; and we seemed only getting farther and farther into a desolate region—

"Where things that own not man's dominion dwell,
 And mortal feet had ne'er or rarely been."

Knowing, however, that there was nothing for it but pushing on to the extremity of the waste, bring us whither it would, we hurried forward in spite of weariness and bewilderment, and presently found ourselves on a savage ridge of crags, from which a wide prospect of green and champaign country burst upon us, and the village of Rylston itself lying at the foot of the steep descent below us. We hastened down as well as we could, and proceeded towards the churchyard, knowing that near it had stood Rylston Hall, the abode of the Nortons. Here we soon found that all vestiges of the old house were gone, and that a modern gentleman's house was built upon the site. The village lies on the green and cultivated plain, just that sort of country which has a most attractive aspect to a grazier, but which the poet gives but one glance at ; it has nothing picturesque in its own appearance ; a more commonplace collection of houses can scarcely be met with, though three or four of them are, no doubt, the dwellings of wealthy people. We found the tradition of the White Doe quite current still amongst the peasantry, who soon pointed out to us, on the moorland eminence whence we had descended, Norton Tower, still exactly answering the description by the historian of Craven:—"Rylstone Fell yet exhibits a monument of the old warfare between the Nortons and Cliffords. On a point of very high ground, commanding an immense prospect, and protected by two deep ravines, are the remains of a square tower, expressly said by Dodsworth to have been built by Richard Norton. The walls are of strong grout-work, about four feet thick. It seems to have been three stories high. Breaches have been industriously made in all sides, almost to the ground, to render it untenable. The place is savagely wild, and admirably adapted to the site of a watch-tower." Here, no doubt, stout old Richard Norton used to assemble his retainers, to make their inroads into Barden Moor amongst the Cliffords' deer, in which he delighted, and for which he constructed, by help of natural crag, and bog, and ravine, that famous, and, to the Cliffords, most provoking pound, of which abundant traces yet appear. Here too, as the poet has more than hinted, he used to come and make merry.

"High on a point of rugged ground,
Among the wastes of Rylstone Fell,
Above the loftiest ridge, a mound
Where foresters or shepherds dwell,
An edifice of warlike frame
Stands single, Norton Tower its name,
It fronts all quarters, and looks round
O'er path and road, and plain and dell,
Dark moor, and gleam of pool and stream,
Upon a prospect without bound.

"The summit of this bleak ascent,
Though bleak, and bare, and seldom free,
As Pendle-hill or Pennygent,
From wind, or frost, or vaporous wet,
Had often heard the sound of glee,
When there the youthful Nortons met
To practise games and archery.
How proud and happy they ! The crowd
Of lookers-on how pleased and proud !
And from the scorching noontide sun,
From showers, or when the prize was won,
They to the watch-tower did repair—
Commodious pleasure-house ! And there
Would mirth run round with generous fare ;
And the stern old Lord of Rylstone Hall,
He was the proudest of them all."

White Doe, Canto V.

If the village of Rylston has little in the aspect of the present, or remaining of the past, to draw the feet of poetic wanderers to it—if Rylston Hall itself, the hearth and home of the stout Nortons, be gone—if all its gardens, walks, waters, and topiary work, have vanished like a dream—yet there still stands that stern old tower on those dark and frowning fells, which will rear their black and storm-shattered heads till the shock which commingles earth and heaven. There they stretch along the grim edge of that region of moorland, glen and forest, river and ruin, over which have passed the consecrating influences of heroic spirits crushed by malignant destinies, of human hearts and hearths laid waste and desolate for ever ; and over which, once more, the poet has thrown a new and indestructible enchantment.

In this beautiful poem, "The White Doe of Rylston," Wordsworth has shewn how far he was capable of handling a romantic and historic subject ; and nothing is more obvious than that, if he had chosen to select such subjects, rather than undeviatingly attempting to develope his own views of the real nature and compass of the province of poetry, he might, much earlier, have stepped into that popularity which he has now attained, and avoided the long reign of ridicule and abuse under which he lived. To say nothing of Peter Bell the Wagoner, Betty Foy, and that class of subjects—a class, and so treated, that I am free to confess to be fair game for critics that love a little fun—it is quite as true as it was ten years ago, that neither the simple pathos of his "Lyrical Ballads," nor the grave dignity and philosophy of his "Excursion," ever could or ever can be truly appreciated by the common run of readers. They can have no charms for those who delight in the literary dram-drinking of fashionable novels. You might just as well have expected a Persian to love Spartan broth ; just as well expect a London epicure, with his gullet on fire with curry and cayenne, to relish the girdle-cake and milk of the shepherd's hut. In this poem he has enlisted more of those stirring elements of historical action and national change, with all their sequences of family disruptions and disastrous overthrows, which, for the habitual story-monger, may become a tolerable substitute for his ordinary stimulus of tragic recital and piquant personalities ; and, for the spirit of genuine passion and healthful sensibilities, may combine with gentler causes and their emotions into a whole of living and exalting influences. He has beautifully woven into his scheme every history or tradition floating about the scene of action, with which our nature sympathises. The fate of the Boy of Egremont, the fortunes of the Shepherd Lord, blend like soft and sunset hues into the great picture of "THE RISING IN THE NORTH," of which the outline is gloriously sketched in the ancient ballad of that name ; the imposing, but ill-organized and ill-maintained attempt to put down in England the growing power of Protestantism, and restore the old religion. Here is material enough to quicken the pulse of every true Briton ; but we soon find the poet, amid the splendour of historic matter, fixing his eye upon a few characters, towards whom he irresistibly draws our hearts after him ; resting finally on that high-spirited old gentleman, Maister Richard Norton, and his family, his nine sons, and single daughter. In working out the characters and fate of these, he finds ample employment for that philosophic taste, and that delight in tracing the movements of our inner nature ; the power of our affections ; the contention between our principles and our interests ; the development of that highest pitch of mortal grandeur, the stern subjection of every hope, feeling, and ambition, to the sole and sovereign sense of duty shed into the heart of man by the law of Christianity. We, accordingly, behold with admiration the brave Richard Norton, who had spent his days amid his sons and vassals in the festivities of the hall, the excitements of the chase, and of Border war, now coming forward in his silver hairs to cast all the fortunes of his house on a single and hazardous die. We behold, with equal admiration, the unhesitating devotion of his eight sons, and their manly beauty, as they surround him, as he takes in his hand the banner wrought by the fair fingers of his only daughter—that banner which displayed

“The Cross,
And the five wounds our Lord did bear.”
Old Ballad.

The group, at this moment, would form a noble picture.

“They mustered their host at Wetherby—
Full sixteen thousand, fair to see,
The choicest warriors of the North !
But none, for beauty and for worth,
Like those eight sons, embosoming
Determined thoughts ; who, in a ring,
Each with a lance erect and tall,
A falchion, and a buckler small,
Stood by their sire on Clifford Moor,
To guard the standard which he bore.
With feet that firmly pressed the ground
They stood, and girt their father round ;
Such was his choice—no steed will he Henceforth bestride ;—triumphantly
He stood upon the grassy sod,
Trusting himself to the earth, and God.
There, sight to embolden and inspire !
Proud was the field of Sons and Sire ;
Of him the most ; and, sooth to say,
No shape of man in all the array
So graced the sunshine of that day.
The monumental pomp of age
Was with this goodly personage ;
A stature undepressed in size,
Umbent, which rather seemed to vie,
In open victory o’er the weight
Of seventy years, to higher height ;
Magnific limbs of withered state ;
A face to fear and venerate ;
Eyes dark and strong ; and on his head,
Bright locks of silver hair, thick spread ;
With a brown morion, half concealed,
Light as a hunter’s of the field.
And thus, with girdle round his waist,
Whereon the banner staff might rest
At need, he stood, advancing high
The glittering, floating pageantry.”

Nothing, we think, for a moment, can be more beautiful and admirable ; but the poet soon shews us a character and a devotion far higher, in Francis Norton, the eldest son, who singly opposes, and attempts to dissuade his father and brothers from this enterprise ; and is repulsed, as a coward and a renegade, by the indignant father and the silently contemptuous sons. The wise spirit and unflinching fortitude of this English Abdiel, impress us with a respect and veneration that are not easy to be heightened ; and yet they are heightened, by finding Francis, instead of satisfying himself with having striven to dissuade, and that vainly, and quietly sitting down to wait the result, or feeling resentful of the rude repulse and wrongful imputations received from them, now shewing that the devotion and nobility of his nature are of a far loftier stamp. He follows them unarmed, and, unmindful of their taunts or their suspicions, watches with patient endurance for that moment of reversed fortune which he is sure will come, and when he hopes to render assistance that may be accepted and available. That moment of reverse soon arrives ; but the indignant father only heaps fresh and more trying scorn on his faithful son ; and it is only when the vengeance of the offended law dooms the father and the sons in arms to perish in their blood, that the sleepless and affectionate attentions of Francis to soothe, and serve, and comfort them, breaks down the barrier of thick prejudice from the old man’s heart, and he sees and acknowledges the wisdom and magnanimity of his devoted son. Here one scarcely knows whether most to admire the frank confession of the old warrior, and the confidence he immediately places in Francis, or the filial piety with which, to gratify the mind of his dying father, Francis undertakes a task, hopeless and fatal to himself. The following out of these great human impulses ; the portraiture of this sublime character of Francis Norton, than which none in history or fiction is greater ; and, besides this, the beautiful sketch of his sister, equally devoted, equally strong in principle, though not so comprehensive and commanding in intellect as her brother ; she these, altogether, were elements of heart and spirit, of character and action, in which the soul of the philosophical poet, who has sought to link fast to our theory of metaphysics, the system of the affections, was sure to revel ; although on one occasion we saw him, strangely enough, as the author of “Peter Bell,” and of this poem, lay down a volume of a contemporary, full of the same elements, and actually of a most kindred nature, saying that he could not read of “sin and sorrow, finding enough of them in the world about him.” Notwithstanding this paradoxical assertion, he has here, in his own case, cast over the sorrows of the Nortons a profound sympathy, and a golden glory over the scenery of the White Doe of Rylston ; over Bolton Priory ; the vale of Wharf ; over Barden Tower, and Norton Tower, on the grim Rylston fells—which, as it drew us thither, shall draw thither also, from generation to generation, other pilgrims as devoted to the charms of nature, of poetry, of history and tradition, as ourselves.

A BRIEF APPRAISAL OF THE GREEK LITERATURE, IN ITS FOREMOST PRETENSIONS.

BY THOMAS DE QUINCEY.

NO. II.—THE GREEK ORATORS.

Now, let us come to the orators. Isocrates, the eldest of those who have survived, is a mere scholastic rhetorician: for he was a timid man, and did not dare to confront the terrors of a stormy political audience; and hence, though he lived about an entire century, he never once addressed the Athenian citizens. It is true, that, although no bona fide orator—for he never spoke in any usual acceptation of that word, and, as a consequence, never had an opportunity of replying, which only can bring forward a man's talents as a debater—still he employed his pen upon real and upon existing questions of public policy; and did not, as so many generations of chamber rhetoricians continued to do in Greece, confine his powers to imaginary cases of political difficulty, or (what were tantamount to imaginary) cases fetched up from the long-past era of King Priam, or the still earlier era of the Seven Chiefs warring against the Seven-gated Thebes of Bœotia, or the half-fabulous era of the Argonauts. Isocrates was a man of sense—a patriot in a temperate way—and with something of a feeling for Greece generally, not merely a champion of Athens. His heart was given to politics: and, in an age when heavy clouds were gathering over the independence and the civil grandeur of his country, he had a disinterested anxiety for drawing off the lightning of the approaching storms by pacific counsels. Compared, therefore, with the common mercenary orators of the Athenian forum—who made a regular trade of promoting mischief, by inflaming the pride, jealousy, vengeance, or the martial instincts of a “fierce democracy,” and, generally speaking, with no views, high or low, sound or unsound, that looked beyond the momentary profit to themselves from thus pandering to the thoughtless nationality of a most sensitive people—Isocrates is entitled to our respect. His writings have also a separate value, as memorials of political transactions from which the historian has gathered many useful hints; and, perhaps, to a diligent search, they might yield more. But, considered as an orator—if that title can be, with any propriety, allowed to one who declaimed only in his closet—one who, in relation to public affairs, was what, in England, when speaking of practical jurisprudence, we call a Chamber Counsel—Isocrates is languid, and with little of anything characteristic in his manner to justify a separate consideration. It is remarkable that he, beyond all other rhetoricians of that era, cultivated the rhythmus of his periods. And to this object he sacrificed not only an enormity of time, but, I have no doubt, in many cases, the freedom and natural movement of the thoughts. My reason, however, for noticing this peculiarity in Isocrates, is by way of fixing the attention upon the superiority, even artificial ornaments, of downright practical business and the realities of political strife, over the torpid atmosphere of a study or a school. Cicero, long after, had the same passion for numerositas, and the full, pompous rotundity of cadence. But in Cicero, all habits and all faculties were nursed by the daily practice of life and its impassioned realities, in the forum or in the senate. What is the consequence? Why this—that, whereas in the most laboured performance of Isocrates, (which cost him, I think, one whole decennium, or period of ten years,) few modern ears are sensible of any striking art, or any great result of harmony; in Cicero, on the other hand, the fine, sonorous modulations of his periodic style, are delightful to the dullest ear of any European. Such are the advantages from real campaigns, from the unsimulated strife of actual stormy life, over the torpid dreams of what the Romans called an *umbratic experience.

Isocrates I have noticed as the oldest of the surviving Greek orators: Demosthenes, of course, claims a notice more emphatically, as, by universal consent of Athens, and afterwards of Rhodes, of Rome, and other impartial judges, the greatest, or, at least, the most comprehensively great. For, by the way, it must not be forgotten—though modern critics do forget this rather important fact in weighing the reputation of Demosthenes—he was not esteemed, in his own day, as the greatest in that particular quality of energy and demoniac power (δυστονη) which is generally assumed to have been his leading characteristic and his forte; not only by comparison with his own compatriots, but even with Cicero and the greatest men of the Roman bar. It was not of Demosthenes that the Athenians were accustomed to say, “he thunders and lightens,” but of Pericles, an elder orator; and even amongst the written oratory of Greece, which still survives, (for as to the speeches ascribed to Pericles by Thucydides, I take it for granted that, as usual, these were mere forgeries of the historian,) there is a portion which perhaps exceeds Demosthenes in the naked quality of vehemence. But this, I admit, will not impeach his supremacy; for it is probable, that wherever an orator is characterised exclusively by turbulent power, or at least remembered chiefly for that quality, all the other numerous graces of eloquence were wanting to that man, or existed only in a degree which made no equipoise to his insulated gift of Jovian terror. The Gracchi, amongst the Roman orators, were probably more properly "sons of thunder" than Crassus or Cicero, or even than Cæsar himself, whose oratory, by the way, was, in this respect, like his own character and infinite accomplishments; so that even by Cicero it is rarely cited without the epithet of splendid, magnificent, &c. We must suppose, therefore, that neither Cicero nor Demosthenes was held to be at the head of their respective fields in Rome and Athens, in right of any absolute pre-eminence in the one leading power of an orator—viz., native and fervent vigour—but in right of a large comprehensive harmony of gifts, leaving possibly to some other orators, elder or rival to themselves, a superiority in each of an orator's talents taken apart, but claiming the supremacy, nevertheless, upon the whole, by the systematic union of many qualities tending to one result: pleasing the taste by the harmonious coup d'œil from the total assemblage, and also adapting itself to a far larger variety of situations; for, after all, the mere son of thunder is disarmed, and apt to become ridiculous, if you strip him of a passionate cause, of a theme saturated with human strife, and of an excitable or tempestuous audience.

Such an audience, however, it will be said that Demosthenes had, and sometimes (but not very often in those orations which survive) such a theme. As to his audience, certainly it was all that could be wished in point of violence and combustible passion; but also it was something more. A mighty advantage it is, doubtless, to an orator, when he sees and hears his own kindling passions instantaneously reflected in the blazing eyes and fiery shouts (the fremitus) of his audience—when he sees a whole people, personally or by deputation, swayed backwards and forwards, like a field of corn in a breeze, by the movements of his own appeals. But, unfortunately, in the Athenian audience, the ignorance, the headstrong violence of prejudice, the arrogance, and, above all, the levity of the national mind—presented, to an orator the most favourite, a scene like that of an ocean always rocking with storms; like a wasp always angry; like a lunatic, always coming out of a passion or preparing to go into one. Well might Demosthenes prepare himself by sea-shore practice; in which I conceive that his purpose must have been, not so much (according to the common notion) to overerow the noise of the forum, as to stand fire (if I may so express it) against the uproarious demonstrations of mob fury.

This quality of an Athenian audience must very seriously have interfered with the intellectual display of an orator. Not a word could he venture to say in the way of censure towards the public will—not even hypothetically to insinuate a fault; not a syllable could he utter even in the way of dissent from the favourite speculations of the moment. If he did, instantly a roar of menaces recalled him to a sense even of personal danger. And, again, the mere vivacity of his audience, requiring perpetual amusement and variety, compelled a man, as great even as Demosthenes, to curtail his arguments, and rarely, indeed, to pursue a theme with the requisite fullness of development or illustration; a point in which the superior dignity and the far less fluctuating mobility of the Roman mind gave an immense advantage to Cicero.

Demosthenes, in spite of all the weaknesses which have been arrayed against his memory by the hatred of his contemporaries, or by the anti-republican feelings of such men as Mitford, was a great man and an honest man. He rose above his countrymen. He despised, in some measure, his audience; and, at length, in the palmy days of his influence, he would insist on being heard; he would insist on telling the truth, however unacceptable; he would not, like the great rout of venal haranguers, lay any flattering unction to the capital distempers of the public mind; he would point out their errors, and warn them of their perils. But this upright character of the man, victorious over his constitutional timidity, does but the more brightly illustrate the local law and the tyranny of the public feeling. How often do we find him, when on the brink of uttering "odious truth," obliged to pause, and to propitiate his audience with deprecatory phrases, entreating them to give him time for utterance, not to yell him down before they had heard his sentence to the end. Μη δορυκαίρετε—"Gentlemen of Athens! for the love of God, do not make an uproar at what I am going to say! Gentlemen of Athens! humbly I beseech you to let me finish my sentence!" Such are his continual appeals to the better feelings of his audience. Now, it is very evident that, in such circumstances, no man could do justice to any subject. At least, when speaking not before a tribunal of justice, but before the people in council assembled—that is, in effect, on his greatest stage of all—Demosthenes (however bold at times, and restive in a matter which he held to be paramount) was required to bend, and did bend, to the local genius of democracy, reinforced by a most mercurial temperament. The very air of Attica, combined with great political power, kept its natives in a state of habitual intoxication; and even wise men would have had some difficulty in mastering, as it affected themselves, the permanent bias towards caprice and insolence.

Is this state of things at all taken into account in our modern critiques upon Demosthenes? The upshot of what I can find in most modern lecturers upon rhetoric and style, French or English, when speaking of Demosthenes, is this notable simile, by way of representing the final effect of his eloquence—"that, like a mountain torrent, swollen by melting snow, or by rain, it carries all things before it." Prodigious original! and exceedingly discriminative! As if such an illustration would not equally represent the effect of a lyrical poem, of Mozart's music, of a stormy chorus, or any other form whatever of impassioned vehemence. Meantime, I suspect grievously that not one of these critics has ever read a paragraph of Demosthenes. Nothing do you ever find quoted but a few notorious passages about Philip of Macedon, and the too-famous oath, by the manes, of those that died at Marathon. I call it too-famous, because (like Addison's comparison of Marlborough, at Blenheim, to the angel in the storm—of which a schoolmaster then living said, that nine out of every ten boys would have lit upon it in a school exercise) it has no peculiar boldness, and must have occurred to every Athenian, of any sensibility, every day of his life. Hear, on the other hand, a modern oath, and (what is most remarkable) an oath sworn in the pulpit. A dissenting clergyman, (I believe, a Baptist,) preaching at Cambridge, and having occasion to affirm or to deny something or other, upon his general confidence in the grandeur of man's nature, the magnificence of his conceptions, the immensity of his aspirations, &c., delivered himself thus:—"By the greatness of human ideals—by the greatness of human aspirations—by the immortality of human creations—by the Iliad—by the Odyssey"—Now, that was bold, startling, sublime. But, in the other case, neither was the oath invested with any great pomp of imagery or expression; nor, if it had—which is more to the purpose—was such an oath at all representative of the peculiar manner belonging to Demosthenes. It is always a rude and inartificial style of criticism to cite from an author that which, whether fine or not in itself, is no fair specimen of his ordinary style.

What then is the characteristic style of Demosthenes?—It is one which grew naturally, as did his defects, (by which I mean faults of omission, in contradiction to such as are positive,) from the composition of his audience. His audience, comprehending so much ignorance, and, above all, so much high-spirited impatience, being, in fact, always on the fret, kept the orator always on the fret. Hence arose short sentences; hence, the impossibility of the long, voluminous sweeps of beautiful rhythmus which we find in Cicero; hence, the animated form of apostrophe and crowded interrogations addressed to the audience. This gives, undoubtedly, a spirited and animated character to the style of Demosthenes; but it robs him of a large variety of structure applied to the logic, or the embellishment, or the music of his composition. His style is full of life, but not (like Cicero's) full of pomp and continuous grandeur. On the contrary, as the necessity of rousing attention, or of sustaining it, obliged the Attic orator to rely too much on the personality of direct question to the audience, and to use brief sentences, so also the same impatient and fretful irritability forbade him to linger much upon an idea—to theorize, to speculate, or, generally, to quit the direct business path of the question then under consideration—no matter for what purpose of beauty, dignity, instruction, or even of ultimate effect. In all things, the immediate—the instant—the præsens præsentissimum, was kept steadily before the eye of the Athenian orator, by the mere coercion of self-interest.

And hence, by the way, arises one most important feature of distinction between Grecian oratory (political oratory at least) on the one hand, and Roman (to which, in this point, we may add British) on the other. A Roman lawyer, senator, or demagogue, even, under proper restrictions—a British member of parliament—or even a candidate from the hustings—but, most assuredly, and by the evidence of many a splendid example, an advocate addressing a jury—may embellish his oration with a wide circuit of historical, or of antiquarian, nay, even speculative discussion. Every Latin scholar will remember the leisurely and most facetious, the good-natured and respectful, yet keenly satiric, picture which the great Roman barrister draws of the Stoic philosophy, by way of rowing old Cato, who professed that philosophy with too little indulgence for venial human errors. The judices—that is, in effect, the jury—were tickled to the soul by seeing the grave Marcus Cato badgered with this fine razor-like raillery; and there can be no doubt that, by flattering the self-respect of the jury, in presuming them susceptible of so much wit from a liberal kind of knowledge, and by really delighting them with such a display of adroit teasing applied to a man of scenical gravity, this whole scene, though quite extrajudicial and travelling out of the record, was highly useful in conciliating the good-will of Cicero's audience. The same style of liberal excursus from the more thorny path of the absolute business before the court, has been often and memorably practised by great English barristers—as, in the trial of Sacheverel, by many of the managers for the Commons; by "the fluent Murray," on various occasions; in the great cause of impeachment against our English Verres, (or, at least, our Verres as to the situation, though not the guilt,) Mr Hastings; in many of Mr Erskine's addresses to juries, where political rights were at stake; in Sir James Mackintosh's defence of Peltier for a libel upon Napoleon, when he went into a history of the press as applied to politics—(a liberal inquiry, but which, except in the remotest manner, could not possibly bear upon the mere question of fact before the jury;) and in many other splendid instances, which have really made our trials and the annals of our criminal jurisprudence one great fund of information and authority to the historian. In the senate, I need not say how much farther, and more frequently, this habit of large generalization, and of liberal excursion from perhaps a lifeless theme, has been carried by great masters; in particular, by Edmund Burke, who carried it, in fact, to such excess, and to a point which threatened so much to disturb the movement of public business, that, from that cause more perhaps than from rude insensibility to the value of his speculations, he put his audience sometimes in motion for dinner, and acquired (as is well-known) the surname of the Dinner Bell.*

Now, in the Athenian audience, all this was impossible: neither in political nor in forensic harangues was there any license by rule, or any indulgence by usage, or any special privilege by personal favour, to the least effort at improving an individual case of law or politics into general views of jurisprudence, of statesmanship, of diplomacy; no collateral discussions were tolerated—no illustrative details—no historical parallelisms—still less any philosophical moralisations. The slightest show of any tendency in these directions was summarily nipped in the bud: the Athenian gentlemen began to deponē in good earnest if a man shewed symptoms of entering upon any discussion whatever that was not intensely needful and pertinent in the first place—or which, in the second place, was not of a nature to be wound up in two sentences when a summons should arise either to dinner, or to the theatre, or to the succession of some variety anticipated from another orator.

Hence, therefore, finally arises one great peculiarity of Greek eloquence; and a most unfortunate one for its chance of ever influencing a remote posterity, or, in any substantial sense, of its ever surviving in the real unaffected admiration of us moderns—that it embodies no alien, no collateral information as to manners, usages, modes of feeling—no extrinsic ornament, no side glimpses into Grecian life, no casual historical details. The cause, and nothing but the cause—the political question, and nothing but the question—pealed for ever in the ears of the terrified orator, always on sufferance, always on his good behaviour, always afraid, for the sake of his party or of his client, lest his auditors should become angry, or become impatient, or become weary. And from that intense fear, trammeling the freedom of his steps at every turn, and overruling every motion to the right or to the left, in pure servile anxiety for the mood and disposition of his tyrannical master, arose the very opposite result for us of this day—that we, by the very means adopted to prevent weariness in the immediate auditors, find nothing surviving in Grecian orations but what does weary us insupportably through its want of all general interest; and, even amongst private or instant details of politics or law, presenting us with none that throw light upon the spirit of manners, or the Grecian peculiarities of feeling. Probably an Athenian mob would not have cared much at the prospect of such a result to posterity; and, at any rate, would not have sacrificed one atom of their ease or pleasure to obviate such a result: but, to an Athenian orator, this result would have been a sad one to contemplate. The final consequence is, that whilst all men find, or may find, infinite amusement, and instruction of the most liberal kind, in that most accomplished of statesmen and orators, the Roman Cicero—nay, would doubtless, from the causes assigned, have found, in their proportion, the same attractions in the speeches of the elder Antony, of Hortensius, of Crassus, and other contemporaries or immediate predecessors of Cicero—no person ever reads Demosthenes, still less any other Athenian orator, with the slightest interest beyond that which inevitably attaches to the words of one who wrote his own divine language with probably very superior skill.

But, from all this, results a further inference—viz., the dire affectation of those who pretend an enthusiasm in the oratory of Demosthenes; and also a plenary consolation to all who are obliged, from ignorance of Greek, to dispense with that novelty. If it be a luxury at all, it is and can be one for those only who cultivate verbal researches and the pleasures of philology.

Even in the oratory of our own times, which oftentimes discusses questions to the whole growth and motion of which we have been ourselves parties present, or even accessory—questions which we have followed in their first emission and separation from the clouds of general politics; their advance, slow or rapid, towards a domineering interest in the public passions; their meridian altitude; and perhaps their precipitous descent downwards, whether from the consummation of their objects, (as in the questions of the Slave Trade, of Catholic Emancipation, of East India Monopoly,) or from a partial victory and compromise with the abuse, (as in the purification of that Augean stable, prisons, and, still more, private houses for the insane,) or from the accomplishment of one stage or so in a progress which, by its nature, is infinite, (as in the various steps taken towards the improvement, and towards the extension of education:) even in cases like these, when the primary and ostensible object of the speaker already, on its own account, possesses a commanding attraction, yet will it often happen that the secondary questions, growing out of the leading one, the great elementary themes suggested to the speaker by the concrete case before him—as, for instance, the general question of Test Laws, or the still higher and transcendent question of Religious Toleration, and the relations between the State and religious opinions, or the general history of Slavery and the commerce in the human species, the general principles of economy as applied to monopolies, the past usages of mankind in their treatment of prisoners or of lunatics—these comprehensive and transcendent themes are continually allowed to absorb and throw into the shade, for a time, the minor but more urgent question of the moment through which they have gained their interest. The capital and primary interest gives way for a time to the derivative interest; and it does so by a silent understanding between the orator and his audience. The orator is well assured that he will not be taxed with wandering; the audience are satisfied that, eventually, they will not have lost their time: and the final result is, to elevate and liberalize the province of oratory, by exalting mere business (growing originally, perhaps, out of contingencies of finance, or trade, or local police) into a field for the higher understanding; and giving to the mere necessities of our position as a nation the dignity of great problems for civilising wisdom or philosophic philanthropy. Look back to the superb orations of Edmund Burke on questions limited enough in themselves, sometimes merely personal; for instance, that on American Taxation, on the Reforms in our Household or Official Expenditure, or at that from the Bristol hustings, (by its prima facie subject, therefore, a mere electioneering harangue to a mob.) With what marvellous skill does he enrich what is meagre, elevate what is humble, intellectualize what is purely technical, delocalize what is local, generalize what is personal! And with what result? Doubtless to the absolute contemporaries of those speeches, steeped to the very lips in the passions besetting their topics, even to those whose attention was sufficiently secured by the domineering interest, friendly or hostile, to the views of the speaker—even to these I say, that, in so far as they were at all capable of an intellectual pleasure, those parts would be most attractive which were least occupied with the present business and the momentary details. This order of precedency in the interests of the speech held even for them; but to us, removing at every annual step we take in the century, to a greater distance from the mere business and partisan interests of the several cases, this secondary attraction is not merely the greater of the two—to us it has become pretty nearly the sole one, pretty nearly the exclusive attraction.

As to religious oratory, that stands upon a different footing—the questions afloat in that province of human speculation being eternal, or at least essentially the same under new forms, receives a strong illustration from the annals of the English senate, to which also it gives a strong and useful illustration. Up to the era of James I., the eloquence of either House could not, for political reasons, be very striking, on the very principle which we have been enforcing. Parliament met only for dispatch of business; and that business was purely fiscal, or (as at times it happened) judicial. The constitutional functions of Parliament were narrow; and they were narrowed still more severely by the jealousy of the executive government. With the expansion, or rather first growth and development of a gentry, or third estate, expanded, pari passu, the political field of their jurisdiction and their deliberative functions. This widening field, as a birth out of new existences, unknown to former laws or usages, was, of course, not contemplated by those laws or usages. Constitutional law could not provide for the exercise of rights by a body of citizens, when, as yet, that body had itself no existence. A gentry, as the depository of a vast overbalance of property, real as well as personal, had not matured itself till the latter years of James I. Consequently the new functions, which the instinct of their new situation prompted them to assume, were looked upon by the Crown, most sincerely, as unlawful usurpations. This led, as we know, to a most fervent and impassioned struggle, the most so of any struggle which has ever armed the hands of men with the sword. For the passions take a far profounder sweep when they are supported by deep thought and high principles.

This element of fervid strife was already, for itself, an atmosphere most favourable to political eloquence. Accordingly, the speeches of that day, though generally too short to attain that large compass and sweep of movement without which it is difficult to kindle or to sustain any conscious enthusiasm in an audience, were of a high quality as to thought and energy of expression, as high as their circumstantial disadvantages allowed. Lord Strafford's great effort is deservedly admired to this day, and the latter part of it has been often pronounced a chef-d'œuvre. A few years before that era, all the orators of note were, and must have been, judicial orators; and, amongst these, Lord Bacon, to whom every reader's thoughts will point as the most memorable, attained the chief object of all oratory, if what Ben Jonson reports of him be true, that he had his audience passive to the motions of his will. But Jonson was, perhaps, too scholastic a judge to be a fair representative judge; and, whatever he might choose to say or to think, Lord Bacon was certainly too weighty—too massy with the bullion of original thought—ever to have realized the idea of a great popular orator—one who and ploughed up the great deeps of sentiment, or party strife, or national animosities, like a Levanter or a monsoon. In the schools of Plato, in the palaestra Stoicorum, such an orator might be potent; not in face Romuli. If he had laboured with no other defect, had he the gift of tautology? Could he say the same thing three times over in direct sequence? For, without this talent of iteration—of repeating the same thought in diversified forms—a man may utter good heads of an oration, but not an oration. Just as the same illustrious man's essays are good hints—useful topics—for essays; but no approximation to what we, in modern days, understand by essays: they are, as an eminent author once happily expressed it to myself, "seeds, not plants or shrubs; acorns, that is, oaks in embryo, but not oaks."

Reverting, however, to the oratory of the Senate, from the era of its proper birth, which we may date from the opening of that our memorable Long Parliament, brought together in November of 1642,* our Parliamentary eloquence has now, within four years, travelled through a period of two centuries. A most admirable subject for an essay, or a Magazine article, as it strikes me, would be a bird's-eye view—or rather a bird's-wing flight—pursuing rapidly the revolutions of that memorable oracle, (for such it really was to the rest of civilized Europe,) which, through so long a course of years, like the Delphic oracle to the nations of old, delivered counsels of civil prudence and of national grandeur, that kept alive for Christendom the recollections of freedom, and refreshed to the enslaved Continent the old ideas of Roman patriotism, which, but for our Parliament, would have uttered themselves by no voices on earth. That this account of the position occupied by our British Parliament, in relation to the rest of Europe, at least after the publication of the Debates had been commenced by Cave, with the aid of Dr Johnson, is, in no respect, romantic or overcharged, may be learned from the German novels of the last century, in which we find the British debates as uniformly the morning accompaniment of breakfast, at the houses of the rural gentry, &c., as in any English or Scottish country. Such a sketch would, of course, collect the characteristics of each age, shew in what connexion these characteristics stood with the political aspects of the time, or with the modes of managing public business, (a fatal rock to our public eloquence in England!) and illustrate the whole by interesting specimens from the leading orators in each generation: from Hampden to Pulteney, amongst oppositionists or patriots; from Pulteney to O'Connell; or, again, amongst Ministers, from Hyde to Somers, from Lord Sunderland to Lords Oxford and Bolingbroke; and from the plain, downright Sir Robert Walpole, to the plain, downright Sir Robert Peel.

Throughout the whole of this review, the same "moral," if one might so call it, would be apparent—viz., that in proportion as the oratory was high and intellectual, did it travel out into the collateral questions of less instant necessity, but more durable interest; and that, in proportion as the Grecian necessity was or was not enforced by the temper of the House, or by the pressure of public business—the necessity which cripples the orator, by confining him within the severe limits of the case before him—in that proportion had or had not the oratory of past generations a surviving interest for modern posterity. Nothing, in fact, so utterly effete—not even old law, or old pharmacy, or old erroneous chemistry—nothing so insufferably dull as political orations, unless when powerfully animated by that spirit of generalization which only gives the breath of life and the salt which preserves from decay, through every age alike. The very strongest proof, as well as exemplification of all which has been said on Grecian oratory, may thus be found in the records of the British senate.

And this, by the way, brings us round to an aspect of Grecian oratory which has been rendered memorable, and forced upon our notice, in the shape of a problem, by the most popular of our native historians—the aspect, I mean, of Greek oratory in comparison with English. Hume has an essay upon the subject; and the true answer to that essay will open a wide field of truth to us. In this little paper, Hume assumes the superiority of Grecian eloquence, as a thing admitted on all hands, and requiring no proof. Not the proof of this point did he propose to himself as his object; not even the illustration of it. No. All that, Hume held to be superfluous. His object was, to investigate the causes of this Grecian superiority; or, if investigate is too pompous a word for so slight a discussion, more properly, he inquired for the cause as something that must naturally lie upon the surface.

What is the answer? First of all, before looking for causes, a man should be sure of his facts. Now, as to the main fact at issue, I utterly deny the superiority of Grecian eloquence. And, first of all, I change the whole field of inquiry by shifting the comparison. The Greek oratory is all political or judicial: we have those also; but the best of our eloquence, by immeasurable degrees, the noblest and richest, is our religious eloquence. Here, of course, all comparison ceases; for classical Grecian religious eloquence, in Grecian attire, there is none until three centuries after the Christian era, when we have three great orators, Gregory Nazianzen, Basil—of which two I have a very fixed opinion, having read large portions of both—and a third of whom I know nothing. To our Jeremy Taylor, to our Sir Thomas Browne, there is no approach made in the Greek eloquence. The inaugural chapter of the "Holy Dying," to say nothing of many another golden passage; or the famous passage in the "Urn Buriall," beginning—"Now, since these bones have rested under the drums and trappings of three conquests"—have no parallel in literature. The winding up of the former is more, in its effect, like a great tempestuous chorus from the Judas Maccabeus, or from Spohr's St Paul, than like human eloquence.

But, grant that this transfer of the comparison is unfair—still, it is no less unfair to confine the comparison on our part to the weakest part of our oratory; but no matter—let issue be joined even here. Then we may say, at once, that, for the intellectual qualities of eloquence, in fineness of understanding, in depth and in large compass of thought, Burke far surpasses any orator, ancient or modern. But, if the comparison were pushed more widely, very certain

* There was another Parliament of this same year 1642, which met in the spring, (April, I think,) but was summarily dissolved. A small quarto volume, of not unfrequent occurrence, I believe, contains some good specimens of the eloquence then prevalent. It was rich in thought, never wordy—in fact, too parsimonious in words and illustrations; and it breathed a high tone of religious principle as well as of pure-minded patriotism; but, for the reason stated above—its narrow circuit and very limited duration—the general character of the Parliamentary eloquence was ineffective.

I am, that, apart from classical prejudice, no qualities of just thinking, or fine expression, or even of artificial ornament, could have been assigned by Hume, in which the great body of our deliberative and forensic orators fall short of Grecian models; though I will admit, that, by comparison with the Roman model of Cicero, there is seldom the same artful prefiguration of the oration throughout its future course, or the same sustained rhythmus and oratorical tone. The qualities of art are nowhere so prominently expressed, nowhere aid the effect so much, as in the great Roman master.

But, as to Greece, let us now, in one word, unveil the sole advantage which the eloquence of the Athenian assembly has over that of the English senate. It is this—the public business of Athens was as yet simple and unencumbered by details; the dignity of the occasion was scenically sustained. But, in England, the vast intricacy and complex interweaving of property, of commerce, of commercial interests, of details infinite in number, and infinite in littleness, break down and fritter away into fractions and petty minutiae, the whole huge labyrinth of our public affairs. It is scarcely necessary to explain my meaning. In Athens, the question before the public assembly was, peace or war—before our House of Commons, perhaps the Exchequer Bills' Bill; at Athens, a league or no league—in England, the Tithe of Agistment Commutation-Bills' Renewal Bill; in Athens—shall we forgive a ruined enemy? in England—shall we cancel the tax on farthing rushlights? In short, with us, the infinity of details overlays the simplicity and grandeur of our public deliberations.

Such was the advantage—a mighty advantage—for Greece. Now, finally, for the use made of this advantage. To that point I have already spoken. By the clamorous and undeliberative qualities of the Athenian political audience, by its fitful impatience, and vehement arrogance, and fervid partisanship, all wide and general discussion was barred, in limine. And thus occurred this singular inversion of positions—the greatest of Greek orators was obliged to treat these Catholic questions as mere Athenian questions of business. On the other hand, the least eloquent of British senators, whether from the immense advance in knowledge, or from the custom and usage of Parliament, seldom fails, more or less, to elevate his intense details of pure technical business into something dignified, either by the necessities of pursuing the historical relations of the matter in discussion, or of arguing its merits as a case of general finance, or as connected with general political economy, or, perhaps, in its bearings on peace or war. The Grecian was forced, by the composition of his headstrong auditory, to degrade and personalise his grand themes; the Englishman is forced, by the difference of his audience, by old prescription, and by the opposition of a well-informed, hostile party, into elevating his merely technical and petty themes into great national questions, involving honour and benefit to tens of millions.

THE COVENANTERS.

CAN Scotland's son, who uncontrolled may climb the heathery steep,
Gaze scornfully where guards the cairn her martyrs'
blood-courtesy sleep;
And say, "A fanatic lies here;" and, with a pitying smile,
Descant on mad Enthusiasts—the ignorant, the vile?

Enthusiasts!—by the freeman's step, that treads on Scottish strand;
By the pure faith that sanctifies the altars of the land;
By hymns of praise, at morn and eve, unawed by fear or shame,
Poured from our peaceful hamlet-homes—still honoured be the name!

If on the plains where Wallace fought, the patriot's bosom swell,
And the bold Switzer drops a tear upon the grave of Tell,
Shall Scotland, with irreverent eye, behold the wild flowers wave
Above the mound, once stained with blood, her Covenant heroes' grave?

They sleep where, in a darker day, by dreary moss and fen,
Their blood bedewed the wild heath-flower, in many a Scottish glen:
When forced to flee their humble homes, for Scotland's Covenant Lord,
They grasped, to save their holiest rights, the Bible and usage sword.

They rest in peace—the Enthusiasts! who unreluctant flung
To earth the proffered gold, and scorned the lures of courtly tongue.
They rest in peace, who knew no rest when with loud curses driven,
And hunted 'mid the wintry fells, and rest of all but heaven.

Enthusiasts!—would the proudly wise, who flings his scorn and sneer
On graves and names long hallowed by the patriot's love and tear—
Would he, when gleams in mount and vale the persecutor's braid,
To quench with blood the altar-fires of his own fatherland—

When all around are fainting hearts and falsehood's hollow smile,
The bloody foe, the traitorous friend, fierce war, and covert guile,
No hope on earth, unless he quit the banner of his God,
And crouch a slave upon the land where his free fathers trod—

Would he renounce all earth-born joys, and choose his wintry bed
On howling heath, with darkness round and tempest o'er his head;
And, trusting in no arm of flesh, undaunted face the fires,
The axe, the torture, and the sword, like Scotland's Covenant sires?

PEDESTRIAN TOUR OF A SCOTTISH EMIGRANT IN THE MIDDLE STATES OF AMERICA.

THE late travellers in America have generally gone "starring" thither, taking the grand route in grand costume. The humble traveller, whom we are about to introduce to our readers, saw nothing of fashionable hotels or watering-places, little of the great cities, and nothing at all of great or noted personages. He visited the Americans "at home," in their farms and villages; threw himself upon their hospitality; lived among them for years; and saw more of their real manners and character than falls within the ordinary scope of a stranger's observation. He was a young Scotchman, of respectable education, and very slender means, who, without apparently any very definite plan of proceeding, set off, in the first place, for Lower Canada, in national phrase, "to push his fortune." He lived for some years as a school-master about Chaleur Bay, and afterwards in different places in the United States. His bulky MSS., now before us, contain a long, minute, and faithful description of his original dreary sojourn among the fishermen, wood-choppers, and Indian tribes of Lower Canada. When tired of that locality, he formed the design of visiting the United States, partly from curiosity, and probably with some hope of bettering his fortune. For this purpose, he went from Chaleur Bay by a sailing vessel to Quebec, ascended the St Lawrence to Montreal by steam, and, finally, found his way to New York by the customary route. In the course of his voyage he picked up a young Irishman, still poorer than himself; and, on the faith of a reputed rich uncle at Baltimore, who was to send money to await his nephew's arrival at New York, the Scot made those pecuniary advances which confirmed their friendship, and left him almost penniless. We take them up at New York, exactly as, on an autumn evening, they had left the steamer which brought them from Albany.

CHAPTER I.

We landed at New York in the evening, the rain pouring down in torrents: of course, got to the nearest boarding-house as fast as our legs could carry us, where we passed a cold, comfortable evening; but our penance in the traveller's room was, in a good measure, compensated by a most excellent supper, and as good a bed. This boarding-house was situated at the corner of Washington Street—a most delightful situation—with one front to the Hudson, and the other to the Battery; and, what was still better, the people of the house were very civil, and produced at breakfast and supper the best coffee I have tasted in America; they also gave us a dish I had never seen before—namely, fried oysters, some of them as large as my hand. Next morning, early, my companion and I went out upon the Battery, "to snuff the caller air;" and, oh, how delicious! The rain had ceased during the night, the breeze came from the ocean fresh and exhilarating, and the sun shone with refulgence upon trees and grass sparkling with dew-drops. What is called the Battery is not so in reality, although it can easily be transformed into one upon an emergency. There you see neither embrasures, cannon, balls, nor soldiers; but the peaceful citizens taking their quiet promenade. It is but a small nook, and much the shape of a Scotch farrel, or cake of oatmeal bread—one of the straight sides being somewhat longer than the other, and the rounded side nearest the river. I know not how many acres it may contain; but, diminutive though it be, it is a most delightful spot, with walks, trees, and seats for the accommodation of those who frequent it. I sat for some time upon one of the benches with a young man whom, although dressed like a gentleman, I took to be a sailor, from his telling me that he had been in every quarter of the globe, and that, of all the pretty spots he had ever seen, he had never seen any equal to the Battery. Indeed, none but an eye-witness can have any idea of the beauty of the scene, as seen from this charming spot. The city, the broad Hudson, the shipping, the Jersey shore, with its towns, Staten Island, Long Island, Governor's Island, with its fort, and vessels of all kinds plying in every direction, from the trim-built wherry to the lordly frigate, with numerous steamers splashing, and dashing, and whizzing, like desperation, through the waves, are the prominent figures of the picture displayed before his eyes. But, after all, the view from the Battery, although exceedingly beautiful, in my opinion is still surpassed by that from the citadel of Quebec. The latter, to all the beauty of the former, over and above adds much of the grand, if not of the sublime. On the round side of the Battery is attached Castle Garden—what I take to have been a fort, or the real battery, but it is now used for the exhibition of fireworks, and so forth.

After breakfast, we made the best of our way to the far-famed Broadway. We had but the length of the shortest side of the Battery to reach the Bowling-green—a small oval green, railed in, and shaded with trees. From this starts Broadway, and runs in nearly a straight line for three miles: so they told me, although I scarcely think it quite so long as that. I know not whether I be right in placing the head of the street near the Bowling-green, since the other end must be nearly three miles higher up the river; but, according to my way of thinking, the end of a street next the country is the foot of it. However it be, along Broadway we went, from end to end; and, take it all in all, it is certainly a most magnificent street, the houses being large, the stores splendid, and filled with the productions of every clime. It may be prejudice, but, in my opinion, it is nothing equal to the Trongate of Glasgow: nor, in fact, have I seen any street which pleases me so much as the latter. One great drawback upon Broadway is the houses being built of brick; for, however commodious, substantial, and large you may build them of such material, still they are but brick houses, and I never saw a pretty brick house yet. Trinity Church—Episcopalian—one of the handsomest in the city, faces upon Broadway, as also some of the largest hotels, I believe, in the world: the chief of these are Hester Jennings's and the Astor House; the latter erected by Jacob Astor, the founder of Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia River, and one of the millionaires of New York.

But, leaving brick walls and other inanimate objects, let us turn our attention to something more interesting. Whoever has strolled down Broadway, between the hours of eleven and twelve, A.M., must have seen as splendid a sight as can well be imagined, in the immense number of ladies on the pavé at that time. We were jogging it along, like good, quiet citizens, and had not proceeded very far down, when we encountered a band of ladies all dressed in white. This company having passed, we observed another as strong following hard in the rear, and another and another, ad infinitum.

"What the deuce is this?" exclaimed my companion.

"I believe it must be a wedding," said I.

"Faith, an' its a big faimale one, too, for the devil a gentleman's among them but ourselves."

"I think we had better take the other side of the street," I replied, "for the faimales seem to have taken complete possession of this one." So, crossing the street, we had a full view of the whole procession.

"What a sight!" exclaimed the Irishman, with an oath.

And well he might exclaim, for the whole west side of the street, as far as the eye could reach, was one dazzling line of white: it was a real via lactea—milky way—or, if the figure please better, a gigantic bed of white lilies. I have seen what is called Vanity Fair at Glasgow; but the Vanity Fair of New York outstrips it beyond all comparison. The above goodly procession moves along Broadway for the Battery; but by what street it returns I cannot tell, as every time I saw the ladies promenading, their faces were turned towards the same point. The comparison may not be a good one, and, for certain, it is not very polite, but they put me in mind of the lemmings which emigrate, at certain seasons of the year, from the northern regions—march straightforward in innumerable armies—but never find their way back again. Whether the New York ladies be pretty in general or not, I cannot say, but I certainly saw some pretty faces among them. My companion, however, who was quite enraptured at the first sight, seemed to have changed his mind on their second appearance. "Oh, it's all dress and show, and nothing else." But it must be confessed he had not a good opportunity of knowing the truth at the distance we viewed them from, besides, his mind appeared to be soured against everything American, and, over and above, he had brought along with him a whole load of Old Country prejudices.

In your progress along Broadway, you will come to the Park—a triangular green, railed in, with walks and trees, the apex towards the street, and the base adorned by the City Hall, one of the most magnificent buildings in the United States. It is built of white marble, and royal enough for the proudest crowned head on earth. I am speaking of the outside just now; for, when you get into the inside—at least what I saw of it—you would never think you were in a palace. Outside, all is nobility and royalty; the inside sinks even beneath republican plainness. The Court was sitting at the time we were there; we, of course, followed the crowd up stairs into the Court-room—a very plain-looking chamber, very much resembling a college class-room. When we entered, it was nearly filled; and all were sitting with their hats on—a fashion much in vogue in the United States. Being newly arrived in the country, it could not be expected that we should know the fashions, or shake off our barbarism all at once; we, accordingly, were so very impolite as to remove the felt from our heads, and modestly retire to a back seat. Two Quakers followed us in the rear, and took their seats beside us, with hats on as broad as talipot leaves. On the appearance of the Judges, the cry of "off hats" arose from the officers of the court. The order was promptly complied with, except by our two friends the Quakers, who were determined to be extra polite on the occasion. The officers, seeing all the polls bare except the two in our immediate neighbourhood, came up to enforce the order; but all would not do: the refractory individuals, intertwining their fingers over the crowns of their beaver, set the officers at defiance, who, seeing there was no great glory to be obtained in the contest, retreated to their proper stations, and left the gentlemen to shew their respect to the Court in their own way. The trial was of a Mr Ellsworth and others, for some kind of conspiracy; but as I was too far back to hear the proceedings, we left the court.

On getting into the open air, our attention was arrested by an equestrian statue of Washington, immediately in front of the City Hall. I took it to be a stucco casting; but I may be mistaken. However it be, the statuary and the good citizens of New York deserve great credit; the former for mounting Washington upon a pony, and the latter for the costliness of the material. If Washington could look down and see something intended as a fac-simile of himself, mounted upon something little bigger than a Highland sheltie, with its fore-feet pawing the air as if it were making some attempt at preaching, I think he would laugh heartily.

Among the buildings facing one side of the Park is the Park Theatre, which receives good encouragement. When I was there, there was only one other theatre, the Bowery; but now they have got no fewer than seven, all which receive their share of patronage ; besides which, there is Castle Gardens, a Vauxhall, and a Ranelagh—places of amusement sufficient, in all good conscience, for a population four times as great ; but the truth is, the United States is the best country in the world for players, lecturers, showmen of all kinds, and so forth. This is evident, from the amazing number of theatres, museums, race-courses scattered all over the country, and the amazing fortunes which foreign actors make in a short time. I don't understand it very well, but a village in the United States, which, if it had been located in the Old World, would scarcely have supported a schoolmaster, here, somehow or other, maintains a newspaper editor into the bargain ; and a town, which, in the Old Country, would not be able to maintain a newspaper, will, in the United States, have two or three, and a theatre into the bargain. After Broadway, the next street of note is Wall Street, celebrated all over the United States, and maybe, too, in the capitals of Europe, for its money transactions. As a street, it is elegant enough ; but its principal beauty, however, consists in the number of gamblers in Stocks, who frequent it as a mart, and the multitude of money-changers, who charitably help the needy by lending them money at cent. per cent. on good securities. In Wall Street is the Post-Office ; a so-so building when I was there ; but they were making preparations to set up a portico in front, to be supported by massive pillars of white marble. Water and Pearl Streets are narrow and ugly, and very much resembling some of the London streets ; but they are great places for business, and well stocked with auction-rooms, which are known by having a flag hanging over the door. Greenwich Street is a very good one, with trees planted on each side ; and the Bowery, Catharine, and William Streets, are worthy of attention. It is almost needless to mention that New York is in no want of churches, some of them handsome enough, but, at the same time, nothing extraordinary. Trinity Church, in Broadway, is a handsome building, and has one of the finest organs I have ever heard. A great alteration must have taken place in New York since I was there, partly owing to its increasing prosperity, and partly owing to the great fire of 1836, which consumed a great part of the city. This latter misfortune, though productive of great calamity at the time, will much conduce to the ameliorating the appearance of the city, as it commonly happens that the streets opened, and buildings erected, after a fire, are greatly superior to the ones destroyed. There is one thing with regard to New York, and I believe it holds good in respect to all the cities in the Union—the streets are not pestered by common beggars, like those of Europe. Indeed, during the twelve years I have been in America, although I have seen many poor people, yet I have never seen any who followed begging as a profession. But there is another nuisance, and worse, in my opinion, than the common beggars, which New York would do well to get rid of—I mean the free blacks, or, as they are called, “people of colour.” These swarm like locusts in Broadway, and swagger along as if a white man was beneath their notice. If you meet a band of them, I'll not say that you must touch your hat to them, but you must take pretty good care they don't jostle you into the kennel. The City Council ought to hang one half of them, and the money would be well spent in shipping the other half to Siberia. During the stay I made in New York, I saw nothing like a mob, and congratulated the city on its quiet deportment ; but, since that period, I have had reason to change my opinion, as very serious riots have occurred in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. I have always said so, and the citizens of the United States may depend upon it, that when their cities become overgrown and filled to overflowing with a manufacturing population, the lower classes of society will become as unruly as those in European cities.

While in Albany, my friend, the Irishman, had written to his uncle, announcing his being on the way down to him, as also the leaky condition of his purse, with a wish that he would be so very kind as to have a quantity of the ready lying in New York Post-Office against the time he should be down there. Our main business, therefore, after our arrival in that city, was to dance attendance at the Post-Office in the expectation of finding a load of money ; but, like a great many searchers for gold, we were doomed to disappointment—no money made its appearance—and our patience began to wear out. As it was of no use to stay in a large city for the mere purpose of expecting money, and actually expending the little we had, I recommended to my fellow-traveller a trip out to the country, where we might find something to do, and at the same time be within watching-distance of the Post-Office, if he actually thought the money would come. He agreed ; and off we started down Broadway, and got into the country on the 7th of October. I don't recollect the name of the place at which we staid that night, but next morning we passed through Manhattan—a small place, and not worth mentioning ; as also another small place called Philipsburgh ; and then crossed the stream which runs from the Hudson or North to the East River, and forms the Island of Manhattan. From this island we passed to the mainland by means of Kingsbridge—a paltry thing built of rough plank, but, nevertheless, much spoken of in American history. By this day's travel we got into Greenburgh township, and put up at night in a decent enough house. The landlady was a tall, majestic-looking woman, with a very fine, pleasant countenance ; but, on further acquaintance, we discovered that her beauty did not extend much deeper than the skin. The biblical figure of the “painted sepulchre” suited her exactly : without, all beauty—within, all rottenness. She had a most unamiable temper, which was somewhat astonishing to me, as she seemed to have been actually delivered of a lump of her ill-nature embodied in human form. This embodied sprite was her son, who lay on the floor, before the fire, in the misshape of—I don't know what; for he scarcely had the semblance of a being of this world. He might be about three feet long, with a monstrous head, and a mouth that would suit a shark. He was hunch-backed, his legs crooked, his eyes, like snakes', gleamed malignity, and he was continually restless, rolling from side to side, uttering imprecations and demands for grog, a glass of which was kept constantly by him on the floor. This being, if he was actually human—although to be pitied—formed one of the most disgusting objects I ever beheld. Sure enough, we were right glad to get out of the house next morning; and, although frosty and very cold, we did not even stay for breakfast, but made the best of our way towards White Plains, having a desire to see the battle-ground. On our way thither, we entered a farm-house to rest ourselves. This farm belonged to an Irishman: of course, my companion and he got quite gracious; and a bargain was not long in being struck, anent his remaining there until he should be enabled to start for Maryland. Whether it was owing to my being a heretic, or a Scotchman, or what other reason, I know not, but pretty strong hints were thrown out that I might take the road as soon as I liked. But having brought my friend and myself so far on my own resources, I did not like, and was determined not to be flung off quite so uncereemoniously; so made bold to stay two or three days, until I could devise some plan for my future guidance. Before I start afresh, it may, perhaps, not be amiss to give a short account of the country between this and New York. The surface of the country is rather inclined to be hilly, at least much broken, and some places remarkably stony—the farm we were now upon being of the latter description. The soil is not among the richest; but, withal, rich enough for growing good potatoes. About a mile from Kingsbridge, I think, we passed a quarry of white marble—a thing I had never seen before. We also observed some gentlemen's seats, which looked to have been built before the Revolution; at least they had the reverend look of age, and were in a style quite different from that of American houses in the present day. The road itself was a tolerably good road, although I think I have seen better. The most striking peculiarity of our journey was the great number of fine orchards we met with, and the plenty of fruit-trees, apples especially, along the road-sides, where the proprietors, when they planted the orchards, had been pleased, in a very kindly manner, not to forget the wayfaring man, but had planted fruit-trees also along the roads; from which, in their season, the traveller has nothing more to do than take up a stick or a stone, and knock down as many as will fill his stomach, and his pockets into the bargain. I return them my kind thanks for my share, for many a good feast have I had from them. The same remark will apply to the whole line of road that I have travelled in the Middle States. Indeed, I have more than once gone over the fence into the orchard without asking anybody's permission, and pocketed as many as I pleased, and that before the house too, without anybody's saying—"What do'st thou?" America is the paradise for fruits, and the people are far from being nigardly of them. The first cider-mill I saw was at the house of a farmer, neighbouring to that in which we were. I assisted them at the work, and got as much cider as I could drink for my trouble. In my progress onward, I met with many of these cider presses; and generally when I asked for a drink at any house, they gave me cider instead of water. The best cider, I believe, is made in New Jersey.

I have to observe, that the New Yorkers, although a quiet and decent enough people, are not of such a kindly disposition, or don't shew their kindness with such a liberal hand, as the inhabitants of the States farther south—at least so it appeared to me. There is a certain air of bluntness, or rather roughness, about them, as if they did not want to be troubled, and which is very disagreeable to a stranger. I accounted for this from the amazing multitudes of emigrants which annually land at New York from foreign ports, as well as those which find their way down thither from Canada. The greater portion of these emigrants are poor; and, as it is impossible they can all find employment in the city, so as to keep soul and body hanging together, crowds of them must, of necessity, take to the country, and harass the inhabitants by demands for work, or help to carry them onwards. By these means, the people's tempers have got soured, especially towards poor strangers; and as for those foot travellers, who may chance to have pretty good coats on their backs, as was the case with us, who either want not, or may not be able to pay for a carriage, they very naturally take them for some runaways from the city, or, perhaps, for something worse. I recollect once, wandering among the Kilbirnie hills in Scotland, I encountered an elderly woman striving to collect some cattle together, and very good-naturedly asked her if she wished for any help; when, instead of thanking me, she stood staring as if she had seen a ghost—indeed, the place would have well suited Macbeth's meeting the weird sisters—and asked me, "Where d'ye come frae?" "From Glasgow," I replied. "Ay!" quo' she, "there's mony blackguards in Glasgow." So it may be the same with the New Yorkers; not that they want the milk of human kindness, but that they have been often troubled by strangers, and because they know there are many blackguards in New York.

Being now pretty well refreshed, I thought of proceeding onwards. I don't know if I could be said to have any regular plan laid down for futurity; all I know is, that I was determined to go to the south—if not as far as New Orleans, at least as far as Virginia. From what I had read in geographies and books of travels, I had formed a very high opinion of southern countries; and as I had already seen enough of northern ones, and was tolerably well acquainted with ice and snow, methought I would be in a kind of paradise if once I could get into the sunny clime of the south, and bask in the sunshine of a perpetual summer. Often I figured myself lying along beneath the shade of the live oak, refreshing myself with the golden fruit plucked from orange groves, while my eyes wandered over the rich fields of cotton and sugar cane. It was, indeed, as a southern country of my own creating that I saw in my day-dreams; but it was none the worse for all that; oh, no! for I had peopled it with everything that was good. Our first parents themselves had not a prettier domicile than the one I had now created for the express purpose of passing the remainder of my days in peace and quietness, and wearing gradually away, like the last ray of the setting sun, as it departs to shine upon some land, perhaps still more fair and beautiful. With such notions in my head, no wonder I parted with my fellow-traveller in right good spirits; and although I had left all the property I had in the world at New York—the clothes on my back, and an exchange shirt or two excepted—my determination for the present was to cross the Hudson at the nearest point, and proceed direct to Baltimore. By this means I thought I could kill three birds with one stone. I could see James' uncle, and get some money forwarded to him; and by so doing, I also might procure some friends to myself—necessary articles in the world, especially in a foreign land: and, besides, I would still be prosecuting my main design of getting to the southward. My plan of travelling downwards was somewhat novel; for I had adopted the whimsical notion of moving in a straight line to Baltimore, or rather to the first bridge on the Susquehanna next to Baltimore, so that I might avoid the bays, be farther in the country, and have a better chance of seeing the Americans “at home”—as they actually existed; for staying in inns, travelling in stage-coaches, et cetera, and seeing only the population of large cities, is to see the people through a false medium, varnished over by the gloss of artificial modes and customs, and but too much corrupted by intercourse with the world. By keeping a direct course, like a ship in the ocean, and, like her, allowing for leeway—for it could not be expected that the road I had to walk upon would always lead in the precise direction I wanted to go—I conjectured I would meet with the people just as Providence presented them to me—the real people, the Republicans, not the politicians, but the real bona fide Democrats. I knew the precise spot where Baltimore lay from the point of my departure, and, to make the navigation complete in all respects, I was determined to ask nobody the road, but depend entirely upon the sun and my own head for guides.

Matters arranged, I started for Tarrytown in order to get a boat to cross the Hudson. On my way thither, I accosted a jolly-looking farmer, who was doing something in his cartshed, with, “Can you tell me, sir, if this is the straight road to Tarrytown?” “No, sir, it is not the straight road, for it is a very crooked one.” I thanked the man for his wit, and went on. The road was actually none of the straightest, but that did not hinder me from reaching Tarrytown—a place of no consequence, except as being that near which André was taken by the American militiamen. I saw nothing like a town, except a few low houses on a kind of reef or breakwater, which, running out a short distance into the river, might be called by that name. But towns in the United States are very easily made: get up a store, an inn, a dwelling-house or two, and if you can add a church, so much the better; your town is already built. In the West they spring up like mushrooms—in a day's time. I have passed through more than one place called towns, and I was asking how far it was to them, long after I had passed through them. On the highway, a little above Tarrytown, I observed a neat two-story schoolhouse; and, at no great distance, I also saw a decent young man proceeding towards it with a step and mien as if he were going to be hanged. It must have been the schoolmaster. Yes, poor fellow, schoolmasters, and school-houses, and schools, are pretty much the same all over the world; plenty of toil and trouble, but very little for it. With three-fourths of all the schoolmasters in the world, the schoolhouse is a kind of penitentiary, where the poor fellow of a teacher has to get daily upon the worst kind of treadmill, in penance for his youthful indiscretions, or rather for that worst of all crimes, poverty.

The primary school system in the state of New York is, I believe, on a very good footing. What is called the school-fund, if I mistake not, is large; and there are numerous schools of all kinds scattered over the country. The United States deserve great credit for the attention paid to education, especially the Eastern and Middle States; and the Southern and Western are coming up pretty close behind them in the same honourable career. In all the public unsold lands, the General Government always keeps reservations for schools and colleges; and most if not all the Eastern and Middle States have school-funds, but how raised I do not recollect; for the past, the payment of the schoolmasters was much upon the same principle as the Scottish schoolmasters' salaries. Connecticut has a fund of two millions, and some of the other States are not far behind it in that respect. This is so far good, as the interest of such large funds, divided among the teachers, lowers the price of education to the people, and thereby enables the poor man to educate his family upon the same footing as the rich—that is, as far as primary schools are concerned. But would it not be an improvement, instead of adding more to such a large principal, to divide the surplus among the teachers, in order to enlarge their salaries, for certainly very few can maintain that the schoolmaster's income is too great? However, notwithstanding all that has been done, and is still doing in the United States for education, there appears to be “something rotten in the State of Denmark ;" for, at a late meeting of some society or other in New York, a Dr Taylor asserted in his speech, that out of the 80,000 teachers in the United States, not 100 were fitted for fulfilling the duties of the station. What qualifications the Rev. Doctor may deem necessary in a primary school teacher, or professor, I know not ; but if his assertion be true—which I think very unlikely—so much the greater pity ; and if it be not true—which is very likely—the Doctor ought to be ducked in a horse-pond, and then heartily cow-hided by way of dessert.

Not getting a boat at Tarrytown, and after having taken a rest in a very poor house—for there are poor people in the United States, and plenty of them too—I took the road up the river for Peekskill, where I arrived late in the afternoon without anything uncommon happening. The country through which I travelled to-day was none of the richest, and very much broken and stony. I went into no houses, except a very mean-looking inn to take some refreshment—and the inside, sure enough, did not belie the out. I may add, that I passed along the Runicon Bridge, situated in rather a romantic spot. Peekskill is but a small place, not deserving the name of town, possessing only one store, a few houses, and no church that I saw. During the Revolution, it was a depôt for military stores.

I have mentioned the word store more than once, and as a store in America may be a different thing from a store in Europe, I may as well, once for all, tell the differences : In the Old Country, when one wants anything, he goes or sends to such a one's shop for it ; but, as it happens that mechanics have got their shops too, it would never do for such a respectable man as an American merchant to have one ; besides, Republican simplicity is very ticklish in such matters ; the shop has therefore been metamorphosed into a store, and what is actually the store is called the warehouse. As these stores in the country places sell a great variety of articles, they are, of course, like our meal-mills and smithies, great places of rendezvous for the neighbourhood ; and the storekeeper is generally a man of great influence.

Not long after I arrived at Peekskill, a boat with some young men was about starting for the other side ; and on requesting a place by them, they obligingly complied. For my fare I paid a shilling, or what they call an elevenpenny bit. From the decent appearance of the young men, I thought it somewhat curious that they should accept such a trifle from a stranger who cost them no trouble : but it is a very hard matter for an American to refuse a piece of silver when offered ; and, besides, the boat might have been a regular ferry-boat, which would greatly alter the case. I put up at an inn close to the place where we landed, built in the southern style—that is, the stairs leading to the upper story are on the outside, and land you upon a balcony, running the whole length of the house, which, of course, forms a kind of porch or veranda to the lower story. The house was a very good one, and the landlord very civil.

Next morning, early, I started over a rough country, leaving Fort Montgomery two miles on the right. A good proportion of to-day's travel lay through woodland, and very stony. In proceeding along, I was much startled by a fox which came out of the wood, in rather too great a hurry, a few paces before me. I don't think he intended to frighten me, as, in his haste, he was half way across the road before he observed me ; when, stopping short, he looked very earnestly at me, and I did the same at him, for, being in a strange country, in my surprise I took him for a wolf or other savage animal. We both stood in the middle of the road, gazing at one another, as if we knew not upon what terms we had met, whether as friends or enemies, or whether we should advance or retreat. However, to make a decided change in the disposition of the parties, I lifted a stone, which sent my opponent out of sight in an instant—he taking his road and I mine.

The first town on my way was Goshen, a tolerably large village, and celebrated all over the States for its butter, although it appeared to me not to be in possession of the richest pastures. The fields, when I passed them, were black with the Spanish needle—a plant covered with a kind of prickles, which easily leave the plant and cleave to the sheep's fleece in such quantities that you cannot tell whether the sheep be black or white. This herb is very plentiful in all the pastures as far down as Virginia, and gives the country in many places a very black appearance. However it be, Goshen, as I have said, is famed for its butter ; and so great is the demand for it, that I am told there is no place where that article is so dear and scarce as Goshen—so much so indeed, that the Goshenites have to lubricate their bread with butter bought at New York.

CHAPTER II.

I inquired for the schoolmaster, and rested myself a little with him. He appeared to be a very quiet man, with a very decent wife, and a good many children. The house, the family, the tout ensemble, reminded me very much of that of a Scotch schoolmaster's. Leaving the teacher and Goshen, I afterwards passed Greenwood furnace, and through Monroe and Craigville, the latter consisting of only one store, a grist-mill, and a dwelling-house or two, romantically situated upon a small stream. The most remarkable feature of to-day's journey, was the large proportion of woodland I passed through ; and the same may be remarked as a general feature in American scenery, with the exception of here and there pieces cleared to a greater or less extent. Taking the line of road I have travelled in the United States as a sample, it was at one time through woodland, at another through cleared portions, but still with a sufficiency of timber on the farms ; now up-hill, and then down again, and so on repeatedly, with a sameness in the appearance of the country, which rendered the travelling somewhat dull.

A little way past the Greenwood furnace, the road cuts a bank of very fine sand, which struck me as well suited for founderies.

At night I put up at the house of a Mr Anderson, a very respectable farmer, from the appearance of both him and his house. He was a quiet man, and spoke but little; but withal very kind, as also everybody about the house. Supper was over when I arrived, but I got a good bed, and next morning the breakfast-table literally groaned beneath the good things placed upon it. The main business with the cook, or whoever else set the table—for I saw no mistress—seemed to be, not how the dishes might be gracefully arranged, but to fill up every vacant nook with something or other. The Americans don't care so much about ceremony or taste—that of the palate excepted—but take good care to put plenty on the board, and then leave every individual to fill his stomach in the way he thinks best. I don't make the above remark because I happened to be well treated at Mr Anderson's, but I found it to apply, with a few exceptions, to all the people west of the Hudson. After breakfast, as it was raining very hard, the farmer, another man, and myself, sat down to shell hickory-nuts for the New York market—they bringing there about a dollar the bushel. These nuts, walnuts, and chestnuts, are very plentiful all over the United States, and, along with acorns, furnish a very nourishing food to vast droves of swine. There are two kinds of hickory-nuts, the large and the small; and both, like the walnut, are the better of a hammer to break them with. The wood is very tough, and of great use for many purposes; and it is from this good quality that General Jackson generally goes by the familiar appellation of Old Hickory; and surely of all the sobriquets that might be applied, none suits the stern, tough old chieftain more pertinently. In Virginia they have a method of splitting it into long thin pieces like tape, of many yards in length. These are worked, in a tub of warm water, into chair bottoms, and form by far the easiest to sit upon of any that I have tried.

The rain having stopped, and tired of shelling hickory-nuts, I again set forward on my journey, and, in the course of the day, passed through Warwick and Hamburg—both neat enough places. I don't know where I staid that night, but next night, I remember very well, I slept very comfortably in a corn-field. I had now got into New Jersey, and, by the time I reached Newton, the moon was also a good way on her journey. Having my pockets well filled with apples, my mind cheery, and my body light and springy, with the fine cool evening air, I thought it best to proceed, and make up for it by resting during the day; for the days were still very hot. I therefore marched on for a while very cheerily, but, by-and-by, a feeling of loneliness began to steal over me, with ardent longings after a warm fireside, a good supper, and a snug bed; and these feelings became more intense when, on reaching a house, I observed all dark and silent about it, not even the baying of a dog to scare me—sure intimations that the inmates were all fast locked in the arms of sleep, and that it was now too late for me to gain admittance. House after house I passed, with the same uncheery notice that I must either walk all night or find a resting-place the best way I could. I chose the latter alternative, and the first corn-field I came to I made up my mind to make my bed there. For this purpose I collected a number of sheaves together, and made a kind of pent-house, in which, like the fox among the brambles, I for a while lay very comfortable: but, by-and-by, the cold, chilly air of night, notwithstanding all my care in patching my house, began to incommode me very much. I consequently, being now rested tolerably well, took the road again. When morning dawned, I found myself much tired, and in a very rough country, with the cleared places remarkably stony. One field, in particular, I observed on the side of a hill, where wheat had been growing, and, to all appearance, a good crop too; but, notwithstanding, it appeared astonishing to me how it could ever enter into the head of a farmer to think of sowing anything on such a place: you could not tell whether they had been sowing stones or grain, the crop of both being equally good; in fact, there was nothing like soil to be seen—no, nothing but stones and stubble. The stoniness of the land, however, can be very well accounted for, when it is remembered that I was now travelling among the spurs of the Kittakinny Mountains, which, farther to the southward, assume the name of Blue Ridge. My principal concern now was to get my breakfast; so, after having sat down by the road-side, and taken a little nap—for I was quite worn out—I proceeded to a house standing a little way off the road, on a piece of newly cleared land. It happened to be a German house, and the people could speak no English. I sat down, however, by a fine rousing fire, and took my smoke, while preparations for breakfast went cheerily onward—I, of course, expecting to partake, but as yet not knowing whether I was to have a share or not. I was not disappointed. The good woman pointed to a chair, before which, on the table, stood a huge bowl of coffee, with suitable accompaniments. You may be sure I made the breakfast of a king; for the table, although the people appeared to be none of the richest, was, in the American style, covered to excess; and, although early in the morning, everything was as clean and neat as if they had expected company. I believe, indeed, that on this identical morning I was one of the happiest mortals on earth.

The German settlers are a quiet, industrious, and cleanly race of people. I look upon them, as a body, as among the best citizens of the United States—at least they were very good citizens to me. When I went into any of their houses, I generally, in the Scotch fashion, bade them, "Good-day to you all." This was generally answered, by the one addressed, by a shake of the head, as much as to say, "I don't understand you." My next manœuvre was to take a seat by the fire, if possible, pull out my pipe and light it, when it would not be long before some man or woman would take their seat on the opposite side of the fire, if not already there, as it were to keep me in countenance while smoking; and while whiff after whiff ascended the chimney, we would all the while be stealing glances at one another, not in a suspicious or hostile manner, but in a sort of kindly way, as it were, as if we had wished, if possible, to enter into conversation; for very commonly while this dumb-show way of friendly greeting was going forward, another individual would be placing upon the table apple-pies, milk, and other et ceteras, for the accommodation of my stomach, when the smoke was finished. In my peregrination through Pennsylvania, I met with many Dutchmen and Germans, and found my pipe to stand me in great stead. In the first place, it gave me an excuse for entering a house; and, in the second, it was a ready passport to their smoke-loving hearts. I was told by a German, that his countrymen and the Dutch, in these regions, have a great aversion to strangers—that is, to all those who cannot speak Dutch or German. That all such are by them called Irish; against whom, it seems, they have a bitter antipathy, but for what reason I could not learn. A man in such a predicament, I was further told, would travel in these parts with great danger of starving in the midst of plenty. But, thanks to my pipe, it was a good friend to me, supplying the places both of banker and interpreter.

Having filled my stomach, and thanked my kind entertainers the best way I could—for money they would take none—I set forward towards Hope, a lucky name; but the village, like the goddess frequently, turned out to be no great things. It had a dingy-looking appearance, and more of the antiquated air of European villages than any I had seen in the country. But, never mind, Hopeonians; hope is still hope—'tis the day-star, the beacon which leads men onwards from happiness to happiness, and without it the present is misery. Leaving the village behind, but not without another hope and brighter prospects before me, I jogged quietly on my way, until I reached a fine green knoll, shaded with hickory and chestnut, when I felt a most indomitable inclination to lie down and sleep. I have a great love to these green spots; they are oases in the wilderness of life; so, without more ado than choosing the shadiest chestnut, I laid myself down at its foot, and fell fast asleep. In such a position, in all good conscience I ought to have dreamed a handsome dream; and, if I had been some Samuel Johnson or other, I would have done so; but, as it was, I slept as sound as a marmot; and when I awakened, the sun was wheeling it rapidly down-hill towards the far west. My route soon abutted upon the Delaware—a charming river, with finely wooded banks—up which I wound my way, and, by-and-by, got mingled with the dismissed congregation of a neat chapel, standing among the trees. I was informed by one of them that that day had been a high day—that a new organ had been just erected—and that all the world had been there to hear it play, to their great delight and astonishment. It was certainly a strange place for a church organ; but it is just like the United States—you will there find things in the woods which can be found in no other woods in the world. In the woods, and forests, and wildernesses of other countries, you may find wild beasts, banditti, and old baronial castles, and, maybe, ruins of various sorts; but in the woods, and forests, and wildernesses of the United States, in addition to the wild beasts, which are now getting scarce, you will stumble upon rising towns, and villages, and churches, and organs, and gentlemen, and ladies; and that in places too where one would never expect to find any such things—a sure mark of the rapid march of the settlement and civilization of the country.

In proceeding up the right bank of the river, I saw some handsome farms; and, hanging by the door of a house, I observed, for the first time, strings of peppers in pods of most beautiful red and green. Almost at every house I had hitherto passed, strings of apples, peeled and sliced, were suspended against the walls, in order to dry, for preserves and pies during the winter. These are very fine, and are sent down to the southern markets by barrelsfuls.

Night began to draw on again as usual, and, as I was determined no more to lie among corn-sheaves, I thought it best to look out for a bed in time. On turning a bend of the road, a large three-story stone house, with the door standing invitingly open, struck my view. A stone house is not a very common article, at least in the parts of the United States I have travelled—of course it struck me as belonging to some nabob or other; but never mind, quoth I to myself, let us try him—much better sleeping with gentlemen than rogues or corn-sheaves—so in I went. The first object that took my attention on entering, was a tall, gaunt-looking personage, in his shirt-sleeves: this was the master of the mansion; and, sitting by the fireside, was the son, still more robustious than the sire, with a stoop in his shoulders, and a fist that might have felled an ox; there were also two or three daughters, not a whit behind the males in bone and sinew. The family seemed to me to be some odd remnant of the Titans; and, to use a homely figure, although not altogether apposite, they very much resembled so many gaunt Irish oxen. The old man, a widower, was quite conversable, and somewhat of a wag; of course he and I soon got intimate. He told me he commonly went by the name of old Jack —, I forget his last name; and he was certainly in independent circumstances; for he was very rough, swore a good deal, and prided himself in being an atheist. Whether from vanity or a fit of kindness, I know not, but he took me through all the rooms in the house, high and low; and, by the time we got down, some visitors had called, one of them a decent young man, whom I took to be a schoolmaster, from the circumstance of Jack asking me if I could write. Upon answering in the affirmative, he put a piece of chalk in my hand, intimating a wish that I should write something upon the door. Complying with his humour, I took the chalk and wrote the word Delaware backwards, at which he broke out into an uncontrollable fit of jumping about the room, and bandying the young man, as much as to say he was completely beaten at his own weapons. For supper we had boiled chestnuts; good enough things in their own place, but, like King Richard with Friar Tuck, I had strong suspicions that Jack and his family were used to stronger suppers than boiled chestnuts. It must be remembered, however, that many of the Americans, during the winter, make only two meals a-day—a breakfast and a late dinner—which accounts very well for the boiled chestnuts. Next morning's breakfast, anyhow, made amends for the meagreness of the previous night's supper; and after an invitation from my friend, Jack, to stay longer with him—but which my impatience to see what novelty the next turn of the road would present prevented me from accepting—I parted with him, and went on my way rejoicing. I proceeded about two miles further up the Delaware, and crossed that river at a small place called Columbia, remarkable for nothing that I could see but broken windows, and the piers of a bridge, which were either in course of being erected, or which had been stopped for want of funds. For want of the bridge, a man put me across in his skiff; and I think he told me that Columbia was about 200 miles above Philadelphia, following the course of the river; but it surely can't be so much as all that. I had now got into Pennsylvania, and, in appearance, into a totally different country from that which I had hitherto traversed—so much difference does the breadth of a river sometimes make. I had now got into a country where farming seemed to be better understood, where the houses were more substantially built, and the kitchens filled with pots of all sorts—copper pans burnished like gold, and shelves crowded with pewter stoups and plates—like to what I had seen in my young days in our ale-houses at home. To all these, were added a cleanliness and neatness corroborative of industry and comfort. The roads, too, were better; and the barns—yes, the Pennsylvania barns—are the most striking objects in the country, and surpass anything, I believe, of the kind in the known world, either for convenience or magnitude. In fact, they are more like factories than the things commonly called barns. In the end of one I counted no less than seven tiers of windows, all glazed and painted—true, a good many of these must have been supernumeraries, as there was one in the very angle at the top of the gable, which must certainly have been more for show than use; but it helps to shew what a Pennsylvanian Dutch farmer thinks of his barn. The lower story is used for feeding the cattle; and in the second, on each side of the house, two large folding-doors open, through which they can drive their four-horse teams, loaded with hay, et cetera, right through the house, and deposit the burden, in passing, upon the mows. One would be apt to suppose that such large houses upon a farm were built more through vanity and display than utility; but it must be remembered that Pennsylvania is a great wheat country, and that they are not in the custom of stacking it, as with us. If I mistake not, all the crop is housed; and an extensive farm, of course, must require a barn of no small size; and if one of these, filled with produce, produces no emotion of pride, or vanity, or thankfulness in the owner, I think he deserves to be without one.

When I had surmounted the bank of the river, I stood for some time to gratify my eyes with the view down the narrow valley through which the Delaware flows. The valley being narrow, the view, of course, is confined, consisting of the slopes on each side of the river, finely variegated with farm and woodland; but away to the southward, following the course of the river, the eye wanders to the verge of the horizon, there leaving the imagination to roam still farther on the fertile banks, adorned with hamlets, towns, and cities. In progressing forward, I soon came to a large brick house situated a little way off the road. I mention this house, as it was the first of the kind I had seen, and will stand as a pattern for a great many more which the traveller will afterwards meet with, especially in Virginia. In Europe there are almost as many different styles of architecture as there are houses; and, I believe, I would be nearer the truth if I had said more, for there are some houses which are built in more than one style: but, in the United States, as far as private dwellings are concerned, there is not much display of architecture. When you have seen one brick house, you have seen all the brick houses in the country; as they are all the same, with the exception of the size, and, maybe, some other trifling modification. The same may be said of the log, frame, and stone houses—the first one you see is a kind of representative of all the rest. Leaving the houses in towns out of the question, the one of which I am now speaking was the first of the kind I had hitherto seen. It was three stories high, built of brick, and of proportional extent in front; at one end was attached a wing extending backward, so as to form, with the body of the house, the two sides of a right-angled triangle. In the present instance, this wing was three stories, but in some it is two, and in others only one. Around this large building—which certainly must have belonged to a Representative at the very least—there was nothing which had the semblance of pleasure-grounds. An English gentleman, whose estate enabled him to maintain so large a house as the above, would certainly lay off a portion in green and shrubbery, by way of ornament. But the case is somewhat different with the greater part of American gentlemen. As their income is derived, not from renting out, but cultivating their property, they may be inclined to believe that the prettiest pleasure-grounds are those which are covered with wheat and Indian corn ; and I don't know but, after all, they are in the right. It may be remarked, that all these brick houses are new, and seem to be the commencement of a new order of things—a step nearer aristocracy ; the old log dwellings being by far too democratic now-a-days.

I'm not certain whether it was in this day's march or not that I went into a farm-house to rest myself. There was nobody in the house but the goodwife and her son, who was lying in bed sick of the fever. The old woman was of Dutch extraction, but spoke good English, and we soon entered into conversation.

"You don't belong to this country, I'm thinking," said she.

"No, ma'am."

"Well, what country do you come from?"

"Scotland."

"Ay, Scotland ; that's far away?"

"Yes, ma'am, a long way from this."

"Have you been long in the States?"

"No, ma'am ; I'm newly come down from Canada."

"How do you like the country?"

"Oh, very well."

"Better than the Old Country?"

"No ; I like the Old Country best."

At this the old woman was taken rather aback, for an American cannot conceive how it can be possible for any one to love the Old Country better than America. She resumed—

"I have no doubt but your country is a fine country, but then you have got a King?"

"Well, what of that, provided I love my King and country?"

"Yes, but you are all slaves."

"That requires proof ; but, supposing we are, and we prefer being slaves to freemen, what hinders us from being as happy under a Kingly as you can be under a Republican form of government? I have not been long enough in the States yet to judge fairly of the comparative merits of the two governments, as regards the well-being of the great body of the people."

She shook her head ; but as she was busy covering the table with beef, potatoes, apple-pies, milk, and so forth, she had no time to reply.

"I'm thinking," said she, after she had finished her task, "that you have not got your dinner to-day yet ; you had better sit down to table and eat something."

The old lady guessed right ; so, without further ceremony than thanking her, I sat down to discuss something much more agreeable than the merits of the two countries ; and, as the good woman had spread the table expressly for me, I must confess I liked both her and her politics the better on that account. Excepting those which I had with my friend, the hatter, in coming down the Hudson, the above was the first political debate I had in the States ; but, as I progressed farther down the country, and began to get better acquainted with the nature of the people, these disputes thickened much upon me. In fact, in that respect, I have literally had to battle my way through the country. The Americans, as far as I can see, have an idea that we are all slaves at home, or rather something worse ; nor can they comprehend how any man can be so foolish as to prefer a Monarchy to a Republic—or Europe to America. But the truth is, the Americans in general know just as much about the Old Country as the Old Country knows about them, and that is little or nothing, notwithstanding all the fine books that have been written about America and the Americans.

Having filled my stomach with apple-pie, and a second time thanked mine hostess for her kindness, I again took the road. During this day's march I travelled through a pleasant enough country ; and, towards nightfall, landed at a very comfortable-looking farm-house by the roadside, where I intended mooring for the night, provided the people were kind enough to let me stay. I entered. The evening fire was blazing cheerily up the chimney, and gleaming back from shelves well filled with pewter dishes of all sorts. Thought I, this is the very place for me ; so I addressed myself to one of three men who were sitting by the fire, taking him to be the master of the house. I was mistaken ; goodman he might be, but master he certainly was not, for, at the sound of my voice, a jolly-looking dame, who was sitting in front of the fire, with a child in her lap, turned her head round in my direction, and let fly a volley of Dutch, German, or Russian, I know not which, as I never studied these languages. It is easy, however, to translate "human natur," as Mr Slick calls it ; so, seeing there was nothing to be got there but a hearty scolding, and that not even "soft sawder"—Mr Slick's prime remedy in like desperate cases—could be of any avail, I turned upon my heel, and started for the door. I might have shaken the dust off my feet at the heroine, but as it is much more pleasant to bless than to curse, I left her to the pleasing reflections of her own good conscience, and went in search of a kindlier dwelling. Nor did I go far : the very first house I came to I was successful. To be sure it had a very ragged, wo-begotten physiognomy : 'twas evident it belonged to no Dutchman, and so much the better, thought I ; and as for its tumble-down appearance, misfortune begets commiseration, so there may be more compassion within these ragged walls than if they had been built of marble. A young man, in not much better plight than the house, was chopping firewood before the door. I asked him if he would be so kind as give me a bed for the night ; to which he gave me a ready reply, that I was welcome to such accommodation as his house afforded. We entered, and plenty of wood being heaped on, we soon had a good fire, and again I felt completely happy. The interior of the dwelling was as neat and clean as could be expected in such a crazy building ; but the principal piece of furniture that caught my attention was the mistress of the house, a very fine-looking young woman, and withal very modest, quietly going about making preparations for supper. Among other items my host asked me what countryman I was, for he said he saw I was not American. I told him, of course, that I was a Scotchman. He could not believe it. I said I could not help that; for I could not make myself be born in any other country than the one I was actually born in. To resolve his doubts he had recourse to a school geography and atlas, from which he cross-examined me for a while to his entire satisfaction, and great honour to myself. Yes, says he, I see you're a Scotchman; and we'll have supper by-and-by. I don't know exactly what idea the Americans in general have of Scotchmen, but I believe it is a good one, for the Yankees call themselves the Scotch of America, and they are pretty 'cute chaps; and I myself, in more instances than one, have been kindly treated for being born in the "land o' cakes." But, somehow or other, it sometimes happened, as in the above, that it was with difficulty I could get credit for being so; and like enough, from my puny body and light-hearted disposition, they took me for a Frenchman. On sitting down to supper, which was a most excellent one, I was surprised by a door opening in the corner behind me, and a man of gentleman-like appearance making his entrance, and quietly taking his seat at table. As, during the repast, there was little or no conversation, my mind was busy forming conjectures upon who or what the stranger might be, or what could induce him to take up his quarters in such a ruin. Having supped, he retired as silently as he came, and went up stairs again to his solitary garret. Being a stranger myself, I did not like to make any inquiries about him, but went to bed immediately on rising from table, being much fatigued with my day's travel. Contrary to expectation, my supper, as I have said, was a good one, and my bed, to my no small surprise, was still better. The bed was soft as down, and the sheets as white as soap and bleaching could make them; and although the sickly state of the walls afforded quite a sufficiency of moonlight through them, yet I found myself remarkably comfortable, and it was not long ere gentle sleep, the friend of the weary, with its soothing and balmy influence, came stealing over my eyelids. Before I sleep, however, I wish to make this remark, that the Americans, whether they can get clothes and houses or not, always manage, somehow or other, to get plenty to eat. The above remark, too, does not rest for its truth only upon the state of things as seen in the house I am now lying in, but upon a great many more instances of the like kind, which I could mention.

Next morning, after having breakfasted and helped the man to gather some apples for the cider-press, I started upon further adventures. To-day I passed some lakes, which, however, the people called ponds—pretty large ponds, forsooth—but the Americans are so used to big rivers and lakes, that a stream which, in England, would make a most noble Thames, in America is only a branch or creek; and a lake which, in the Old Country, would form an important part in the landscape to the splendid palace on its shore, in the New is only a pond—nothing but a mere pond. No wonder doctors differ. My first resting-place was at a small cottage at the foot of a hill, or rather rock, close by the wayside. One room was the only chamber in the dwelling, but, like the generality of American rooms, it was clean and neat. A good bed stood in one corner, and before it, on the ground, was a rug to keep the feet warm and dry on retiring to rest. By the fire was an elbow-chair, and in said chair sat a little old man, with a nightcap on his head, while his old helpmate was "todlin" about the house, doing various little, necessary turns. The old man was pleasant and sociable, and he and I soon got into familiar conversation. He was, moreover, a Methodist minister, and whether I told him or not that I was brought up in the Presbyterian persuasion I don't recollect, but I know we managed to get pretty deep into the comparative merits of the Arminian and Calvinistic creeds. The latter and its reputed author he held in utter abhorrence. Being no great adept in school divinity, the little old man had things pretty much his own way; and if his discourse did not shew much learning or cogency of reasoning, it at least shewed the goodness of his heart—a thing much superior. He dwelt much upon the passage, "God is love," and, of course, deduced from it his conclusions that such a good being could not possibly doom any son of Adam to eternal damnation. But he ought to have remembered, and the Methodists along with him, that there are a great many more passages than the above in the Bible, and also that the Supreme Being possesses a great many more attributes besides that of love. Further, the Arminians ought to recollect that no descendant of fallen Adam has any right, claim, or title to the least particle of the love of God; and that, thousands of years ago, our fallen ancestor subscribed virtually and de facto to his own damnation. Further yet, it is declared by an express revelation, that man cannot save himself; and, in the nature of things, it is utterly impossible that he could do so, however willing. Well, then, the whole work of man's salvation must necessarily rest upon God, who is love, both to will and to do 'of his own good pleasure. But all men are not saved. God, then, does not vouchsafe of his love to those who are not saved, or else they would be so, for God is stronger than man. I have already said that I am not much versed in theology; for a voucher, therefore, I give the Arminians the Apostle Paul. Perhaps they look upon him as no great authority in the question, but he is the best I have; and from what little study I have given his writings, it is very plain to my mind, that, in every sense of the word, he was a strict Calvinist; or rather Calvin, far from being the author of the creed which goes by his name, was, in reality, a strict Paulist. So much for divinity. Having got my smoke, and the old man's blessing, I trudged along the road again. Little worthy of remark occurred to-day; I passed through much the same kind of country as heretofore ; and in the evening I passed Nazareth on my right, it not lying exactly on my course. It is inhabited, I believe, principally by the Moravian brethren. At night I slept at a German's house, and the people were kind enough to me. In the morning—and a most beautiful morning it was—I started early, and got to Bethlehem somewhere in the forenoon. It is a fine town, and finely situated on the Lehigh ; very clean, with a handsome inn and some large stores. It is the headquarters of the Moravian brethren in Pennsylvania, if not in the United States. The Society's buildings are on a large scale, resembling colleges, barracks, or cotton-mills, as you like to take it ; and, I think, somebody told me, they possessed a great deal of property throughout the town.

CLARKSON AND THE MESSRS WILBERFORCE.

To the Editor of Tail's Edinburgh Magazine.

SIR,—You have manifested so warm an interest in Mr Clarkson's cause, against his depreciators, that I am encouraged to forward to you a communication, the first portion of which, concerning no one but myself, would not merit your attention ; but it will be compensated by what follows.

In my supplement to Mr Clarkson's Strictures on the Life of Mr Wilberforce, I have stated that the books of the Abolition Society, instead of proving that Mr Wilberforce from the beginning directed the Society, (as stated by the biographers,) shew him in scarcely any other light than as being engaged to conduct their cause in the House of Commons. Commenting on their statement that the Committee were persuaded, by Mr Wilberforce's arguments, to modify and rescind certain resolutions, I said, "There is no trace in the books of any modifying," &c. ; but, at the same time, I (p. 131) quoted a minute of the 28th of July 1788, directing that Mr Clarkson should pay regard to "advice contained in Mr Wilberforce's letter of the 8th of July." Now, to my great surprise, I have just discovered in the books the very minute the existence of which I so unqualifiedly denied. It is in these words:—

"15th July 1788.

"The resolution of the committee on the 1st instant, for calling a general meeting of the Society on the 7th of August next, being read ; and many doubts respecting the expediency of the measure, at this juncture, having arisen in the minds of several members ; and a letter from William Wilberforce, dated Rayrigg, the 8th instant, to the treasurer, containing many forcible arguments against it, being produced—

"Resolved unanimously—'That the calling a general meeting of the Society be for the present suspended.'"

This minute fully justifies the statement of the Messrs Wilberforce as to this one transaction ; and I very much regret my unaccountable oversight. I owe to the Messrs Wilberforce an apology for my mistake ; but I owe it to myself to remark, that it was, after all, absolutely immaterial as to the great question at issue between them and Mr Clarkson. The only object of these citations from the books is, to shew how much or how little Mr Wilberforce actually interfered in the business of the Committee, beyond what must be done by any one who conducts Parliamentary business. Now, this newly discovered minute adds nothing to the information given by the one before printed by me. It still remains a very remarkable fact, that there is no evidence on the books of Mr Wilberforce having ever suggested a single idea, beyond that of warning the Committee against giving "offence to the Legislature by forced, unnecessary associations." Mr Clarkson having organized the Society, and brought Mr Wilberforce into connexion with it, proceeded to establish Societies through the kingdom ; Mr Wilberforce, with the instinct of a friend and partisan of Mr Pitt, naturally enough objected to so much agitation, and succeeded in checking what he thought too active measures ! And on this single act rests the right of Mr Wilberforce's son to represent him as the Director of the Committee. I have set out the several references to him.

I have now, sir, to lay before you a document of a very different character. You will bear in mind that the biographers state, that Mr Wilberforce had received so unfavourable an impression of the character of Mr Clarkson's history, that he, at one time, resolved not to read it ! Now, the letter which Mr Wilberforce wrote to Mr Clarkson, on receiving a presentation copy, has been very lately found. I send you a copy of it, because it supplies a most significant comment on that text:—

"May 20, 1808.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have been, for several days, intending (indeed ever since I heard the book was out) to write to Mr Allen, to beg him to secure me a copy. That which is now on my table will be more valuable to me, on account of its being your gift. I shall assign it a distinguished place in my library, as a memorial of the obligations under which all who took part in the Abolition must ever be to you, for the persevering exertions by which you so greatly contributed to the final victory. That the Almighty may bless all your other labours of love, and inspire you with a heart to desire, a head to devise, and health and spirits to execute them and carry them through, is the cordial wish and prayer of your faithful friend, &c.

"W. WILBERFORCE.

"I beg my remembrances to Mrs Clarkson. My wife would join ; but I never get to her, at Broomfield, from Monday morning to Saturday afternoon or Sunday morning."

This letter does not amount to a recognition of the correctness of Mr Clarkson's statements, (Mr Wilberforce's continued friendship with Mr Clarkson to the day of his death prove that ;) but the letter is in this respect very remarkable; that while others have idly objected to Mr Clarkson's History on the ground that it contained too much of Mr Clarkson's own doings, Mr Wilberforce assigns it a distinguished place in his library, for no other reason than it is a " memorial of the obligations of all Abolitionists to him for his persevering exertions"—that is, because it records his own actions. The pious prayer that follows shews in what estimation Mr Wilberforce held the " other labours of love," " the heart to desire, the head to devise," &c. of his friend. Mr Wilberforce, writing such a letter, had no presentiment that his sons, becoming his biographers, would one day endeavour to cast all possible reproach on that same book; that they would not refer to it as an authority even when their statements had no other authority; asserting of it that it contains numberless misstatements, which they declined pointing out ! Nor did he anticipate at any time that they would do—what the public are sufficiently apprized of, and it may be added, have generously resented.

It must be allowed that the attempt to degrade has been turned into the conferring of honour ; and that it is to the Messrs Wilberforce that Mr Clarkson is indebted for this ; that he has been allowed to take possession, during his life, of a portion of that " estate " which good men, as well as wits, in the usual course of events, " inherit after death." Had the Messrs Wilberforce never written, posterity would have assuredly assigned Mr Clarkson the first, and Mr Wilberforce the second place of glory, in effecting the Abolition of the Slave-trade ; but Mr Clarkson's merits would not, without their fostering aid, have been thus honouringly and honourably acknowledged during his life.—I am, Sir, yours,

H. C. ROBINSON.

GUIZOT ON DEMOCRACY.*

THE work, the title of which we have subjoined, was originally written by M. Guizot, as a contribution to one of the latest numbers of the Revue Francaise—a Doctrinaire monthly periodical, commenced in the last years of the Restoration, suspended in 1830, and revived in 1837. The second series is, in our opinion, destined to possess no farther value than as representing, in some sort, the registry of the decease of that political and philosophical eclecticism the registry of whose birth was represented by series the first. M. Guizot's contribution has had the honour of being twice translated into English, the one quoted by us being the second and best translation. It has also been done into German, praised and quoted by both Whig and Tory journals, and designated to the public as an important tract on an important subject.

The importance of the subject we are by no means disposed to deny. It is immense and urgent : immense, for the safety of generations depends on it—urgent, for a time approaches when the solution of the problem may, with us, as throughout all Europe, be imperiously called for. And, whatever may be said, it is to a presentiment of this epoch universally diffused—to the too long despised power of this word, DEMOCRACY, dazzling us here in the first page, and which, though branded not long since as the watchword of certain obscure fanatics, now meets us as if by enchantment—the nucleus of all questions of any weight—the burden of all writers, even the most quiet-loving, to whatever rank they may belong : to this it is we attribute, in a great degree, the interest that M. Guizot's pamphlet seems to have excited ; for its real importance is, in our opinion—(can we hope to be pardoned by our Whig and Tory contemporaries?)—none, or next to none. Perhaps the most evident lesson it teaches, is the incapacity of the Doctrinaire or Juste-Milieu school to comprehend the existing question, and the inevitable degradation of superior talents, as often as they undertake the defence of an unjust cause.

The abilities of M. Guizot are really superior, and destined him for something better than the part he has played since 1830.† Freely disposed

* Democracy in Modern Communities, translated from the French of M. Guizot. London : Senior. 1838.

† " How can M. Guizot bring himself to lay his noble mind at the service of the intriguers and jackals of a Court ? How can he, who is an honest man, feel himself at ease in the midst of a ministerial crew, so servile and depraved ? Does not he, who has so closely inspected the bottom of so many false hearts—of so many debauched consciences—of so much venal or pride-pandering corruption—does not he blush to his eyelids at the position he fills ? How can he, a Protestant, whose ancestors endured persecution for the liberty of religious opinion, forbid the liberty of political opinion to those who have been the sovereign manipulators of charters, of oaths, and of kings ? He who demanded the abolition of the punishment of death, how could he propose that writers should be condemned to the thousand times more cruel penalty of transportation—to the sullenness of a desert isle, under a sky of fire ? He, a man of feeling and taste, how could he set material interests, so coarse and brutal, above the interests of morals—above the sacred love of country and liberty—above all those noble affections which are the life, the charm, and the grandeur of a civilized people ? God has permitted him so much evil, in chastisement for his pride. . . . Pride fills too much of his soul, to leave any room there for other sentiments. He would be the first to dive into the ocean, for that he should drown would be contrary to the fitness of things ; and he believes in his own infallibility with a violent and desperate faith.

" M. Guizot is of short and slender stature ; but he has expressive features, and fine eyes, with extraordinary fire in their glance. His bearing and aspect have something severe and pedantic, as have all the professors, and particularly those of the Doctrinaire sect—the sect of pride. His voice is full, sonorous, and positive—if it exhibit not the flexible emotions of the soul, it is rarely hollow or husky."—Studies on the Parliamentary Orators, by Timon, (M. Cormenin,) 1837.

to do justice to his volumes on European History, though they are destitute of all insight into the future—recognising the gravity and the conscientiousness of his disquisition on our own Revolution, though the light in which he compares it with the French Revolution, appears to us totally false—ready to admit all that there is of excellence in his character, provided it be also admitted that the love of power has modified it considerably—we do not contest his right to the first place among the men who compose the Doctrinaire phalanx. Alone, perhaps, among them, does he possess the qualities requisite for the chief of a party; for he alone, perhaps, has a decided system and a resolute purpose—he alone knows from whence he is setting out, and whither he wants to go. The middle-class Aristocracy which has substituted itself for that of blood, has not a more able supporter, a more faithful representative than he. Only, what are we to say of a party who thus make intelligence slay its best friends—who force men, matured by searching historical study, to break the law of continuity, which is the very foundation of history—sturdy spirits, to speak in misty and unintelligible phrases—hardy and choleric politicians, to recoil before the antagonist, Idea—to attack it by by-paths, and never confront it bravely and honourably?

All this there is in the pamphlet of M. Guizot.

All this there is; and, what is still worse, there is nothing but this. Wherefore, we should not have cared to write these few pages, had we not espied danger, on the one hand, in the exaggerated reputation which, for some time—not without design perhaps, on the part of certain persons—has been gaining currency amongst us for M. Guizot, the statesman; and if, on the other hand, we had not found in this little essay a summary expression of the general tactics that govern the operations and discussions, parliamentary or otherwise, of the entire party.

The danger we refer to is that of suffering to be resold to ourselves—brushed, smartened, trimmed, and disguised by a Continental cut—those very clothes that M. Guizot bought from us some fifteen years since; that of becoming enamoured of a translation, just precisely when we begin to weary of the original; that of retracing a road already gone over, fancying ourselves all the while on the march forward. We can now but enunciate this danger, without further explanation; with a promise to return to it, should the case occur.

Their tactics, summed up in as few words as possible, are these:—Whenever you desire to refute a principle and impede its action for the future, begin by approving all that it has effected in the past. You risk nothing by accepting what is accomplished Fact; and you give yourself an appearance of impartiality and moderation, which, with the majority of readers, will create a presumption in your favour. The business of the past thus settled, you have nothing further to do with it—all your efforts are to be directed to the perversion of the principle—a question falsified is a question destroyed. Take the material expression of the principle, the mechanical process of its agency, and constantly substitute this last enunciation for the enunciation of the principle itself. Analyse the principle, then take, one by one, and separately, the elements composing it, and shew what there is incomplete in each of them. Never look at the whole—never define—nothing more dangerous—talk phrases—be positive; and, if you succeed so far as to get your position of the question accepted, the victory is yours, and in the deduction from your premises you may play the logician at your ease.

We are much deceived if, among all the political works of the school known as the firm of Cousin, Guizot, & Co., there be found a single one that does not, more or less, betray the influence of the above system. And this we can rapidly verify by the little sample before us.

The democratical Fact exists; it exists in a state of power; it has fought, conquered, destroyed other rival powers. Like the ghost in Hamlet, it reveals itself here, there, and everywhere. Some hope in it, others tremble at it, none deny it. Of the two writers who furnished M. Guizot with the occasion for his article, the one, M. Billiard, belonging to the Republican creed, maintains, in his "Essay on the Democratic Organization of France," that the existing condition of society "must inevitably tend to establish an equality of political rights, universal suffrage, and, in fact, end in a republic." The other, M. Alletz, yesterday siding with the Carlists, to-day with the Doctrinaires, asserts, in his book "On the New Democracy, or the Habits and Influence of the Middle Classes," that "the natural result of this condition is the consolidation of a constitutional monarchy, (as established by the Revolution of 1830,) in the spirit of the charter, and in the persons of the present dynasty." If democracy be nothing more, as his title would indicate, than the aristocracy of the middle classes, he is perfectly right; but "all unanimously concur in admitting that the present state of society is thoroughly democratic, and that the democratic principle will ultimately triumph over every other." Let us not, however, suppose that M. Guizot mistakes his path so far as rashly to abjure this principle; far from it—he takes it under his protection. "Assuredly," says he, "there must be truth, considerable truth, in this opinion." Is there not, as it were, a shade of sadness hovering over these words? It may be—and that is all; a mere passing cloud, a weakness hastily suppressed. M. Guizot performs his part with tolerable grace; he creates himself the historian of democracy: he recounts and confirms its conquests. "It has destroyed"—these admissions are precious—"the feudal system, or the personal power of one man over another, by virtue of the right of property; the system of castes, or the immovable and perpetual concentration of social privileges and power in the hands of a few; the system of the right divine, lay or ecclesiastical—that is, the presumption of representing God upon earth, and the suppression of all human control over power: these are the victories of modern democracy. They are victories at once glorious and legitimate."—P. 16.

Now, should we not expect that M. Guizot would go on to educe the law of the movement of futurity from a principle endowed with so much vitality? Should we not expect that, whilst seeking to imbue its march with regularity, he would go on to assign its future conquests? Should we not suppose that, strong in the past and in that prophetic series of successive emancipations so logically accomplished, he would go on to cry in the ear of the retrograde and stationary—"Movement is the law of the world; all your efforts will but communicate a violent and dangerous character to that force whose action will evolve itself mildly and productively if it encounter no obstacles. You could not prevent the transmutation of the slave into the serf, of the serf into the peasant and artisan—you will not prevent the transmutation of the peasant and artisan into the citizen."

Alas, no! This would be logical enough for us, who have no reason for halting on our route; but not so for M. Guizot. He has two systems of logic; one for the past, the other for the future—or rather for the existing state of things—which he intends to maintain as long as possible. M. Guizot is revolutionary—but only to the year 1830; progressive—but only to the amended charter of the 7th of August. On that day democracy should have sent in her resignation. In destroying the aristocracy of blood, she did well—M. Guizot is not noble; but for the moneyed or middle class aristocracy, let her beware of touching it—M. Guizot is of the middle class. If she has overturned the eldest branch of the Bourbons, so far so right; but for the youngest, that is immortal. And so with the rest. What talk you of the eternal rights of humanity—of the incessant working going on in its bosom? Entire humanity has worked but to achieve the charter of 1830; and, perhaps, too, the laws of September worked just so far as to attain the system of M. Guizot. Humanity is truly fortunate; she has now only to repose in quiet. By a legislative labour of seven hours, the seventh of August raised those Pillars of Hercules, beyond which there is to be no progress.

What if some one should say to M. Guizot—There are no pillars of Hercules known to progression? God alone has fixed them; and we know not how he should have revealed his secret to you. In virtue of what right, of what criterion, of what principle, then, do you dare to determine their place? On what law do you rest yourself, in pronouncing that certain conquests of the human mind are lawful, while others are not so? How do you dare to approve the past, if it be not in virtue of a principle traced up to God himself, and legitimating the movement hitherto pursued? If you possess the knowledge of this principle, why not proclaim it boldly? Can it be that this principle would be inconvenient to you? If, instead of bowing down only before the material Fact of conquests already accomplished, you should recognise in this Fact a manifestation of the will of that God who is the eternal source of the life of humanity, would you not also be compelled to ratify all the conquests that humanity may accomplish in the future? These conquests which you have just approved are either merely the fruit of chance, of capricious revolt crowned with success—and, in that case, by what title do they appear to you glorious; by what title do you declare them legitimate—that is to say, in conformity with the law of the existence of humanity—or, rather, they are the effect of a divine impulse, in accordance with which men unceasingly strive to develop themselves—to associate themselves—to perfect themselves—to approximate themselves to that UNITY willed by God when he caused humanity to proceed from a single man—to that LIBERTY willed by God when, placing before them good and evil, right and wrong, he made them responsible for their choice—to that EQUALITY (which is, at bottom, but liberty for all, and without which liberty is but a bitter deception) willed by God when he gave to all an immortal soul, called to the same certain end—to that ASSOCIATION, lastly, willed by God when he made man a being essentially social, and unable to exist where there exists not a common law, a common aim, a common consent, a common co-operation: and, in this case, how dare you fix an arbitrary limit to the activity of this impulse? How dare you shackle the march of the People? How dare you hinder them from overturning successively all the obstacles that ambition and selfishness may heap on their route? The People first encountered the aristocracy of the nobles, and overturned it. It did well, say you: true—but why will it not do equally well in overturning all else that may rise before it? France has overthrown Louis XVI. and Charles X. She did well, say you still. But was it because Louis XVI. and Charles X. were called by these particular names that she did well; or, is it that she would do well to overthrow every influence, by what name soever called, which threatens to strike at her nationality, her honour, her liberty of progress? Very evidently, it cannot be from a detail, but from a principle, that we must deduce the legitimacy of the undertakings of humanity. It cannot be the overthrow of the aristocracy of nobility, or of any particular man who may encroach on the rights of the mass, that forms its destiny, but rather the overthrow of ARISTOCRACY, by whatever term of privilege and exclusiveness it may be called—whether it may be incarnate as a man or as a caste, as a king or as a tribune, as an individual or as an assembly; and, by interdicting the democracy from combating the aristocracy of the middle classes, whilst you are lauding its contests with the higher classes, are you doing aught else than renouncing every rational basis for the appreciation of events, and substituting for law the caprices of your own individual impressions?

To this—judging from his pamphlet—M. Guizot has little to offer in reply ; at least, nothing directly ; but, by suddenly changing his ground, he takes the question in another point of view. You can—he says to Democracy—you can only reject, overthrow, destroy ; you can build nothing ; you possess not a single positive principle able to organize anything. Now, the world cannot repose on ruins—cannot live on negations. Thus, it is not I who desire to arrest progression ; it is you who are unable to produce it. Answer me that.

There is in this argument, coming from M. Guizot, a great deal of chicanery, which we could be well content to meet by a series of interrogations.

What is to destroy ? we would ask of M. Guizot—What is to build ? Is not to reject anything, to affirm its contrary ? When the religion of Christ superseded the Pagan belief of two nations, and produced, in consequence, the Abolition of Slavery in Europe, did it not make for humanity the first essential step towards its union ? When Democracy rejected the feudal power, did it not affirm human liberty ? When it overthrew the influence of castes, did it not proclaim the equality of men amongst each other ? On these two bases of all association, has there not been organized, in America, something which, though far from being faultless in our eyes, yet lives, proceeds, and prospers, at least as much as any government now existing in Europe ? Moreover, would not the argument have applied at the very birth of Democracy as well as at the present day ? and, if it had been applied and admitted, should we not have been deprived of those two conquests or successive overthrows which M. Guizot proclaims to be glorious and legitimate ? Would it not have been far more natural to affirm that no principle can effect the work of organization till it has annihilated the opposing principle in all its manifestations ; and that the aristocratic principle not being yet conquered—since its existence in the middle classes is the very pith of the present question—we have no right to reproach the still unthroned Democracy with its inaptitude for organization ? When we have asked all this, we shall have done but one half of our questioning. But it is our wish to meet M. Guizot on his own ground.

Democracy (says M. Guizot) has only two principles wherewith to re-organize. These are—"Personal sovereignty, or the right of every individual over himself ; the sovereignty of the number—which its partisans, in order to disguise it, term the sovereignty of the People—or the right of the majority over the minority. Whoever considers modern Democracy closely, will discover that all its ideas, all its attempts at social organization issue from and finally return to these principles."—P. 17. He then goes on to examine these one by one, (see above,) and thence to prove the impotence of these two principles, which should, on the contrary, harmonize themselves into a true Democratic constitution. This should be particularly remarked ; for, in the separate consideration of two elements equally sacred in our eyes—but which are only complete the one by the other—rests all the force of M. Guizot's pamphlet.

Straitened as we are for space, we cannot stop to point out our author's errors in what he says on personal sovereignty. Besides, no one maintains that the sovereignty of the individual over himself can singly furnish the basis of a charter for the social system. All association has a common end ; and this is not implied in the right of each over himself. Agreeing, then, at bottom, we shall only observe, that M. Guizot's assault on this principle is, on his part, a logical error. His philosophy, in fact, like all the eclectic philosophy, rests on no other basis than this very sovereignty of Eco.

But, on the Sovereignty of the People—a phrase which, in accordance with the tactics before explained, M. Guizot abandons for that of the sovereignty of the number—we have much to observe.

First, On a close examination of the argument, we find that all M. Guizot's declamation on the oppression of the minority by the majority—the inevitable consequence, he says, of the sovereignty of the People—goes to object to the consent of the greatest number, that same right of each individual over himself, which he has the moment before been condemning. The right of the minority cannot, indeed, be aught else than the right of a part against the whole—that is, of individuality against association.

Secondly, What is the meaning of all this argument coming from a constitutional writer and ex-minister ? What is a constitutional government, such as now exists, if it be not a government of the majority ? What decides the proceedings of the State, unless a majority of Parliament ? Whence the nature and bias of a majority of Parliament, save from a majority of electors ? Only, as in ancient states, there were a mass of slaves without the pale of all institutions, political and social, there are now an unrepresented People without the sphere in which power is constituted : but in what does this change the question ? In the system that M. Guizot attacks, parliamentary majorities would represent the majority of the nation ; now, they represent but the majority of a small fraction. Is that, perchance, the advantage of the present system ? Taking M. Guizot's position, there are now two oppressions, in place of one, on the part of the Parliamentary majority—an immediate oppression of the parliamentary minority or of the represented ; an eventual oppression of the whole mass of the unrepresented. In our system there would be but one—the first. The inconvenience pointed out, then, belongs to both systems, but to his much more than to ours. To parry this, M. Guizot would have but one remedy—that of right divine, and the infallibility of power. Perhaps he has detected this ; perhaps his constant choice of examples from the constitution of a family, hides an instinctive predilection for a government of a paternal despotism. He dares not, at all times, be logical ; perhaps, also, it occurs to him that there is hope that France may a second time find its saviour in him. It is by the aid of this parliamentary majority that his friends strive to reconquer it for him.

Moreover, this is not the question ; and all this solicitude for minorities, pleasant enough from the mouth of a minister who declared from the tribune that it was necessary to govern by fear, tends but to falsify it.

As respects society, there is oppression only where there is injustice. Whenever what is done is out of regard to the good, to the duty, to the object, to the principle of association, there is, on the one side, a right to impose—on the other, a duty to submit : selfishness alone can then complain. Are the chances greater, however, that this may happen under the system to which M. Guizot belongs, than under our own ? In other words, is it more easy to find the expression of a love for the general good, which is the object of association, in the universality of the elements composing it—that is, in the People ; or, rather, in a class—that is, in some one of these elements, in some one of these interests, no matter whether patrician or territorial ?

There is the question—there only—and the ex-minister has not even hinted at it. To be in a position to judge of it, or even to throw the least light on it, a beginning must be made by a sound, rational, and complete definition of the words people and sovereignty. M. Guizot has not done so. He has altogether taken the material fact for the principle—the sign for the idea—the effect for the cause. In the People, he sees but an agglomeration of a certain number of individual interests—in the sovereignty, one numeral greater than another—in the will of the national majority, a caprice.

Now, it is not true that the People is but the sum, the agglomeration of the interests of all the individuals. A People—and we have said it before, in an article on Siamondi—our People is not a class, even though it should be the most numerous ; it includes all—it is not a mob drawn together by chance. It is an association of men on an ascertained territory, with an ascertained language ; it is one country, one law, a moral and material unity, a common interest, a common aim—all this it is that constitutes a nationality. And in this there is nothing of obscurity, or of abstruse theory : The first among us who, being asked, “ Who are you ? ” shall proudly reply, “ I am a Briton,” will say all that we have just said. He will express, by these words, that he has a country—that he is attached to it—that he seeks, not only the satisfaction of his moral and physical wants as a man and an individual, but also as an Englishman and a citizen—that he not only cherishes his own honour, but that he feels himself bound also to that of his country—that, not only does he like to be able to carry his head boldly amidst his family, and in his personal transactions, but also before the children of other nations—that he desires that his country's flag should be environed with love at home, and welcomed with respect and sympathy abroad—that it is his wish that the rank and the mission marked out for his nation, by her situation, her strength, and the principles of her constitution, should be faithfully preserved. In a word, that he recognises in himself a double existence, personal and social.

Neither is it any truer that the Sovereignty is but a numeral more or less great ; for the Sovereignty is not power, but the legitimacy of power ; and this legitimacy in an association can only be found in its tendency to discharge its functions in the stead and for the good of the entire body—that is, for the common end, for the common interest, and for the common progress. Wherever this is not, power is an usurper. The Sovereignty of the People signifies, then, the sovereignty of the national aim—the sovereignty of a tendency to the progressive welfare of the association. Now, this tendency that constitutes the legitimacy of power, should manifest itself by acts. There must, then, be established a mode of verifying it by the test of action ; so that the legitimacy of power may be contested if this tendency be wanting, or the submission and co-operation of all be guaranteed if it be present. Now only begins, if we may so call it, the question of the numeral.

The democratical opinion maintains, that the universality of the nation, for whose good power ought to execute its functions if it desire to be legitimate, is alone able to judge whether what has been done be for its good, and that the only possible means of expressing this conviction, is national or universal suffrage.

The opinion with which M. Guizot sides, maintains that to a fraction of the nation belongs the right of suffrage, and that of judging if the functions of power be employed for the common end, for the good of the universality.

But, whatever may be the solution adopted, how, after these brief explanations, are we to estimate the language of M. Guizot ? how describe the cunning with which he endeavours to terrify consciences, by likening the exercise of the national sovereignty to that of brutal and capricious force, by constantly talking of the aggregate and the numeral without announcing what they represent ? Whom does he pretend to refute, when he cries, in the tone of an alarmed moralist, that the will alone is not the legitimate law of man, that it cannot make what is just unjust, and that “ reason and justice are completely supreme over all will ? ” This is perfectly true ; but Democracy admits this supremacy of the moral law as fully as M. Guizot—she admits it so fully that she is seeking which may be her better method for its interpretation and application. But, as M. Guizot has not the law in his pocket—as it is written only in the history and experience of generations—as it has not yet been proved to her that either M. Guizot, or his friends, or the doctrine he preaches, are universal history and experience incarnate—she inquires whether she be more likely to see it oftenest interpreted and applied, by confiding it to the whole of society or to a minority? In treating of the existence or non-existence of the law, M. Guizot has discussed a question that does not exist—that no one has provoked. Now, if it be permitted to discuss the value of democracy, it is not permitted to calumniate it—it is not permitted to M. Guizot, if he really mean well, and therefore conscientiously studies the opinions and progress of the age, to be ignorant of the ground on which the democrats of the present day pursue their labours—it is not permitted to him, a continental writer, to be ignorant that, all around him, the formula Sovereignty of the People, is better understood at this day than it was in the time of Rousseau—to be ignorant that existing democracy has far outstepped the narrow and reactionary idea of right—that she is no longer in the hands of materialism—that she has inscribed on her flag, God and the People—that the word duty has sprung up to aggrandize the question, and endue it with all the sanctity of a religious source—to be ignorant of La Mennais, of the principal political schools of his own country, and of the entire associations of other lands, that have for their point of departure the ideas we have set forth.

Neither can it be allowed, as we have already remarked, to separate, one by one, for the purpose of refuting, the elements of a complex idea, without taking into account what may proceed from their combination; for it is not by analysing the substances composing a medicine, and discovering each to be pernicious or inefficacious, that we form our opinion of its value.

The sovereignty of the individual is legitimate.

The sovereignty of the people is legitimate.

For there is a sphere of action, springing entirely from the individual, which lives in him, having respect to the personal wants of his physical and moral life; and for these it is necessary that the individual sovereignty exercise itself freely.

And there is a sphere of social action, springing from the ideas of country and nationality—from a common aim—from the vital principle of association, internally and externally applied; and for these it is necessary that the social sovereignty be admitted and exercised without obstacle;—but the social sovereignty cannot reside in a fraction of the society, but in the whole.

These two spheres spring from a principle—from a superior law, reflected in the conscience of the individual, for individual acts—in the conscience of the reunited nation, for social acts.

Now then, is it good, as to the acts of individual life, that the individual himself intervene to watch, as far as in him, to the support and amelioration of the means necessary to his accomplishing them unfettered?

Is it good, as to the acts of the social life, that society itself intervene to watch that they be accomplished with the least possible departure from the superior moral law—the primitive source of all sovereignty?

Or, is it better for the one and for the other,

that a very small minority, chosen by the hazard of birth or fortune, be intrusted to fulfil this function of surveillance, without test, without control, save that of violence.

Save, we say, that of violence; for, in fact, that no minority can abolish—it is the source of revolutions, and it is also the only one that the adversaries of Democracy, by, we know not what fatal blindness, open to the people; they even approve it—for every revolution accomplished, is with them legitimate, and a passage is to be found in M. Guizot's pamphlet, admitting it as a right.*

Such is the way in which every conscientious writer should state the question, when about to treat of universal suffrage and "Democracy in Modern Communities." To state it as M. Guizot does, is to deceive the reader, and to be self-condemned to say nothing useful.

When the question shall have been thus stated and resolved, it will remain to examine what is the best organization to conciliate and harmonize the two spheres; and then, which is the speediest and most efficacious path for throwing more and more of the light of the sovereign moral law on the souls of men, so that the People may wander from it as little and as seldom as possible. The solution of the first question will be a plan of organization; that of the second, a plan of general education.

We are not going to enter on this at the present moment; we were only desirous of proving that M. Guizot has not even thought of it, and that, consequently, his pamphlet, translated, retranslated, and be-praised, cannot furnish a single idea, abstract or practical, to advance the discussion a single step.

We will proceed to his conclusions, and we may then ask what may be learned from them:—

"Permanent unity of social opinion represented by the government!" Who does not desire this? But a few questions necessarily present themselves:—Does this unity exist at present?—Did it exist in France eight years ago, when a revolution exploded that you applaud?—What guarantee do you give us, other than the individual sovereignty of your own intelligence, that it exists at the present hour?—Does a government represent the unity of the social tendency when it is in a state of permanent struggle, and when millions proclaim the contrary?—Who guarantees, who verifies this representation, when the majority is deprived of all means of so doing?—What protection do you furnish to the nation against monopoly, against the substitution of the ends of private interest, of the wishes of a privileged class—against the substitution of these for the general good, and the advancement of the general interest? Does the ex-minister resolve one of these questions?

* "Permanent and universal rights are all centred in the right of obeying only such dispositions as are just and wise. Variable rights are all comprised in the right of suffrage,—that is to say, in the right of passing judgment, directly or indirectly, upon the wisdom of laws and government."—P. 42. Thus, disobedience is placed in a more favourable condition than the expression of the wherefore we find ourselves compelled to disobey.

"Respect for public authorities!" Who does not desire this? But is it not necessary to ascertain that all their dispensations are just and wise?

"Subordination of individual inclinations to the law?" Who does not desire this? But is it not, beyond all things, necessary to see whether the power that makes the law be legitimate? Is not the law the prerogative of sovereignty? And is not the source of sovereignty the very question at issue?

"Partition of rights according to capacity!" Well—very well; but here arise a crowd of questions. What is capacity? Is it intelligence? Is it morality? Who is to measure capacity? What is to be the standard? Works—public, social works? Who so fit a judge as society? If the power of various abilities, some law must be defined for its application? And where is the college to which we can blindly confide that function? Are we to take the tax-collector's list as the just valuation of the human faculty, and translate intellect into pounds?

To these questions, M. Guizot offers no reply. Thus much the oracle utters—divine it who can:—

"The capacity here spoken of, is not merely that of intellectual developement, or the possession of this or that particular faculty; it is a complex and profound whole, comprising spontaneous authority, habitual situation, and natural acquaintance with the different interests to be regulated: in fact, a certain aggregate of faculties, knowledge, and methods of action, which animate the whole man; and which decide with more certainty than his spirit alone upon his course of conduct, and the use which he will make of power."—P. 43.

What a precise definition of the capacity for an elector! What a foundation for an improved system of government!

And, a page afterwards:—"Its (rights of suffrage) legitimate limit is a concealed principle which unfolds itself in a ratio with the material and moral developement of society: and, in a free community, in proportion as this principle is well or badly defined in its laws; so that community is well or ill governed, and becomes steady or unsteady, under the hand of its government."—P. 44. What a splendid discovery!

We will take our leave of M. Guizot with one more extract, to which our readers will be, by this time, prepared to yield a hearty assent: "It cannot be that truth imposes upon man so much confusion, impossibility, and incoherence."—P. 23.

J. M.

MRS BROUGHTON'S SIX YEARS' RESIDENCE IN ALGIERS.

ABOUT the beginning of the present century, Henry Stanyford Blanckley, Esq., held the appointment of his Britannic Majesty's Agent and Consul-General at Algiers, then an important and delicate post. If without definite duties, Mr Blanckley seems also to have held a general superintendence in the Mediterranean. He was a judicious and highly popular public functionary, acting on all emergencies with remarkable courage and good sense. It is, however, with his lady that we are principally concerned. Mrs Blanckley and her little daughters accompanied the Consul to Algiers; and, during a six years' residence there, she kept a diary, noting, however briefly, every important occurrence, and every striking novelty, in a land where all was new, strange, and wonderful; and where, from the public situation of her husband, and the perpetual succession of visitors, at a period when the Mediterranean was crowded with Algerine rovers, with British ships, and those of every nation, abundant scope was afforded to a fluent and lively pen. Native characters and customs, traced by a lady having such admirable opportunities for close and continued observation, form, however, the charm of Mrs Blanckley's journal; together with the circumstances of domestic life in a heterogeneous household, composed of natives of half the countries of Southern Europe, besides Turks and Algerines. The extracts from the diary would often be imperfect or unintelligible, save for the commentaries and explanations of the editor of the book. Mrs Broughton, the daughter of the author, who, though a child in years, when her parents resided at Algiers, by her vivacious reminiscences, has added not a little of beauty and interest to her mother's narrative. Let us give an example.

The Dey received Mr Blanckley very graciously, although, on his offering him his hand to salute, Mr B. respectfully, but, in the firmest manner, declined doing so, as being an homage he only felt due to his own Sovereign. The Dey looked earnestly at him, whilst the dragoman interpreted Mr B.'s answer, then good-humouredly held out his hand, and shook Mr B.'s very heartily.

Mrs Broughton adds:—

From that moment was my dear father's popularity established. His gracious and firm deportment, his fine countenance and noble presence, ensured universal respect.

The Dey understood good manners, and also what was due to himself.

Shortly after Mr B.'s return from the palace, the Dey sent an officer to present his compliments, and a poor female slave, (with a lovely infant in her arms,) to wait upon me. Poor helpless unfortunate, she appears unable to do anything for herself or child. They had just been brought in by an Algerine cruiser, which had captured them when on their passage from Gaeta to Leghorn, whither she was going to rejoin her husband. She is a pretty girl of only seventeen, her poor babe but three months old. Her whole wardrobe was snatched from her as their perquisite, by the crew of the vessel that captured her. Her money and jewels falling to the Dey's share, he has, out of compliment to me, given orders that all the latter shall be restored, that by their sale she may be enabled to purchase clothing. This is the first instance ever known of such an act of mercy, and it is considered a mark of high consideration to the British Consul and nation.

"21st Nov. 1806.—We were awakened by hearing a royal salute fired, on the Niger frigate anchoring in the bay. Captain Hillyer has been sent by Lord Collingwood with a watch for the Dey, and he accompanied Mr Blackley to the palace to present it. It is much to be lamented that so trumpery a present should have been sent, since it is to be feared, that far from its being a benefit in promoting feelings of good-will towards our nation, it may very probably have a very opposite effect."

On Mr B.'s presenting it to the Dey, he drew it from the case, and twisting it between his thumb and finger, eyed it with the most contemptuous expression of countenance, and calling to his head cook, (who, it appears, is a person of consequence in his household,) gave it to him, saying that he made him a present of it, as it was more fit for him than himself. Mr B. and Capt. Hillyer were much mortified, and join in regretting that these matters were not better understood at home.

The sort of entertainment which the reader may expect from this new Lady Mary Wortley, with much of her sprightliness and with goodness of heart to which she was alien, may be surmised from the following passage:—

I understand our dragoman, Rais Ali, was married last night, although he says that he had no intention of the kind two or three days ago. He is a strange being. He served several years in our navy, where he acquired his present refined knowledge of the English language. The name he bore was Tom Lee. He professes himself to be a most devoted admirer of the English, more especially of the ladies of that country.

The three sailors are returned; the prize had disappeared. I have ordered each of the poor fellows a suit of linen, and I have had beds made up for them, which they stand in great need of, as they have been lying on the bare ground ever since they left their ship.

This morning, I remarked that Rais Ali had a large key stuck in his sash, and inquired what it belonged to. He said it was the key of his house. "What! have you locked up your wife?" "Yes." "And who with her?" "Oh! nobody but the cat. I go to-day to buy her a slave." I pitied the poor bride so much, that I offered to pay her a visit, at which the Rais appeared much pleased."

"15th Nov. 1806.—I went, according to my promise, to pay my wedding visit to Rais Ali's wife, but found that he had not yet fulfilled his intention of purchasing her an attendant; for he unlocked the door himself, let us in, and ushered us up stairs, where we found the lady in lonely grandeur. She was literally laden with pearls, and appeared very passive and contented, merely staring at us. She had on a high gold flaggee cap, from which were suspended on each side of her face long rows of pearls, with many of which her neck was completely covered.

The dress of the locked-up lady is minutely described; but as we believe it is she that figures in the frontispiece of the book, we shall skip that. When the visitors had satisfied their curiosity, the silent bride was again locked up. Very frequent occurrences of those days were, the Algerine cruisers bringing in captured vessels, with their crews and passengers as slaves,—and romantic stories of this sort abound in Mrs Blackley's diary. One strange tale of a beautiful Mrs Farara, born at Minorca, of English parents, left an orphan at an early age, and married to an Algerine merchant, who treated her ill, completely realizes in its sequel the prophecy in Guy Mannering. A wandering Gitana, or female gipsy, looking hard at Mrs Farara's beautiful infant, said—"It will be well for you if you pass your fourth birth-day." The slaves drove the woman from the door, and, in their anger, told the mother the fatal prediction. From that day she constantly declined accepting the invitations of the Consular families, by whom she was much beloved and respected. One day, the lady of the American Consul, who was the niece of the wife of General Washington, and had been brought up in his family, went to her friend, Mrs Farara, determined to carry her and the Signior back to dinner. Mrs Farara was prevailed on by great importunity, her husband joining in the request; and the party mounted their mules, and set off for the country residence of the Consul. The tale is wild and affecting, but it appears perfectly well authenticated.

But ere they had reached it, what were the poor mother's feelings of self-reproach and regret, when she recollected that this was the birth-day of her precious child; that this day completed his fourth year. Oh! why then had she been induced to leave him? The gipsy's prediction was not yet fulfilled, and surely will not be now, added she, as she strove to smile, in answer to some remark of one of her companions. Again, let me repeat, this is not an imaginary story, but one which I have often heard repeated by more than one witness of this sad, but, alas! true event; and need I add, that the sorrowful impression with which I heard the circumstances related, has not ceased to keep alive in my recollection all the affecting details.

So careful was every individual of the family in sympathizing with the strict orders of the absent parents, that they each strove who could best watch over the precious child; and the most confidential persons of the household, the two scribanos or clerks, had desired that the Carissimo Piccolo might play about the counting-house, that they might be enabled faithfully to fulfil their promise of watching over his safety. The playful boy scrambled up the back of their chairs, pinched their hair, then tried to snatch the paper they were writing upon from beneath their pens; their desks were placed parallel to each other; they ceased from writing and gazed, admiring his playfulness; instinctively they both took up their pen-knives to mend their quills, when, strange, awful fatality! the devoted child, in playful defiance, attacked one of them, who in return pretended to stab him with his penknife; he turned to his other guardian, who as thoughtlessly did the same, and the blooming boy fell upon its blade—it pierced his little heart. The dire forebodings of the Gitana were realized, and the disconsolate parents were forever bereft of their only child.

The marriage of the daughter of the Cadi—a lovely widow of nineteen—at which Mrs Blackley attended, gives her an opportunity of describing the wedding customs of the country. She was astonished and dazzled by the profusion of jewels worn by the ladies. They were quite as fair as Europeans, and many of them beautiful. Nothing could exceed their courtesy, and the politeness of the reception they gave the English lady. The bridegroom was a middle-aged, one-eyed Turk. Before the bride was introduced to him, she literally staggered under the weight of the ornaments heaped upon her, and required two attendants to support her head. A visit which Mrs Blackley and her little daughters made to the wife of the Dey, is still more oriental, and like an Arabian tale.

She received us very graciously; indeed, most kindly. Her father was also present, and met us at the entrance. He led us up stairs, and introduced us; and, as he speaks lingua Franca perfectly, and I begin to understand it very well, he acted as my interpreter. Her Majesty or

Highness is twenty-three years of age, very pleasing in appearance, and unaffected in her manners. She has two fine children, both girls. We dined there; a vast variety of dishes of meat, poultry, pastry, and sweetmeats, succeeded each other. Each dish was placed separately upon a small low silver and mother-of-pearl table. I was accommodated with cushions; but the children were quite adepts at sitting in the Moorish fashion, which we all followed, in eating out of the same dish. The Sultana appeared much gratified at the admiration (which I could not restrain) with which I observed the splendidly embroidered napkins which were placed on our laps, as also the curious rosewood spoons, tipped with amber, with which we were served; and she afterwards presented me with three of the former, richly embroidered in gold, silver, and various coloured silks, on a curiously wrought linen ground, and with ten spoons similar to those we had used. I understand that it is contrary to the Alcoran for Mussulmans to eat or drink out of silver, although they have not any scruple to have articles of furniture made of this costly material. I was perfectly astonished at the grandeur of all I beheld. When we entered the room in which the Sultana received us, jewels were strewn all over the carpet, which was of cut velvet, in a pattern of the richest flowers, and most varied colours. Before we left this room, to go to that in which we dined, some beautiful-looking women (who appeared to be her favourite attendants, and who Sidi Cadua told me were Georgian slaves) gathered up these treasures, and placed them on the shelves of two glass cabinets that stood against the wall at our backs. In the centre of this apartment was a shallow recess, and on its walls were hanging several pistols and swords, whose handles and scabbards were entirely covered with diamonds. At the opposite end of the room from where we were seated, was a gilt four-post European-shaped bedstead, on which were placed four mattresses of gold brocade, and the curtains were made of blue tiffany, embroidered with gold sprigs. My Elizabeth gave the Dey's eldest daughter a toy watch, with which she was delighted.

The lady of the British Consul was among the most loyal and patriotic of the English women of those loyal days, and the most devoted of wives. Her feelings were accordingly often excited and interested by those delicate public affairs in which Mr Blackley's devotion to his Sovereign, and zeal for the honour of England, engaged him. But these transactions, how important soever at the time, and though highly honourable to the actor, have sunk into comparative oblivion; while the record of Mrs Blackley's domestic and social existence, and the fond reminiscences of her daughter, of bright and happy days, long since elapsed, remain fresh and engaging as ever. The families of the different Consuls of Algiers may be taken as representatives of their different nations in character and manners. Those of the French and American Consuls appear to be fixed with peculiar tenacity in the affectionate memory of Mrs Broughton. One day the French Consul invited the other Consuls and their families to a grand entertainment in honour of the Emperor, then in the first flush of the imperial dignity. The loyal Englishwoman writes:—"Mr Blackley is not a little puzzled, as he says drinking the usurper's health is perfectly impossible—for nothing shall prevail upon him to act the hypocrite."—"Mr Blackley" escaped the infliction, by taking the opportunity to visit the Balearic Islands on official business; but his lady and family went to the fête, and she exultingly says—"At eleven o'clock there was a brilliant display of fireworks, during which a machine, on which the French colours were suspended, caught fire, and we had the pleasing satisfaction of seeing them burnt and fall to the ground. It augurs well." This good lady was, at the same time, sincerely attached to her Gallic friends, whose history exhibits one more instance of those numerous vicissitudes of fortune, of which so many have been displayed among the satellites of Napoleon. Mrs Broughton tells the story of the French Consul's family very pleasingly. She does not seem to be aware of the alleged fact that Buonaparte himself first paid his addresses to the future wife of his brother.

In these days couleur de rose, dear Madame de Thainville, was, in the fullest sense of the word, a charming woman. She was by birth a Mademoiselle Cléry, cousin-german to deux Majestés; the one wife of Joseph Buonaparte, or (as my dear mother would name him) the mock King of Spain, and the other, her sister, still a bona fide queen, viz., the consort of Bernadotte, the present King Charles of Sweden. These ladies were the daughters of a banker of Marseilles, of great wealth and respectability, and their alliance was considered a very desirable one by both the brother and followers of General Buonaparte, as I believe Napoleon then only was.

Madame de Thainville, from her alliance with the Imperial Court, was, when in Paris, lançée dans le grand monde, and it may be supposed, that, to one so fully suited by taste and inclination to delight in all the gaieties and splendid elegance of that bright period of the Court of the magnificent Napoleon, the comparatively monotonous and quiet style of the European society at Algiers could not have had sufficient charms to win her from Paris. Paris! who, that has lived there long enough to feel the full strength of the regret of all, who by birth or adoption have claimed it as their home, will not understand the magic of that word Paris! ce cher Paris! il n'y a rien tel que Paris! and, therefore, the greatest part of Madame de Thainville's life was passed in that fascinating region, where also she had a strong additional tie, as her only son and her eldest daughter were both left at schools there. M. de Thainville joined her whenever he was at liberty to do so, and she always returned with him for a few months to Algiers, where her arrival was hailed with great delight by all her more stationary friends; nor could the sincerity of her female ones be doubted, for amiable and charmante as she was, she also was their guide and model in tous les derniers goûts; and even during her long absences, she failed not to compassionate them in their exile, for most kindly and good-naturedly did she execute all their commissions, so that European Algerine belles (unless an English cruiser happened to capture the last chef d'œuvre of the Parisian artistes on their voyage) were far more fashionably attired, in accordance to the taste of the undisputed emporium of fashion, than even the most celebrated London leaders and settlers of it, who in those glorious days were restricted to follow their own tastes, and sighed in vain for a copy of Le Journal des Modes. Of Madame de Thainville's youngest daughter, the lovely fascinating Irène, I retain a very affectionate and sisterly recollection. She was my sister's and my most favourite playfellow; but we have never met since, although a few streets or miles have for years only separated us; for both the Diles de Thainville made a determination, as firm as it was deeply deplored by all, who loved them for their own as well as their parents' sakes, that they never would, in their reduced circumstances, have any intercourse with, nor even be seen by those who had known them in their days of prosperity. Their mother was our constant visitor in Paris, after mine had succeeded in discovering her, alas! most humble abode; but never could we prevail on her daughters either to receive our visits or accept our invitations. Nor was such their conduct to us alone; the rule was invariable towards all their former friends, not even excepting their father's vice-consul, who had resided in their family for years, and loved them as his own children. I cannot bear to dwell on the sad reverses of this poor family, or I could relate a tale of woe. Both M. and Mme are no more, and their children are lost to me; but should they yet survive, they have my earnest prayers for their peace and welfare.

We have seen Mrs Blanckley and her daughters visiting the beautiful wife of the Dey; but the final exit of that Sovereign, and the accession of a new one, was quite as summary, though not so agreeable as a morning visit.

"7th Nov. 1808.—Our janizary, Sidi Hassan, returned from town in great consternation, and came into the drawing-room, saying that the Turks had risen, and were going to kill the Dey. Our dragoman, Rais Ali, has taken sanctuary in our house." Further accounts, about eleven o'clock, were sent to us from town, saying that the Pacha Achmet was shot on the terrace of a house belonging to a Jew, when endeavouring to escape; he had succeeded in running over the terraces of several houses from the palace of his wife, to which he had first escaped; and on being pursued thither, he got upon the terrace, and from thence over several others, until he was shot through the body and leg, by a very young Turk. He was then by the soldiers dashed from the terrace into the street; and they cut off his head, and carried it to shew the new Dey, his successor, who is called Ali Pacha.

"In the evening we heard that everything was quite quiet, and the usual order restored in town.

"26th.—Sidi Cadua, father-in-law to the late Dey, Achmet Pacha, and the proprietor of our garden, has been stripped of all his immense property and possessions, with the single exception of this garden, and had been thrown into prison; but on the day of Bairam (the Mahomedan feast answering to our Easter) he was restored to liberty. Our janizary, Sidi Hassan, at my desire, called upon him yesterday, and found the venerable old man seated upon a sheep skin, which alone replaced all the beautiful carpets and splendid cushions with which he had previously been surrounded. He was very grateful for the coffee and other necessaries which I had ventured to send him by Hassan. Such are the vicissitudes of life under this government.

"I have, in secrecy, been informed, that in addition to the many tyrannical measures which have of late caused so much misery, it is suspected that to-morrow there will be more bloodshed; but I hope (however unworthy of governing the expected victim is) that the above plot will be checked. The public news is, that Sidi Omar, the very Turk at whose marriage with the Cadi's daughter we were present, and who had, for a length of time back, been concerned in a conspiracy with the present Dey, Ali Pacha, has been put to death. This Sidi Omar being a man of great influence with the late government, Ali, to ensure his co-operation in placing him (Ali) at the head of the Regency, had promised that he would reward him by bestowing upon him the next post in honour and dignity in the country. After Ali was firmly established on the summit of his desires, Sidi Omar claimed his expected reward, and the Pacha in return presented him with a commission, naming him Caid or governor of some distant town and province. Sidi Omar was so enraged at the appointment falling so far short of his expectations, that before the face of the

* Complete anarchy was consequent upon a revolution taking place, and until a new Dey was elected by the janizaries. All the Moors and Jews were at the mercy of the ruthless soldiery, and any one who had reason to fear or suspect that he had an enemy among that lawless body, sought to hide his person and self from their researches, until the reign of misrule ceased, by the ascension of the green standard of the Prophet on the terrace of the palace, which announced that a new Dey was seated on the warm seat of his massacred predecessor. Probably our heroic dragoman might have had some reason to induce him, by seeking the protection of the British Consulate, to prove that he agreed in Shakespeare's definition of the better part of valour. The Jews invariably paid a large ransom to avoid a general pillage.

Pacha, he tore the commission in pieces, and, leaving the palace, stirred up several Turks, his adherents, to rebellion. On this plot being discovered by the Dey's spies, the conspirators were seized and bastinadoed, and two of them died in consequence; Sidi Omar alone was strangled, and, to relate, I hear that he was betrayed to the Dey by his own sister-in-law. She is in great favour with the Dey at present, having become acquainted with all the details, and even knoweth the name of the Turk whom they intended to have placed on the throne, and who proves to be too influential to suffer with his partisans. This Brutus-like lady is, without exception, the prettiest woman I ever saw; and the recollection of her mild and gentle aspect, with the knowledge of the part she has acted, tends much to excite my wonder.

"30th Nov. 1808.—Sidi Cadua is again in prison, in consequence of the dragoman of the late Achmet Pacha, who made his escape to Gibraltar, writing to the Dey, that seven quintals* and a half of gold, and two sarmas of brilliants, were concealed under ground. A black man, slave to Sidi Cadua, who was brother-in-law to the possessor, and father-in-law to Achmet Pacha, impeached his master, and accused him of knowing where these treasures were buried. This Sidi Cadua denied; and alas, alas! even the poor widow, (whom I visited and witnessed in the enjoyment of regal splendour,) she too has been (dreadful to think of it!) subjected to the bastinado, to force her to reveal that of which she declares herself ignorant—"where the treasure is." The late Dey's head piscary has also, from being involved in a similar suspicion, been this morning hanged, after receiving, in the course of the last two days, a thousand strokes of the bastinado."

Such is a revolution in Algiers, or the main features of one. Truly the European residents need not have lacked sensations. Sometimes, too, an earthquake varied their feelings. In the fifth month of his reign, this Ali Pacha was poisoned, and the European Consuls paid their respects to a new Dey, also named Ali.

"5th March 1809.—I understand that a cup of coffee, containing the powder of ground diamonds, a most effectual poison, (P) was offered to the late unfortunate Pacha, out of respect, as they said; but he refused to drink it, saying, that he did not choose to be accessory to his own death. He therefore politely declined the honour which the Turks intended him, preferring rather to be led out by the chaousses, like a culprit, to the usual place of execution, where he was strangled. A distinction was, however, made in his case, as he was strangled at once, instead of undergoing the usual refinement of cruelty, in being twice revived by a glass of water, and only effectually executed the third time that the bowstring is applied."

Mrs Broughton refers, we presume, to a period previous to this, when she relates the preparatory ceremonies—

One morning, shortly after day-break, when my dearest father was proceeding to town, preceded, as usual, by Sidi Hassan, and unaccompanied by any other attendant, he was much astonished at seeing a great number of janizaries prostrated at their devotions in a field at the back of this old house. Whilst he gazed at them, they simultaneously arose, and drawing their attaghans, swung them round their heads, and then appeared to be uttering some solemn oath or invocation. Before my father had time to inquire from Sidi Hassan the explanation of so strange a circumstance, the latter had fallen back on a line with him, and in an earnest whisper said, "Signore Console, look only before you, and hasten your horse's pace; and, for the love of God! let me entreat that Il Signore Console will allow what he has witnessed to be as if he had not seen it." He then instantly resumed his usual distance in advance of my father.

On their reaching town, Sidi Hassan appeared studiously to avoid being left for an instant alone with my father; but as he was equally desirous to receive some explanation of the mysterious occurrence, he at length sent for him. On entering the apartment, the janizary, with a decision of manner most unlike that in which he had ever before addressed his master, interrupted him by saying, in a deprecating tone, "Signore, you have seen nothing ;—and as I would sue for my life, so let me, with all respect, urge you not to ask me a single question. When I shall be at liberty to answer, you will have nothing to learn." He then impressively put up five of his fingers, and added, "cinque luno"—five moons. After this interview, with the exception of a certain trace of anxiety visible in his countenance, and a seriousness of manner evincing great iniquitude, Sidi Hassan, to all appearance, fully acted up to the advice he gave. This occurrence took place very shortly after the accession of the almost imbecile successor of Achmet Pacha :—and exactly at the expiration of the five months, Ali Pacha was offered a diamond-powder-seasoned cup of coffee, to which he, however, preferred submitting to the bowstring. Then, for the first time, Hassan broke through his self-imposed silence. How far it had been altogether voluntary is uncertain, and raising up the same number of fingers, said, "Signor Console, was I not right? But even now let me entreat you, sir, to remember, that you saw nothing."

* Weights and measures used in the country.

"An M. Arago," whose name is now better known both in Europe and Africa, chanced at that period to seek refuge in Algiers, in an attempt to reach his own country, after having been driven from Spain, whither he had gone on some scientific pursuit. He had a British passport; but the new Dey refused to let the Frenchman go, even although he could shew King George's Seal on his passport. He said "that no Frenchman should leave his kingdom: and that if he wished to find the longitude, &c., he might take his spy-glass, and go up one of the mountains in the vicinity, which would answer his purpose quite as well as any other part of the world."

However, the enlightened prince at last yielded to importunity, and M. Arago was permitted to leave Algiers.

At this period, there was in Algiers one of those self-devoted and apostolic Roman Catholic priests, whose exalted lives shed lustre upon their faith. Padre Guiseppa was an universal favourite; and Mrs Blanckley's diary only expresses the general sentiment of affection and regret for him.

"8th Jan. 1811.—Poor Padre Guiseppa, I am distressed to hear, has a pleurisy; and the ignorant and obstinate doctors, who bleed on every unnecessary occasion, refuse taking blood from this good man. I am truly distressed and unhappy on his account, and join my prayers to the many which doubtless ascend from the innermost hearts of the poor slaves, to whom he has indeed been pastor, father, and friend, in this moral desert."

"6th.— The extreme unction has been administered to the excellent Padre Guiseppa. Our cook, Salvador, was present, as he had gone to inquire how he was. The good man recognised him, and sent by him his respects and his blessing to us all. The prayers and blessing of the righteous avail much. How much do I feel!

"7th.—The humane, the charitable, the man of God, Padre Guiseppa Jesuit, is no more. He, at eight o'clock last night, resigned his soul into the hands of his Redeemer, whom he imitated to the utmost of mortal power. May my life be influenced by his holy example, and may my death be like his! My heart is afflicted beyond description at the unspeakable loss the poor slaves have sustained. May the Almighty in his mercy make it up to them!

"My dear husband was so much affected at the loss of so valuable a member of society, that the gout attacked his stomach; but, thanks be to God! some ether I gave him immediately removed it. I find the mortal remains of the venerable man cannot be interred to-day, (as is the custom among the Roman Catholics in warm climates,) on account of the Moorish feast, and the great concourse of people at Bab-el-Ouate—the gate which leads to the Christian cemetery. The Guardian Pacha came to see Mr B. this evening, and, at my request, he assured me that all the slaves shall attend the Marabout Padre Guiseppa to his grave; and he added, that he thanked me for telling him how to testify the respect he felt for this very good man.

"8th Jan.—All the Consuls attended the funeral of the worthy Padre—Mr D. acted as Mr B.'s representative. There is scarcely a dry Christian eye in Algiers."

Mrs Broughton fills up her mother's outline, and we are tempted by her faintly picture. Padre Guiseppa arrived at Algiers in the prime of life, and in the habit of a religious order, many years before this time.

From the instant he set his foot upon its shore, his every moment had been devoted to the service of his unfortunate brethren in the bonds of slavery; but he brought not alone himself to their relief, but likewise the produce of the sale of all his great landed estates which he had sold, that he might bestow all that he possessed in the ransoming of as many Christians in Mahomedan bondage as his ample means could effect. After thus expending all that he possessed, he remained amongst those unfortunates, for whom he had only prayers and consolations to offer, instructing them by his exhortations, and encouraging them by his holy example, to look beyond this state of trial towards that "better and enduring" heavenly country. So consistent was his whole life, that the Mahomedans undeviatingly shewed him the greatest respect, and spoke of him with scarcely less admiration than the Christians.

He had three different times had the plague; but as long as his strength was unexhausted, he ceased not to attend to the bodily as well as the spiritual wants of his beloved children—for so he ever called the objects of his affectionate care. The Moors used to think he had a charmed life, and, I believe, many of the poor slaves shared that conviction. All those free Christians, who were disposed to share a portion of this world's goods with their unhappy coreligionnaires, willingly made Padre Guiseppa their almoner; from the charitable in France he likewise received remittances for the benefit of the slaves; and by these means he was yet enabled to relieve their temporal necessities, and gladly did he so. I remember that a gentleman, having visited him, perceived that he had nothing but a straw paillasse to lie on, and on leaving his cell, he went and ordered two good wool mattresses to be sent to the poor (in this world's sense) old man, and added half a dozen shirts from his own wardrobe. A few days afterwards he repeated his visit, but the mattresses had disappeared. He could not refrain from expressing his surprise to the Padre. "Oh! my son, that paillasse is a very good bed for me, so I was very glad to send those nice mattresses to two poor suffering old slaves in the Bagnio!" and he instantly turned the conversation. The disappointed donor afterwards, on inquiry, found that the shirts likewise had accompanied the bedding. His ever-benevolent and cheerful countenance never assumed a look of sadness, except when, on one of his children asking for relief, he could but open his tabatière, and say, "Alas! my dear son, this is all I have to-day to offer you; but let us hope and pray the Lord to send us assistance." And I have heard the poor creatures say, that his affectionate look and words failed not to inspire them with submission and resignation, as they well knew how constant were his personal privations for their sakes.

His tabatière my dear mamma, from the time of her first acquaintance with him, ever took care should not be empty, as she always furnished it in kind; for she knew that money would offend her to another destination than providing for this single gratification. His was a tall and most erect figure, although he was, I believe, about eighty years of age, and his countenance was most benign. He always wore his black religious habit. My dearest parents were never happier than when they welcomed him to their house. Indeed, I believe, the whole family felt as if a particular blessing rested upon it whilst he was under its roof; and a certain one was surely derived from the benefit of his pious conversation, divested, in our regard, of all sectarianism; for nothing was more pleasing to him, than to listen to my reading the French Testament, when he never failed to impress upon us the necessity of attending to its divine precepts. When he was expected, an air de fête seemed to pervade the whole household; and when he appeared upon the mule which had been sent for him, all our servants pressed around him, each anxious for his paternal recognition and benediction, whilst they actually kissed his garments, until each in their turn could press their lips upon his aged hand; and his departure from our house was attended with like demonstrations of love, which, although they, in our own case, partook of a different character, were not less warmly felt. My mother especially loved him with filial affection. I have often heard her say she had indeed mourned for him as a daughter.

Bastinadoing, decimating, and strangulation, are such common occurrences in Mrs Blanckley's journal, that they fail at last to affect the reader, unless attended by some picturesque circumstance, or from the victim being a person of rank or note, as, for example, the King of the Jews.

"5th February.—Our feelings have been dreadfully shocked by hearing that David Bacri, the King of the Jews, has been cruelly massacred at the palace, whither he had been sent for, and at first received with apparent courtesy; indeed, the Dey was almost unusually gracious during the whole time of the audience, conversing on the most indifferent topics; and it was only on the unfortunate victim's leaving the barbarous presence, that he had even a suspicion of the dreadful fate to which the smiling tyrant had doomed him. As he descended into the skiff of the palace, two of the chaousses seized him, whilst a third, wielding a sabre, but too evidently informed him of the sentence that had been passed upon him."

This man was assassinated, that the Dey, Ali Pacha, might obtain his vast wealth. His brother, Jacob Bacri, was benevolently concealed in the garden or villa of the British Consul, and many of the Jews at this time, found a sanctuary in his town residence. His home seemed, indeed, ever open to the distressed of all nations. The Dey led a stirring life.

"12th March.—The news to-day is, that in consequence of a command from the Dey, the Bey of Constantina, Alifa, and his father-in-law, an Arab Sheik, are both strangled, as it was discovered that large supplies of wheat were constantly sent by them to the Bey of Tunis, with whom this country is at war, and to the injury of the British commerce at Bona.

"18th.—The first news this morning was, that our poor landlord, Sidi Cadua, had been sent for by a chaous to the palace, where, without any accusation, his turban and shershia were taken off, he was then dragged to Bab-el-zoon, and hanged like a dog. Thus died the head of the most noble and ancient Moorish family, at seventy years of age, whose only crime, it proves, was marrying yesterday his only daughter to a Turk, who was hogia at the palace in Achmet Pacha's reign. The two elder sisters being now widows, the one of Achmet Pacha, who cannot ever marry again, and the other of the late Aga. The bridegroom has taken sanctuary in the barracks. The body of Sidi Cadua is to remain exposed for three days.

"The Guardian Pacha called in the evening, but was very grave, as are most of the Turks; such arbitrary acts cannot be long successful without some change.

"19th.—A relation of Sidi Cadua's, the Calid or Governor of Tesso, was this morning seized and taken to the strangling-house. The plot begins to thicken. I just have heard, that fear or policy has caused the Dey to liberate the Calid this evening. His house is so near ours, that we could hear the sound of the women's rejoicing at his unhoped-for return; he caused a sheep to be killed before his door, and then distributed to the poor. Sidi Cadua's body has likewise been allowed to be buried.

"6th September.—We hear that the Dionysius of Algiers yesterday condemned a poor Jew to receive twelve hundred bastinadoes, for having disturbed the tyrant by the noise of his hammer during the night. This poor creature had been ordered to continue working during the night by the Lamine della Ricca, or Master of the Mint, who employed him to coin or make money for the use of Government; for which compliance the poor wretch was to receive the enormous sum of three mezunas, 56 of which make a Spanish dollar!

"9th.—The poor Jew, who was bastinadoed, is not yet dead, but has been obliged to submit to lose three pounds of flesh from the part where the bastinadoes were inflicted.

"24th.—When Mr B., &c. &c., went to the palace this morning, to present the present from our King, the Dey was in the worst possible humour, on account of not having received an answer to the letter which he wrote to the King; and scarcely would he credit Mr B. when he assured him that he had not received a single line from our Government. When a musical snuff-box, which cost £500, was presented, he asked if the King took him for a child, to be pleased with ting, ting, ting. He ridiculed a beautiful cestus, or clasp of brilliants and emeralds; he also seemed to think very little of a bale of broad-cloth, but more graciously received some instruments of death, viz., a splendidly ornamented brace of pistols, but peremptorily asked, "Where is the gun that belongs to them?" No such thing had been sent. Had the same expense been bestowed upon a suitably arranged present, the interests of our country would have been advanced, instead of weakened, by the disappointment the barbarian now experiences. Had the opinion of any one versed in oriental customs been taken, a gun, no matter of what intrinsic value, (so that it was brilliantly ornamented, and to match the pistols,) would have been sent, instead of the beautiful ting, ting box, and the useless cestus. The result has been any thing but to influence the Dey in British favour.

"Our chagrin is great at the impolitic conduct of our Government, in sending such dissatisfactory, yet expensive presents here, actually casting pearls among swine; when an old brig or cutter would have been highly acceptable, many of which are falling to decay in our ports.

Many little traits of humanity and amiable feeling among Algerines, Turks, and Jews, as well as in their Christian friends, impart a peculiar grace to this volume. It was the duty, but still more the inclination of the British Consul and his lady to do good to the many unfortunate persons of different Christian nations, whom captivity and other causes threw upon their kindness and compassion. When Mrs Blanckley was about to return to England, the guardian Pacha, an excellent heathen, called for her. She says—

"I offered to pay him for the support of some poor old slaves a twelvemonth in advance, that they might be exempted from labour. He pushed back the little bag of money I held out to him, saying, 'Take back your money, signora: you have paid too much for those people already; and believe, that such is my respect for you, that whilst I am Guardian Pacha, those old people whom you have protected shall never undergo any labour.'"

This worthy man was one of the first of his countrymen who fell under Lord Exmouth's fire. . . . He was highly connected, and his whole life and conversation, public and private, proved that nothing mean or dishonourable could be associated with him. He would, as I have constantly heard my father say, have been an ornament and honour to any country or creed. He was a most strict Mussulman; yet often, when he was obliged to call up the Christian slaves in the night during the violent hurricanes to which the port of Algiers is so liable, he would, at his own private expense, bestow a glass of agua ardiente upon each of the poor dripping creatures.

The servants of the English Consul were generally Christian slaves, whose services he hired from their owners. The cook, a faithful and attached creature, named Salvador, belonged to the King of the Jews. Mrs Broughton relates that, David Bacri, whose assassination we have noticed, paid her mother ceremonial visits on New-Year's Day, and other holidays, and made her the usual compliment of declaring all that he possessed was hers—

When he, in the usual courteous parlance of southern foreigners, declared, in paying his compliments to my mother, that all that he possessed was at her service, she never failed, in mood of half seriousness, half plaisanterie, to say, "I shall be very glad to take you at your word; and tell my cook, Salvador, that he is at liberty, for that you have made a present of him." The repetition of this burlesque ended by the poor eagle-killer being restored to liberty, of which he had been deprived at the age of twelve years, under the most afflicting circumstances.

Salvador had once killed a tame eagle instead of a Guinea fowl.

A respectable old man, a native of Sicily, had, with his sons, been captured by an Algerine corvette. One of the sons obtained employment in the family of Mr Blanckley, who took a warm interest in the whole family. Mrs Broughton relates—

After many abortive attempts to propitiate the Dey in behalf of the poor old man, whose wife and daughters had sold all they possessed in the world, to send the products to Algiers, in the hope that it might suffice for his ransom; though, alas! it fell so far short of the fixed large sum, that the Dey would not hear of its acceptance. My dear father, on a particular occasion, (what exactly I do not now recollect,) on which, according to usage, the Dey was bound to make a present of value to the English Consul, as was his constant practice in similar circumstances, made a public request that his Highness would graciously be pleased, instead of any other offering, to bestow upon him a Christian slave. This, in royal courtesy, even in Algerine etiquette, the Pacha could not refuse, and Francisco, as well as several other equally fortunate slaves, were granted by his request, although the Dey latterly said, "Take care, Signore Console, that you have not to reproach yourself with the loss of my head, for I fear I may with justice be accused of being over-generous in thus parting with the property of the state."

When the old man was on the point of leaving us, my father asked him, if he should ever find a propitious moment in which he might prevail upon the Dey to grant him the liberty of one of his sons, on the payment of the hitherto-considered inadequate sum of money which had been forwarded for the purpose of his own ransom, to which of his sons the preference should be shewn? "Ask me not, sir," replied the agitated father; "I cannot make a choice between two children equally dutiful and affectionate, and equally dear to me."

An opportunity for the furtherance of my father's benevolent intentions did at length occur, and he named our own servant Marianno as the object worthy of being benefited by the Dey's liberality; and in consequence, his passage was engaged on board a ship going to Malta. He took a respectful leave of the family, and we all looked at the vessel as it sailed out of the bay—of course believing that it contained our honest sotto cuoco. But to the astonishment of the whole household, Marianno entered the drawing-room that very evening, and throwing himself at the feet of my parents, he exclaimed, "Pardon me, my benefactors, if your servant has thus presumed to deceive your goodness. Luciano was my elder brother, and in every respect more worthy, and capable of being more useful to our parents than I am; and I have therefore—against his own will, by proving to him, as he is able to do more good, that it was his bounden duty to go in my place—with difficulty persuaded him; and believe me, that it is far happier for me; and I hope it may please God to let me serve you while I live."

These are charming anecdotes, heightened, too, by farther proofs of the warm gratitude of these poor people, and the sympathy of their English benefactors.

In the description of Maria, the maid or nurse of the young ladies, we have a lively and characteristic portrait of the Neapolitan coquette of the lower order, as well as a romantic story:—

She was a decided brunette, of a clear transparent complexion; the roseate tint, however, positively predominating in her plump cheeks. Her black eyes were bien fendus, and bright at all times, but brighter still when we presumed to disobey. Her jetty hair was knotted back from off her full forehead, and fastened in a turban at the top of her head by a large silver bodkin, two long curls alone being allowed to escape, and hang down from her temples;—and yet Maria was not a beauty—she was rather what the Scotch would denominate consie, for her nose, mouth, and proportions generally, were on too large a scale. What her age was I do not know, and children are so apt to fancy their seniors so much older than—as they themselves rise in the scale of humanity—they afterwards find them to be, that I shall not say what my own presumptions were on that delicate point, to which a femme de chambre is as susceptible of an unfavourable misconception as the fairest and most courtly of dames.

Reggio in Calabria was our worthy Bonne's birth-place, and she always wore the costume peculiar to it, namely:—On great festas, her hose were of red silk, ornamented with golden clocks—her high-heeled shoes, of crimson and blue satin—her rather short petticoat was of striped white dimity—and her tightly-fitting laced bodice of the same materials and colours as her shoes. She at all times wore large gold ear-rings, and never for one instant, night or day, did she separate herself from a row of coral which surrounded her olive throat. To this she attributed many supernatural qualities; as I have often heard her declare, that when any evil, either of sickness or of the other innumerable calamities our nature is prone to, were on the eve of occurring to her, these became of a paler hue, and only recovered their usual deep red colour after the evil they so truly prognosticated had passed away.—Colourless, indeed, then, should they have been on the fatal night, when their poor hapless wearer occupied her couch, in a small fort on the Calabrese coast, for the last time—where her husband, Antonio the Stupid, commanded in the capacity of Sergeant of veterans; and it being his duty each night to raise the drawbridge, he, with his usual regularity, left it in that convenient state that made it quite unnecessary to let it down in the morning. In short, Antonio thought raising and lowering the ponte-levatoio a mere work of supererogation; and the other four veterans under his command, with true Neapolitan love of the dolce far niente, of course, were not so mutinous as to interfere with their sergeant's duty. The consequence of this perfect good understanding in the garrison was, that one starry night a boat's crew from an Algerine frigate landed; and the first sight our good Maria saw, was her chamber filled with Turks;—the next instant, ere they perceived her, she slipped from her husband's side down the ruelle of her bed:—While she lay beneath it, scarcely alive from fright, her husband and little boy of seven years of age were seized, and, with everything of any value their room contained, removed out of it. Scarcely did she begin to breathe and think that she was at any rate spared to her daughter, (by a former marriage, who, at the time was on a visit to her grandmother at a village, a few miles in the interior,) than she heard some one re-enter her chamber, and a Turk stooping down with a drawn attaghan, proceeded to flourish it under the bed, and in so doing, he discovered ed the trembling unfortunate, as he had anticipated. For just as they were leaving the fort, the thought had struck him, that some one might have been under the sergeant's bed, especially as the poor boy's cries of "Lamia Mama, Mama mia dove siete," gave him to understand that such an individual was missing. As all these veteran watchmen were married, and had all of them families, this proved a most successful harrying to the Algerines.

Maria, on her arrival, was consigned, with her little son, to the house of some Turk in office, where she lost her poor child before the second year of their captivity elapsed. She always spoke of the great kindness she experienced, as indeed is universally the case, for all private individuals always treat both Christian and negro slaves rather as if they stood in the relation of children to them than in a state of bondage. How dreadful is the opposite picture that we have heard drawn of the conduct of those, who bear the outward name of disciples of Him, who for our sakes became poor, that we, through His poverty might become rich.

Maria entered our service immediately on our arrival, and remained, even after our departure, for some time nominally in it, as I have quoted from the journal. But in vain did we try to find an occupation suited to the avilities of her husband. To please my mother, the Christian head gardener at the Dey's garden caused him to be removed from the wretchedness of the bagnio, and entered on the list of slaves employed under him. Vainly, however, was any labour, however trivial, given to the stupid old man, for he invariably acted in direct opposition to the orders received.

By a singular accident, a temporary janizary, employed in the Consul's family, was discovered to be the very Turk who had dragged poor Maria from her hidingplace. He expressed contrition, but Maria never forgave him. The caprices and waiting-maid tricks of Maria are as amusing as her portrait is piquant. Fainting, and taking hysterical fits, and sudden violent illness, was her ordinary mode of gaining an object, excusing a fault, or gratifying a caprice. Maria is a good type of her class.

More than half of this pleasant volume is from the pen of Mrs Broughton; her mother's entries, in the earlier part, merely serving for pegs on which to hang her own souvenirs; while the latter division is wholly her own, and occupied with descriptions of the country, of the Consular residence, and those modes of life in which there must have been, spite of stranglings, earthquakes, jackals, and white ants, much ease, freedom, and enjoyment. To her young life in "dear Algiers," the author ever looks back with delighted recollection. A warmer tone in speaking of her relatives, not merely upon great occasions, when expressions of sensibility or affection come naturally, or are called for, distinguishes Mrs Broughton's book, warmer than is usual among the cold, seeming-proud, shy English; and critical readers may, perhaps, object to the language occasionally running into something like the lingua Franca, familiar to her childhood, from the odd and unnecessary mixture of French and Italian words. These are the only blemishes of a work always readable, and often pleasant and attractive, from the new aspects of life, and the goodness of heart which it displays.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Diary of the Rev. John Ward, Vicar of Stratford-upon-Avon. London: Colburn.

Dr Charles Severn, Registrar to the Medical Society of London, in examining the Society's multitudinous papers, fancied he had made a great discovery, when some MSS., written by the vicar of Stratford, fell into his hands, as he hoped to obtain many anecdotes of Shakespeare, who died in 1616, while Ward only finished his notices in 1662. He states that he has not been entirely disappointed, but we apprehend that his readers will differ from him on this point. The diary of the good vicar, who was also a medical practitioner, contains much quaint, curious, and amusing, as well as much trivial matter; but so far as Shakespeare is concerned, it is the old story of the play of Hamlet, with the part of Hamlet omitted.

Dr Severn has indeed done his best by fresh research, and the expression of the most fervent and enthusiastic admiration, to atone for the deficiencies of his author. If the vicar of Stratford had ever covenanted or pretended to tell the world anything about Shakespeare, it would have had a right to complain of him; but if the public be discontented now, the blame lies with his "editor." Bating Shakespeare, however, the book was well worthy of publication, from the light it throws upon the manners and history of the age. Though entitled a Diary, it is, in fact, a commonplace book of anecdotes, good sayings, and, generally, of what is called table-talk. Thus, we have a story of a woman in Warwick, who, being very ill in labour, was exhorted to patience by Lady Puckering, and gravely informed that her cruel sufferings were brought upon her by her grandmother, Eve, eating an apple! "Were they?" said the woman; "then I wish the apple had choked her." Whereupon Lady Puckering was compelled to retire from the room, to indulge her inclination to laugh. The originals of a good many old Joes will be found here. The joke imputed to half-a-dozen, or, for aught we know, half-a-hundred Scottish clergymen, of having, when discoursing on the parable of the Feast, remarked of the man who pleaded that "He had married a wife and could not come"—"Bonny like excuse that! Could not the fool have gone and ta'en his wife wi' him?" is here attributed to Dr Prideaux, who improves on the Scottish divines, by saying—"What a fool was he not to bring his wife with him, for then he would have been all the more welcome." We learn this singular fact in physiology, "that it is a certain truth that women with blue lips are always scolds." Mr Dod, a friend of Ward's, learned this interesting fact in London—"Ware blue lips, then, bachelors—they may prove more troublesome than blue stockings.

"That lisping people are usually good-natured," is another of these facts. It is here recorded that Hippocrates advised physicians to cure their patients with physic and compounds, and themselves with sack and claret. Many of the mots are smart or pithy, but many more mawkish or pointless enough. Still a diner-out, or professional story-teller, particularly if he have a turn for adapting old sayings to modern circumstances, may add considerably to his stock in trade by the perusal of Ward's

Diary. He remarks, that the phrase of a lying-in woman "being in the straw" argues that feather-beds are not ancient. But we fear that our frugal grandmothers saved their feather-beds, upon such trying occasions, and punished themselves. In primitive parts of the country, we have heard the preparations for a confinement described by the phrase: "Such a one is gathering her straw." Missionary zeal was almost as fervent in former generations as it is now; and some learned divines gravely proposed that missionaries should be sent to More's Utopia to preach the Gospel to the natives! Here is one of the pithy sayings—"Lawyers' gowns hurt the common wealth as much as soldiers' helmets." Here again is a merry physician's prescription to dyspeptic patients—"Dr Dolphine bade his patients abstain from windy meats. They asked him what windy meats are. He tells them, bellows, bagpipes, trumpets, and such like diet."

Ward's account of the slogan or curfew song of the erring wenches of Edinburgh, if not the best we have seen, is among the most ancient—"In Scotland, especially in Edinburgh, when they throw out a chamberpot, they cry cardeleu! to signify to those that go under, to take heed, knowing what is coming." It must have been perilous walking in those days, "when in Edinburgh you shall hear twenty cardeleus altogether, so that by endeavouring to avoid one you fall under the persecution of another." Winifred Jenkins' interpretation of this warning cry is, however, far more classic than that of the vicar of Stratford. They cry "Garde-loo!" says Win, "which means, The Lord have mercy upon you!"

It seems to have been the common belief in Mr Ward's time, that Charles I. was privy to the Irish massacre. He remarks:—"Some say they (the Irish) had the broad seal for it, but it is hard to accuse Majesty." Ward was a rather liberal loyalist. We find this curious query—"Whether there are not more men than women that are naturals, notwithstanding women are the weaker sex?" Here is a saying applicable to our palace-diners:—"Sir Henry Ward, hath said—'He that hath tasted the King's broth never likes any other.'"

The vicar of Stratford disliked about equally Papists and Quakers, whom he takes pleasure in girding, though his hits are generally blunt. Of one of these denominations, he remarks, "An oath on a Papist's conscience is like a collar on the neck of an ass, which he will slip on for his master's pleasure, and slip off again for his own. The Puritans are wittily said to speak through their noses, because the High Commissioner stopped their mouths; and, because conventicles were forbidden in Scotland, one there said grace of an hour-and-a-half long, so couching a conventicle in it." Of the Quakers, he says, quoting the Latin proverb—"A swine's soul serves for salt to keep the body sweet, and a Quaker's does no more." Their books are "flatly and dully written;" and their doctrines, like those of the Alcoran. "They would need a second Bible to ascertain the truth of the first, and a third to ascertain the second." How consistent is prejudice in every age!

Medical science has made some progress since the days of this clerical physician; but his frightful account of certain surgical operations, tediously and clumsily performed, may well make the moderns bless their stars. He mentions some practices of respectable physicians, his contemporaries, which surely could not be tolerated by the profession now, though strange things are sometimes whispered. "Some doctors have a noble out of the pound of their apothecaries, as Dr Wright—and many, a crown, as an apothecary of London told me."

It was only about thirty years after the death of Shakespeare that Ward began to write, and he settled at Stratford-upon-Avon in 1662. Much might then have been learned from the surviving connexions and contemporaries of the bard; but the precious material which mainly sent this volume into the world is, as we have intimated, exceedingly scanty. About the whole amount of the vicar's information is as follows, after he has mentioned the number of Shakespeare's children.

"I have heard that Mr Shakespeare was of a natural wit, without any art at all." [This helps to put to rest the pretensions to regular classic scholarship lately set up for the dramatist.] "He frequented the plays all his younger time, but in his elder days lived at Stratford, and supplied the stage with two plays a-year; and for it had an allowance so large, that he spent at the rate of £1000 a-year as I have heard."

"Shakespeare, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merrie meeting, and it seems drank too hard, for Shakespeare died of a feavour there contracted. Remember [Mem.] to peruse Shakespeare's plays and bee much versed in them, that I may not be ignorant in that matter."

In describing the localities of the town and neighbourhood, he mentions "John Combe" as steward of the lands and possessions of the Guild, and probably the descendant of Shakespeare's John o' Combe, and also the Lucies or Lucys of Charlote. Among the witnesses to a grant in his time, was "Goody Hathaway."

In his select sentences on theology, politics, and philosophy, it is probable that Mr Ward is not always original, and that many of his sayings are the fruit of his reading or conversation.

Bevan's Thirty Years in India. 2 vols. Longman & Co.

Major H. Bevan, of the Madras Infantry, has here run through his adventures in India "e'en from his boyish days." He went thither a cadet in 1807; spent five-and-twenty years in military surveys, campaigning, sporting, and the other customary duties and pastimes of a solitary British officer generally stationed in the Mofussil; acquired a good knowledge of the Malabar language and of some of the other dialects of Hindostan; was just and kind to the people; and gained their esteem and affection. In 1832, Major Bevan came home on leave, married, and returned to India a happy husband and father; but shortly lost his wife and three children by cholera within a very few days of each other. He gave up the service, under great depression of spirits, and again came home, having seen much of India, and being deeply interested in the future fortunes of the country where he has passed the most important part of his life. He delivers "his round unvarnished tale" with a soldier's plainness and frankness, but with much more of thoughtfulness and enlightened benevolence than the world, however unjustly, has been in the habit of attributing to persons of his profession. It may be presumed that in so long a residence, and so much of it passed in remote stations, and among the natives, without another European, save perhaps a brother officer, within hundreds of miles of him, he has seen much of India and has much to tell. Among the first spectacles which (disguised as a woman) he witnessed in India, was the performance of a native drama, somewhat, we imagine, like Les Anglais pour rire; in which the English were ridiculed, and the tricks by which they are, on their arrival, plundered and outwitted by their native servants and people of business, were shewn off as capital jokes. Thirty years, during which there were several regular wars and many eruptions, afford material for public history, and sketches of the native chiefs and sovereigns with whom the author came in contact. Major Bevan is an Irishman, and a man of Liberal opinions, which, moreover, must have been formed free from all bias, as the fruit of his solitary reflections. His views of Indian policy appear enlightened and comprehensive, and are well worth the attention of those interested in the preservation and improvement of that vast and important portion of the empire. He is the advocate of a free press in India; but, doubting if the country is yet prepared for a native representative government, concludes that the Government of the Court of Directors is, on the whole, better than that of the British Parliament and Ministry. The question is beset with difficulties, but we believe no Liberal man would wish to see the British Minister armed with the enormous patronage of India; and representing India directly in Parliament would too surely be merely representing the handfull of whites.

Major Bevan suffered the too common misfortune of losing his savings—by the failure of the house of Palmer, we presume, for he gives only the initial letter of the name. He was, after long service, promoted, and appointed to the command of Wynaud, where he successfully introduced the cultivation of the coffee-plant. But the natives were either listless, or averse to follow up his attempts, from the very natural idea that Government would levy a tax on the new production. They were probably of the mind of the Irishman who, when reproached by the Parliamentary Commissioners for lounging about idle, while there was no road to his cabin, replied—"Is it a road I'd make, that the agent might drive his gig up to the door and raise the rint on us?" The immense resources of India for many valuable productions are hardly yet developed; nor have those productions which are raised received anything like the care and attention necessary to their perfection. Major Bevan gives many judicious hints for improvement.

We must abruptly conclude—recommending Major Bevan's book to all who are interested in the condition or prospects of India. They will find it sensible and unpretending, full of information, and entirely devoid of fudge.

Rambles in the South of Ireland. By Lady Chatterton. 2 vols. With numerous illustrations. London: Saunders & Otley.

Were Lady Chatterton's work greatly inferior, as a literary performance, to what we find it, it is still to be valued for the excellent motives of the writer. Her object in publishing "is to endeavour to remove the prejudices which render so many people afraid to travel or reside in Ireland." There can be no doubt that strangers may travel with as great, and, we may aver, with greater security in Ireland, than in almost any part of the world. Permanent residence, both as to comfort and security, must be affected by many considerations; but every one who, like Lady Chatterton, goes among the people in the spirit of trust and love, with the determination to abide by the rule of impartial justice, and to use generous forbearance in its application, need have no fears in settling in Ireland. Lady Chatterton's sketches of national character and manners confirm whatever has been said of all that is most engaging in the Irish. She made herself at home in their cabins, and in the humble homes of the Catholic curates; travelled in carts and cars; picked up acquaintances by the wayside; and everywhere found kindness, courtesy, cordial welcome, and unexpected virtues. Her work may be of gossamer texture; but, if somewhat spun out, the staple is good. We had marked, among other specimens, a description of Mr O'Connell's residence in Kerry; but the world has, perhaps, heard enough of Darrynane. Lady Chatterton indulged in antiquarian researches, and has presented her readers with several architectural drolleries, traced by her pencil, which she seems to have exercised as freely as her pen. Her book, exteriorly, is handsome enough for any boudoir-table.

"Wearing its trappings gaily, as a lady's ought to do."
The Fergusons; or Woman's Love and the World's Favour. 2 vols. London: Colburn.

This new novel of fashion is whispered to have a very fashionable origin. It is solely about persons of fashion and their vulgar imitators; their daily occupations of dinners, balls, and operas; and their serious business of flirtation, intrigue, scandal, courtship, and schemes of matrimony. The characters are the ordinary commonplace, and somewhat threadbare, personages of a fashionable novel; the sentiments ditto; the moral good. Of heroes there are three or four, of varying grade; but the hero par excellence is Arthur Ferguson, who, with many good and amiable qualities, sacrifices every solid virtue to the desire of charming, and of being universally popular in society, or of gaining "the world's favour." His young brother, William, is one of the "good young men." Of heroines, we have one of the impassioned school, Clara, a beautiful Italian; one noble and dignified—an English perfection—Lady Cecil; and one or two of the sweet, mild, ingratiating, timid, and sensitive caste. The novel winds up with three happy marriages, every Jack, after the usual game of cross-purposes, getting his Gill. With this very ordinary material, clever sketches of society are interwoven, at least, in the opening scenes. The second volume lags sadly.

The Phantom Ship. 3 vols.

So much more than could be agreeable to any one had been heard of Captain Maryatt's new nautical romance previous to its appearance, that inclination to speak of it is altogether damped. As a whole it is unequal; but it contains some fine and wildly imaginative sea-scenes, which the writer has never surpassed. Among these are the burning of a ship at sea, and those charmed glimpses of the Phantom Ship, which occur ever and anon. There is but one female character; and she is almost Shakspearian.

Miller's Rural Sketches. London: Van Voorst.

This new work of the basket-maker is of that purely English school and class in which the lovers of nature delight—of that native school, in which, in one sense, Cowper and the author of "Grongar Hill," Isaac Walton and White of Selborne, were eminent masters; of which Miss Mitford and the Howitts are distinguished living disciples, and the present writer of no mean reputation. Such books, springing from an intense love of rural beauty—and of rustic and homely manners and usages, halloed by associations of the brave olden times, and exalted by the purest spirit of poetry, peculiarly deserve to be cherished, and even taken fondly to the national heart. There is, however, less of still-life painting in this volume than in some of the author's former scenic works, and much more of real life in these little stories than is to be found in his long romances. It consists of sketches, of which the nature may be surmised from such titles as "The Old Bull's Head;" "The Country Courtship;" "Old Customs of Travelling;" "Bonny Bell," &c., &c. Some pretty papers are devoted to old English rural poetry. The work is beautifully embellished with really fine and characteristic wood engravings, which style of art seems to us better adapted to works of natural history, and of this kind, than for depicting battle-pieces, and heroic, tragic, or historical scenes.

Lives of Wellington.

Three Wellingtons are in the field together. One life is issued by Longman's house; the other by Colburn. Both are appearing in Parts, and at the same price. The third memoir is published by Fisher and Son. Longman's Life of the Duke is under the care of Major Basil Jackson and Captain Rochfort Scott; and Colburn's is written by Sir James E. Alexander, the ready and clever literary undertaker of so many books of travels. Of the Messrs Fisher's life, we cannot at present speak beyond the portraits, which are very fine engravings. These works must progress a little farther, before any sound opinion can be formed of their respective merits, though each starts fairly and promises well.

The Metropolitan Pulpit, or Sketches of the most Popular Preachers in London. By the Author of "Random Recollections," &c., &c. London: Virtue.

Whatever difference of opinion there may exist about Mr Grant's abilities as an author, no one will deny that he has the knack of seizing upon subjects which are calculated to excite curiosity among a large class of readers. These sketches are often bald enough—the best being the reminiscences of Irving, Rowland Hill, Wilks, Waugh, &c., &c.; but they will be eagerly read by many, for the private lives of the divines interest nearly as much as those of the players. Mr Grant, who is rather remarkable for crudities, has also fallen into inaccuracies, probably from a too easy adoption of the current gossip about popular preachers which abounds in religious circles.—Some of the stories about Rowland Hill are of such a description. Irving—poor Irving!—is spoken of in a very kindly and even affectionate spirit. Whatever were his failings, he certainly had the virtue of making himself beloved—an unfailing sign that he possessed qualities deserving of love. Mr Grant may henceforth hold Dr Waugh free of the sin of quoting Burns' songs on a Sacramental Sunday, as Burns, as every Scotsman should know, was not the author of the song he refers to.

The most memorable late event in the religious world recorded here is, the conversion of an anonymous Duke by the preaching of the Rev. Mr Beamish. His Grace has forsaken Almack's, and "given it," we are solemnly told, "a blow under the effects of which it is now staggering, and from which it is doubtful if it ever will recover." Devonshire is the noble convert hinted at. Two of his servants stood out against family prayers; but the refractory varlets were subdued, and all the domestics now attend family worship regularly, morning and evening. Mr Grant anticipates farther great revolutions in the fashionable world from his Grace having become devout. We must confess that there is a sort of solemn simplicity in our author's statements and reports, upon many occasions, which is almost ludicrous.

In noticing the Rev. Mr Ford, the predecessor of Fletcher, he gives a characteristic picture of the avarice of that reverend person, who, as the plain pastor of a Dissenting chapel, contrived to amass a fortune of thirty thousand pounds. Mr Ford, being an excellent preacher, wisely left his salary to the generosity of his congregation, which was one of the wealthiest among the Dissenters in London. He refused regular seat-rents, and, taking whatever gratuity was offered, the money was generally collected and deposited in his pockets in the vestry before he mounted the pulpit. When the sum was large, it was noticed that he looked uncommonly pleased, and preached with remarkable unction: thus verifying the Scottish proverb about a minister preaching according to his stipend. If the silver and sovereigns were heard jingling together in his pockets, on the pulpit stairs, "he preached with peculiar life and animation." But we vouch for nothing of this. Mr Grant has volumes to spiu out, and seems blessed with an enormous organ of wonder.

A popular Treatise on the Kidney. By George Corfe, of the Middlesex Hospital.

A very singular work this for our age, or from the pen of a medical man of any age. As a scientific treatise, though we do not at all pretend to pronounce upon its merits, it appears to us ingenious and original; but the characteristic feature is the violent tendency of the author to spiritualize the most homely details of his subject, and perpetually launch out into mystical divinity.

"And when divinity comes 'cross him,
His readers, then, are sure to lose him."

So strange an admixture or jumble of science and piety was never before presented to the world; and this is the more to be regretted, as the writer, with great scientific knowledge, appears sincerely devout. It may be asked, if Harvey might spiritualize the starry heavens, or the flower garden, why may not a devout physician adopt the same course with that particular part of the strangely and wonderfully made human frame which he has selected for his treatise? We do not deny the right; yet the results are, in this instance, often inconceivably incongruous, if not irreverent; and yet nothing, we are persuaded, was further from the intention of the author. Let us take a brief example of his singular way of treating a strictly scientific subject. "That dense mass of oil shut up in its numerous cells, above and around the kidney, I propose calling 'The Log of Oil,' after the language used by God, the Holy Ghost, in His Word, in describing the various offerings for the Jewish people." The circulating animal oils, or their connexion with the functions of the kidney, form a vital part of Mr Corfe's treatise; and he has wild and wonderful things to say on the mystical nature of this substance, which we really do not care to cite. It would, however, be unwise in men of science who are fond of speculation to be repelled, by the metaphysics or transcendental soarings of the author, from the perusal of this queer but original book. Nor is it extraordinary that some medical men should become mystics, while others "go the whole hog" in Mesmerism.

A Voice from America to England.

Much sound truth, and some vigour of thought, is in this work, kneaded up with a vast quantity of rank American Toryism. But, then, the Toryism of the United States is but the mild Liberalism of British Whigs. The leading evil tendencies of American society—those which threaten its dissolution—are, we are assured, the Demon of Radicalism, and the worse demon of spiritual tyranny—which has originated in Voluntarism, or the separation between Church and State. The author spares no pains in exposing what he considers the rash folly of the crusading attempts of the Abolitionists; and brings a railing accusation against Miss Martineau for coming from England to stir up the American women to claim no less "than a share in the 'Parliamentary deliberations and other affairs of the State!'" We were not aware that Miss Martineau had gone quite this length; but the Abolitionist doctrines of amalgamation had previously, it seems, prepared the way to the acknowledgment of the equality of the sexes, and the American rebellious ladies were only "aided and abetted by the seditious labours of Miss Martineau." The Abolition Convention, held last autumn, consisted of 123 men to only 42 women—this might still the fears of our author; and only two ladies to seven men were on the committee which drew up the constitution of the society. The ladies, save a very few heroines, are still backward; but our author hopes their amiable diffidence may soon wear away "under the encouraging gallantry of the gentlemen hitherto improperly called their lords." The Mauses Headriggs or Jenny Geddesses of the Abolition Movement are named Maria Chapman and Abby Kelly. Their crude declaration reminds us of the spirit of the Pilgrim Fathers, or the old Covenanters; and in some of its doctrines of the Fifth Monarchy men:—

"We cannot acknowledge," they declare, "allegiance to any human government—we recognise but one king and lawgiver, one judge and ruler of mankind. We are bound by the laws of a kingdom which is not of this world; in which there is no division of caste, or inequality of sex. Our country is the world; our countrymen all mankind. The interests, rights, and liberties of American citizens are no more dear to us than are those of the whole human race. The dogma that all the governments of the world are approvingly ordained by God is not less absurd than impious. We register our testimony not only against all wars, but all preparations for war; and against every edict of government requiring of its subjects military service. . . . As a measure of sound policy, we adopt the non-resistance principle. It appears to us a self-evident truth, that whatever the Gospel is designed to destroy at any period of the world, ought now to be abandoned. We may not fight in defence of life, property, or religion. We must obey the powers that be, except in those cases in which they bid us violate conscience. It will be our leading object to devise ways and means of effecting radical change in society," &c., &c., &c.

Our author believes that this society, or its doctrines, will have great vogue, and prevail in America. The women are brought into play. "It is the best hit of all," this change for them, where all, according to this report, are ever panting for continual change.

The Vegetable Cultivator. By John Rogers.

A plain, sensible, and comprehensive treatise on the cultivation of vegetables, which may benefit the market-gardener, and prove a useful guide for the management of the private kitchen-garden, of whatever extent. This book is the production of a practical man, who has proved his own directions.

The Philosophy of Artificial and Compulsory Drinking Usages, &c., &c. By John Dunlop, Esq., President of the Temperance Union of Scotland.

Second Report of the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society.

If not a nation of absolute tea-totalers, we shall certainly by-and-by become a temperate people. The higher classes of this country have, in the natural progress of civilization, and without any associations, become temperate; and there is little doubt that, if more fortunately situated in the articles important to human comfort in this northern climate, the inferior classes, also, would have gradually renounced excess without any compulsory or ostentatious means; and their increased temperance have been the natural result of increasing social comfort, improved morality, and refinement of manners. As it is, and without admiring the extravagance to which even a good thing may be carried, we must say, from observation and conviction, that the Tee-total Societies have already done great good among the lower orders of the community, and are, together with many concurrent causes, paving the way for a state of things in which their active and rather obtrusive operations may no longer be required.

Among the zealous or the enthusiastic apostles of Total Abstinence, no one is more distinguished than the philanthropic author of the book before us. Mr Dunlop may carry his opinions to the extreme; but there can be no more doubt of his good intentions, than of the many excellent results of the associations which he patronizes. His history of the drinking usages of the three kingdoms is, besides, curious, as a part of the history of the social life and manners of the people. Nor have we any hesitation in pronouncing compulsory drinking a much worse evil than compulsory abstinence. Both are injurious to the free growth of that mental strength which teaches a man to rule his own spirit—to regulate his conduct by his own independent judgment. Mr Dunlop commences Chapter I., sentence first, with a high and deserved compliment to Sir Walter Scott's knowledge and masterly delineation of Scottish manners. Does he remember that passage in "The Antiquary," when Monkbarns, meeting Maggie Mucklebucket, hopes the distilleries may never work again. "Ay, ay," said Maggie, "it's easy for your Honour, and the like o' you gentlefolks, to say sae, that hae stouth and routh, and fire and fending, and meat and claith, and sit dry and canny by the fireside; but, an' ye wanted fire, and meat, and dry claise, and were deeing o' cauld, and had a sair heart, which is worst ava, wi' just tippence in your pouch, wadna ye be glad to buy a dram wi't, to be eilden, and claise, and supper, and heart's-ease into the bargain, till the morn's mornin'?"

This might be very fallacious reasoning on Maggy's part—no doubt of it; yet Monkbarns admitted her apology as "too true;" and we cannot see why every advocate of Total Abstinence should not therefore cordially join with those who demand for the people the cheap, the untaxed bread and meat, and the lightly taxed tea and sugar, and other comforts which their industry is sufficient to procure, and which would leave to no one Maggy's "too true an apology," for giving away the last twopence, whether for gin or for opium. There are, however, we admit, a very great majority of all cases of intemperance which have no claim to Maggy's apology.

Has not Mr Dunlop's credulity been abused in some of the anecdotes he relates? In what British towns are the following dark revels held?—"It is notorious [notorious?] that in great towns, and in the populous districts around, there are secret assemblies of females, instituted in revenge of their husbands' self-indulgences, for the purpose of the vilest excesses out of the presence of the men; which diabolical resorts have all their peculiar dark and hateful regulations. Town missionaries, sometimes in their researches among the abodes of sin, stumble unawares on these receptacles." We entertain strong doubts about these regularly organized clubs of British matrons. Had such existed, Pilet must have heard of them.

The very Kirk itself does not escape Mr Dunlop. "In some presbyteries," he says "the presbyterial dinner is furnished with liquor, not by each member present paying his direct proportionate share, but by fines imposed on various occasions. When a clergyman gets a new manse, he is fined a bottle of wine; when he has been newly married, this circumstance subjects him to the same amiable penalty; a child also costs one bottle, and the publication of a sermon another." Reverend bachelors are, on the other hand, fined for having no new wives nor children. Now, we apprehend, some will think the fine exceedingly moderate, and that the bottle should be, at least, a magnum. In a certain burgh, the elder sent by the magistrates to the General Assembly, presents them, we are told, in return for his appointment, with two guineas to drink! and if a clergyman of Edinburgh, during the sitting of the venerable Assembly, preach in his own pulpit and thus dispense with the assistance of his provincial brethren, the customary bottle of wine is forfeited to the Presbytery. But the Kirk has much more to answer for. One lass, when married, became a drunkard, from the evil habit of sipping out the dregs of the minister's toddy-tumbler every day after dinner; and some of the grave senators of Great Britain were "unfeignedly amazed" to hear that it was not unusual for the clergymen of North Britain to take a dram! We wonder that, among these anecdotes, the fact does not appear, that the number of glasses of toddy to which a minister's wife is entitled being by regulation three, she may claim an additional glass on every augmentation of stipend; so that three augmentations during one incumbency would double her originally prescribed allowance. It is to be regretted that this zealous author should have impaired his real usefulness among rational people by this sort of over-doing. Lord Teignmouth, whom he frequently cites, was lately horrified at seeing ladies and gentlemen in the Highlands drinking whisky before breakfast. He found it the invariable practice among clergymen's families and in every gentleman farmer's; and the good people were simple enough to wonder that his Lordship should be surprised at the common custom of their country. Would they not have as much cause to feel astonishment, if coming south, at his Lordship or his contemporaries imbibing a nauseous morning draught, called soda-water or saline mixture? And we will venture to affirm that the "mountain-dew," the plain dram, or the bitters, no more affected the faculties of the Highland ministers, or the Sutherland sheep-farmers, than as much soda-water would have done the brains of his Lordship.

Mr Dunlop must not be offended at these remarks. We respect his motives, and we acknowledge that great good has been accomplished by Temperance Societies, and therefore regret that carrying matters to the extreme should draw sneers and ridicule upon the efforts of the most useful associations with which he is connected.

Excursion in the Interior of Russia. By Robert Bremner, Esq. 2 vols. royal octavo. London: Colburn.

In the course of a rather extensive tour on the Continent, Mr Bremner and a small party of friends made, in the autumn of 1836, a dash into Russia, entering at St Petersburg, and making their exit by Odessa. Their adventures, personal observations, and acquired information, supply the contents of two bulky and interesting volumes. The travellers, or traveller, is not unjust to Russia, where any bias is perceptible; but, upon the whole, the work is very fairly written. It accordingly does not present the most flattering view of that vast and cumbersome empire, in which a French gentleman told a late traveller, that the only distinction existing between the noble and the peasant was, that the one wore his shirt outside his trousers, while the other tucked it in. The Russian nobles, those of them who do not come abroad to other countries to un-Russianize, still beat their wives occasionally, as Mr Bremner states, and shew equal refinement in other points. Love is unknown in Russia, (which we should doubt,) marriages being made from vanity or convenience; and a man may buy himself another man's wife for his bride, if he gives her price. At least a case is noticed of one of "the most powerful of the Russian nobles" having lately bought such a partner for £2000. Mr Bremner, like other travellers, may, however, be apt, in this and some other instances, to forget that one swallow does not make a summer. Like all selfish, pampered, and half-civilized persons, who value everything merely by its cost and rarity—and there are plenty of them in every wealthy country—the Russians prize forced delicacies, such as cherries, at a guinea a-piece, or peaches, at two guineas, and sterlet, at from £7 to £50 for a single fish. Another trait of unrefined or low taste, is ostentatious extravagance in wines. Of Champagne alone nearly half a million bottles are imported yearly into Russia. Mr Bremner wonders where so much genuine Champagne is obtained. Let him consult Dr Granville's German Spas for the solution of this mystery. The Russians, though far from being tea-totalers, are universal tea-drinkers. And they have delicious tea. The superior quality of their tea they impute to getting it overland—sea-air being supposed to destroy the exquisite aroma of the tea on long voyages. Tea brought so far by land-carriage is necessarily very high-priced. The mushroom is another universal and delicate article of food, with all classes; and, from abundance and wholesome quality proves a blessing to the poor. As we cannot attempt anything like justice to this work, nor to give even a slight idea of its contents, we must satisfy our consciences by recommending it strongly to those who would acquire a mass of fresh and authentic miscellaneous information respecting the important country which it discusses.

Deerbrook. By Miss Martineau. London: Moxon. 3 vols.

Deerbrook is not a novel, in the common acceptation of the term, and it is yet less of a romance. It is one of Miss Martineau's little stories, illustrative of social morals, and of the domestic life of the middle classes, expanded into three volumes, and suffering in the process, from what necessarily becomes too copious a mixture of the merely trivial and commonplace details of every-day life—such, details, as throw little or no light upon individual character or the workings of the passions. Rapid or startling incident is excluded, probably upon system, and there is none of the broad caricature or rage for the ludicrous exhibited, which is at present carried to excess in novels. None of the characters are of the kind which "elevate and surprise," but some of them are finely discriminated. Yet young novel readers will be disappointed in Deerbrook, though the fault may haply lie with themselves, for there is much that is admirable in these village annals, both of the naturally interwoven and the artificially embossed. It is, in short, a picture of real life, of which all the excellence will not be apparent at the first perusal. It must be taken up a second time, and will repay the study.

Claims of the Animal Creation on Humanity. By the Rev. John Styles, D.D.

This is the essay to which the hundred-pound prize of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was adjudged, out of thirty-four given in. It contains the usual arguments, facts, and appeals addressed to human reason and feeling in behalf of the lower creation, and needful strictures upon the new-fangled forms of torturing animals by captivity in the Zoological Gardens. These places, wherever they exist, it is justly remarked, "contain a great amount of animal suffering, for which no compensation whatever is made, either in advancing natural science, or in domesticating animals of other countries. In both these objects they have been a total failure." It is, however, forgotten, what pretty morning lounges they form for idle people. This volume contains many interesting anecdotes of animal intelligence. Dr Styles is alike the denouncer of fishing, fowling, coursing, racing, and caging animals and birds; but his special horror is reserved for the anatomists, or rather the experimenting physiologists; and he relates an experiment in vivisection that took place in the Edinburgh University, which is so utterly appalling and disgusting—so truly demoniacal, that we would fain hope it is greatly exaggerated.

Lectures on Natural Philosophy. By Montague Lyon Philips.

These Lectures have been delivered to the author's pupils, and are published from his notion of the want of such an elementary treatise. A set of questions intended to test the knowledge and exercise the understanding of the pupils is appended to each lecture.

The Conversations Lexicon. Parts 47 to 50.

This solid work draws to a close. The 7th volume is to finish the work, and to contain a Supplement and Analytical Index. The progress of science and discovery renders a Supplement to every Encyclopædia which has been going for some years absolutely necessary. The late Parts contain a History of the United States of America and a good many biographies.

Foreign Monthly Review. No. I.

This new Review is addressed to those whose thirst after the novelties of Foreign Literature will not allow them to abide the leisure or slow pace of the Foreign Quarterly. The first number is of fair promise; the contents are light and diversified.

A True Picture of Australia. By a Friend to Truth.

It is not easy to give "A True Picture of Australia," of which every man speaks as he personally feels, where candour prevails so far, as to permit the humiliating confession of sanguine, senseless expectations resulting in disappointment and suffering. This pamphlet has the merit of shewing the reverse of that flattering picture, by which so many persons have been misled. A number of original letters, from emigrants of different classes, are given, and form the most valuable part of a little work which, however, falls very short of what might be said either in giving the information required, or the cautions necessary to emigrants.

The Family Sanctuary,

Is a portly, handsome volume, in full canonicals; containing a sermon and prayer for every Sunday in the year, with the Collect of the day, and a portion of Scripture. The author is a zealous, and, we have no doubt, a conscientious Churchman; but why should he think that, if we had no Established Church, we should have no Sabbath—no day of holy rest. Do Voluntaries disrespect the Sabbath more than Churchmen?

Letters to the Bishop of Durham, relative to his Subscription for the Rev. W. Turner's Sermons, &c. &c.

These Letters are written by a Unitarian, and their object is to shew that the Right Reverend Bishop need not have taken so great alarm at the imputations cast on his orthodoxy, for merely buying a Unitarian work. The writer, in short, in his Letters to the Bishop, takes occasion to give a popular view of the Unitarian creed.

Outline of the Sacred Literature of the New Testament. By D. Macintosh.

A little work or pamphlet, containing a good deal of useful information, compiled from safe and trustworthy quarters.

The Discovery of the Vital Principle, or Physiology of Man.

A very singular book, composed by a man more bold than wise, we should think. Animal magnetism, phrenology, nay, even the perpetual motion, the transmutation of metals, and the very elixir of immortality itself, are thrown into the shade by the discovery, of the "Vital Principle." The discovery, the author of it believes to be made just in time. We do not pretend quite to understand him and perhaps he is not always sure of himself, though a theory more cut-and-dry could not be wished for. His speculations on progressive life, animal and vegetable, in its oval, fetal, and locomotive stages—on the "Mundane Egg," on Man, &c. &c., are at least stimulating. In "the wreck of worlds" which the author of this new cosmogony believes will be hastened by our mining processes and waste of coal, he predicts that a remnant of the virtuous portion of the human race will be saved, by means, not of arks, as at the Deluge, but of balloons! A spirit of benevolence and piety pervades these philosophic reveries; and the writer, in his search for materials to prop his theories, has collected a vast number of curious facts.

The Little Book of Knowledge.

A very neatly printed and most legible tome for little readers; and one which is adorned with some pretty cuts, and quite stored with useful knowledge.

SERIAL WORKS.

Heads of the People.

The last number of this clever publication which has reached us, is so conglomerated by the stitcher or binder, or whatever his proper title be, that we can make little out of it. It seems a compound of different numbers. We have the Undertaker complete, with Douglas Jerrold's graphic illustrative sketch of that functionary; and this tells for something; and that latent spirit of philanthropy which we were delighted to recognise in this series from its first number, is manifested in the Chimney-sweeps—those black spots upon the garments of a Christian community. The Chimneysweep tempts us to relate a trifling illustrative anecdote:—A few days since we chanced to witness the mingled surprise, horror, and pity of a Highland servant-maid—a fine specimen, in every way, of the mountains from which she had very recently emerged—on coming into personal contact with chimneysweeps. Two of the black-whites had come to her master's house, and she was ordered to see that the soot was not allowed to escape from the chimney about to be swept, through a room in which there were a good many books, and other things that might be injured. The full-grown sweep, who went aloft, she did not seem to heed, or to regard only with a passing feeling of disgust; but she became absolutely fascinated by the extraordinary creature in human form who held the sheet opposite to her to keep in the soot. He was like all his kind—a miserable, stunted wretch, very ill with what seemed purulent ophthalmia—a spectacle such as no savage country ever did present, and which was quite new to his temporary assistant. She gazed more and more intensely into his stupid or rather dull and begrimed face; and at last fairly turned the strange creature round with the points of her fingers, under evident excitement.

"Och! poor boy, how long have you been at this work?"

"Six years," grumbled out the blackened undergrowth.

"Six years! How old are you?"

"Fourteen."

"Fourteen!—he's liker nine. Sic a miserable wee chieldie! What took you to the sweeps, boy? Could you na rather herd, or do anything in the world?"

No reply.

"Why do you not run away? Lord be good to us! Och heine! Such a miserable black cratur!" And the Highland lass, in her benevolent excitement, said things about the appearance and condition of the object of her compassion, which must have deeply wounded the feelings of the little sweep, if sweeps have feelings—which we sincerely hope they have not—physical sensation being quite sufficient for their torture. A hint was given that the poor boy might have some remaining human sensibility, and that he certainly could have had no choice of his trade, as large towns do not afford many opportunities for little boys getting even the poor employment of herding. Nothing could pacify the natural and unsophisticated feelings of the woman regarding the cruelly-defaced human image. Her final advice or entreaty was, that he would run away, which the boy seemed to hear with the same indifferent or stupefied air as the rest of her vehement discourse. He was quite subdued to the quality of his degrading office. The only gleam of satisfaction which was visible on his countenance, was in gulping, rather than swallowing, the draught of beer which his patroness said he did more greedily than the big man. So, again ejaculating, "Och heine! the black cratur!" she resumed her own business, probably thanking heaven that there were no chimneysweeps in the Highlands. Mr Ogden, the author of the Sketch of the Chimneysweep in the "Heads of the People," inquires why the legislature does not at once provide, that all chimneys should be so constructed as to admit the free use of the machine. We have often thought that the chimneysweeping department, like that of street-cleaning and lighting, ought to be under the management of the police. Not only are boys tortured contrary to law, but thefts, burglaries, and fires, are occasioned by the present system; many persons being seemingly willing to endanger their own house and neighbourhood, rather than pay for the cleaning of their chimneys when it is required.

Knight's Pictorial Shakspeare.

Parts VI. and VII. contain the first and second part of King Henry IV.; and, among other embellishments, a whole gallery of Falstaffs, and an admirably discriminative appreciation of the character of the fat knight. Some of the architectural and other plates are very fine; and there is, as usual, a vast quantity of learned lore in the preliminary critical remarks and annotations.

Smith's Standard Library.

This is among the best of the many popular libraries now in course of publication. The works are well selected—the printing, paper, and size unexceptionable—and the price, at first too cheap, still moderate. We wish every respectable young man, or young householder, no worse a stock of refined English literature to commence his collection with than these very handsome and cheap books. There are seventeen parts already published, which would make two very handsome volumes of about 650 pages each—containing, The Lady of the Lake, The Lay of the Last Minstrel, and Marmion; Crabbe's Borough, Thomson's Poems, Burns's Poems, Goldsmith's Poems and Plays, and Vicar of Wakefield; Coleridge's Translation of Schiller's Wallenstein; The Poetical Works of Henry Kirk White; Paul and Virginia, The Indian Cottage, and Elizabethe; Anson's Voyage round the World, Kneckerbocher's History of New York; Locke on the Reasonableness of Christianity; Mrs Inchbald's Nature and Art; Meeting of the Bounty; and Memoirs of Colonel Hutchinson.

Christian Literature.

This series commences with Boston's "Crook in the Lot," and West's "Observations on the History and Evidence of the Resurrection." It is well printed, and moderate in price.

Records of the Kirk of Scotland.

Part VI. of these curious ecclesiastical and historical annals has appeared. It brings the Records down to the eve of a perilous period of the Kirk's history—1640. In the General Assembly of 1639, when zeal against Episcopacy was at blood-heat, the Moderator gave this amusing definition of Tulchan Bishops:—"Tulchan was a Scots word used in their common language. When a cow would not let down her milk, they stappie [stuff] a calf's skin full of strae, and sett it down before the cow, and that was called a Tulchan. So those Bishops brooking [enjoying] the title and the benefice, without the office, they wist not what name to give them, and so they called them Tulchan Bishops, (at which the Assembly laughing heartilie,) the Moderator said—"Their follies were worthy to be laughen at in this General Assembly."

Views on the Shores and Islands of the Mediterranean. By W. L. Leitch. With Descriptions of the Plates by the Rev. G. N. Wright. Fishers.

The taste, talent, and care with which the publishers of this series get up such works, is already appreciated. Those familiar with their "Illustrations of Syria and the Holy Land" have, therefore, only to transfer their thoughts to this fresh region to obtain a lively and correct idea of the work. Some striking views are taken in Sicily, Algiers, and on the Barbary coast.

Early English Authors.

This is a new set of reprints, of which the first is well chosen, but not so well executed. "It is Percy's Reliques of Ancient English (and Scottish) Ballad Poetry. The works deserve to be well printed; and the price will afford it, as modern cheap publications go.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

The Melbourne Ministry has resigned and again resumed office. After a lengthened debate on a Bill introduced by Ministers, to suspend the Constitution of Jamaica for five years, a division on the motion, that the Bill should go into Committee, took place on the 6th of May, when there appeared, for the motion, 294; against it, 289—the Ministerial majority being only 5. Ten Radical members voted with the Opposition, and five Tories with the Government. At the meeting of the House next day, Lord John Russell announced the resignation of Ministers, on the ground that the Jamaica Bill required more than ordinary support and confidence, but that it had received less than Ministers have usually obtained; and that, besides, there was the Canada Bill, which would likewise require more support than Ministers were likely to receive. On his resignation, Lord Melbourne advised the Queen to send for the Duke of Wellington; who went to Court on the 8th May, and advised that Sir Robert Peel should be placed at the head of the new Ministry. At the first interview, the Queen informed Sir Robert Peel that she entirely approved of the conduct of her late Ministry, and parted from them with regret. Next day Sir Robert submitted to the Queen a list of the new Ministers, among whom were the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Ellenborough, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, Sir Henry Hardinge, and Mr Goulburn. On the 9th May, however, a difficulty arose. In discussing the question of the household appointments with his future colleagues, Sir Robert Peel had said he would make no change in the subordinate offices, or those below the rank of a Lady of the Bedchamber; and with respect to the superior offices, he assumed that all difficulty would be prevented by the voluntary resignation of the ladies who held them. But, on applying to the Queen, her Majesty stated, that she would allow no change whatever. The Duke of Wellington having agreed with Sir Robert Peel in the opinion, that if the Queen adhered to her resolution, the attempt to form a Ministry must be relinquished, the Queen consulted Lord Melbourne. A council was held, at which the matter was discussed; and the result was, that her Majesty was advised to send a note to Sir Robert, refusing to consent to a removal of the Ladies of her Bedchamber; which was, she stated, a course contrary to usage, and repugnant to her feelings. In three hours afterwards, Sir Robert Peel resigned, and the negotiations ended. The Queen then sent for Lord John Russell; and, in answer to a question from the Queen, Lord John gave it as his opinion, that she was justified in refusing to dismiss the female part of the household. The question was again considered by the Ministers at a Cabinet Council, and the following was the deliberate judgment of the Cabinet:—"That the great officers of the Court, and situations in the Household, held by Members of Parliament, should be included in the political arrangements made in a change of the administration; but they are not of opinion that a similar principle should be applied or extended to the offices held by the ladies in her Majesty's household."

The course adopted by the Queen is said, by high authority, to be unconstitutional; but it has been generally approved of by the country, and numerous addresses have been voted to her Majesty denouncing the attempt to make her a state prisoner in her own palace, to place spies over her domestic movements, and to make the Crown a mere pageant, to be used only for the purposes of an oligarchy. What has occurred will go far to open the eyes of the people to the real nature of the constitution of this country. The three estates keeping each other in mutual check, is a mere pretence. Before the Reform Act was passed, and in a great measure still, the House of Commons was and is not the representative of the people, but of the Aristocracy; and as the Crown must always receive such persons as Ministers whom the majority of the House of Commons support, the aristocracy has a complete control over the Crown. The power of the Crown to check the acts of the two other branches of the Legislature, was almost annihilated by the Revolution of 1688; and since that event, only one Bill, which passed both Houses of Parliament, has been rejected by the Sovereign. Where any measure particularly obnoxious to the Crown is likely to pass through Parliament, the true constitutional mode of rejection by the Crown is not now adopted, but the unconstitutional course of using the secret influence of the Sovereign on the House of Peers; and the same course is adopted, when measures are likely to be rejected by the Peers, which the Crown wishes to be carried. For example, the rumour that the withdrawal of the opposition to the Reform Bill in the House of Lords, was the effect of his late Majesty, William IV.'s personal interference, is now proved beyond doubt by the letter of Lord John Russell to the electors of Stroud, and the answer to that letter by Lord Brougham. No person ventures to defend the conduct of the King on that occasion as constitutional.

The Whigs are congratulating themselves that the Tories have received a blow from which they will not soon recover; but that depends entirely on the conduct of the new Ministry: if they go on as hitherto, acting on Tory principles, and thwarting every measure the Liberals have at heart, a very few months will place the Tories in office, notwithstanding their recent defeat. In a country where so much deference is paid to rank and wealth, a great party possessing probably three-fourths of the land in the country cannot be permanently put down; nor is it desirable that they should; for the last few years have proved that Tory principles may prevail in, and be acted on by a Whig as well as a Tory Ministry. That the new Ministry will make any great change in the line of conduct pursued for the last four years, we do not expect, although they may possibly make plenty of Liberal professions at the outset. They will certainly not extend the Suffrage, give Vote by Ballot, nor shorten the duration of Parliaments; neither will they Repeal the Corn Laws, nor attempt to carry out the principles of Free Trade. They will probably make some slight change on the Reform Act, such as the repeal of the Rate-Paying clauses, and the simplification of the Registration, and if the revenue can safely bear the experiment, reduce the rate of Postage, and this is all that we expect from the re-establishment of the Melbourne Ministry.

Before the resignation of Ministers, the Speaker of the House of Commons, feeling the approach of old age, had resigned his office. Whether he is to go to the House of Lords is not yet known. The candidates for the Speakership are, Mr Shaw Lefevre on the Whig side, and Mr Goulburn on the Tory; so that the power of each party will be soon ascertained. A general election appears to be very generally expected; but we can see no reason why the Whigs should make so dangerous an experiment. If they do, we do not believe that they will gain any accession of strength.

ENGLAND.

THE CHARTISTS.—The Government has taken serious alarm at the violent language used by the Chartists, and numerous arrests have taken place in London, and the manufacturing districts, without, however, intimidating their leaders. Exhortations to arm continue to be poured forth, though apparently with little effect; for it has been ascertained that the sale of fire-arms has not increased; and, in the searches which have been made, few fire-arms or pikes have been found. The Convention finding itself perfectly insignificant in London, has removed to Birmingham; and frequent meetings of the Chartists are held in most of the manufacturing districts. We are convinced that those of the Chartists who wish to resort to physical force are a very inconsiderable body; but not in the least dangerous, unless persecuted. The arrests and imprisonments are not only unnecessary, but highly injudicious; and much more likely to inflame the masses than to inspire them with the spirit of peace. Instead of attempting to put down the agitation for the Peoples' Charter by legal violence, it is high time the middle and upper classes were considering what amount of justice there is in the Peoples' claims.

DINNER TO MR HUME.—A party of from two to three hundred dined at the Crown and Anchor on the 1st May, on the occasion of the presentation of a silver tea-service to Mr Hume, for which subscriptions were commenced soon after his defeat in Middlesex in 1837. Sir Edward Codrington was in the chair. Sir Edward, as well as Mr Hume strongly recommended union among Reformers. The Ballot, extension of the Suffrage, and Short Parliaments were among the toasts. Mr Aglionby said, that he did not think that the Ballot, without the extension of the Suffrage, would work out the principles of Reform. He was for Household Suffrage, as a stage to which he was prepared to go, and although he had been for the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, he had never dreamed it to be a final measure. Mr O'Connell attacked Lord Brougham, and accused him of being the supporter of Wellington and Lyndhurst; but was very properly admonished by one of the company to leave Lord Brougham out of his censure.

PENNY POSTAGE.—The petitions for the adoption of Mr Rowland Hill's plan of a uniform penny postage, have been presented to the House of Commons in hundreds; and there is little doubt that the Ministry must soon yield on this point. The attempt to increase the Post-Office revenue, by high rates of postage, has entirely failed; for, comparing the six years ending 1837 with the six years ending 1820, there is an annual increase of £3823 only; whereas an increase in the ratio of population would have given £500,000, and an increase in the ratio of stage-coach duty would have produced £3,000,000 annually. The evasion of postage is almost universal. In Manchester and Glasgow, it has been shown that four-fifths and five-sixths of the letters sent do not pass through the Post-Office. The chargeable letters are only three-fifths in number, and one-fifth of weight of the whole mail; and the cost of transit being the only portion of the whole charge which is affected by the distance which the letter has to travel, is less than a farthing per letter. The present mail-coaches could carry, on the average, twenty-seven times the number of chargeable letters; while a sixfold increase would, at a uniform rate of a penny per half ounce, nearly preserve the present revenue. The Committee of the House of Commons have recommended a uniform rate of twopence per half ounce, and one penny more for each additional half ounce; but this is not Mr Hill's plan at all, and, if attempted to be carried into execution, will prove an entire failure; for, while it will cause a great diminution in the revenue, it will not increase, in any great degree, the number of letters sent through the Post-Office. At present, the evasion is practised either by sending the letters in parcels of goods, in which case they go free, or by collecting them by carriers and delivering for one penny each. It is proved that even a very low postage prevents the sending of small orders; and we therefore hope that no experiment will be made with a twopenny postage, for its failure will be held out as an argument against Mr Hill's plan, which must shortly be carried into effect if postage is allowed to continue at its present rate. The progress of the question is very remarkable, and shews, in a strong light, what can be done by agitation. Before Mr Hill's pamphlet appeared, no complaints were heard of the high rate of postage, at least none reached the Legislature. In 1837, five petitions were presented to the House of Commons for a low and uniform postage; in 1831, 320; and this year, to the 15th May, no fewer than 880.

ANTI-CORN-LAW CIRCULAR.—Following the excellent example of the London Mercantile Committee on postage, an Anti-Corn-Law Circular has been established, which has already a great circulation. Of the first Number, 10,000 copies were printed; 12,000 of the second; and 15,000 of the third. It cannot fail to be highly beneficial in removing the misconceptions and prejudices which exist, even among the Liberal party, on the subject of the Corn-Laws.

THE NEW POOR-LAW.—Notwithstanding the high price of provisions, the reduction of the rates occasioned by the New Poor-Law has been very considerable. For example, in the Ulverston Union in Cumberland, which consists of twenty-seven parishes and townships, the expenditure, ending Ladyday 1839, as compared with the average of the last three years under the old law is twenty-two per cent., although the expenditure this year is nearly twenty per cent. higher than the expenditure of 1837-8. In some parishes the reduction is as much as sixty-one per cent., and in all, except two, there is a reduction more or less; and this although a new work-house has been built and furnished. As 679 parts in the 1000 of the poor-rates are paid by the land, it is obvious that the new law—whatever it may be to the poor man—has been a great boon to the landed-interest, and justifies a demand, on the part of the industrious classes, of a repeal of the restrictions on and prohibitions against the importation of food.

ARISTOCRATIC TAXATION.—If we looked to nothing else than our tariff, we could easily discover who were the real rulers of this country: beef, mutton, pork, cattle, sheep, and all fresh animal food, or animals fit for food, prohibited to be imported; wheat, at present, a period almost of dearth, loaded with a duty of seventeen per cent., and oats with forty-five per cent on the selling price here, to increase the wealth of the land-owners: horses, with a duty of £1 each, that the sports of racing and hunting may not be interfered with; dogs and cats free, for a similar reason; asses—the only foreign commodity we ought to dispense with—only 10s. each; stockfish—the food of the poor man—5s. per 120; eels a fish consumed by the middle class, £13, for a cargo of 15,000 or 20,000 lb.; turbot and lobsters—the luxury of the rich—free. These facts are more instructive than Blackstone's Commentaries, in shewing the practical working of the British Constitution.

SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh and Leith seem destined to remain, as they have been since the passing of the Reform Act, Government Nomination Burghs, and always to be represented by placemen or pensioners. Leith, every one is satisfied, will always afford a seat to the Lord Advocate of the day, be he Whig or Tory; and Edinburgh can only be represented by Members in the confidence of Government. Has Edinburgh really gained anything by the Reform Act? Were our jobs not as well managed in the time of William Dundas, except that Tories, and not Whigs, were the recipients of the plunder? What imaginable claim has Macaulay—not the really useful Macaulay of the police board, but the other; he who has been feathering his nest in India—on the constituency of Edinburgh?

SURPLUS CHURCH PROPERTY versus UNEXHAUSTED TEINDS.—At a time when so much noise is made about Church Extension, and when demands are made upon the Legislature to vote money for that purpose out of the pockets of the industrious classes, we need not apologise to our readers for again directing their attention to the immense surplus patrimony of the Church, which has not yet been applied to its proper objects—education and spiritual instruction. It appears, from the Reports of the Church Commission, that there are no fewer than 351 parishes in Scotland with more surplus teinds than are required for their spiritual wants; and that the total of those teinds amounts annually to no less a sum than £124,318:12:11, being a fund adequate very nearly to double the number of the Established Clergy, for it will yield an endowment or a stipend of £150 a-year to no fewer than EIGHT HUNDRED AND TWENTY-EIGHT ADDITIONAL CLERGYMEN! Surely this is an extension which would satisfy the greatest glutton of endowments. What a comfortable addition these surplus teinds make to the rent-rolls of our landed interest may be easily imagined. Unexhausted teinds of above £1000 a-year are to be found in the following twenty-one parishes:—

Airth, . . .	£1489	Kilbarchan, . . .	£1414
Cannobie, . . .	1063	Larbert, . . .	1180
Castleton, . . .	1508	Liff, . . .	1006
Cavers, . . .	1134	Linlithgow, . . .	1029
Dunbar, . . .	4350	Paigley, . . .	1615
Eckford, . . .	1254	Rathven, . . .	1082
Falkirk, . . .	1144	Roxburgh, . . .	1346
Greenock, . . .	1639	St Ninians, . . .	2700
Inveresk, . . .	2034	St Vigean, . . .	1086
Inverness, . . .	1073	Wemyss, . . .	1066
Jedburgh, . . .	2100

We must confess that we do not understand that species of piety which insists on the Legislature taking a portion of the hard-wrought earnings out of the pocket of the working man, rather than demand that the magnificent income arising from the spoils of the Church shall be taken out of the hands of the landed interest and applied to its legitimate and appropriate object. That the landowners would be very unwilling to disgorge it, we do not doubt; but if the friends of Church Extension will bring the matter fairly and repeatedly before Parliament and the public, which they have never yet done, the landlords will be forced to capitulate. We cannot leave the subject without pointing out the conduct of some of the landowners on this subject. Some of them, who are drawing hundreds a-year from church property, subscribed £5 or £10 to Church Extension; and one nobleman, who is in the annual receipt of £5000 of surplus tithes, subscribed £100! We cannot for a moment suppose, although it is very generally insinuated, that the reason for the clergy not directing the attention of Parliament and of the public to the unexhausted tithes is, that they wish them to remain as a fund from which future augmentations may be claimed. But if this is really the true reason for the silence of the Established Clergy, we hope that the Dissenting Clergy and lay extensionists will not longer overlook this great fund, destined by our ancestors to the diffusion of sound education and true religion.

FRANCE.

On Sunday, the 12th of May, a serious insurrection broke out in Paris, of which neither the authors nor the object have yet transpired. About three o'clock in the afternoon, a body of some two hundred workmen, clothed in their usual dress, appeared in the Rue St Denis. Their numbers soon increased, and proceeding to the shop of a gun-maker, they broke it open, carried off a great number of fire-arms, chiefly fowling-pieces. They then proceeded in good order through different parts of the city, successfully attacked and disarmed some of the military posts, and with great rapidity erected several barricades. Although 50,000 troops of the line were in Paris, or within a few hours march, besides some twelve or fifteen legions of the National Guard, a handful of insurgents kept possession of the city for the greater part of the afternoon; and the insurrection was not effectually suppressed till late next day. The "emeute" seems to have taken the authorities by surprise, for no preparation whatever had been made to resist it. The inhabitants of Paris generally seemed to have looked on with indifference. As happens in most attempts to overthrow an established power, it is likely that the greater number were watching the chances of success, as they did in the "glorious days of July"—glorious certainly for Louis Philippe. Forty-seven of the military and National Guard were killed, and probably double the number of the insurgents. About 200 wounded had been carried to the hospitals. A large proportion of these were soldiers. The wounded revolutionists would, of course endeavour to get out of the way. The insurrection is attributed by various Journals to the Republicans, to Prince Louis Napoleon, to the Société des Familles, to a coalition among some journeyman batters, and an attempt to liberate some of them who had been imprisoned, and finally to Louis Philippe himself, who is accused of having resorted to this expedient with the view of alarming the inhabitants of Paris, and inducing them to consent to a Conservative Administration. Be this as it may, it is shrewdly conjectured that Louis Philippe has, for some time past, purposely been throwing impediments in the way of the formation of a Ministry, till he saw whether the Tories could resume office in this country or not; and it is certain that the news of the defeat of the Tories, in their attempt to reinstate themselves in power, was known in Paris on Saturday night; that the outbreak took place next day; that, in the midst of the tumult, and within an hour or two after it broke out, Soult went to the Tuilleries, and immediately undertook to form a Ministry; and that, next morning, the Moniteur appeared, containing a royal ordinance, with the appointment of a Conservative Ministry. If Louis Philippe, therefore, is not, in reality, the author of the outbreak, he has, with great promptitude, taken advantage of it for his own interest; but no one expects that the Ministry can last long. They were very coldly received in the Chamber of Deputies; and already differences have arisen among themselves.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

The accounts from the manufacturing districts, generally represent trade to be in a dull state; and a considerable fall in the price of manufactures has taken place within the last month or two. An extensive speculation in cotton-wool has been going on, which has proved painful to the cotton trade; for, since its commencement, the total rise in prices has been from seventy-five to eighty per cent. The consumption of cotton in Britain, which, last year, averaged 23 785 bales per week; has, as is calculated, sunk this year to 18 000 bales. But as an agreement to work only three days in the week has unanimously been entered into in some of the most important seats of the trade, a much greater diminution in the consumption of cotton will take place; and this will tend to break up the speculation. The wool trade has also been in a state of depression; but the recent sales of wool having dissipated the expectation of a decline, either in the raw or manufactured article, the demand has improved. The supply has of late been very deficient, and the manufacturers have been producing with the utmost caution.

AGRICULTURE.

The cold weather has greatly retarded vegetation, and the season may be considered three weeks later than in average years. Pastures are exceedingly bare. The superiority of the Italian rye-grass, in point of early maturity, has been clearly shewn, in various instances, in this neighbourhood this year—that grass having been cut before pastures of the ordinary grasses were an inch high. The accounts from England of the appearance of the wheat crops are generally favourable; but in many parts of Scotland, a considerable breadth of wheat was found to be so thin and weak, that it has been considered expedient to plough it up and sow barley in its stead. The weather, though cold, being dry, has been favourable for the sowing of the spring crops of all kinds. Little fluctuation has taken place in the corn-markets; and, as large quantities of foreign wheat continue to be imported there appears no great probability of prices rising much higher, even although harvest should be later than usual.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

JULY, 1839.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS FOR ESTABLISHING A CONSTABULARY FORCE IN ENGLAND AND WALES.

EVERYTHING in this Report denotes a foregone conclusion. The inquiry does not even purport to be, whether what is misnamed a Constabulary Force is required or not, but what are the best means the Executive can adopt for establishing an efficient force. There is a class of Whig commissions, the members of which appear to feel themselves in the position of the girl, in one of Burns' songs, who earnestly craves counsel, offering her "bonny black hen" if her sister "will but advise her to marry the lad she loves dearly." Mr Chadwick and his coadjutors are in the exact predicament of the fond girl's sister; and their advice has not baulked the Government, languishing for the consummation of an innovation which, whether called for and justifiable or not, would certainly be a greater violation of the old principles of British institutions than any of those changes about which so loud an alarm has been sounded. To speak of the Militia in blue coats, or rather of the Standing Army in round hats—starting at once with an organized, trained, armed, and partly mounted force of 8,000 men and officers—as a "Constabulary Force," is an abuse of language—a futile attempt to disguise the tiger under a calf's skin—i. e., to wrap the trained and paid police private, armed to the teeth, with truncheon, cutlass, sword, and pistols, in the tattered cloak of the old parish constable, with no more deadly weapon than that rather obsolete emblem of authority, his baton. We are not now arguing whether this national Standing-Army be required or not, but contending for the propriety of calling things by their true names. The projected new force possesses not one feature in common with the existing constabulary establishment of the kingdom. It is intended entirely and speedily to supersede it. Why, then, retain the name, save for some sinister purpose? To a certain extent the objects of both may be identical, but those of the projected force are far more sweeping and comprehensive, and are meant to be accomplished by very different means. It is not the increase of thieves and vagrants, and of fraudulent crimes, which renders this great change desirable, and a new and powerful arm necessary to the Executive; but the increase of an unruly population in the manufacturing districts, and the necessity of restraining or forcibly putting down the expression of discontent, where there seems very little desire or expectation of removing the causes of discontent. The Report makes out no case from the increase of vagrancy and ordinary crime; but the riots at Bristol, the intimidation employed, and the other guilty acts of the combinations of Norwich and Glasgow, do furnish something like a case. It is, however, a very different question whether the organized force to be appointed and wielded by the Executive is the true remedy for this growing evil. The great increase of the Irish in the manufacturing districts, and in all large towns, is another argument for the adoption of this continental scheme of repressing disorder; for the Commissioners would have no case at all, if they rested only upon the increase of crimes against life and property. By their own estimate, the whole of the thieves, coiners, pick-pockets, vagrants, and rogues of all descriptions, amount to 40,000 persons. It is not clear whether they include prostitutes in this number, as in the 17,600 bad characters found in the metropolis, with its population of upwards of a million and a half, 5,800 prostitutes are included. But it cannot be for the restraint and punishment of 40,000 depredators and other bad characters, scattered over the kingdom, and often migrating—and of whom a large proportion is always in gaol—that a trained force of 8,000 men is required; especially as we are assured, nor is it unlikely, that where a trained police is in operation, the number of depredators rapidly diminish. The great, if not the only object of the new force then is, to keep the discontented population in check—to put down tumults among paupers and artisans; and, in few words, to strengthen the hands of the Executive—first, by vast and increasing patronage; and, next, by an accession of power of a character hitherto unknown in England. There is, without question, necessity for great reforms in the institution of the civil force of the country; but, in the slang of the day, it is not reform and improvement which Mr Chadwick and his coadjutors recommend, but complete revolution. They can hardly deny—when the recent increase of the population, the magnitude of trading and commercial concerns, and the vast accumulation of wealth, are taken into account—that crime has diminished within the last twenty years, and is still progressively decreasing. Crimes of violence, by their own acknowledgment, are become comparatively rare; and petty thefts, and crimes of fraud, when the privations of the labouring classes, —through heavy taxation, the imposts on food, and the fluctuations in trade and manufactures, are considered, have not increased so much as might have been anticipated. In a year of dearth, like the present, the apparent amount of crime must be prodigiously swelled, by the number of hen-roosts robbed, potatoes, or turnip tops, or water-cresses stolen, or palings carried away in districts where coal is scarce; and yet the extent of depredation infers no great increase of moral turpitude among the population, nor any fresh necessity for a rural gendarmerie, though it powerfully suggests the necessity of improving the condition of the working classes.* The present Lord Mayor of London, (Alderman Wilson,) is a great advocate for a rural force, for the special repression of crimes of the above description. Four years ago, the village of Beckenham, in Kent, where he has a farm and grounds, was a most dissolute place; but his Lordship went roundly to work, brought down two trained policemen from London, and zealously aided them himself—sitting up whole nights to assist and direct their operations. And now, Beckenham may be termed “The happy village”—a sweet Auburn—only we fear it will, in future, always require at least as many policemen, and a zealous functionary, like the Mayor, to maintain its new character. His Lordship is a great authority with the Commissioners. His experience is quoted as settling the question of a rural police over the whole country. The policemen also checked the depredations of farm-servants, and occasional farm-labourers; but we shall cite his Lordship’s opinions—passing over the useful service he performed, in fining some men for cutting quantities of turnip-tops:—

The first year that I established this police, I am sure I cannot tell how many sacks of turnip-tops were stopped by the police at all hours of the night, and early in the morning, and vegetables, and water-cresses, and everything of that kind—persons coming from London to fetch them. One night they found two fellows fast asleep upon the common, with their baskets, and they had got their strap to put round their waist; they said they had only come to gather water-cresses; however, they were known. I had had them before, and I sent them down to Maidstone [to jail] for sleeping in the open air. The report which I sent to the Metropolitan Police Commissioners states the quantity of sacks that we discovered, the first year. There was an acre and a half of Swedish turnips destroyed in one night—the tops cut off; but we have put a stop to that now; we have been a year without any thing of the kind occurring, except this one case last year; and the year before last, we had not any turnip-tops taken. There was one very strong case indeed. At ten o’clock at night, as the police were going across a field, they observed two men; they thought they would watch them, to see where they were going to. They hid themselves, one in one part and another in another. By and by they heard from one of my field gates a whistle; they looked through the hedge and saw a man come to the gate, and get up as if he was coming over; then he whistled again, and the man got down; in a few minutes more he said, “All right, Jack;” and over the gate he came with a sack on his shoulders, to go back the same way they had met come. The police ran through another field and met them. “What have you got here?”—“Nothing at all.”—“I must see what it is.” One had got a sack of green gages, and another of potatoes. That is one proof, among many others, I could give of the use of a police.

* As we write, the following paragraph, in the Anti-Corn Law Circular, meets the eye. Is it wonderful that labouring men, in the condition described, and under the harsh working of the New Poor Law, which allows no out-door relief, should be guilty of even more serious crimes than pilfering food and fuel from the farmers?—

“PEASANTS’ WAGES.—It appears that the average wages paid to the labourers who till the soil of that garden of England, (Devonshire,) are under eight shillings a-week! The price of provisions, as well as house rent, is, we believe, somewhat lower than in London. Tens of thousands of heads of families are there toiling for a shilling or fourteenpence a day each; which, supposing them to have a wife and three children, will not be more than eightpence a head—less, by sixpence, than is allowed for the subsistence of a pauper in the Manchester workhouse—nay, less than is paid for the food and clothing of the criminals confined in our New Bailey prison! Such are the peasants of beautiful Devonshire. Truly may it be said of that county—God created a paradise, and man surrounded it with an atmosphere of misery, and peopled it with the wretched victims of selfish legislation.”

At present, then, the neighbourhood is freed from vagrants within the village?—I should say entirely so. We hardly know what a beggar is. You do not see a beggar publicly. They may get into the grounds under the pretext of selling tapes and things of that kind. I have not been asked for relief by a vagrant in the village of Beckenham for the last twelve months.

Are we not right in styling Beckenham “The happy village.” Unfortunate, though, that it can only, in all time coming, be maintained in this attitude by a trained and armed police, appointed by the Executive, and partly paid out of the consolidated fund, to protect the turnip-tops and green-gages of ruralizing Mayors. Yet, without his Lordship’s energetic, and rather sharp practice, it is questionable if so much could have been accomplished. The inveterate attachment of English villagers to old foot-paths, is a well-known source of injury and indignation to all rural dignitaries; but Alderman Wilson was able to correct this vicious propensity:—

A farmer of the name of Deane, who held land but did not reside in the parish, complained to me that in one field of his, where there was a public thoroughfare, it was a loss of some pounds to him, the villagers in the evening trampling all over his high grass. I desired him to put up a notice board, warning all persons trespassing; this was very soon taken down and carried away. I then told the police to keep watch and warn all persons; several ran into the high grass, even into the very midst of the field, and laughed at the police. I granted summonses, fined some a few shillings, and promised them, upon repeating the offence, if I could get a second magistrate to agree with me, I would put Mr Peel’s Act in force, and have them publicly whipped round the field. I have had no further trouble.

His Lordship thinks that the Force should be shifted about, and not allowed to remain longer in one locality than a year at most, lest they “get corrupted by becoming too intimate with the inhabitants.” The Commissioners asked:—

Your Lordship has said that you think it essential to a police, from your experience of a rural police, that it should be changed from time to time. Do you think it essential that they should come from a trained force? Certainly. To go into those rural parishes, where there is no one to instruct them, would be almost useless. I very much doubt whether the police would have succeeded at Beckenham, but for my experience, and the support I gave them. I practically superintended it. I have been out with them the whole night. I have gone out at ten and been out till five in the morning, to watch suspected characters.

Now this is about the strongest authority the Report contains for the necessity of a Rural Police. It is therefore disheartening to find, that even the trained men—the élite of the metropolis—might have been baffled, save for the activity and zeal of a local magistrate, who had gained his knowledge in London. There are other considerations. The maintenance of those two policemen at Beckenham, by the general estimate of the Commissioners, would cost the country considerably above £100 per annum, besides the expense of the superintendence, gratuitously given by Alderman Wilson.

We have seen, in part, the class of offences which a rural police is intended to suppress; for the Report never once alludes to riots in the rural districts, in consequence of the New Poor Law, or other causes. They do not pretend to deny that life was never more secure in this country than now; and the same thing, we apprehend, may be affirmed of property, when its vast diffusion, and the great changes which have taken place in the relations of society, and, above all, the hard condition of the labourers, are duly estimated. But it is at this time that a project is broached by the Government, of entirely doing away with the local conservators of the peace, recognised by the constitution, and for placing the whole kingdom under a centralized system, familiar under arbitrary governments, but hitherto happily unknown in Great Britain.

This Constabulary Force, or rather this police—this corps of gendarmes—to be efficient, must, at the outset, as we learn from the Report, when in full operation, amount to 8000 men and officers, who are to be appointed by a Central Board of Commissioners—i. e., by the Executive. They are to be drilled or to learn their duties in the metropolis, sent in detachments to the provincial towns and country parishes, and shifted about at the discretion of the omnipotent Board. They are to have more than double the pay of ordinary soldiers, and, indeed, not very much less than that of excisemen and other petty revenue-officers; they are to be systematically organized, co-operative, and wielded by their commander-in-chief, the Central Board. Though the local magistracy are to have no voice in the appointment of the force, that there may be some seeming check, the privates are to be amenable at the Petty Sessions, and the officers at Quarter Sessions, for misconduct or neglect of duty: they may even be dismissed. All vacancies are, however, to be filled up by the Board sending draughts from the Police Normal School of the metropolis. With amusing naïveté, the Commissioners openly acknowledge that the local authorities having the power of appointing officers under the Poor Law Act, has not worked pleasantly; and that, in organizing the Force, it would be preferable to have the original power lodged in the Board, leaving to the local authorities the power of controlling the squadrons appointed by the Central Board, trained by it, and shifted about at its pleasure. The Commissioners have no hope that the country will all at once, or simultaneously, adopt their scheme for the appointment of a national Force by the Executive, by acclamation; and they therefore do not recommend “the immediate, absolute, and general adoption” of it; but they trust that a blessing so desirable may steal upon us by degrees; and suggest that a first great step will be to have the trained men in readiness, to be located as fast as communities can be brought to endure, or, if possible, to request their presence. This, however, can only be granted upon the specified conditions. The Commissioners state that they “see no reason to doubt the general and voluntary extension of this desire, especially in favour of a force expressly organized to meet the wants and conveniences of the rural or provincial districts, aided by the contribution of a part of the expense. Here is the quickener. The squire and farmers, when the game can be protected from poachers, and the produce from bad, or fraudulent, because often underpaid servants, partly at the expense of the public—i. e., the consolidated fund—will, it is anticipated, no longer demur.

But, besides the force stationed over the whole of the country, when the scheme shall have crept into general acceptance, the Commissioners recommend that a trained body of from 300 to 400 men—and wherefore not as many thousands?—shall form at all times a disposable force, stationed at head quarters, to be despatched, in any emergency, wheresoever the commanders-in-chief of the Force may deem necessary. They, moreover, consider it desirable, even before that gradual extension of the scheme, for which they deem it prudent to wait, that immediate power be given to the Government to provide for the peace of the manufacturing districts, without consulting their wishes, by the appointment of an efficient Constabulary (i. e. trained and armed) Force; and for this reason, “that, in these districts, free deliberation on the subject is prevented by the influence of the interests adverse to good order or legal restraints:” in other words, the bulk of the inhabitants of the manufacturing districts, having an interest in disorder and lawless license, must have no voice; must not be allowed to deliberate; will not be waited for to come gradually in, like the inhabitants of the agricultural districts. They trust that Parliament will see the necessity of making exceptions to the permissive indulgence: in other words, that Somersetshire or Devonshire may be allowed to take their own time, and to display voluntary acquiescence; but that Manchester and Birmingham ought to be dealt with summarily, and at once placed under the Centralized Force. Those places, and others in the same category, have already police establishments, appointed and controlled by themselves.

But so has the city of London ; and we have just witnessed the late struggle, though not yet all its results. We have seen that the misnamed Constabulary Force recommended to her Majesty in Mr Chadwick's Report, is not only different from the old constitutional force of the kingdom, from the prose comitatus of Old England, but its direct opposite. It has a new origin, new functions, and new and very extraordinary powers. It adds the cutlass and the pistol to the truncheon and the baton ; it spurns at local control ; it is to know no sympathy with the People ; it is arrayed in almost formal hostility against the poor.

There is no feebler part of the case of the Commissioners than that in which they attempt to prove that a rural force is necessary for the protection of the property of labourers from petty depredators and vagrants roaming about as pretended sailors, who, once in a year, or seldom, may, perchance, frighten a dame, found alone in a cottage, into giving them alms, while they deserve the stocks. No one will deny, that, among other reforms, great reforms are required in the existing institutions for the preservation of the peace and the repression of crime ; but it is somewhat curious to find not necessary change and improvement alone, not organization and extension corresponding to the increase of the population and the progress of society, but entire revolution, sweeping away all the old bulwarks and landmarks, and making all things new, advocated by the same persons who, in every other instance, shew such rabid horror of innovation. By the new system, the local magistracy are not even to have the selection of special constables. These are recommended to be taken from lists drawn up by the County superintendent of the Force—the creature of the Central Board—of the persons he considers “properly qualified.” The Commissioners treat the additional patronage, which the Executive would obtain by these 8000 appointments, as a very slight matter, as the slender emoluments are really not worth thinking about, and as it is even now difficult to get the places filled. Times must change for the better in this country before the appointments which, with a tolerably easy life, gives a private nineteen shillings a-week and his clothing, and a superintendent £200 a-year, shall not be a source of great, and, it may be, mischievous patronage. What small farmer or village dealer, for example, would not, at a hard-run election, give his vote “the right way,” be that Whig or Tory, in exchange for a son or two being sent to London to be drilled for the force, with the chance of afterwards achieving the dignity of sergeant, or haply of superintendent ? And the respected correspondent of the Commissioners, the high sheriff of Shropshire, makes the abuse of patronage by the local authorities an argument for placing the power of appointments in the Executive. But what does not exist cannot be abused. Yet if some sixty or eighty appointments, vested in a set of magistrates, may be made, according to the high sheriff, a source of jobs in a county, is it too much to presume, that 8000, which may be increased to double the number, may not be a source of corruption in a country ? The reasons given by their great authority, quoted by the Commissioners—and they have on this head only two—is, that with the magistrates' favouritism, local politics, or an active canvass, would have more weight than the efficiency of the candidate. Now, these reasons, in our apprehension, apply almost equally to the supreme government and the local powers. It is not a little extraordinary—and the fact embraces a wide range of objects besides policemen—that it should uniformly be presumed, that governments are not only better qualified to judge of the efficiency of functionaries of all kinds than the communities requiring their services, but that it should be as uniformly assumed, that governments have a stronger interest in making such appointments impartially than the parties directly concerned ; that the people have not merely no adequate knowledge, but no regard to their own interests. It is yet more remarkable, that as a society becomes more enlightened in every other respect, it gets more and more incapable of interfering with, much less of managing its civil and religious affairs ; and that the supreme government, in its paternal kindness and wisdom, must gradually slip from out its hands, whatever is held, and at the same time refuse any vestige of new power.

It will clear the ground at once to admit that the existing system, in its practical working, is far from being perfect, though the few instances of its inefficiency, adduced by the Commissioners, do not go for much ; and we have, indeed, little doubt that many more flagrant might be found. The constable—honest man !—is not fond of getting his head broken ; and the watchman likes his bed o' nights, or at least a nap out of it. Serious inconveniences sometimes arise in the prompt execution of warrants, from the limited jurisdiction of county functionaries ; and there are many other blemishes and drawbacks on the existing system, requiring revision. But is it incapable of being improved ; and is there no medium, no choice, save between new King Stork, entrenched behind his arbitrary Board, and old King Log, rambling loosely, and with less power and dignity than would become him, over the parishes ? The Commissioners gravely inform her Majesty, that although a diminution instead of an increase of political liberty were to be the consequence of the establishment of an organized force, or gendarmérie, throughout her dominions, it would be better than the existing state of things ! How the increase of political power is to arise, is a riddle we need not perplex ourselves to unravel ; but the state of things which, it seems, atones for its possible diminution, even with all appliances and means to boot forced into the service, is not half so appalling as we had anticipated.

The Commissioners divide the depredations, midnight thefts, and darker horrors of this unhappy country, into many different heads. One head is entitled, The insecurity of the highways ; which might suggest, that we live in the times of Abershaw or Turpin. But, no; "a mounted highwayman is never heard of." The "oldest inhabitant" scarcely remembers to have heard of the mail or a stage coach being attacked; and yet strange it is, that commercial travellers dare not travel after dark, and that the farmers—no longer the bold yeomanry—will not venture to go home from market after dark, save in bands of threes and fours. We shall afterwards cite the evidence of this state of the roads. The evidence given in the Report is on every point feeble, and the tabular statements are often fallacious, as we shall afterwards shew; but the proofs of the insecure state of the roads are, above all, unsatisfactory and lame. The principal witness, one of three, to the perils of travelling singly overnight, is Mr Elliott, who has for twenty years taken commercial journeys in the south-eastern counties, from Norfolk to Devonshire, but who has never once, so far as appears, been robbed, nor even threatened. He, however, never travels after dark, and we imagine that few commercial travellers do—they have enough of it before dark; and their correspondence, and other business, occupies their evenings, without taking into account the terrors of the highway to men with a charge of money, and dangers which, according to Mr Elliott, would seem as great in England in 1838 as in Scotland in the days of Rob Roy. Mr Elliott states:—

Occasionally in a moonlight I may; but it would be contrary to prudence for any person who travels about the country with much money in his pocket to be out after dusk. I would rather travel before light in the morning than very late at night.

Is that habit general amongst the travellers? That is their general, almost universal habit. So much so, that if a person were to come into the room where travellers were collected together at eight or nine o'clock in the evening in the winter time, it would be the general remark that he was very late; that he was doing that which was obviously contrary to their prudent custom.

Prudent with respect to the avoidance of danger on the roads? Yes, with regard to thieves. There is no other danger now; the roads and appointments are so good, that there is no other danger.

Have you travelled on any of the roads where there is a patrol or a police? Along the roads within the distance of five or six miles from the metropolis, at all hours riding and walking, and I never was interfered with, nor did I ever see anybody attacked; and I feel the most perfect security and confidence, and I never go about with any kind of fear within that line.

If you went out beyond that line of the police — ? I should feel considerable alarm. I should not do it without I had a very strong motive.

The most dangerous time reputed to be so in the country is not at midnight, or the very late hours, but about six or seven o'clock in the evening, when working people are about. The habits of the country people are so much earlier than those of people in the towns, that very few people are about at ten or eleven o'clock at night.

As you do not yourself travel out at night, you do not carry any arms? No; because I do not make a habit of being out at night; but occasionally some young men do, who like to sit late at dinner, and they frequently have a dog and pistols with them.

That is when travelling out on unpatrolled and unprotected roads? Yes.

In the course of your travelling, have you observed any instances of like fear or apprehension on the part of people who are more constantly resident within the district? There is a general habit in the country, to avoid being out after dark.

This prudent person, so far as appears, has never once been molested in his journeys of twenty years, by night or day. A second witness to the alarming state of the highways of England, in which the Commissioners themselves could find "no traces of a mounted highwayman," and no recent robbery of mail or stage coaches, is a Mr Burt, a London straw-hat maker, who travels to Luton with money in his pocket to buy straw plat, and probably in some small tremor in consequence, but who never was robbed; though once, after dark, he fancied he was shot at, as a pistol was discharged that frightened his blood-horse, which accordingly galloped off, and thence saved him. Probably the pistol was intended for him; yet it is all conjecture. This gentleman, of his own knowledge, can tell of no more attempts at robbery: but he has heard of some. The neighbourhood of Manchester, (though Manchester has a regular police,) and the northern manufacturing towns, he considers the most dangerous districts in England. Mr Burt considers the roads in Belgium and France much more safe than those of England, though he has heard bad accounts of Spain. Mr Cole, the third and concluding witness as to the alarming state of the roads, has been a commercial traveller for six years. He considers the roads in certain parts of Yorkshire as particularly exposed, and we doubt not, that still "there be takers in the vale of Beever;" yet he does not say, though often in fear, that he was ever either threatened or attacked. When travelling alone in solitary places, with three or four hundred pounds in gold or notes, Mr Cole, though never attacked, has very naturally thought, "what would happen if I were to be? I would have little chance either of saving my money or recovering it afterwards;" and so, to allay the temporary fears of the Messieurs Cole and Elliott, upon roads much more secure than they ever were before, the country must be saddled with the expense of a mounted patrol, and all the other blessings of a rural police, having its headquarters at Somerset House! The table of the Commissioners shews a regular decrease in the number of convictions for robberies effected by violence on the highways, from 1831 to 1837, and also in the number of commitments for such offences. The number committed in 1830 was 573; the number of persons convicted 279; executed, 7. In 1837, the last year quoted, the number of highway robberies committed was 290; the number of individuals convicted, 158; executed, none. In short, the evidence of the three commercial roadsters, and of the table, proves the very reverse of what is intended, namely—that the roads generally are now more secure than they ever were at any former period. When Mr Cole was asked what would relieve him of the natural qualms of travelling in the dark with several hundred pounds upon him, he replied,

A police like the metropolitan, on which one might rely in case of need.

Have you not felt the same security from any local or municipal police? I have met with none; nor should I rely on the people where such states of things exist, for I have found protection against them wanted in times of excitement. I know of an instance of a gentleman travelling in the neighbourhood of Leeds during an election, who was hooted and pelted in consequence of his unconsciously having ribbons at his horse's head of the unpopular colour, which were intended only for ornament.

Surely this awful case completely establishes the necessity of an armed patrol! In the heat of an election, the "ignorant rabble" hooted and pelted a gentleman for decorating his horse with colours which were probably those of the opponent of Sir William Molesworth, or some other Liberal candidate. He did this in ignorance; but it must also have been in ignorance of his ignorance of what was a very notorious fact, that the people insulted him. Truly the Commissioners must be ill off for reasons when they have recourse to what Mr Cole thought to himself might happen, or to such electioneering hootings and peltings. The frauds committed owing to the deficient protection of goods conveyed by canals and highways, form another head of the Report; and we are made acquainted with very ingenious and extraordinary ways in which goods are abstracted from bales and packages, which yet look as if untouched. These depredations are not attributed to regular professional thieves, but to the boatmen on the canals, and carters' and carriers' servants, who would seem to be all rogues together. We can have no doubt that, admitting the packages were fairly made up in the warehouses—and why might not a spice of roguery be presumed sometimes to exist in the warehouse as well as on the road?—the details of the systematic plunder of goods in transitu is, like all details of plunder, greatly exaggerated. There is little question but that, in rural districts, one stolen sheep often rates for two or three, and that one stolen fowl may cover the plunder of a whole yard. If we are to attach implicit credit to this Report, the state of the canals in England are as bad as that which travellers ascribe to the canals of China. The thieves are the captains and crews; receiving-houses are found all along the banks; and the systematic plunder is represented as so enormous, that it is remarkable manufacturing houses do not send supercargoes to take charge of their goods. So far from that, they treat the matter with indifference; they will not even complain; they don't seem to feel or understand it, though in other departments some complain loudly. Raw silk is particularly liable to be pilfered in all its stages: the carriers steal it, the boatmen steal it; and a manufacturer, who was examined by another Commission, declares that he believes one person in four of the men, women, and children engaged in the manufacture, are pilferers. We should be very cautious how we implicitly received evidence like the following, though given by one of the greatest silk-manufacturers of Leek. There is such a thing as fanatical suspicion, where self-interest is the animating motive; and witnesses, in their own cause, are not unfrequently under its strongest influence.

Silk is pilfered in every part of the process, and perhaps one in four of the people in employ—men, women, and children—are pilferers. It goes without any ready means of ascertaining the thief. And there are several persons in the town who get a good living merely as receivers, without any other means whatever. A boy now committed to Stafford gaol stole £15 worth of silk, which he sold to a man, who sold it to a known receiver, who parted with it to a "more respectable" (somewhat richer) party. There is much work given out to wind and twist, and there is great variety in the amount of waste, according to the quality of the silk, which it is very difficult to estimate. It is also very easy to load the silk so as to increase the weight and conceal any deficiency of quantity.

There are two things wanting to correct these evils. One is, a greater penalty on the holder of silk who cannot shew whence he purchased it. It is now only £20, which, of course, while driving a thriving trade, the receiver can easily pay. Robbery has become almost universal. Within the last eight years, it has increased tenfold. There are as many as ten men in Leek who live in idleness and drunkenness on their gains as receivers. It is said by large manufacturers, though it is of course impossible to prove it, that they believe themselves to be robbed annually to the extent of from £100 to £200.

The other requisite is some better means of detection. It has been debated in the town to have down a London policeman, to put them on a system to detect the offenders; but unless one will tell of his accomplices, it is difficult to know how detection is to be attained. Some of the manufacturers have determined to incur this expense, though others, yet uncertain that they are extensively robbed, are unwilling to take part in it. At present the sole police of the town are a parish constable and a night constable, under the Commissioners for Lighting and Paving. The Commissioners, it is probable, will assist in the experiment of trying a London policeman. The receivers dispose of the silk to people "respectable" in circumstances, who get it dyed by the dyers, men of capital and property, and then take it to Manchester and Macclesfield, where they sell it at good bargains. The whole set of receivers in succession are putters up in defence of the subordinates, and detection is almost impossible. About two years ago an association was formed among the manufacturers to defend their property, but it has been of little effect.

Now, the question is—Do these mysterious and impenetrable frauds really exist to the extent imagined by the irritated and suspicious losers of some quantity of silk; and if so, what police establishment could afford an adequate protection? From the evidence, it would seem that one or more incorruptible policemen would be required in every boat, and to accompany each waggon, besides the ordinary general protection. But how could the most vigilant and numerous police protect property of all sorts against the hazard to which it is wilfully exposed by the blinded economy of those concerned in its safe transmission? If a man will employ a servant at under wages, whose honesty is doubtful, and who is placed under strong temptation by the inadequate remuneration of his labour, are the public to pay for his self-incurred losses? One of a respectable company of carriers, when questioned about the pilfering of silks and other goods, answered:—

We find, that where men work their own horses, they will work a boat for less than it can be done honestly for, —lower than we can do it. They have to pay for hay and corn, and everything of that sort, and it can only be done by making it out from the barges. A great deal of robbery is committed by those men; they work at so much a mile—at much less than it can be afforded to be done at by any possibility.

Are the parties who employ such persons deserving of protection at the public cost?

The Commissioners strongly object to rail-road and other companies being allowed to protect themselves by a police on their own lines and works. These objections are exactly those which a certain class of politicians bring against voluntary associations—that they are expensive, ineffectual, and would be detrimental to the efficiency of the all-embracing scheme to be directed by the Central head. In brief, it would be both better for the public and cheaper to the companies that they obtained protection from the trained force, and placed themselves fairly under the Board.

Another species of property requiring increased protection is wrecked vessels. Now, the black crime of plundering wrecked vessels, we have no doubt whatever, is steadily decreasing, though it still exists to a considerable extent. The Cheshire coast, where shipwrecks are frequent, is notorious for wreckers; but, since a regular police has been established in Liverpool, some protection has been given to wrecked property in that quarter. In other localities the coast-guard interfere. We admire the answer given by the magistrates of the Hundred of Wirral, who, when asked—

Does any nightly patrol appear to be requisite within your division? answered, No, except as a coast guard to protect wrecks; and such guards should be appointed at the expense of the port of Liverpool merchants and underwriters, as entirely affecting them.

The Commissioners condemn this reply. They affirm, that the inhabitants of the places where such practices of plunder prevail, are of the worst description and the most demoralized character. Now, we should doubt this. They do no more than all their forefathers have done. A Guinea captain, who stole and sold Africans, using fraud and violence, or the Bristol or Liverpool merchant who fitted out his ship, and profited by his crimes, even he, in his day, was not necessarily the most demoralized and the worst of men. The Commissioners hint that the magistrates and respectable inhabitants of these wrecking districts ought "to be made sensible of their duties, by heavy amercements and other salutary punishments."

The state of the rural districts, in respect to crime committed by resident delinquents, forms the heading of a long section of the Report. It gives a deplorable picture of the condition of the agricultural districts; yet we must bear in mind the circumstances and position of the witnesses—squires or farmers; nor can we doubt but that the very darkest of the returns made, figure in this Report. Among the worst of those published, which are to the number of eighteen or twenty, from all the parishes of England and Wales, or, at any rate, all those to which interrogatories were addressed, is this from a parish in Devonshire; that county where the labourers, at present, earn eight shillings per week, while the four-pound loaf costs ninepence:—

The crimes committed by residents are those of petty robberies, such as stealing wood; which goes on here to a great extent, even to the lopping of trees, cutting up hurdles, gates, &c.; also the nocturnal work of stealing turnips, poultry, and portions of ricks; all of which, it may be said, were overlooked, principally through fear of revenge from the criminal parties, and partly through the trouble of catching the depredators.

In the return from Little Laver parish, Essex, it is stated—The number of petty thefts is very great; no kind of portable property is safe unless well secured: fowls, bees, wood, &c. The inconvenience from sheep-stealers is very great: no farmer dare fold his sheep.

Since 1835, more than twenty sheep have been separately slaughtered within two miles of my house, without detection.

From the parish of Lytchett Minster, near Poole, it is stated—No felonies within the parish, but many cases of stealing bees and honey, potatoes, turnips, wood, &c.; and repeated riots at the beer-houses and meeting-houses.

The Commissioners seem to have sometimes fancied themselves in Ireland—not the real country, but the Earl of Roden's frightfully demoralized Ireland. They gravely assert, that the depredations in some rural districts—and the parish of Brangling, in Essex, is instanced—"are carried to such an extent, as even to threaten to put a stop to useful sorts of cultivation!" Formerly, the poor-rate was about to drive farmers from cultivating their lands; and now it is the "depredations" of paupers, or nameless miscreants of some sort. This appalling state of things is thus described in a communication from the guardians of the parish to Mr Chadwick and the other Commissioners:—

No cattle have been maimed, but many sheep have been stolen, both in this parish and in the surrounding neighbourhood. It is not an uncommon practice to lay open sheep-folds and turn the flocks loose at night; to pull up and destroy young trees; to lift gates off the hinges, carry them away, throw them into ditches, or, what is still more dangerous to the public, lay them flat upon the roads.

During the whole of last winter scarcely a week passed without sheep, pigs, poultry, corn, or straw, being stolen, generally with impunity. Although two men were transported for stealing £40 in the house of a publican, two others for sheep-stealing, and one other for breaking into a hen-roost, where he was taken early in the season, these punishments caused no interruption of the practice. Scarcely a hen-roost in the parish escaped robbery; some were broken into very early after dark, and the poultry left killed, if not all taken away. Ducks, fowls and turkeys were several times stolen or killed in the day-time.

The facility of committing depredations with impunity is, in great measure, caused by the general reluctance of all labourers to give evidence against each other, or any member of their families. The temptation to steal wood and injure fences is strengthened by the usual high price of coals in this part of England.

Trespass generally begins with venial offences of wood-stealing, injuring and breaking fences, turnip and potato theft; which lead to poaching, sheep-stealing, and other more serious crimes. [Poaching is a very serious crime.]

But the most serious losses which the farmers seem to suffer, are from their servants and labourers. The consolidation of small farms, the sudden rise of the class which Cobbett termed the bull-frog farmers—the division of commons, where no share, or no adequate share, was left to those who, till then, largely benefited by the commons, and the change of manners to that modern refinement, which led the gentleman farmer and his lady to turn their servants, who formerly constituted a part of their family, out of doors, have certainly had a most unfavourable influence upon the whole rural population of England. A certain sharp and energetic person, a Mr Richard Gregory, who holds a large farm in the parish of East and West Ham, Essex, gives decided evidence to the general system of plunder carried on by farm-servants and carters, and very pleasant pictures of the petty depredations committed on the roads. He states:—

The person I succeeded had been very much plundered by his servants. The men engaged upon the farm promises would get up between twelve and four o'clock in the morning, while the farmer was a-bed, and help themselves to every kind of produce. Most of the plunder was regularly disposed of by the carters at the different watering-houses on their way to the London markets. There, almost as a matter of course, they sold their horses' corn, and much that should have been part and parcel of the produce they delivered to the different salesmen. The general plan was for them to put the things into cellars, or boxes left open on purpose at these houses, and as they returned they were paid for what they had left by the ostlers at the side of the road.

That was the state of things when you took the farm; do you know whether such practices prevail at the present time?—To a great extent.

Perhaps the practices may be somewhat abating; but, alas! he affirms, that they still exist to "a great extent;" and Mr Gregory, notwithstanding many vigorous prosecutions, acting the part of a policeman himself, at "the roadside cupboards," having plenty of people every now and then, "up to Lambeth Street police office," and, enjoying the protection of the horse-patrol, is obliged to keep two or three paid watchmen. And what security, we should like to know, has he for their honesty, if farmers may be plundered without detecting their losses? The case of Mr Richard Gregory and his compeers, if any other farmer be so very unfortunate, appears to us far beyond the remedies of the projected Force. If the farmer must have his potatoes, his cabbages, his palings, his hurdles, his turnip-tops, his fowls, the weighing of his grain, and its safe transmission to the purchaser by his own servants, provided for, not by their care and fidelity, but by the sharpness of the police and the penalties of law, where is the matter to stop? Every householder has an equal right to demand that his domestics and work-people shall be watched on his premises; that the cook shall not purloin the butter, nor the dairy-maid the cream, nor the footman embezzle the beer. There is, indeed, no end to it. Every person expecting a parcel; every traveller, by coach or steam, is entitled to demand that his trunks and packages shall be cared for, not by himself, or those conveying them, but by the general police of the State; and there is an end to the natural operation of individual interest and responsibility. Now, to be really efficacious, the padlock must principally be placed on the mind. The depredations in gardens, poultry-yards, cabbage and potato fields, are represented as enormous; but were the new force to consist of 80,000 instead of 8,000, how would it be possible to put an end to the commission of offences, which are, at present, sure of impunity, from the circumstance, that the bulk of the rural population consider them laudable, or at least venial. A clergyman, near Bath, describes these petty depredations as taking place at "certain seasons of the year;" and of late, there "are certain seasons," in every year, when hunger, on the one hand, and the Union Workhouse on the other, may urge starving men to break through stone walls. In the meanwhile, the Ismaelitic condition in which Mr Gregory, and those of his condition, must live with their poorer neighbours, might well drive a man to the Bush. There are no painters among the lions, however, else we should have liked to see how the labourers depict the farmers. He is asked—

Have you known instances of farmers being ruined whose ruin you would attribute to the prevalence of these practices?—The young man I succeeded was one, and the same has been the case with many of the first farmers in the county of Essex.

Besides these depredations you have described, have you experienced much annoyance from vagrants and such casual plunderers?—I have one field adjoining a foot-path, from which I lost half an acre of potatoes in the course of a week by children. They scratched them up with their hands, their parents standing a little way off ready to carry them home.

An old vagrant repeatedly stole cabbage-plants from Mr Gregory. He says—

As the law administered by others was of no avail, I took the law into my own hands. I inflicted corporal punishment, and it had the desired effect. I took a stick and thrashed him most soundly, and he has never troubled my fields since. My neighbours are not so fortunate.

Are you molested by gipsy vagrants?—I am not: because, as soon as any of them make their appearance, I get a horse patrol to go and tell them if they do not depart I will take them at once to Lambeth Street police-office. That is always enough.

If we have understood you, then, by your three watchmen, and your constant enforcement of the law, you keep off a considerable amount of plunder?—Yea.

Are your neighbours, who do not use the same means, plundered as you expect you would be if you did not use them?—Yes, and considerably more; for being many of them timid people, they encourage depredators. If they catch a thief, they do not punish him; being afraid of having their houses set fire to, or their cattle destroyed. The other night a man near me, named Farrel, had been thrashing his wheat over night, and in the morning all was gone. The next farmer had one of his horses stabbed, because he had accused a man of stealing a pig he had lost. A Mr Chope had a calf's throat cut. I persuaded him to prosecute; and the court at the Old Bailey gave the offender fifteen years' transportation. It was quite a deliverance for us all. Another farmer had just before had his farm-yard set fire to by the same fellow. Everybody had been afraid of him, and afraid to punish him.

In all these cases of depredations upon farmers, the plunder must be considerable to bring anything worth while to the parties, as the produce must be sold at so much less than its real value?—It is great; and the great source of the evil is the beer-shop. You are sure to find the robberies concocted at beer-shops. When I took my farm there was no beer-shop; one was set up, and the difference seen in the working people before and after was such as no one would conceive. I had hardly lost anything before that by my own people's dishonesty, and now I was obliged to watch them every way. They would take my fowls, and go there and have them cooked right opposite my farm-yard. They would cut the hearts out of the cabbages for the same purpose. I once went with a patrol and took one half boiling out of the pot. I took the man and the cabbage to Lambeth Street, and then it was found out that he and his brother had been plundering in a larger way; and they were both transported. [How was the boiled half cabbage identified?]

One gentleman states—

We have exercised the right, very beneficially indeed, of searching men in going to market in every direction. We almost make a point, without they are very well known, to search the higglers' and even farmers' carts, to see that they take nothing more than what ought to go to market; that they do not take a truss of hay, or nest of eggs extra, or anything on their carts not right. If so, we take them away.

You are speaking of your subscribers', the farmers', own men?—Yes.

Is there a great deal of that description of depredation?—Not with us. [A great deal of searching, though.]

Is the burning of a light at night an important point?

—Yes, a very essential point. If they live on the edges of commons, it is a guide to bring the rogues home, because they come over hedge and ditch. If there is a light put up, then they can see the way to come home. There is no reason for a cottager burning a light. If we see one burning, we always inquire whether they were sick, and so on; and by that means we come at the cause.

Is such a state of things tolerable?—We are not greatly surprised at the irritated and revengeful feelings of the peasantry.

Such is happy, rural England! Merry England! By the way, we may inquire, why, if the beer-shop ruined the morals of Mr Gregory's men, and tempted them to plunder him, it happened that his predecessor on the farm was fairly ruined by much worse plunderers, before beer-shops existed? Like Mr Gregory, the paid police, established in some localities, take the law very freely into their own hand. In one case we hear of them entering all the cottages in a village before dinner, (those castles of Englishmen, which "the King may not enter!" though the policeman, like the winds of heaven, may at his own discretion,) and examining the pots to see if there was any mutton cooking, because a sheep had been stolen in the neighbourhood! In another place, the policemen are directed to tap with their staves the pockets of all labourers, and other humble persons abroad after dark, in order to break pheasants' or partridges' eggs, if by chance any of those precious articles should be lodged in the plebeian pockets. We must give a little extract, illustrative of the vaunted freedom of Englishmen, who are "all alike in the eye of the law."

In conformity with the directions of the chief magistrate of one considerable town, the constables seized all vagrants found within his jurisdiction, and took them to prison, where their heads were shaved; and they were then set at liberty. The superintendent of this police was asked—

What legal right have you to apprehend them and crop their hair?—The Mayor, who is a man of few words, says he crops them for cleanliness.

Do you think that system is effectual with the vagrants you get from the various districts?—Yes.

Then the town itself is very little infested?—Very little indeed. We do not, in fact, allow them to beg—I do not mean to say we have no beggars.

Before the Police was established, this town was infested both with vagrants and migratory depredators from other towns, was it not?—Yes it was; and others used to go to a distance and commit robberies, and come here to spend their money and their time. At our races, we have had 800 known thieves.

How have you dealt with them?—They dare not come near us now. I adopted the plan of apprehending them before the races, and keeping them in custody till the races were over.

What law had you for that?—I took that upon myself.

This is an exact parallel to the police of Milan, locking up all the beggars in gaol, at the late coronation of the Emperor, lest the motley crowd might haply contain traitors, or because their rags would have been a foul blot on the glory of the pageant!—This was a stretch of power at which the English in Milan were either indignant, or amused. They may look nearer home.

Alderman Wilson dispatches persons found sleeping in the open air to Maidstone, as vagrants; but neither are the magistrates pleased with their present restricted powers over the only sort of lodging-house that the way-faring poor, however respectable, can afford to take shelter in. The magistrates of Chelmsford complain that the parish officers and constables, though they have a right to enter the lodging-houses, have not power to take "travellers," or "trampers," as they call them, into custody, "unless they are found in the commission of some offence." There is cruel hardship in this restriction! Not allowed to arrest poor people—a lettre de cachet; from their workshops not reach a trumper, or any sort of low wretch, who cannot give above 3d. or 4d. a-night for his lodging in "the low haunts" which the travelling poor must frequent, unless they choose to be surprised asleep in the open air, and punished for misdemeanour! Whether, we would inquire, are the classes subjected to this rough and prompt handling by justice, or those liable to have their fowls stolen, the most to be commiserated? The Commissioners ought to have opened their Report, as Mr Senior commences his dissertations on political economy. They should have premised—"We are not treating of the causes which deprave the morals of the lower orders, nor of the misery and ignorance which produce mendicancy, vagrancy, and crime of all descriptions, but of how the private property of respectable individuals is to be protected, and the public peace preserved, amidst the many causes which are unsettling society."

The Commissioners repeatedly and strenuously insist, that want—real want—is in no case the cause of pilfering and other crimes. Indolence, averseness to labour, the love of dissipation, are, according to the Report, the uniform and universal causes. Yet the history of the origin and progress of felony in England, given by them from the information, or on the authority of Mr Chesterton, the Governor of Cold-Bath-Fields prison, sets out—"Most thieves commence their career at seven or eight years of age, and are engaged for some time in petty thefts of loose articles," &c., &c. But are not these thieves in many, if not in a great majority of cases, neglected orphans, and either starving or ill-provided children? If "most thieves" have this early initiation, the State, if it shall assume the sole care of the peace of the country, and the prevention of crime, will need to have large recourse to the schoolmaster, and the nursery, and dietary, as well as to the Force. The local authorities have more sympathy with the poor. They act as if they knew that real destitution is, in the rural districts, sometimes the incitement to pilfering.

The Commissioners, after mentioning occurrences of tyrannical character, admit, that if falling under the observation of an English traveller in a foreign country, "Such things would be cited as instances of arbitrary government, and of the oppressed condition of the people." Yet they conclude—"That they were, no doubt, efficient, and might have been beneficial, if legal." An important if this. And why, if found "efficient and beneficial," not at once make these "instances of arbitrary government" legal? Is it not precisely for the purpose of rendering such acts, and many more such, legal, that the new Constabulary law, to be administered at the large discretion of a Central Board, is so imperatively required, and so earnestly recommended? We wish no mistake to exist, and shall therefore cite the passage leading to the logical conclusion about the efficiency and legality:—

I never wait for warrants—it is not my plan. It is a waste of time. The magistrate's clerk was rather particular about it, because, I believe, every warrant was something to him. I said they are things I do not know much about. I rarely act upon a thing that is not very clear. I am for being prompt in everything. I act first, and take the responsibility afterwards. I say, if I can take the man up with a warrant, I can take him up without a warrant.

Have any other means of prevention occurred to you, as to guarding property, and preventing its conversion into money after stolen, or for stopping stolen property?—I have a system in our town, I do not know whether legal or not, to visit the marine store-shops once a-week—that is a great source of annoyance to the marine store-dealers. A constable or sergeant goes and sees their books for the week. Some of them kept no books at all before, and never made any entry of property received. Since I have sent the men to examine the books, I believe, and am satisfied, that there are not those facilities given to young thieves that there were before. I mentioned publicly to the magistrates the system adopted by me, merely that they might hear, from the newspapers, that I was going to carry that on. Since that, they have books; and they are cautious who they buy of. That course you have taken upon yourself—the regular inspection of the marine store-shops?—Yes.

Searching and looking into the books?—Yes; looking into their books, and looking at their property—whether legal or not, I take the risk of it.

These modes of proceeding were, no doubt, efficient, and might have been beneficial, if they were legal.

The necessity for the introduction of this arbitrary centralized system, drawn from the evidence of the increase of crime, is, as we have said and in part shewn, though our limits forbid detail, lame and inconclusive; but some of the tabular statements either involve equally fallacious conclusions, or are founded on false data. It seems wholly inexplicable, for example, why the proportion of known bad characters, in different large towns, should vary so much.

In the metropolitan police districts, the proportion is only one bad character to every eighty-nine individuals; while in Liverpool, it is one in every forty-five; yet Liverpool has a paid and trained police. In Bristol one in every thirty-one is the alarming number of the guilty; and more remarkable still, in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, one individual in every twenty-seven is a known rogue of some description or another; and yet in that unhappy town, thieves enjoy a much shorter career than in the well-protected metropolis, where their average period is four years, while those of Newcastle, on the average, are stopped short in two years and a half. The depravity of Liverpool, if numerically little more than half that of Newcastle, seems bad enough. In one important department, it boasts no fewer than 102 houses for the reception of stolen goods; while the whole metropolitan district, with a central position and teeming population, has only 227. In Liverpool, by the evidence of these tables, there are 520 common brothels, 625 houses of ill fame, where prostitutes resort, and 136 houses where they lodge. Save in the number of private residences, this far exceeds the rate of London. Elsewhere, we find the brothels of Liverpool stated at 300, and we hope the lower number may be the correct one. Liverpool has 2071 houses for the resort of thieves, and 146 where thieves reside. The first number, is, however, qualified in a note, as it includes the 520 brothels, and also 55 public houses, to which places other persons than thieves—classes beyond the control of the police—may also be supposed to resort. Humanity must rejoice to find the appalling number of unfortunate women, often vaguely assigned to the metropolis, vanishing before the plainest application of the common rules of arithmetic. There is still enough of vice and misery to be found in London; but the 50,000, and sometimes 80,000 prostitutes alleged to harbour there, are on reasonable, and it would seem exact data, reduced to less than 9,000. The number of gambling-houses in the different towns, as shewn by the tables, draw suspicion upon their accuracy. There are 32 in London; in Liverpool, Newcastle, and Hull, none; but in Bristol, 31. The amount of plunder and of lawful property, which goes to the support of vice in Liverpool, furnishes a curious table, though it is probable that many things are counted twice or three times over. It is not drawn up by the Commissioners, but was furnished to the municipal council in 1836, by one of their own functionaries. The sum specified is £700,000, of which £499,200 is reckoned to be expended in supporting brothels and prostitutes in private lodgings. The remainder of this large sum is divided among adult and juvenile thieves, dock-wallopers, hawkers, and men who pilfer in discharging vessels. In Liverpool, there are above 4000 prostitutes; and, including all descriptions of depredators, about an equal number of thieves. The numbers have also been greatly diminished by the new police, who, as in other places, if they do not diminish the aggregate of bad characters, succeed in driving them beyond certain boundaries. The native thieves of Liverpool are noted for dexterity; like those of the other large cities, they are migratory, making occasional extensive tours, and attending races and fairs. Town-bred thieves, who do business in a large way, seldom prowl in country places. These are left to the peddling, petty-larceny rogues and trampers. The number of depredators of all classes to be found in all England must be partly conjectural; but the estimate of the Commissioners is, as we have noticed, in round numbers 40,000. Of these, including above 8,600 prostitutes, London alone contains 17,600 individuals, from the gentlemen of the swell mob to the dealer in begging-letters.

The training and habits of thieves of the lower class are detailed in copious confessions and narratives of adventures, in which we should be disposed to place much less reliance than the Commissioners seem to do, qualified as their belief is. These romances and personal histories are curious, and though they occupy too much space in a grave and weighty Report, will certainly prove the most popular portion of its contents to many honourable legislators. Yet the tame, sly, prowling thief, or sneak of our civilized times, is a despicable creature compared with the daring, bold-faced villains of the ancient "Newgate Calendar," whose courage, enterprise, and masterly self-possession, gave such gusto to their adventures. The commonplace "family-men" of the present day appear to possess no quality in common with their illustrious predecessors, save fidelity, not always unimpeachable. The anonymous personages who figure in the Report, are, we apprehend, greatly indebted to fictitious embellishment for the brighter parts of their career. They make no pretension to the swaggering generosity which made the pursuit of their predecessors something like a dispensation of wild justice. One of the heroes of the Report was in durance in the jail of Salford. Like every thief when in the confessional, he was "the son of honest parents." He was born in Manchester, and "travelled" freely for four years, though occasionally in trouble. His adventures occupy a considerable space in the Report. Unless he kept a diary of his depredations, this individual must have a wondrous memory. This respectable youth assigns superiority, in dexterity in doing business, to Liverpool and Manchester; and he asserts that the latter town and Birmingham turn out more practitioners than even London. "They are thought to be of Irish parents, and have most canning." He adds—"In fact, I'll be bound to say, that three parts of those who are now travelling throughout the kingdom have Irish blood in them, either from father, mother, or grandmother." The Irish monopolize one branch of knavery entirely—illicit distillation. It is singular, but not unaccountable, to find the Irish become so dexterous in England, for there is no people more honest at home. Save for them, the police of Manchester would enjoy nearly a sinecure, though the functionaries do not accuse them of dishonesty, but of turbulence, a tendency to riot, and drunken, "brutal rows." Quelling the Irish, when they run-a-muck, becomes a rather perilous duty. The writer, in Cold-Bath-Field's Prison, who describes the habitual practices of the London thieves, which is found in the appendix to the Report, states, that the "love of fame forms no small proportion of a thief's composition." This passion must have inspired some of the narrations of which we shall now submit a few specimens to the judgment of the reader. The hero of our first tale is twenty-two years of age, and, as usual, "the son of honest parents." In January, 1838, he left Manchester, and enjoyed a six months' plundering tour in the north of England, Scotland, and Ireland, before he was again nabbed. He travelled with a companion, and they did some trifling business at Chorley:—

Then to Preston a fortnight; got a decent sum, about £30. Thence to Garstang; market day; just as we got in, met a drunken man; we knocked him down; robbed him; did not hurt him much; got £12, and went on without stopping. Got to Lancaster at night by coach, which overtook us soon after we left Garstang; stayed about a week. Just as about going out, a native of Lancaster, just out of the castle, (gaol,) told us he would take us to a house, if he would get "screws," (housebreaking implements,) &c. It was a gentleman's house. Just as we had got the door open, two gentlemen, at eleven at night, came up the walk, took him, and we two escaped. We went right away for Kendal; did nothing there. Only one night over Shaffels and to Penrith; then to Carlisle; stayed fourteen days; got "very fair" there. If people in Manchester were same as they are there, there would not be so much got; "it is up in the north;" "they are near the Scotch." We got what kept us on the road; most we got was £5. Next intended to go to Scotland, but changed mind and to Altwistle, a village; then to Hexham three days; some little money in the market-place. Got £25 off a flour-dealer; the man was not drunk; flattened his nose; about three minutes about it. Went straight off all night to Newcastle; got there early in the morning; big town; no suspicion. There a fortnight; robbed a warehouse there by ourselves; my companion had been up the country before and knew the people; done between seven and nine at night; a "crack" burglary; got two dozen of silver spoons, and some silk, which fetched £15; a piece of silk handkerchiefs; got them off in a bag. My companion disposed of them; he gave me the full half of what he said he got. Kept his handkerchiefs in piece for wear, as we were going out of the town; got them hemmed by the women where we lodged; all thieves. Went thence to Durham; only there one day—to look at the cathedral; did nothing there. Next to Darlington; nothing. Stockton next, where we stayed (in March) a week; got about £12. One thing particular there—we were suspected after we had got away; they followed and took us; they could not swear to the purse and £12, but we were sent to Durham gaol for a month. This was done by picking the pocket of a person on the move; "more done that way than any other now-a-days." In the winter they don't work at the mill; they can only put on twelve on the mills at once, the rest tease oakum; its not so sharp service as the New Bailey; governor was formerly surgeon of the prison. Bread is better than here; the diet altogether better there; the skilly (broth) is thicker, though less of it. From Durham we went to Sunderland; we had given up £18 to the turnkey, and received it again. Went to Sunderland; there a week; did not attempt anything. I used to read at night. One night I could find no other book but the Bible, and I read that; at the time I was much struck with a passage in Isaiah, which I could not shake off for some weeks; it was about "the sending a Saviour who should deliver." From Sunderland to Shields; got about £8 by pockets; then to Newcastle again; two days did nothing. Then to Durham, and were very careful and determined to work back to Manchester. To Darlington—Richmond, Yorkshire; Bedale, Gunboro'; and to Whitby. The constable was gone to Northallerton sessions; we got £4—a lady's pocket in the Market-Scarboro'; (about May;) got about £3 two days; thence to Burlington one night, Hadden did nothing there. Then to a place near Sir Clifford Constable's; through villages to Garingwold; got a country farmer, and robbed him of £5. (We were low, not working now.) Came next to York; two days; got about £2: 10s. off a gentleman looking at the Minster, talking to him and admiring the building. Thence to Leeds; got some little, about £10; there two days. Then Bradford; got £3. To Halifax, and then to Rochdale, and so home. Arrived there in May, about the 25th; stayed about three days; went off with the same men to Warrington, St Helen's, Wigan, Bolton, and Manchester. One of the constables stopped us coming in at Windsor Bridge; took 7s. 6d. off us; we got it by application at Town Hall. Went out to Ashton; got £5; then started to Huddersfield; nothing much; about £5 pockets; had to fly very quick. To Wakefield three days, got about 25s. Selby was not drunk. Thence to Newcastle, Morpeth, and did nothing more till we got into Edinburgh; there we were a fortnight. Drawed a till there, out of a shop; and Hull, some few pounds. Then to Beverly, Scarboro'; there, on the coronation day; pretty fair that day; got in the procession about £3, and at a supper at night got £25 off a gentleman who had come out of the hall—pocket. Next morning to Whitby, Loftus, Stockton, Hartlepool, when we lit of an old sailor, just landed, who had got £25, his wages, just received: picked his pocket; he got about £30, about ten in the morning; a grocer's; there was no one in the shop. The drawer was open, and a bowl in it; £20 in silver, 10 sovereigns. Thence to Stirling, Falkirk, and Glasgow; there a fortnight, got about £20 the day before we went out, to help us on the road.

Thus our friend proceeds. Whether he really did so great a stroke of business, or is inspired by the love of fame, is to us doubtful. At Ayr he was suddenly parted from his comrade, after they had robbed a lady; and they never met again. He never slackened running till he had reached Burns' cottage; and by this route he pushed on to Portpatrick, and afterwards did a little in the country towns of Ireland. In Dublin the youth was prospering—the police not being so sharp there as in any town in England—but he took an infatuated longing to return to Manchester, and ran into the lion's throat.

This "traveller" dropped some useful preventive hints, which, for the benefit of those of our readers who are householders, we shall afterwards notice. The most picturesque part of these adventures is the embellished relation of a juvenile thief, describing a country excursion which he made from London, with a companion. We wish that the birth and early education of these two boys had also been given:

A twelvemonth ago he and P—— were together in Cold-Bath-Fields, where they planned a thieving journey to Kidderminster.

They built a dog-cart, stole two dogs from Smithfield, bought hardware, brooms, &c., at a shop near Farringdon street, to the amount of 17s. While they were purchasing the articles, two companions stole for them a dozen and a half of hand-brooms from the door; they valued them at 5s., making, as four were concerned, 1s. 3d. each; P—— and H—— paid them 2s. 6d. They also took with them twenty sixpences and ten shillings bad money, which they concealed in a large false bottom of the cart. Thus equipped, H—— with 5s., P—— with 15s. 6d., they started off about twelve at noon, in the winter or end of autumn. At Wandsworth they sold a mat for 1s. 4d. and a broom for 11d. They went on to Wimbledon, and called at a public-house, where they had a pint of beer, for which they gave a bad sixpence. The landlady served them, and then went into the inner bar and continued serving. The boy H—— reached down and took four silver salt-spoons which were on a shelf; he would have taken the salt-cellars, but was afraid they might soon be missed. They decamped, bought some bread and cheese, and hastened out of the town in about ten minutes after the robbery. At Kingston they went to a traveller's house and sold the spoons to the landlord, who gave them board and lodging for the night and next day, with 5s. for the bargain.

At the next town, (the boy did not recollect the names of the places,) about eleven or twelve miles from Kingston, they went to a public-house; it was market day. H—— made cloth caps, and, in the course of the evening, he sold a dozen and a half, at 1s. 6d. each, to the countrymen in the tap-room. They stole a greatcoat which belonged to one of their customers, and hid it in the false bottom of their cart. There was a hue-and-cry for it; some suspected the boys; but the landlady said she could be answerable that the poor lads were innocent. Having proceeded next day on their route, they sold it to a passing countryman for 3s. H—— considers it to have been worth about 7s.

For three weeks they lived entirely upon the produce of what they sold, and ultimately arrived at Kidderminster.

They put up, for a short time, at a traveller's house. Houses of this kind are in every town, price 3d. or 4d. a night; they have a common kitchen, where the trampers cook and live. (P—— confirmed this, and stated that the better sort pay 6d., and have the attendance of a girl to cook.)

At every lodging-house on the road H—— met plenty of trampers; and he did not see one face that he had not seen at St Giles'. They also recognised him, and compared notes. Some were hawkers, some were going half-naked, some were ballad-singers, some were going about with false letters, others as broken-down tradesmen, some as old soldiers, and some as shipwrecked sailors; and every night they told each other of good houses. They all lived well, never eat any broken victuals, but had meat breakfasts, good dinners, hot suppers, and frequently ended by going to bed very drunk. Not one spent less than 3s. a day; many a great deal more. They sometimes make 5s. and average 3s. 6d. per day; some often get a sovereign where humane people reside. (All this is confirmed by P——)

P—— having been employed at a carpet-manufactory before he came to London, went to visit his old friends, and was soon able to introduce H——. Every day these boys stole balls of twine and string from this place. They daily went there to take whatever they could lay their hands upon, and have brought out two and three dozen balls of a day in their greatcoat pockets, finding a ready market for their plunder in the rag-shops. The first lot they sold was worth about £1, and they got 10s. 6d. for it. They did not dispose of any stock-in-trade while in the town, but lived by plundering the manufactory, and picking pockets in the streets. Some of the property they pawned, some they sold to trampers at the lodging-houses.

P—— and H—— were very punctual in attendance at the churches, where they always robbed. They took three watches—one was pawned for 15s., the other two for £1 a-piece. P—— is very clever at "easing a yoke of his watch."

They went to a fair about fifteen miles from Kidderminster, leaving their dogs and cart at a public-house about two miles from the scene. P——, who can play "prick in the garter," soon got a mob, and soon found "better." He allowed them to win nearly all the money he had, and then won it back with double interest. In the meantime H——, who never appeared to know P——, was very busy rifling the farmers' pockets of their money bags. (He minutely described the bags as being to him a matter of great singularity.) He took eight bags in a short time; but the richest of the eight contained only 15s.; he also took seven handkerchiefs. One of the party having lost a bet, applied to his pocket, but missed his purse; a row ensued; every one felt his pockets; the robbed and the swindled gave vent to their anger, and, having secured P——, took him to a pond and ducked him. H—— decamped when the storm was brewing, as he had all the bags and property about him. This occurred at about four in the afternoon; and, at about nine, P——, having concealed himself after his ducking, joined H—— at the public-house, and off they set in their vehicle.

They left the neighbourhood, and shaped their course for London. On their journey back, they entered a gentleman's house, about half-past eight in the evening. It stood upon a hill, and was to let. They opened the kitchen window, and rummaged all over the house for about an hour, taking away a greatcoat, some glass decanters, and a hearth-rug. On arriving at the next town, which was about ten miles off, (and they travelled in the night after this robbery,) they told the landlord they had something to sell. His wife went out, and returned shortly after with a man, who bought the lot for £1 : 5 : 6; but H—— remarked, "the fellow swindled us, for the decanters were worth all the money; but we were glad to get rid of them at any price." At some distance from this town they came near a large village, and saw several persons coming towards them, when P—— put down the table for the "garter story." H—— began betting, and the people, when they came up, stopped to see the fun. Shortly they began to play, and H—— began to thrive; at length they became exasperated at their losses to P——; H—— had retreated, and, having packed away the property in the dog-cart, was moving off, when the storm broke out, and P—— again got into a scrape. He was severely thumped and beaten; H—— was accused of being an accomplice; and they were both locked up in the cage till next day, when the magistrates acquitted them, remarking that P——, if guilty, had received punishment enough, and as for H——, there was no charge against him. It remained a mystery amongst them what had become of the stolen property, for neither boy had been out of their sight, and yet nothing was found either on them or in the cart. They never suspected the false bottom.

The boys, on their return, robbed some soldiers who were billeted at a house where they lodged—stole a pair of silver salt-cellars at a public-house where they baited—and, when disposing of a broom at a gentleman's house, picked up a valuable watch and a silver egg-stand; for all of which they readily found purchasers. For the watch they got £15. This seems incredible, whatever might be its value. A boy of fourteen, in Knutsford gaol, gave the following account of his career and that of his comrade.

I have known many persons who would not prosecute, and many a one who has taken money which has been sent by the woman at the lodging-house for them not to tell a strong tale. We would frequently at night get a wire and turn the key in the lock, which was inside, straight with the hole; we could then push it out on to the floor; we had then another long wire to feel for the key and draw it under the door; then unlock the door, and help ourselves. Sometimes I have been sent begging to different houses; the people have been watched up stairs to make the beds; I have then gently opened the door, pulled the key out of the lock, and pressed it against a piece of tempered clay which I had in my hand. We could then cut a key, and go in when we liked. There were sometimes three or four of us. We always endeavoured for money, but we could do with anything if we could not get it. If we were strangers in town, the lodging-house folks would find us a receiver for the property. We would often hide it while one of us went and made sure of the receiver. Lodging-house folks always tell us to do so, instead of carrying it into the house. They often cheat us out of half the value.

I never did work much; while I did work in the day, I thieved at night. I only worked for two or three weeks at once. There were plenty of places to dispose of anything we got. I lived by housebreaking, picking pockets, and stealing money-drawers; the number of thefts was according to what we got. They used to put me sometimes through a window, by taking a square out, and I opened the doors; sometimes down a cellar-hole. I was often suspected; but as soon as I got anything, I gave it to the men that were with me, and they could find nothing on me. I have been taken by the constables many times, and got off in that way. I was apprehended at Stafford with two £5 notes in my pocket, and my companion came and said he was my father, and he had given them me to change. The man who had been robbed, could not swear to us nor the notes. My companions were very sharp; they were dressed like gentlemen; and when we were at fairs, nobody would think of them being thieves. They had all sorts of tools and skeleton-keys, and were first in the country at using them. Have committed, altogether, many hundred depredations in my life, little ones and big ones. I spent my time, when not on the look-out for booty, with my companions, in certain beer-shops or public-houses, where we were known. The landlord knew of our courses. My companions used to make it up with some (landlords) when we should be in at night, and changed their clothes to go out, that they might not be known. We were nearly always travelling. We did not commit our robberies near the towns we stopped at, but went a good way off. We went to Chester, Shrewsbury, and different towns in Lancashire, Yorkshire, Cheshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, and many places I did not know the names of.

Sometimes I worked for two or three months, and then went to thieving for some months, and then go to work again. Some places I did not like to go to, because the constables were sharp. The lodging-house keepers would put us down to the traps, and find us a receiver when we wanted one. I have been at a burglary, but I generally went picking pockets, or on the sneak. In one lodging-house, I got off many a time by being let down a trap-door that led to an entry. I have many a time been caught by the people I have been robbing, and been let off. Myself, and two other chaps, stopped a Scotchman on the road near Preston, and took his pack off his back, and his money, tied his hands behind him, and left him. One of my companions was taken; but we gave the woman at the lodging-house a sovereign, to swear that he was in bed at the time, so they only vagranted him. I have travelled through Yorkshire and Lancashire, but have done very little in Cheshire. We moved from one town to another, that the traps might not know us.

One of the lads states that there is now little to be done in his way, save in picking pockets; a species of depredation which no police can wholly prevent. We do not think it prudent to explain all the ingenious modes of picking pockets—a science long well understood in London, though there appears to be a few late improvements. Still more ingenious is the new machine for abstracting goods from bales. One scapegrace of nineteen, of most respectable parents, seems to have been, by mental constitution, an ill-conditioned fellow—un mauvais sujet—one of those predestined "hand-wiled blackguards," whose career nothing but a gaol can arrest, and who appears beyond the reach of moral influence. He was always of dissolute habits, and repeatedly, when a boy, ran away to sea. His history shews a finished specimen of the incorrigible vagabond.

A thief glories, of course, in the number of his exploits, and will naturally exaggerate their number; but the Commissioners like to hold them at their widest word. When the juvenile depredators were interrogated as to the extent of their petty thefts, their round reply was—"Could not remember a tenth of them"—"hundreds, many hundreds." It is estimated that each, to live, must steal six handkerchiefs in a day, or things of similar value; but when the limited number of persons wearing silk pocket-handkerchiefs is considered, in relation to the number of thieves, this seems excessive. The great evil of the uncertainty of conviction is generally admitted; but the Commissioners have adopted what appears to us a most fallacious way of contrasting the amount of crime with that of conviction, that great defect in the operation of the criminal law.

The crime they specify is the uttering of forged bank-notes; and they do not quote the number of prosecutions, in a table, extending from 1805 to 1837, but only the number of convictions. The prosecutions must have been comparatively few; for, of all imaginable crimes, it is the most difficult to convict upon this, the law having settled—or being understood to have settled—that no one can hold property in a forged Bank of England note, or a right to detain it. Now, the notes generally come into the Bank; but, in a multitude of cases, through channels that cannot be suspected, and it is enough that an innocent man suffers the loss of the value of the note, without being subjected to prosecution. Hence, there must be very few prosecutions for uttering forged notes, compared with their number; and, consequently, almost no convictions, though considerable numbers of forged notes are issued. This crime, also, seems decreasing rapidly. In some years, the number of forged notes stopped at the Bank amounted to from 20,000 to 30,000. Of late years, the number has not reached 300. In 1836 there were 223 forged notes presented, and probably few or no prosecutions, as there is not one conviction. In 1837 the number was 263, and three convictions took place, out of what number of prosecutions we are not told, but certainly very few. Hence the fallacy of selecting this particular crime to prove that, in all offences, the number of convictions gives no true idea of the vast number of crimes that escape conviction. The average of escapes drawn from such data must, we are satisfied, be very erroneous. The preventive hints thrown out by the thieves merit attention. One clever vagabond suggests that not an organized force consisting of 8,000 men, but forty or fifty vigilant policemen, should be on the move through England, and attend at all fairs, races, &c., wherever rogues do congregate. They ought to learn the cant of the thieves, and they would soon know their faces. Another is of opinion that as picking pockets is now the only sure card, it would do more good to transport two or three master pickpockets, who give instruction in the science, than hundreds of boys. This same experienced person adds:—"If I had a house I would not have a grid, (a coal grating,) as many robberies are done in that way. A boy and most men can get down. Underground kitchen-windows are bad places to guard. A drop-latch, connected with the outside, should have a button on it, to turn down at night. Inside bolts should be at top and bottom, and, to be good for anything, should be locked, when in that position, by one of the patent locks, so that no boy could be shewn in. The main-door key is best left in the lock. A young gentleman of nineteen—the same who ran away to sea, and who has been engaged in about a dozen burglaries, seven of them in inhabited houses—tells that skeleton keys were the general means of access; and, when these failed, back-cellar windows were forced by small crow-bars. The object was silver-plate, money, or clothing. We need not detail his varied methods; but a chain he considers safer for a door than a bolt, as it cannot be got out without noise, "Thinks it (the chain) would be a sufficient impediment to stop the work altogether. Never met with a bell; thinks it better than even a drop-latch, which is the most serious impediment he ever met with. The drop-latch is formidable, because it forms part of the lock. The bolt of the lock may be shot, but the thief not know it, because the door binds by the drop-latch, and so they may work for an hour, thinking the lock not picked. . . . Thinks there is a general deficiency of caution—careless servants not fastening what bolts there are—or a deficiency of bolts. Would recommend every door to have a drop-latch, a chain right across the door, and a bell. Doors are preferred to windows, because the chains are often rusty and easily broken by a lever. Windows are not liked on account of the glass. It is very difficult to take it out, in the dead of night, without letting some part drop, and the noise generally alarms people. The fastening of a shutter is very awkward to get out, as the brace cannot easily be worked to it, as in using much noise must be made. If a bell were on the shutter, it would be impossible to break in. . . . Never heard of a man turned by a cellar-window, unless interrupted. They ought to have no communication that is not cut off by night bolts, locks, and bells. . . . The best means of preventing the escape of offenders, is to search them in the very first house—man or woman. Very often get rid of the property on their way to the station, by swallowing, chewing notes, dropping it in the sludge, crossing the streets. By keeping every prisoner entirely separate, many may be convicted who now escape."

Pickpockets say that if a handkerchief be carried in the inside coat-pocket, hat, or even pinned to the outside pocket, they are foiled. Shop thieves say, if a till be locked, or a nail at the back part to prevent its being drawn entirely out, they are baulked. Pickpockets say, if they can get a man into a push, he must be robbed unless he be aware of them. If so, their cant words will save him: if he keeps out of a push, his cash in an inside pocket, his watch well guarded by a chain, or wears a cloak in the season, they are foiled. The house-breaker says, a plate of sheet-iron in the inside of the door, foils him in his attempt at panelling, and that Chubb's locks give a great deal of trouble in opening; but Bramah's have, as yet, defeated all their attempts. The thief who robs shop windows, says, wire-gauze curtains within the glass, foils him. The thief who robs shops by "palming," says, that shopkeepers must be aware of the game of palming to guard against his attacks; and the most notorious smashers state, that bad gold is known by its deficient standard and weight, and bad silver by its malleability and greasy feel. Base silver coin is chiefly made in London; gold in Birmingham. The metallic dealer obtains £6 worth of base coin for £1. One individual chiefly supplies the town. He meets the venders every morning at a stated place, and supplies them at 4s. the sovereign, and the crown at 10d. There must be a great deal that is purely conjectural in these statements—they are all derived from doubtful sources.

We have been wandering from the main business of the Report, into more amusing, but much less important matter, and must now sum up as briefly as possible. If the increase of crime and immorality of a kind that a police can repress, prevent, or punish, be made the ground of the novel and arbitrary scheme recommended by the Commissioners, then the proof has entirely failed. In crimes that may be checked, there is a positive decrease. If the demoralized condition of the rural districts be pointed out, greatly exaggerated as we are persuaded, the amount of evil is—from the witnesses being all parties interested, by their actual losses, or selfish suspicion—we should look back to the causes; to the consolidation of farms, the enclosure of commons, the low rate of the wages of agricultural labour, the extreme scarcity of fuel in many parts of England, the corrupting influence of the old Poor Law, and the harsh or stringent operation of the new system. And is it the establishment of a State gendarmérie that is to correct these evils? Is the policeman to usurp the place of the schoolmaster, and to be maintained by funds which might be better employed in removing the latent causes of crime? Laying aside the unconstitutional character of the projected Force, and the novel and anomalous powers and influences to be vested in the Executive by its existence, the expense is some, though an inferior consideration: The number of the force to start with, is estimated at 8,000; to start as soon as all the rural localities accede. The expense of a police of the kind intended for the county of Chester alone, is estimated—and we may be pretty certain the estimates are as moderate as possible at, £8,112:8:4 per annum. But this is no fair calculation: if the Irish police, consisting of 8,203 men, cost £380,208 a-year in a country where wages are so low, what would the entire national Force necessary for England and Wales cost? It is delusive to speak of the same rate of payment in the two countries; but at the Irish rate, which can be little more than one-half the expense of the English, the amount requisite at the outset would be, according to the Commissioners, £680,222. But the expense is the least consideration in this monstrous proposition: the Commissioners hint that, in process of time, the suppression of delinquency might make a smaller Force equal to the multifarious, and many of them useful duties, which the Report suggests for it. But when was ever any source of patronage and power to a Government voluntarily reduced, while funds could be found to maintain it? The financial part is not, however, the worst feature of the plan; the funds expended in the repression and punishment of crime being already enormous, and there being little doubt that a centralized system might, under strict management, be rendered the least expensive.

The project of the Commissioners has not, we perceive, obtained anything like general approbation in the rural districts. Many of the magistrates, to whom inquiries were addressed, appear quite contented with the old modes. Of 435 petty sessional divisions, 123 recommend the appointment of "an improved rural police;" and in 13 divisions, they recommend that it shall be under their own control. In 77 divisions, the appointment of a patrol and additional constables is recommended; and 16 recommend that the present constables be better paid. In 37 divisions, the magistrates consider some farther security necessary; in 47, they give no opinion; and, in 122, it is declared that no change is required. This analysis shews no great alacrity in embracing the centralized system; and the few authorities, the very few, that the Commissioners have been able to rake together, are not much entitled to attention, in the adoption of a scheme subversive of the fundamental principles of British freedom. We see but one magistrate of Hertford—an anonymous one—mentioned as approving that "central control" which Mr Chadwick and his two co-Commissioners consider more essential to the nature of a constabulary, than even to the administration of relief to the poor—one magistrate, and Mr Wolryche Whitmore, the high sheriff of Shropshire. The returns from half a dozen other places, small towns or villages, are construed to favour the novel and magnificent scheme; but the words do not fairly bear out the interpretation. They all speak of arrangement and co-operation, but do not recognise the grand central head.

The strongest argument for the establishment of a small movable civil force, independent of local connexion or control, is found in the shameful events attending the combinations at Norwich and in Glasgow. Many abuses are also pointed out requiring reform, and which are quite susceptible of it, without the introduction of a new system entirely subversive, as we gravely re-assert, of the fundamental principles of British freedom. No case whatever, we again affirm, is made out in this elaborate Report, for abridging the liberties of Englishmen—for placing Great Britain under a continental police. As a complete system of State espionage, we have not yet considered the scheme.

THE GUERNSEY SYSTEM OF LAND-TENURE.*

To the Editor of Tail's Magazine.

SIR,—Your Guernsey correspondent has not been sufficiently explicit with respect to the mode of letting, or rather disposing of land in that island. It is always done for a certain annual payment, consisting of quarters of wheat, (the Guernsey quarter being much less than the English;) and it is generally optional with the purchaser to pay it either in wheat or in money, at the rate (on an average of years) of £1, English, per quarter; or to redeem a certain number of these quarters, as may be agreed on between the parties, for the sum of £20 each. Except in this payment in kind, the system differs little from the English mode of disposing of property, and allowing a part of the purchase-money to remain on mortgage, at the rate of five per cent., per annum; with this manifest advantage, however, in favour of Guernsey, that all sales are inscribed in a public register, and are open for inspection for a trifling fee, consequently no frauds can take place. The Guernsey farmer is thus an absolute landholder; and, from the number of small farms, the fields being proportionately contracted, the hedges or fences are extensive; but this latter circumstance is not injurious, as they are merely furze (gorse) banks, the produce of which pays them handsomely.

The following is the general mode of farming:—The sea-weed (called varecq) thrown up and growing on the coast is a valuable manure; but is not allowed to be gathered except at stated periods, which are regulated by an “ordonnance” of the royal court of the island. The first gathering is about Shrove Tuesday, which the farmers usually lay on the barley field in its natural state, in the proportion of six or eight cart-loads per vergeé, (two-and-half of which rather exceed an English acre,) and shortly after plough it in. The second is about midsummer; and this is generally dried and used as fuel in the winter by the country people, the ashes of which is a valuable manure. Their mode of ploughing, though not Mr Owen’s system, is one of co-operation. When they intend to plough, they give notice to their neighbours, who make it a practice to assist. They have a small plough which precedes a large one; the former going two or three inches deep, and the latter, drawn by ten or twelve horses or oxen, penetrating nearly a foot deeper; thus making the whole depth about fourteen inches—equal to spade husbandry. After the business of the day is over, those who have contributed their aid repair to the owner’s house, where they are regaled with a sumptuous supper. This is a very general practice, and the farmer, therefore, need never have more than two or three horses, or one ox and two horses, for all other purposes.

Parsnips are cultivated in large quantities. They are twice hand-weeded, and the last time thinned out to the distance of five inches. This, however, might, with care, be performed equally well with the hoe, and save much labour. A horse-load per perch (of twenty-one square feet) is reckoned an average crop. The succession of crops is c’over, wheat, parsnips, lucern; or wheat, parsnips, wheat, barley. Parsnips require rather a wet summer. Neither cows nor horses are allowed to range over the fields; but they are staked to the ground, with a play of rope of about eight feet, allowing them a circle of grass of sixteen feet diameter, which they are obliged to clear completely before they are changed; and the cows are generally milked three times per day. The milk is always so rich, that it is immediately made into butter, without the preliminary operation (in England) of taking off the cream for that purpose.

From a residence of fourteen years in the island, I can confirm your correspondent’s report of the integrity, independence, and absence of poverty among the natives generally; and, during the whole of that period, even in the town, bars and bolts were quite unnecessary, except to exclude the English soldiers; but then, it must be remarked, that these small farms cannot possibly support all that are born on them, and, therefore, a constant stream of emigration is always in operation. I have the pleasure of knowing Mr Brock, the bailiff or chief magistrate of the island, and can bear my testimony to that gentleman’s comprehension of intellect, sound sense, and general philanthropy. No one can doubt the correctness of his recommendation: but how the plan is to be executed in Ireland but by compulsion, is the grand question.

I beg you, Mr Editor, particularly to notice, for the information of the bigoted landholders of Great Britain and Ireland, that although the Island of Guernsey is open to all the world for the free importation of corn, without any duty whatever, still the rent of land there is not less than £5 per acre! Will not this convince them that they are blind to their own interest in opposing the Repeal of the Corn-Laws?

Yours respectfully,

H. A. M.

PERILS AND ESCAPES OF A COVENANTER, AS RELATED BY HIMSELF.

THE times of the Covenant, as every person even moderately read in the history of that period must know, were productive of innumerable hardships, oppressions, and cruelties, to the people of Scotland. Their faithful adherence to their own parish ministers and the Presbyterian form of worship, drew down upon their devoted heads the vengeance of a tyrannical and persecuting Government. For the space of eight-and-twenty years they walked in the fiery furnace of affliction, exposed to all manner of sufferings for conscience' sake, and compelled, like the primitive martyrs, to hide themselves from the fury of their persecutors in the dens and caves of the earth.

The origin of these sufferings—which increased every year, until they became absolutely intolerable—may be expressed in a single sentence: the ill-advised and barbarous determination of Charles II. to force Prelacy, by violent means, upon the Scottish nation. And it was for their noble and persevering resistance to this arbitrary policy, that our covenanting forefathers were exposed to all the severities which a corrupt Parliament and a lawless soldiery could inflict.

By a decree of the Council, called the Glasgow Act, passed in October, 1662, all parish ministers who refused to submit to Episcopacy, were ordered to remove with their families, by the 1st of November, beyond the bounds of their Presbytery; otherwise the military were authorized to expel them at the point of the bayonet: the people were forbidden to own them as lawful pastors, or attend their sermons, or pay their annual stipend.

The intention of this rigorous decree, doubtless, was either to produce acquiescence on the part of the ministers, or to provoke the more refractory and indiscreet to measures that might afford a pretext for violent extrusion. But the Council had reckoned without their host. The Presbyterian clergy declined to compromise for their livings by sacrificing their conscience, or betraying the interests of their religious establishment. They hesitated not a moment as to the course they should take. In one day, nearly three hundred pulpits were left vacant, and above a third part of the Church laid desolate. The people of that day, who were attached beyond measure to their spiritual teachers, beheld with sorrow and dismay the dispersion of so many witnesses and champions of the "good old cause." They universally approved of their resolution to offer no violent opposition, even to a statute passed by men who deserved the name of debauchees rather than legislators. It was not unfrequent to see them at once regretting and recommending the departure of their beloved pastors; shedding tears of pity at their misfortunes, yet applauding their constancy and unconquerable integrity; and encouraging them to enter on their trials with Christian resignation, trusting to the kindness of Providence and the charity of their friends.

One of the first consequences of this arbitrary Act on the part of the Government, was the almost immediate commencement of field-preachings and private lectures by the ejected ministers, who were scattered over the country wherever the hospitality of relations or acquaintances afforded them a temporary habitation. The practice soon became very general, especially in the more sequestered parishes. It proceeded, however, from no wish to furnish new matter of offence, but from a clear persuasion that forcible deposition would not denude a minister of his clerical rights. The secular arm, they admitted, might extend to their persons or their properties, but could never unminister lawful pastors, or take from them an office which they held immediately by divine commission. This they considered as arrogating a power that belonged to the Church alone. A mere paper proclamation they held incompetent to nullify the ceremony of ordination, or the will of the people; and therefore, the hallowed union between them and their flocks still subsisted, though nominally dissolved by an act of the regular power. As they were now forbidden access to the Established pulpits, they had no resource but to exercise their profession in a less secular way, and to lend their spiritual assistance wherever it was craved. To have refused this, would have been to implicate them in the guilt of looking with indifference on the religious destitution of the land; for many parishes in the south and the west were totally vacant, and in some districts people had to travel twenty miles to hear public worship.

From these causes, the custom of itinerary preaching soon became prevalent. The displaced clergy lectured, exhorted, baptized, and dispensed ordinances in their own houses, or at places in the neighbourhood; frequently in the woods, or such other sequestered spots as were most convenient.

The attachment of the people to their old parish ministers, seemed to increase in proportion to their dislike for the curates who succeeded them; and who, generally speaking, were men very ill-qualified, either by learning or morals, for the sacred office. Wherever they were settled they were regarded as intruders, thrust in against the will of the congregation, and kept in their pulpits by military force. To serve as an excuse for not attending their sermons, the church bell was sometimes purposely deprived of its tongue—that appendage being now regarded as the symbol of their degradation, and embittering their miseries by reminding them of their spiritual slavery. Its weekly summons rung in their ears as the voice of the oppressor proclaiming his conquests, and insolently bragging of his triumph. In several places the doors of the churches were built up or barricaded, that the Scriptures might be literally fulfilled, and the "hireling" be made to climb in by the window. The minds of the people became disgusted with the incompetency and the irregularities of these intruders: nobody attended them except those who were compelled by violence to do what was against their conscience and their principles. In this extremity, they were driven to seek, at all hazards, their ordinances and spiritual instructions from men whom they venerated for their unblemished reputation, and still recognised as their lawful ministers.

The desertion from the curates called down upon the heads of the disobedient peasantry the severest vengeance: all private meetings for religious exercises were discharged, under penalty of contumacy to ecclesiastical authority. Fines were exacted, for every offence, from all persons absent from their parish church. Heritors and masters of families were commanded to see that their tenants, servants, and cottars attended; otherwise to remove them out of their houses and lands, and to grant them no new leases unless they subscribed a bond for conformity. The same injunctions were applicable to magistrates and inhabitants of burghs; and, for neglecting to enforce the statute, landholders and civic rulers became liable to imprisonment or sequestration. For personal absence, heritors forfeited a fourth part of their rents; householders and citizens a fourth of their substance; and, if merchants, the freedom of their incorporation and the privileges of trade.

As for the deposed clergy, they were forbidden, under pain of sedition, to reside within twenty miles of their former parishes, within six miles of Edinburgh or a cathedral church, or within three miles of any burgh in the kingdom. It was strictly prohibited making charitable collections for their use, or from contributing in any way to their support.

To enforce these despotic regulations, an army of twenty-two thousand foot and two thousand horse was dispersed in companies over the more refractory districts, to compel church attendance, uplift fines, and bring offenders to punishment. As an auxiliary to this crusade, a high commission court was instituted, which assumed the power both of the sword and the keys, exercising a civil as well as a spiritual jurisdiction. The greatest noblemen in the land were amenable to this tribunal; the inoffensive peasantry might be fined, incarcerated, or transported beyond seas at pleasure; and by captious questions, the most wary might be entangled and decoyed within the meshes of the law.

With a court so constituted, and provided with such auxiliaries and accomplices, it may be readily conceived what excesses would be committed against all who refused implicit submission. Accordingly, the history of the times is filled with the sad memorials of the cruelties and exactions practised by the Turners, Claverhouses, Dalzells, and other booted missionaries of Prelacy, who acted as the leaders in these disgraceful expeditions. The people were dragged to church like felons to the dungeon, and severely beaten or fined if they resisted. When families were unwilling to pay, the military were sent to live upon them at free quarter, until they should eat up the value of the penalty; and frequently they continued until they had consumed their whole substance. Cattle, grain, furniture, &c., were seized to defray church arrears, or wantonly burnt and destroyed. The food they could not use was wasted; hen-roosts were plundered; chests and presses were ransacked, and their contents carried off in large panniers or creels. In the dairy, "they upset the butter-kirns, and hacked down the cheeses with their swords, among the horses' feet." The widow and the fatherless were thus robbed of their necessary subsistence; "and when the children cried for bread, it was snatched from their mouths and given to the soldiers' pleasure-dogs."

The usual mode of discovering the obnoxious, was by means of a parish list, generally drawn up by the curate. After sermon, this muster-roll was called from the pulpit, and absentees marked out for the weekly fine. Many were arrested without either proof or presumptive evidence, and amerced on mere suspicion. The process was brief—the curate was the accuser, the soldier was the judge and the executioner of his own sentence. It was in his power to demand a sum exceeding that specified by law; and, as a stimulus to exertion, the surplus was allotted to his own pocket. Whenever the performance of his duty required him to travel, he could claim "riding-money"—an expense chargeable on the person of whom he was in quest.

Sabbath was the day on which these extravagances were very often committed. The troops sat drinking and revelling in the nearest ale-house until public worship drew to a close. The last psalm was the signal for attack; they then sallied from their cups, surrounded the churchyard, and placed sentinels at the doors. The congregation were made to pass out one by one, and interrogated whether they belonged to that parish. If they answered in the negative, they were fined upon the spot: generally all the money they had was taken from them. Those who had none or too little, were plundered of their coats, hoods, plaids, and Bibles; and the soldiers, laden with their sacrilegious spoils, returned from the house of God as from a field of battle, or the pillage of a stormed city.

The tyrannical measures thus resorted to, designed to remedy the evil, tended, as always happens in similar cases, rather to aggravate the disease. New and severer proclamations were issued; amongst others, that called the Scots Conventicle Act, in 1666, discharging all conventions for religious exercises "as seminaries of insurrection and rebellion."

The natural effect of these tyrannical proceedings, was to goad on the people to mutiny and rebellion, the first outbreaking of which was the ill-starred and disastrous Battle of Pentland Hills, fought in November, 1666. That defeat, and the bloody executions which followed it, repressed, for a while, field preachings and private conventicles; but in a short time, they revived and spread more extensively than ever. For ten years they continued to be held in every county, and almost on every hill, from the Frith of Tay to the banks of the Tweed and the Solway.

A milder expedient than arms was now tried by the Government, to check them, and that was the Indulgence; but it had only a temporary and partial effect. It was a fertile source of dissension among the exiled clergy, but it did not in any degree abate the desire of the people to attend their clandestine ministrations. Again the military were let loose, and encouraged by the Privy Council to apprehend these "hot and fiery teachers" whom neither clemency nor indulgence, as they complained, could reduce to submission. The consequence was, that the people, when they met at these field-preachings, carried arms to defend their ministers, and repel this hostile invasion of their worship. As many as ten or twelve thousand often attended these armed conventicles. Sometimes the King's troops, who were ordered to disperse them, dared not venture to molest them; or, if they did attack them, they were repulsed and put to flight, as at the Beith Hill, above Dunfermline, on the Lomonds, and at Kinkel, near St Andrew's, in 1674.

The arrogance of Lauderdale, then lord of the ascendant in Scotland, at length exasperated the people to open rebellion. The Parliament issued acts of new and unprecedented rigour; the progress of legislation became more and more severe; and the barbarous executioners of the law were not only sanctioned in their cruelties, but instigated to greater excesses by rewards and impunity. All the resources of art and ingenuity were put in requisition to bear down the Covenanters. As a more effectual expedient for rooting out conventicles, garrisons were appointed to be planted in the districts where these religious assemblages were most frequent—that is, in Galloway, Nithsdale, Annandale, the Merse, Teviotdale, the Lothians, Fife, the shires of Perth, Stirling, Lanark, Renfrew, and Ayr. Each garrison was provided with a company of foot and ten horse, to be supplied with provisions and necessary accoutrements by provincial assessments. Heritors were made responsible for the good behaviour of their tenants and domestics, magistrates for their citizens, householders for their families, fathers for their children, and husbands for their wives.

It was made sedition for the non-indulged clergy to pray or expound Scripture anywhere but in their own family; and they were punishable if more than four individuals were present, not belonging to it. For a minister to preach in the fields, was death and confiscation of goods; and double fines for the hearers. A premium of five hundred marks was offered, out of the treasury, to any one who should apprehend and secure the persons of those who held or assembled such unlawful conventions, with full indemnity to the seizers and their assistants for any slaughter they might commit. Four hundred pounds sterling was the price set upon the heads of the most celebrated field-preachers, and others were valued according to their notoriety. Letters of intercommuning, as they were called, were issued against all delinquents who refused to appear in Council and confess their guilt. By these letters, the absent were outlawed; and whatever persons intercommuned or held converse with them, either to fulfil the duties of relations or to administer the common offices of humanity, were liable to the same punishment as if equally involved in the same offence. In a single writ, above ninety clergymen, gentlemen, and even ladies of distinction, were interdicted from the common intercourse of social life. To procure evidence of guilt, all persons were required to inform against offenders, under the highest penalties—to swear upon oath whatever they knew tending to criminate them, or lead to their discovery. Whoever should refuse, when called upon, to depone according to their knowledge, were subject, at the Council's pleasure, to fine, incarceration, or banishment to the American plantations. The son was bound to witness against the parent, the husband against the wife; and every man became a spy and informer on his neighbour. A justiciary power was lodged in the officers of the army; and the meanest sentinel had the license of an inquisitor.

These despetical and sanguinary acts struck people's minds with terror and consternation. At a moderate computation, 1700 persons of either sex, and of every station and rank in life, in one year, were thus harassed and oppressed. Many of them voluntarily abandoned their properties and their houses, which were surrendered to the plunder of an unbridled soldiery. Deprived of the refuge and protection of laws, they took to flight and concealment, or assumed an attitude of defence. Driven from cities and society, and hunted like partridges on the mountains, they began to acquire the fierce habits of a vagrant, unsettled life.

"Maddened by oppression," says a writer on this period, "they seized the fastnesses and natural defences of the country, and boldly unfurled the standard of religious liberty. They retired with their flocks to the wilderness and the solitary places, carrying their ark along with them; there to worship God in peace, according to the custom of their fathers. Necessity prompted the use of defensive armour, and prudence taught them to select the most sequestered and inaccessible retreats. For the purposes of escape or concealment, they often pitched their tents in the neighbourhood of morasses, or in the deep and silent glen, embosomed within the green inclosure of the mountain. Denied the privilege of worshipping in temples made with hands, they made the lonely hills their pulpits, their sanctuary the high places of the field. They sought the mist and the cloud to hide them from the vigilance and fury of their pursuers; and they have been known to choose the darkest and most tempestuous nights, when the enemy durst not venture to prowl abroad. To them, the terror of the elements was less appalling than the cruelties of their inhuman oppressors; and the wildest scenery in nature wore a more friendly aspect than the face of man!"

As might have been anticipated, these merciless coercions had an effect the reverse of what the State intended. The more that outlaws were multiplied, the more did conventicles increase, both in frequency and numbers. The religious ardour of the people grew in proportion to the obstacles that opposed it. The intrepid champions of Presbytery waxed bolder and more fervent in the discharge of their professional duties. The concourse of hearers became immense, when they could reckon with certainty on the means of protection; for they had learned, from their continual exposure to danger, to adopt more systematic measures for precaution and defence. Scouts were stationed on the hills, to prevent surprise, by timely alarm. The boldest and best accounted were posted, during worship, on the frontiers of the congregation. At the conclusion of the service, they were escorted to their quarters by troops of horse; and, during the night, watch was kept by regular patrols. When attacked, they repelled the assault; and, occasionally, bloody skirmishes ensued, in which acts of violence were committed on either side.

This state of affairs continued for five or six years—the hatred of both parties being inflamed to an incurable degree—so that the aspect of the country looked more like an insurrection to be quelled by arms than a contest about forms of Church government. Under these circumstances, it is not to be wondered at, that occurrences such as the murder of Archbishop Sharpe, and the battles of Drumclog and Bothwell Bridge, should have happened, and all of them in one year, 1679. The course of events had gradually paved the way for insurrection and bloodshed. The people had borne their wrongs with great patience; and their forbearance must appear astonishing, considering the extent and duration of their sufferings. It is more surprising that they should have endured so long, than that, after twenty years of almost unrelenting misery, they should try, by armed force, to extricate themselves from beneath the feet of their oppressors, and shake off the intolerable yoke under which they had so patiently groaned.

The murder of Sharpe, and the rising in the West, entailed fresh severities on the Covenanters, and were made insidious tests for inveigling many innocent people into the snares of persecution. All who had taken a part in these unhappy affairs became the objects of relentless vengeance. The prisoners were executed or banished; and those who made their escape were hunted for their lives like wild beasts on the hills. Many remarkable preservations are recorded of the poor, persecuted fugitives about that time. The soldiers frequently got their clothes and cloaks, and yet missed themselves.

They would have gone by the mouths of the caves and holes in which they were lurking, and the dogs would snook and smell about the stones where they lay hid, and yet they remained undiscovered.

One of the most extraordinary of these retreats was that of Major Learmont, residing near Lanark, who had commanded a troop of horse at the Battle of Pentland. He had dug a vault under ground, and formed it for his hiding. It had its entry in his own house, upon the side of a wall, and closed up, with a whole stone, so close that none would have judged it but to have been a stone of the building; it descended below the foundation of the house, and was in length about forty yards; and, at the far end, the other mouth of it was closed with turf, (fail,) having a fail dyke built upon it; so that, with ease, when he went out, he shot out the fail and closed it again. Here he was sheltered for the space of sixteen years, betaking himself to it at every alarm; and many times had his house been searched by the soldiers. At length he was betrayed by his own herdsman, in March, 1682.

But, instead of enumerating more examples, or extending our general remarks on the history of these troubles, which, it is well known, terminated at the Revolution of 1688, we shall confine our relation to the perils and escapes of the individual who is properly the hero of our story. We shall give the details in his own artless, simple manner, only modernizing some of the expressions, and omitting what may be considered superfluous, from not being immediately connected with his personal adventures. The narrative was addressed to his children and grandchildren, intended for their instruction and encouragement amidst the trials of their earthly pilgrimage. It professed to give an exact account of the author's experiences, both as to his "soul exercises" and the "strange and remarkable Providences he was trusted with," and bears the somewhat quaint title of "A Rare Soul Strengthening and Comforting Cordial for Old and Young Christians." After giving a detailed account of some of his religious experiences, he proceeds to the narrative of his providential deliverances:—

The first I shall mention was what I met with at Bothwell. I am not ashamed to own I was there, and do declare it was not a spirit of rebellion against the then King and Government that took me there, as that rising up and association is slanderously reported of by many. That which moved us to join together—yea, appear in arms—was the necessary defence of our lives, liberties, and religion; for it is well known that the enemies of God did eat up his people as bread, and called not on his name; and whenever they met with honest ministers or private Christians, they either shot them, banished, or dragged them to prison, and for no other reason but because we worshipped the God of our fathers according to our conscience. We took cheerfully the spoiling of our goods, had not the enemy sought to lord it over our conscience, which we could not submit to without incurring the displeasure of God. Since many of us could not be edified by a set of men forced on us by the prelates. And it is well known how scandalous and immoral the generality of them were; and yet, for not going in communion with them, we were hunted like partridges upon the mountains, and exposed to the rage of the bloody soldiery, whose tender mercies we found to be cruelty; yea, when we complained of our grievances to those in power, in the most humble, dutiful, and loyal way, we were the more harassed and oppressed; and, as if our persecutors had a mind to shew the world that they were entirely void of humanity as well as religion, they made acts against our laying grievances before them: all which considered, it was no wonder we joined together for our common safety; and our uniting together was on the very principle on which our happy Revolution was afterwards brought about—namely, the preserving ourselves and posterity from popery, slavery, and arbitrary power.

Having shewn you what made us take up arms at Bothwell, I come now to let you know the providence I met with there. Whilst we lay at Hamilton, before the engagement, I observed all my acquaintances and others providing head-pieces and breast-plates, and what was necessary for their safety in this day's battle: I not having money to spare on these things as some others had, looked up to God and took him for a covering to my head in the day of battle, as he had been to David of old; for, I observed, whatever pieces of armour they had prepared for their safety, there was still a possibility of their being slain, therefore, I humbly told the great God I would entirely depend on him as my shield and buckler. Accordingly, when our forces fled before the enemy, and all took what way to go they judged most proper for their safety, I rode not through Hamilton with the rest, but went about the town, and got near a glen. When I got to the other side of it, I espied a party of the enemy just below me, and in the very way by which I behoved to ride. I could not turn back without alarming them, and therefore rode on. My comrade was riding just before me, with his head-piece and other armour, which he had provided for his safety. I saw him dismayed, and that he could not well sit on his horse through slavish fear; on which I whispered him to go on composedly; and I went before him with my carbine over my arm, and my sword drawn in my hand. The enemy came so close up to the way, and all standing under arms, that I could not ride past without touching clothes with them; on which the commander, in a threatening tone, asked me the word. I had resolved not to speak whatever they asked of this nature, because I knew not their word, and thought it would irritate them the more if I told them what was not their word. As I spoke nothing but rode on, depending entirely on God, I got past them unmolested. But whenever my comrade came up, I heard the officer ask him—"The word, dog?" on which question he told them what was not their word; which so provoked the commander, that he struck him over the head with his broadsword, which, by reason of my comrade's head-piece, broke in two. This so enraged the officer, that he ordered some of his men to fire, which they did, and killed him on the spot. I still rode on without the least hurry or confusion, and they never so much as molested me. Just as I passed them, I saw Colonel Burns, lying in his blood, whom they had shot a little before; so that I must own the Lord was my safety in the saving of my head on the day of battle. He hid me as in the hollow of his hand, and set remarkable bounds to the remainder of the enemy's wrath, so that I escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowler.

From this time till our happy Revolution I was obliged, for the space of nine years, to retire and hide myself as much as possible from the rage of my persecutors. And I, knowing the wrath of the enemy, and fearing, if I were taken by them, I should be tempted, through my weakness, to any sinful oaths which they ventured to ensnare souls with, or be exposed to the greatest sufferings, I set apart times for prayer, and pleaded with God that he would make out graciously to me what he had promised to do for his Church and people in the days of fiery trial, which I own he did, and preserved me remarkably as you may hear afterwards.

Sometime after this, a troop of the enemy was quartered about Daily, and five of them upon my father, in Camragen. As they came to our house, they were informed that I had that morning come home; for there were many informers in the country, who sold themselves to betray innocent blood, and that for a piece of bread. They had told the soldiers what sort of man I was, what clothes I had on, and what sort of hair; and it was so that I had come from a hiding place just into the house to get some refreshment. I had not sat down, neither did I resolve to sit down, when all of a sudden my sister and I heard a great noise before the door. We ran to the door to see what was the matter, and found three of the five dragoons, who asked if I was the Goodman of the house, or if I belonged to the family? I answered, I was not the head of the family, but I belonged to it. I expected the next question would have been, Are you his son? But the Lord restrained them from it, for his wise ends and my safety. They told me they were to quarter with us, and dismounted, and were in a great rage. The Lord ordered it so, that neither my sister nor I were in the least daunted before them. I spoke civilly to them, and told them to be calm and easy, and they should get for themselves and their horses in great plenty. I offered them either straw, hay, or corn, for their horses; and took them into the stack-yard, and made up a bundle for each of them what they desired, and also one for myself. I let them take up their bundles first and return to the stable, and I just followed; but when they entered the stable door, I skipped back and got over the garden ditch, and so escaped from them. They afterwards were in great rage at the disappointment, and when they met with my father, threatened to have him ruined for entertaining such a person as I in the house. But my father turned the abuse on them, and threatened to tell their commander that they had let me go after having me in their custody; upon which they held themselves quiet; and the Lord kept me from that hour of temptation, as I had begged, and as he had made me hope.

Shortly after this, some of the dragoons being quartered in my father's, I was lying out by night and by day on a neighbouring hill, to which I had my meat sent me for ordinary. It fell out that the Scotch troops which lay at Girvan and Daily were all ordered to rendezvous; upon which they who were quartered in my father's, went to meet with the rest at Girvan. I, seeing them go off, came down from the hill where I used to lurk, and came with a design to get some refreshment. Whilst I was taking it, my father came in and told me he saw some dragoons coming back in great haste, and that they were just at hand, and desired me to fly for my life, and he would divert them at the entry till I could hide me in the garden. I told him I would lie on the other side of the garden in a blackberry bush, till he had got them settled; and when he had done so, he might bring me an account, and I would go off. Accordingly, I went out and hid me in the bush, whilst my father helped them to lay off their furniture; for they were the dragoons who used to stay with him, and had been sent back in haste. Before the dragoons would go into the house, they would see their horses put to the grass; and notwithstanding of all my father could do to divert them, they would put their horses to grass that night at the place where I lay hid. Whereupon, one of the dragoons seeing the blackberries, came to eat them off the very bush at the root of which I lay. My father seeing him at the bush where I was, cried to him that he would poison himself, for now in harvest these berries were full of worms, and desired him to bring him a berry and he would shew him a worm in it. The dragoon went to him accordingly, and gave him a berry, which my father opened, and shewed him a worm in it, which is ordinary in many of them at such a time of the year; and thus he got him from the bush, and persuaded him to go into the house with the rest, and to take meat. Whenever they were set down, my father came out as if he had been to take care the horses should not break in upon the corn; and he told me they were settled, and so I slipped off to my ordinary lurking-place upon the hills. And here again it is evident that I dwelt under the shadow of the Most High, and lay in the secret place, when my enemies were so near and did not discover me.

After this some time, having entered into the married state, my father made a secret place in a hay-stack, where I stayed a whole winter by night, and some part of the spring time, when my wife was not with me. Sometimes a friend, in like circumstances with myself, would come and stay a night, for there was room under the stack for two; and this was my secret chamber for the time above mentioned, and a very cold one too, notwithstanding all the hay that was about us. One morning when my wife was with me, she got up and went out at the little hole we had to get out at, and then stopped it up with the bundle of hay which was our door. As she stood in the garden, all of a sudden she observed four men hard at hand. She stepped back and stooped, as if she had been drawing hay, and whispered to me that I should keep close, for she saw some of the enemy. Within a little, one of them struck her on the back with the flat of his sword, and told her she was their prisoner; on which they took my wife and sister to prison, for no other reason alleged against them but that they would not hear the curate; which they had no freedom in their conscience to do, considering these came not in by the door, but were blind guides forced upon us by the prelates, and very immoral for the most part too. For this they were carried to Maybole and put in prison, where they lay some days, till a party of friends got them out by night.

As for the four men who took them, three of them were afterwards served by my wife as common beggars at her door, and the fourth man's wife also, when we lived to see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, and our spoilers in straits, and we provided for in plenty, able and ready to feed our enemies. Now here I also remarked the kindness of Providence, that suffered not these men who took my wife, to see her just coming out of the stack; for had they done so, I either had been apprehended, or been obliged to shed their blood, in which I had no pleasure.

Sometime after this, a kind Providence had provided a nursing for my wife at Craigdarroch, in Nithsdale, in the house of Mr Ferguson, who suffered much in the cause of the Covenant. Here she stayed till the Revolution; and by this the Lord opened a door for my safety and comfort, for I was, for the most part, well entertained there, though I was kept hid in the house, none knowing I was there but the good lady and my wife; for so dangerous were those times, that kindness could not be shewn to one in my circumstances without endangering the family that did it, were it once known. Now my wife having gone to nurse there, some months after, I left Carrick to go and see her; but not knowing the way, I got a lad who had been in that country to be my guide.

Accordingly we set off, but durst not keep the common road for fear of the enemy, it being now like the days of Jael, when the highways were unoccupied, and no peace to honest people when they went out or when they came in. Being obliged, then, to go by the mountains, there came on a frightful mist and fog, so that we wandered in a desert and pathless way, and knew not whither we were going. I told my guide that we were surely wandering, and therefore I would sit down and pray, as I usually did and do in such a case. Before I prayed, I sung some verses of the 107th Psalm, about the chosen people then wandering in a pathless way, and how they cried to God, and were by him brought to a city of habitations. Having sung some verses, I went to prayer, and was so burthened with Zion's distress, that I forgot to beg of God to remove the mist, and lead us in a right way. I considered that the oppressed Church in this land was like sheep without a faithful shepherd, and scattered on the mountains, in the dark and cloudy day; as for our own pastors, who were careful of their flocks, many of them were banished, others of them executed, and the rest durst not be seen. All this made me hang my harp upon the willows, when I remembered Edom's children, that were crying out—"Raze, raze Zion to the foundation." I was much enlarged both in my mourning and supplications for Zion, which was now afflicted and not comforted, and helped to wrestle at the Throne of Grace, that now, when of all the sons that Zion had brought forth, there were few left like to take her by the hand; therefore the Lord himself would yet build up her broken walls, and that he would not forget the prayer of the destitute, nor let the expectation of the poor fail for evermore. Before I had done, the mist was carried off, so that we saw we had wandered, and afterwards were directed into the right way. And as the hearer of prayer did prepare my heart to lift up my supplication for the remnant that was left, so he inclined his ear also to hear me in that; for not long after, our captivity was brought back, and Zion again built up since our happy Revolution.

About a year and four months after this, I carried my daughter, Elizabeth, to Craigdarroch, my wife still being dry-nurse there. The lady had desired me to bring my child to stay in her house, and be company to her child, which was about the same age—namely, about two years and a quarter. I got a horse, and a woman to carry the child, and came to the same mountain where I wandered by the mist before, which is commonly known by the name of the Kells Rinnas. When we were going up the mountain, there came on a great rain, which, as we thought, was the occasion of the child's weeping; and she wept so bitterly, that all we could do would not divert her from it, so that she was ready to burst. When we got to the top—to the place where the Lord had been formerly kind to me in shewing me the way—I looked round me for a stone, and espying one, I went and brought it. When the woman saw me set down the stone, she smiled, and asked me what I was going to do with it? I told her I was going to set it up as my Ebeneser, because hitherto, and in that place, the Lord had formerly helped, and I hoped would yet help me. The rain still continuing, and the child weeping bitterly, I went to prayer, and no sooner did I cry to my Deliverer but the child gave over weeping; and when we were about to depart, the rain was pouring down on every side; but in the way wherein we were to go there fell not one drop. The place not rained on was as long as an ordinary avenue; and so we went on our way rejoicing, the child well pleased, and we wondering at the goodness of Providence in keeping us dry whilst it continued to pour down on each side of us.

After this some time, whilst I was kept hid at Craigdarroch, my ordinary was to go out some nights to walk in the fields to get fresh air; and having been there a considerable time, my shoes failed me in a strange part of the land. My wife and I durst not let this be known to any, lest it should make a discovery of me—not knowing those who were our friends and who our foes; and we could not tell the case well to the lady, who knew I was about the house, lest she might think I was expecting them from her. Therefore, not being able to want shoes, when frequently wandering out in the night, I at length betook myself to prayer, and begged humbly of God he would direct as to this; and that he would order my being provided for with shoes, in a way that would not endanger either me or the family that was so kind to me. After three days, I got a pair of shoes sent to me from my wife's brother, who lived at that time about thirty miles from the place where I was, and knew nothing of my wanting shoes. When I had occasion, some months after, to see him, I inquired what moved him to send me a pair of new shoes? He told me that, being in Ayr one day, he was strongly impressed to do it, and, therefore, bought them, and in Providence, got one going to the country where I was, which he knew not of when he bought them, and so had sent them to my wife, who could give them to me with safety. I inquired at him when he was thus moved to buy them? He said it was the very day on which I had prayed for them, as I understood when he told me the time he bought them.

Whilst I stayed at Craigdarroch, they had a child, about three quarters old, which my wife gave suck to. He fell into a violent fever, which threatened to take away his life, in every one's apprehension that saw him. The lady desired I might see him; but this could not be done, lest I should be discovered, till all in the family went to bed, excepting an old Christian woman, a neighbour, and my wife, who came to sit up with the child. Wherefore, I came about midnight, and looked a little at the child, who was in great trouble. Having thus viewed him for some time, I went out to the garden to beg his life from God. I went to the upper end of a long walk, where there was a summer-house or seat with a hedge about it, and there I chose to offer up my supplications.

When I had for some time earnestly pleaded for his life, the terror of Satan fell upon me in such a way, that I immediately concluded the enemy was at hand, and wanted to fright me from my prayers, (for I was not ignorant of his devices;) wherefore I resolved I would continue in the duty. On my doing so, I heard a noise just before me, on the other side of the hedge, and it seemed to be like the groaning of an aged man. It continued for some time, yet I knew nobody could be there; for, on the other side of the hedge, where I heard the groaning, was a great stank or pool. I nothing doubted but it was Satan, and I guessed his design; but still I went on to beg the child's life. At length he roared and made a noise like a bull, and that very loud. From all this, I concluded that I had been provoking God some way or other in the duty; and that he was angry with me, and had let the enemy loose on me, and might give him leave to tear me in pieces. This made me entreat of God to shew me wherefore he contended, and beg he would rebuke Satan; but the enemy continued to make a noise like a bull, and seemed to be roaring about the hedge, towards the door of the summer-seat, bellowing as he came along. Upon this, I got up from my knees, and turned my face towards the way I thought the enemy was coming, and looked to God still that he might rebuke him. After that, he made a noise like a mastiff-dog in great trouble. This was not so terrible to me as the other. I got some courage; and having my stick in my hand, I resolved to stand still to see if he appeared to me in any shape; but, instead of that, he went past into a place hard by, full of nettles, and there groaned as formerly. I heard him very distinctly and composedly; yet I thought I would go in and consider what could be the meaning of this dispensation.

Accordingly, I came in and whispered to my wife that I had been somewhat frightened. The old Christian woman that sat by, overhearing me, drew a bow at a venture, and pierced between the joints of the harness, telling me to take care lest I had provoked God by the want of submission, and being too much set upon the child's being spared. No sooner had she spoken thus than I was convinced of my fault, yet could not think of the child's dying. I inclined once more to venture out—yea, tried it a second time—but Satan, I then thought, was just ready to devour me; so I saw I need not go on to contend, if I would not learn submission as to the child's life. Whereupon, I looked up to God and begged he would rebuke Satan, and allow me to go and pray for the child's eternal salvation, and I would not any more beg his life, but leave that to his sovereign pleasure. No sooner had I done this, than I went out with a holy boldness, and had not the least trouble from Satan any more at that time.

That which made it so difficult for me to submit to his death was, the thoughts of the comfortable accommodation we had in the family, my wife being the child's nurse, which we might come to want if the child had died. Thus, my carnal reasoning, and the distrusting that Providence which had wonderfully appeared for us formerly, did much provoke God, so as to let loose the enemy. But whenever I got thorough submission, as I said, I went to the same summer-seat, and there begged eternal salvation for the child, and was wonderfully enlarged, and persuaded that he should partake of the great salvation. When I had spent a considerable time in prayer, I came away rejoicing that I had got such good hope concerning the child's eternal happiness. When I came in, and went to see how the child was, he was as ill as ever; but immediately he gave a sneeze, and in a minute was free of fever. His recovery being so sudden, was very surprising; and much I saw in it of the dispensation of Providence; for whilst I was mainly set on the child's life, he sent the enemy to chase me, as it were, from the Throne of Grace; but, whenever he let me see my sin, and helped me to due submission, then I got to the Throne of Grace, and had my mouth filled with argument—yea, I was only set on the child's salvation, and he not only persuaded me he would grant it, but he gave his natural life over and above. And he yet lives in Craigdarroch; and may he still live so as to find mercy in the day of the Lord; and at this very time, I know nothing about Craigdarroch that maketh me ashamed of the hope I had of his happiness when he was a child.

After it pleased Providence to bring back our Zion's captivity, and Presbytery was established in this Church, I had great difficulty about my going in communion with her, and that because I thought our Covenants were not secured, and all guilty of sad defection not duly censured. It was difficult for me what to determine; therefore, I set apart a day for prayer, and went at some distance into the fields. I consulted my Bible to see what had been the practice of the Church in the like case, both under the Old and the New Testament dispensations. I found it had been frequently the approved practice of the chosen people, to bind themselves to God by solemn and national Covenants; and that, in their covenanting, they bound themselves against error, both in principle and practice, as we have done by our National and Solemn League and Covenant. And I am persuaded that these Covenants are always binding, not only as they contain nothing but what every good Christian is obliged to do—namely, all that lies in his power in appearing against sin and error—but they are also binding because of the oath sworn to the Most High.

When I considered the Church, under the New Testament dispensation, at the time our great pattern and example came into the world, I found a great many things wrong at that time. They taught for doctrine the commandments of men; were more fond of their unwritten traditions than they were of the Divine law; their teachers very formal and corrupt; and the Church very much subject to heathen magistrates, who had too great influence in changing the High Priesthood from one to another. Yet, for all this, the great head of the Church owned her for a true Church, though many things were wrong, and spoke nonourably of that Church—yea, and himself joined in communion with her, as did Joseph and Mary, Zacharias and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna, who were eminent believers. From all which, I concluded that it was my unquestionable duty to join in communion with the Church of Scotland, though our Covenant was not renewed, seeing she had all the essentials of a true Church—her doctrine pure and incorrupt; her government, discipline, and worship according to the Scriptures; and the sacraments administered according to the pattern shewn on the Mount. As such like considerations as these cleared up my way in joining with this Church since the Revolution, so I have ever since loved the habitation of his house, the place where his Honour dwells. Frequently has he satisfied me with the fatness of his house—frequently has he made all his acts, all his ordinances, smell to me of aloes, myrrh, and cassia. Whilst I live I shall ever pray for the peace of Jerusalem; and for my friends' and brethren's sake, and for the House of the Lord, and for my own sake and posterity's too, I will ever seek her good, and still shall wish that peace may be within her walls and prosperity within her palaces.

About this time, my wife was taken with such a complication of dangerous troubles, that her life was given over by all sorts, and those of good skill. But it pleased Providence, in answer to my prayer, to spare with me one who had been my sweet companion in the most fiery tribulations; yea, my great support and comfort in the hour of my pilgrimage. Not long after, I was smitten with a universal cruel, which had broken out in many parts of my body, and taken my right hand off the joint, so that I had no power of it, and was laid aside from all work. I consulted a physician of the best skill in our country, who told me he could not do me any service, if it were not to apply some plaisters to the wounds to ease my pain; but he advised me not to trouble myself with physicians, for I would find them all physicians of no value. Having continued under this trouble for two years, I found an inclination to go to Moffat, though my circumstances were so low at the time I knew not well how to get there. But, having asked counsel of the Lord, I said I would go, and make use of the water, in faith, as a mean appointed, and frequently made useful through him who works by means, without means, and contrary to means, as seemeth good in his sight. Accordingly I went; and in close dependence on him, did drink of the water, and washed my wounds therewith, for the space of forty and eight hours, at proper seasons; and by this means the Lord brought my hand back to the joint, and made it strong as aforetime, so that I came home with joy, and was able to go about my work. I went three summers, and stayed about six days every time at Moffat; and as my hand was restored to its place and strength the first time I went, so, the following season I was perfectly recovered, my wound healed, and I restored to a sound and healthy constitution.

A little before my above-said trouble, when I came back from my long captivity—(as God had brought back Zion's captivity, so, at the same time, he brought back mine; for with Zion I embarked, and with Zion I stood and fell)—I say, after my coming to peace and liberty, I took a piece of ground in tack—for husbandry was my occupation—and seeing God was again suffering his people, and me among the rest, to dwell under their own vine and fig-tree, and none to make us afraid. I found I was not used with buying and selling, and therefore could not improve the blessing of peace and liberty. Whereupon I set apart some time to ask counsel of the Lord, and went to my own hill where he had frequently met with me; there I begged that he who taught the husbandman discretion would teach me to order all my affairs with discretion to the end. And I was made to remark ever since, that whereas, before this time of prayer, a great many had outwitted me in buying and selling, and were like to carry off the little that I had in the world, yet, after counsel sought of God in this matter, I was either, in providence, kept from having much business with the crafty, or helped to a holy and just caution in the way of trade, that, to this day, the Lord has helped and kept me from the paths of the destroyer, of the unjust, fraudulent, and violent man.

After this, I was one day taking some broth, and a little bone went over with the broth. By the endeavouring to get it up, it got into the wind-pipe, and went down by degrees, as far as it had passage. It continued immoveable fourteen years and three quarters. For six years I was able to go about my work, though weakly; but, for the other eight and three quarters, I could do nothing. This threw me into a decay, for it occasioned a great cough, drouth, and spitting; and none thought I could recover. Yet, at the end of the above-said space, I was taking a drink of water, and my cough coming on at the time, occasioned my vomiting the same; and with that stress and vomiting, the bone came away, after it had lodged within me fourteen years and three quarters as above. The bone, when it came away, was in bigness and shape like the half of an ordinary nut-shell. All the time I was under this trouble, I was helped to great patience and submission, and abundantly satisfied to die by it. The whole time it continued, Providence made me cheerfully acquiesce in the dispensation, without murmuring or repining; and since my deliverance from it, though my body—considering my age, and the troubles I went through—be not so strong as formerly, yet I have enjoyed a tolerable measure of health ever since, which is the space of eighteen years.

In the time when I had the above-mentioned bone for my trouble, I had occasion to go and see the worthy Lady Castlestewart, my old acquaintance; and when I was there, I was seized with a cough, and for three days fixed to my bed with it. On one of those days, as I lay looking about me, I was suddenly impressed that Mrs Rodgers, the minister's wife, at Galston, was in child-bearing pains, and that both mother and child were in the utmost danger. Upon this I prayed earnestly to spare the mother and the child, and was helped to plead this with great concern; and I was persuaded both would be preserved. When I had done, I wrote down the time when this happened—the year, month, day, and time of the day. And when I saw Mrs Rodgers, afterwards, I shewed it to her, who observed that she was in travail, and her child and she in imminent danger on the day and time of the day whereon I was made to pray for her; though I was then about fifty miles distance from her, and knew nothing as to the time of her travail. Adored be his name! for, as I have read and heard, so have I seen that his secret is with them that fear him.

After this, I was pained much with a stitch in my left arm, so that, for three weeks, I was not able to follow my work; for I could not lift it up or stretch it out, but held it on my breast like an arm broken or out of joint. On this, I came over to Kirkoswald, where I frequently came to pray and meditate, and went into the church, which was the place where prayer was wont to be made when I was in that part. As I was praying, I forgot to put up a request about my arm—being very much enlarged as to other things—till I was just going to close and end the duty, when it was strongly impressed upon my mind that I should put up a petition for the recovery of my arm, and it should be granted; on which I begged of God to remove the pain and allow me the use of my arm, for harvest was now drawing on. No sooner had I desired the favour than I was persuaded that it was granted, whereupon, after I arose from duty, I put it to the trial, and stretched out my arm, and it was as well and strong as ever, and continued so ever since. Surely this was done by the same power and goodness that long ago healed the withered hand.

There were some things which I should have mentioned before, that now I shall give an account of.

In our days of fiery trial and persecution (before the Revolution) I fell into a great fever, and lay in a cot-house of my father's. When I had lain fourteen days, I got an account that there was to be a strict search made by the enemy, for such as I was. On which—the fifteenth—day, I rose up in the rage of the fever, and went on foot to Castlestewart, which was about twenty miles from the place where I was lying. My wife stayed in the family at that time, and none but the lady and some few others knew I was there. It was not fit the laird should know of it, lest he had been brought to his oath and faulted on my account. When I went there, I lay down as I came away, in the rage of the fever; but strangers coming to the house, I was obliged to leave the room to make way for them, and was put in a little closet above the laird's room. When I was laid in there, being in great sickness, I moaned much, and it seems, pretty loud; for my wife, being in the laird's chamber, heard me, and running up, told me I behaved to give over moaning, otherwise the laird would hear, and would certainly inquire about me. I thought it hard not to be allowed to moan when my trouble was so great. However, considering the danger it might bring both the family and myself to, I begged of God to keep me from it; and no sooner did I entreat that favour than it was granted; and if he had not done it, I could no more, of myself, have stopped it, than I could command the raging of the fever.

A little after the Revolution, I being at Craigdarroch, was looking out of a window, and saw Craigdarroch standing without. I no sooner saw his face than I was impressed with his death, being assured, as he was now going to his regiment, he should never return. The following day he set off for the regiment, which lay about Edinburgh; and in prayer and out of prayer, I was persuaded he should never see his family again. This I told to my wife and the lady's gentlewoman. I got them to promise never to speak of it till the truth of this promise should appear. Accordingly, very soon after, he was killed at Killiecrankie, and never returned. After the battle, it was reported that he was taken prisoner, and carried off by the Highlanders. I, hearing this, went to prayer about it, and was assured he was dead. After which I told the lady that she had better lay her account to hear of Craigdarroch's death, than vainly imagine he was taken prisoner, for I was certain he was dead. A little after this, Lady Craigdarroch got several letters, assuring her that Craigdarroch was taken prisoner, and still alive; she shewed me three of them, and said, what do you think of yourself now, for here are three letters from persons of note, confirming the report we had of Craigdarroch's being prisoner? I told her, write to her who could that her husband was alive, I could assure her of the contrary; which, poor lady, she soon found to be true.

About the same time, three of Craigdarroch's children took the small-pox. Whenever I went in to see them, and looked on the second son, I was impressed he would die; and this, haunted me both in prayer for him and whenever I looked upon him. So firmly was I persuaded of it that I told the lady and my wife the child would die. The lady said she could not observe the least symptom or evidence of it. I assured her she would find it so; and so it fell out, for the same child died by the small-pox, and the other two recovered.

Sometime after this, my son, John, was servant with Mr Adam, in Kirkoswald, and took a great swelling in both his legs, which came to such a pitch that he was obliged to quit the work, and come home to me for a time. When he came I was filled with compassion towards him to see him in such distress. On which I went and prayed the Great Physician of soul and body, that he would condescend to direct a proper means for his recovery, and that he would bless the means and heal my son. After prayer it was suggested to me, and impressed on my spirit to send for some sea water, and wash his legs therewith. I did so immediately; and with once washing them therewith, he was as well, next morning, as ever, and continues so till this day.

I had a horse about that time, which was seized with some extraordinary distemper frightful to look on. All that could be applied for the removing of it was to no purpose, but still increased the more. Whereupon I humbly besought Him who is the preserver of both man and beast, that he would direct me to some proper mean for his preservation, that I might not lose him, and that he would make it useful. I, immediately after, was standing without, with the horse; there came a stranger past, who asked what ailed him. I told him; when he directed me, by the goodness of Providence, to what would cure him. I immediately made the application, for the mean prescribed was easily obtained. And no sooner did I, but he was recovered from his trouble. This, dear children, I record, that you may make errands to the Throne of Grace, even on the account of your beasts, and acknowledge him in all your ways, and he will direct your steps.

Reader, the above narrative is no fictitious tale, no coinage of the imagination; it is a faithful relation of the perils and providences that befell honest John Stevenson, land-labourer in the parish of Daily, in Ayrshire, who died in 1728. The particulars here recorded were taken down, with many others besides, from his own mouth, and from his papers, by Mr William Cupples of Kirkoswald, who says, of this zealous and persecuted Covenanter, that he was the most eminently pious man he ever knew—excelling in meekness, modesty, and simplicity; and adorned with every Christian grace and virtue.

A NIGHT SCENE AT STRATHPEFFER WELLS, ROSS-SHIRE,

October, 1838.

BY MAJOR CALDER CAMPBELL.

A cold October eve—but the fair moon
Shone in autumnal splendour o'er the Strath,
That looked by such brave lamp a huge saloon
For spectral revelry. The weed-girt path
Was crisp with frost, that made the breath of night
Taste keen and bitter;—from the mountains nigh,
Clouds scudded past, appearing, in that light,
Strange phantoms of the sky!

A dismal grave-yard, without church or fane,
Stood, 'neath encircling mountains, sad and lone,
With all its humble heaps, for winter's rain,
And sleets, and snows to bear. A rude gray stone
Just here and there was scattered; epitaph,
Save roughly-chiselled names, had none; about
A few old trees, by Time leaf-plundered half,
Stretched their gaunt branches out.

And all was silence, so profound, so dead,
Seemed as the very wind, that runs o' nights,
With a low whisper, through the grass, had said
Its last farewell; when—sudden as the lights
New lit within a beacon, in the dark,
Speak out their lustrous warning—loudly rose
A chaunt of holy psalmody;—and, mark!
What shadow near us grows?

Near us, beyond the old dismantled wall
Of that lone grave-yard, seated on a tomb,
The moonbeams shew two figures gaunt and tall,
Dim, shadowy, spirit-like, within the gloom
Of ancient trees! And thence, their voices blending
In holy cadences, uplift to God
Harmonious sounds—ascending and descending
From and unto the sod.

What are ye, in this solemn hour, who meet
Where the new turf tells of fresh burial? Why,
Through this quiet Sabbath night, do you your sweet
And manly voices raise unto the sky,
Thus sadly, holily, alone? Why here,
Where at this hour the peasant fears to tread, Assemble ye, twin mourners? "Man, draw near—
We watch the DEAD!"

And so it was! These ancient Highland men
Watched the new grave of youth, lest hands unholy
Should dare, with sacrilegious lust, that glen
And its lone grave-yard of its corpses lowly
To 'spoil!—sad thought, alas! for e'en here
Doth the inquisitive craft of science come,
To fill the poor man's home with pain and fear,
When very life is dumb!

"Here buried lies a widow's only child—
Her dear and dutiful; and could she bear
To hear that his young form, hands coarse and wild,
In lawless search of knowledge, e'er should tear
From the blest sheet in which that form she wound?
Could she e'er think, nor madden at the thought,
That the fair locks her tear-wet hands had bound Should by the knife be sought?"

"Could she endure that he whose every limb
Was as her life-blood dear, should from the shroud
Be dragged to some foul vault, obscure and dim,
For blades to mangle, and for voices loud
To curse and quarrel over? Nay, though We Are poor, yet, Stranger! we have feelings fond That should not be insulted. Misery
Can feel, though it despond!

"Stranger! this world is but our home awhile,
But even in death we would not have defaced
Our loved ones that have flourished in our smile,
And faded in our sight—whom we have placed Within the sacred dust! The soul, 'tis true,
Soars high; and his was holy. O'er his head
Our vigil do we keep with anthems due—
Stranger, we watch the dead!"

And then they turned them from me, and once more
Their plaintive psalm was heard; while solemn thought (Yet not unblent with gentle feelings) o'er
My spirit passed; and, as my bosom caught
The shadow of sweet hopes from Pity kind,
Homewards I strode, thanking my God that still
The wildest haunt may hold the meekest mind—
For good still blends with ill!

CHAPTER III.

I am now very sorry that I did not visit the Moravians, and see something of their modus vivendi; but, being a complete stranger, I contented myself with a view of the exterior of the building, as I passed along to the Lehigh, at the foot of the town, which I crossed by a bridge, and, for doing so, paid one cent. At the further end of the bridge, a road turned down towards Philadelphia, from which, as the milestone informed me, I was distant fifty-one miles. I stood for some time alternately looking down the road and at the milestone, debating with myself whether or not I should go and pay that city of brotherly-love a visit; but recollecting I had no friends there, and nearly as few in my pocket, I kept on my old course, consoling myself with the idea that I would visit it at some future period, when friends were more plenty. After Bethlehem, the principal thing which struck my attention in this day's march, was a field of buckwheat cut down, and lying in swathes like hay. I also saw the farmers treading out their hayseed, by making a number of horses go round and round upon it. I was also a good deal amused in seeing them thrashing wheat. Three men performed the operation, instead of two, as with us. The flails they used were not much bigger than whip-handles, but with these they kept alternate time, with a velocity which was altogether amazing. On going along, I encountered a party of Quakers, young and old. It appeared to be a pleasure party; and the young folks, albeit in the Quaker cut, were very gaily dressed, much more so than I had supposed possible for a Quaker.

Towards sundown, I knocked at the door of a neat, whitewashed house, when a surly old nigger came to it. The first sound of his voice, and the first peep at his face, were enough for me. Like master, like man—I have no business here, thought I, so left him without saying a word. A few hundred yards from the house I entered a wood; but that was nothing very surprising in such a woody country as America. What surprised me most was, that, after travelling until the sun was a good while set, I was still in the wood. One great mercy it was, that, if the sun was out of sight, the moon—none of your artificial moons, lighted up by the novelist to guide the benighted hero on his weary way, but a real bona fide autumn moon—with a face as round and as bright as a brass kettle, flickered through among the trees, and shewed me numberless roads running in all directions. If it had not been for the moon, I was lost to a certainty for that night; but, guided by her benign light, I kept on the road which appeared to be most used, until I became quite exhausted, and could proceed no further. Sitting down on the stump of a tree, and having both time and opportunity for reflection, I gave way to it accordingly. "I'm got into a veritable forest, that's certain. Dang that old, crabbed nigger—I wish Lady Douglas was here—fine place for meditation—plenty of 'woods and wilds' and 'solitary glooms.' Rather too many. The wood must certainly have an end somewhere. It can't be the far west yet. I wonder if I'm to sit here all night. Certainly plenty of people live at no great distance, or there would not be so many roads; there must be houses at the end of them. Better be walking than sitting here shivering. Let me try it once more—the farther I go, the nearer my bed." So up I got to my task, and again walked until I had again to give in and sit down upon a stump. I was a mighty stump-processor to-night; but this time my reflections were becoming of a more gloomy cast, and I began to fling my eyes around, to see if I could observe anything like a place to pass the night in. I was almost miserable; the night, to be sure, was good, but it was very chilly, and, besides, I was very hungry, and quite worn out with fatigue. I knew that if I tried the road once more, I would soon have to drop, and I thought I might just as well pass the night where I was as in any other part of the wood; but the idea of a warm fireside and a good supper came so strong over my fancy, that I could not resist the temptation of trying my legs a little longer. 'Twas but dropping at last, anyhow, and perseverance works wonders. Up I started, and had just got round a bend of the road, when something, having the appearance of a building, presented itself in the moonlight; but it did not look in the least like a dwelling-house—the thing of which I was in search. On my nearer approach, it turned out to be a church; and, although at all times a firm friend to the church, in the present instance I could have very well dispensed with it in exchange for a snug dwelling-house. Upon second thoughts, however, I recollected that since there was a church, the minister's house might not be very far off—the very place for me, thinks I; he must preach up hospitality to strangers, and ten to one but he practises it too. The church was a new one—another instance of the march of civilization, and verification of the prediction of the solitary place being made to rejoice. On going round the end, I saw what I took to be the manse, with the door open, and the light from a large fire gleaming from it and mingling with the moonlight—blessed sight! it was, indeed, the prettiest piece of scenery I had for a long time seen. Now, thinks I, I'll not be very forward, but go round and knock at the kitchen door, very naturally thinking that the front of the house looked towards the church. So, round I goes, but found nothing like a kitchen door until I came round again to the one from whence proceeded the light. After some hesitation, to see whether anybody would make their appearance, I entered; but, to my surprise, no living being was to be seen within, and all was as still and quiet as a church-yard. There was a first-rate fire, however, blazing within a huge chimney, arched like some of those old ones I had seen at home; and beneath was also a log of wood, by way of seat, which I was pretty quick in occupying. I sat for some time, expecting every moment to see some one make his appearance, or hear some noise as evidence of inhabitants; but no—not a movement—not a dog—not a cat—not even the chirping of a cricket. This is very strange, thought I—very strange, indeed—for everything is so neat and clean, that somebody must have been here since long. I began to get a little superstitious at length, and some rudely defined feelings of fear came creeping over me. If it had not been for the church before the door, I could easily have imagined—if I had been in the midst of a German forest I certainly would have done so—that the good fairies had built a house expressly for my accommodation for the night: but to that notion the church was an insuperable objection. However, after waiting and waiting for the arrival of somebody, I thought there would be no harm in taking a smoke; so prepared accordingly; finished it, rested a while, and, for lack of something to do, tried my pipe again. Having knocked the ashes out of my second pipe, I had some thoughts of lying down before the fire and taking a nap, since I had all the house to myself, when I was startled by the opening of a door, and the entrance of a little woman, middle-aged, plainly but decently dressed, and of but a homely countenance. I addressed her without leaving my seat; upon which she shook her head, as much as to say—"I don't understand English." With the design of trying what stuff her heart was made of, I held out my empty pipe, making her to understand I had no tobacco, and wished her to help me to some. She immediately went to a cupboard—brought out a bag full of "cut and dry"—and gave me a whole handfull. This will do, thinks I—I'm safe—here I stay for the night; but that I would have done anyhow, unless I had been put out by sheer violence. After performing this act of kindness, the woman went away; nor did she make her appearance again until I had finished a pipe of her tobacco. When she returned, it was for the purpose of putting on the tea-kettle. My bed is already sure, said I, to myself, and I see my supper is not very far off; and the reader of this, if he hath ever been in danger of being benighted in a foreign land, will have some conception of the feelings which now fermented within me. You may talk about travelling, and the beauties of nature, and all that sort of thing; but I refer to all travellers, sentimental or unsentimental, whether a well-plenished supper-table, after a fatiguing day's journey, be not preferable to all the beautiful scenes of nature, or master-pieces of art they ever saw. Yes, for scenery either grand or sublime, give me the clean hearth, the blazing fire, the files of cups and saucers, butter-plates, and jelly-mugs, mountains of bread, and rivers of cream; and for music, give me the singing of the tea-kettle, the frying of ham, and the hissing and spurning of bursting puddings; "them's" my scenery; as for all others, any traveller, if he chooses, may fling himself into the crater of Vesuvius, or break his neck on Mont Blanc for me. My kind hostess—as yet I had seen nobody but her—came again upon the stage, and pronounced the word "Zuber," which I very scholar-like translated "supper"—a good version; but, verily, my stomach was in such a state at the time, that I believe I could have easily translated any one of the million dialects of this Babel of an earth. I arose from my log, shoved my pipe into my pocket, and followed her into another room. On entering, I was greeted by the glances from the eyes of nearly a dozen handsomely dressed young ladies, seated round a splendid supper-table; and, in return, I gave them a slight bow, and took my place among them. At first I was inclined to believe I had got into a nunnery; but some knowledge of the rules of such establishments soon changed the nunnery into a boarding-school, in which opinion I was strengthened by the presence of a piano-forte at one side of the room. Our meal was made in silence and decorum; not a word was spoken; but I was plentifully helped to everything on the table. Towards the end of the meal, a little man made his entry into the room rather unexpectedly; for I had given up all hopes of seeing any males, and, during supper, could not help conjecturing how so many ladies were going to dispose of me throughout the night. The little man approached the table, looked at me, then looked at the woman who so kindly entertained me, who said something to him; upon which he held out his hand to me, and, in broken English, said, he was very happy to see me. After supper, we had but little conversation, as the man was not overstocked with English, and I was too tired for talking; but I learned enough to convince me, that the hearts of these honest Germans were much imbued with the milk of human kindness; indeed, all my wishes were as much anticipated as if I had been a near relation newly arrived from Germany. On expressing a wish to retire to rest, the man conducted me up stairs, through a kind of ante-room into another; when putting down the candle, he retired, wishing me a good night. I immediately began to undress, and, while doing so, my attention was drawn towards the bed, which seemed to me to have a very blown-up and dropsical appearance. Although covered with one of those beautiful counterpanes so common in Virginia, yet, to my mind, it had something very suspicious-looking about it; for I must confess, notwithstanding I had been treated with much kindness since I came in contact with these good people, my mind was not altogether easy. I had read and heard of too many murderous stories connected with circumstances precisely like those in which I now was, not to have all my eyes about me ; in fact, the people's kindness began now to militate against them. I accordingly approached the bed, and turned down the coverlid, when no pillow presented itself, no blankets, no sheets, nothing but the bare bed. I wondered not a little at this, and thought that so many young ladies might have spared me at least one blanket among them ; but, while standing wondering at the want of the blankets, and still more at the strange, puffy look of the bed, my eyes rested upon something white near the head, but away down about a foot below the surface of the bed. I examined it ; it looked exactly like a piece of a sheet. Strange—and in following up my discovery, I tumbled down the bed, when, lo ! and behold, pillows and sheets as white as the driven snow presented themselves to my astonished sight. The most horrible suspicions took possession of my soul. O God ! I exclaimed in an agony, they are going to smother me while asleep ! I ran to the door ; it was locked on the outside ; and I recollected that, on coming through the ante-room, a bed was placed with its head beside my door—the murderer's bed. All my suspicions were more than confirmed ; I saw nothing but death before my eyes, or rather behind my back—I saw no way of escape, and, as the last refuge of the wretched, I betook myself to my Creator. In a kind of agony, I dropped upon my knees to commend my soul and body to the only being who could aid in such awful circumstances. Though tolerably regular at my prayers during my lifetime, yet I must confess that, although at the outset, when I first got upon my knees, my whole soul was fervently directed heavenward ; yet very soon, my ideas began to scatter like grape-shot, and my imagination to roam a wool-gathering to the ends of the earth. My petition to heaven got so mixed up with the odds and ends of earthly thoughts, that, when I was done, I could scarcely tell whether I had been praying or not. So it happened in the present instance. At the outset, I was more than serious : but my head was so full of the fearful bed, that my thoughts could not help falling that way ; from the bed, they got among the Germans, and from Pennsylvania they bounded into Germany, till at length they entered an inn along with an Irish gentleman, who got on the top of him, to his no small puzzlement, just such another bed as was about to go on the top of me. He rang the bell and told the waiter, that if any gentleman was going to sleep in the bed above him, he must be quick, as he was going to sleep and did not wish to be disturbed. Altogether forgetful of my situation, I burst into a hearty laugh, forgot my "Amen," rose from my knees, undressed with dispatch, and jumped into bed ; and, oh, how delicious ! Ye presidents, prime ministers, princes, potentates, and powers, if ye wish to know what happiness is, step down from your thrones, walk fifteen or twenty miles in the hot sun, five or six more in the cold dews of night, get your stomachs as empty as the treasury chests ; and, after having done all this, contrive, some how or other, to get a good supper, then jump into a German bed ; and if that don't make you happy, nothing on earth can.

I need not say I enjoyed a most delectable night's rest ; and, in the morning, I a good deal amused my worthy hosts by a recital of my last night's fears. I have called them worthy, for so they were. I came among them as if I had dropped from the clouds, yet Mr and Mrs Gerard (their name) were as kind to me as if I had been a brother ; and so far were they from taking anything for their trouble, that it was with difficulty I could get setting out on my journey, they wishing me to stay some days in order to recruit myself. It was he who told me of the antipathy of the German population here towards strangers ; and, in confirmation, he further told me, that, a few days before my arrival, an Englishman came to his house begging something to eat, as he had not eaten anything for two days ; and that, although he had offered handfulls of silver, nobody would receive him. Mr Gerard gave him plenty, without money and without price. Before setting out, I may mention that I was right in my conjectures—Mrs G. keeping a boarding-school for young ladies, and Mr G. a day-school for boys.

Having received another handfull of tobacco, and returned them thanks for their attention towards me, I left them. In the afternoon, I reached a store known by the name of Swampgrove ; and a few hundred yards beyond it, I observed a man before me, of no very decent appearance. I was now about five or six miles from Potsdam, and, not wishing to enter the town in such kind of company, I made up my mind to quicken my pace, accost him civilly with a " Good day," and go a-head of him. I did so, and had got a few steps a-head, when I heard him muttering something. I stopped to see what he wanted, when he asked me if I was going to Potsdam. I told him I did not know whether I would go that length to-night or not, and left him again. But my gentleman was not going to let me slip so easily a-head of him. I heard him speaking to me again, and, of course, had to stop till he came up.

Says he to me—" If you don't know whether you are going to Potsdam or not, you may as well go home with me."

I looked in the man's face to see if I could get any information there, but there was nothing like a home stamped upon it. It was a round, pale, doughy face, surmounted by an old hat, knocked into every kind of shape ; and, below, it was garnished by a black beard, which had not felt the razor for many a day. His other accoutrements were an old roundabout, duck trousers, and a pillow-slip slung over his shoulders, with something in each end to balance it. I had already set him down as a runaway sailor ; but when he spoke about his home, I really did not know what to make of him, and a half desire entered my mind to know more about him.

" How far is it to your house ?" I inquired.

" Scarcely two miles," he replied, with a Dutch accent.

"Well, I shall think of it as we proceed; and, in the meantime, I thank you for your kind intentions."

As we went easily along, we continued our conversation; and, among other items, he told me that he had been at the store purchasing some little things for his wife, as she was making apple-butter, and was going to have a great apple paring—that he had bespoken some fiddles—so they would have quite a frolic of it.

"Apple-butter, did you say?—what kind of butter is that?"

"It is made of apples, pared, cut into pieces, and boiled in cider till it becomes a kind of jelly."

We were not long in arriving at the end of the lane leading up to the house, and, as his information made me still more curious, I had made up my mind to go along with him. A short way up the lane, we encountered a waggon, with a fine team of four horses. It stopped as we came up, and the driver and my companion had some talk. After it had passed, I said, half jokingly—for I had set down my man as half deranged in the intellect—

"I suppose that is your team?"

"Yes, that's my team," says he.

I smiled, and had some thoughts of turning back again, being convinced that the man was fully mad; but curiosity still kept me going along with him. By-and-by we came in sight of a white-washed two-story stone house.

"Well, I suppose this is your house, too," says I to him.

"Yes," says he, "that's my house, and I will make you as comfortable as I can in it."

I thanked him a second time, but could not help thinking he was about leading me into some scrape or other, as a shabbier, or more blackguard-looking man could scarcely be. However, I kept my thoughts to myself, and followed him into the house; and, sure enough, there was the big copper on the fire, and the apple-butter, that was about to be, tumbling to and fro in it. A handsome young woman, with a pipe in her mouth, was busily engaged in attending to the concern, to whom I was introduced as the wife of my conductor. The mother, a very decent matron, neatly and cleanly dressed, soon made her appearance from another room; to whom I was also introduced. As the ceremony of introduction took place in Dutch—the only language spoken in the house—I know not what story my friend told, nor what reasons he gave for bringing me to the house; but I saw well enough that I was welcome, for they all seemed well pleased, and I was directed to take my seat in a fine, antique-looking elbow-chair—the place of honour—and I soon had my pipe in my mouth like the rest of them. At supper we had a hand at the apple-butter; and I now recollected that I had before tasted some of it in coming through the Jerseys, but did not know that it went by that name. It is really excellent, and quite American; and, believe me, buckwheat cakes and apple-butter are a feast for a king: I guess Queen Victoria has never tasted any thing so fine. By-and-by, the apple-parers began to drop in—young people of both sexes—until the house was full; when we set to work cutting up the apples like desperation; every one, as is customary upon such occasions, doing his best, and striving to shew how clever he is. The labour was enlivened by a variety of jokes, stories, and songs. Our principal songstress was a blooming young woman, with cheeks as red and plump as any apple; she appeared to me to be the reigning belle—the queen of the meeting; at least I could easily perceive she thought so herself. She gave us a variety of songs; and though not with the sweetness of a Caradori, I believe it was good enough for Dutch singing; for the company, every now and then, burst into fits of laughter. As I could not understand a word, my principal business was to appear well pleased, and shew my industry at the apples. After business was finished, we ought to have had the ball; but, as the fiddlers, somehow or other, did not come, the company dispersed, and I retired to bed, or rather to beds, for I had again one above and one below me.

This German way of resting is the best of all modes that I have tried, and I wonder it has not become more general among northern nations. I, for one, would advise my countrymen, the Scotch, to convert their blankets into greatcoats, and substitute feather beds in their place, and then they may set the cold of winter at defiance. In confirmation of the superiority of the bed over the blanket system, I will relate a little anecdote. In Virginia, in one of the houses I stayed in, a young Dutchman slept in the same room with me. On the Saturday evenings he commonly went and visited his friends, staying all night with them. It happened, one very cold Saturday, that he went away as usual; and, after having gone to bed, I found that I could easily stand the weight of another blanket, and so took the liberty to take one from John's bed. Contrary to expectation, he came home that night, upon which I told him what I had done, and that, if he wanted his blanket, he might take it off me. No answer was returned, and I went to sleep. On waking in the morning, I naturally cast my eyes towards John's bed, but I could neither see John nor bed-clothes. Now, thinks I, some thief has been in and taken away all the clothes; and up I got to examine things more narrowly. In prosecution of said design, I found John's head away far down, sticking out from below the bed. He was sound asleep. He had literally turned the world upside down; and, for all the world, looked exactly like an overgrown turtle, with the head peeping out of the shell. I left him alone in his glory, perfectly convinced that he was in the right on't.

At breakfast we had a dish new to me. I don't recollect what name they gave to it; but it might, with great propriety, be called cider soup, as it was composed of potatoes and cider—exactly our potato soup at home, only cider instead of water. It was a favourite dish with the Dutchman, and I had to tell a good many lies to save my good breeding; for he often asked me how I liked it, and if it were not good. Of course I answered in the affirmative; but my affirmatives came up my throat with as much difficulty as the cider soup went down; for I really did not like it.

After breakfast I started, though not till after an invitation to stay as long as I chose, and welcome. In the course of the forenoon I passed through Potsdam; a considerable place, with some good houses, and a newspaper—maybe more; for I encountered the courier with an armful. It is situated on the Schuylkill, which I crossed by means of a neat wooden bridge. At night I slept at the house of a German, and, next day, passed by the end of West Chester, and through Downingtown, where I crossed the Big Brandywine by means of a stone bridge—the second I had seen in America, although they say there are plenty of them in Pennsylvania.

A short way beyond Downingtown it commenced raining very heavy, which forced me to look out for shelter. I turned off the road to a farmhouse I saw close by; but receiving an impudent answer from a boy I accosted in the cattle-yard, I kept on towards a neat little cottage not far off. Here I was welcome. The occupants were an Irishman, Robert Owen by name, and his wife: everything was neat and clean, and they treated me like a gentleman. In the morning a neighbour came in; and they commenced talking about the elections, and federalists, and republicans. I put in my word—

"I thought," said I, "that you were all federalists and republicans in the lump in this country?"

"O yes, so we are," replied the neighbour; "but when we go to particulars, there is a great deal of difference between a federalist and a republican, for all that."

"And what, pray, may be the difference between the two?" said I; "for certainly you have but few Tories now-a-days."

"As for the Tories," says he, "we have got enough of them yet; and as for the federalists, they are little better than Tories in disguise: true, they love America—that we must allow—and don't wish to be ruled by the King of England, or anything by the name of king. They are still republicans in principle—words anyhow—but their practical comments upon their own doctrines, evidently tend toward, if not a monarchical, at least an aristocratical form of government, as near as may be, without actually crossing the boundary line. Their principal aim is to give as much power to the General Government as they possibly can, without quitting either the name or reality of a republic. They wish to merge all the individual republics into one grand whole—the republic of America. The republicans, on the other hand, wish all the individual States to remain as free and independent of each other as they were at the formation of the Constitution. For that purpose, they wish to preserve to them all the powers reserved to them at the formation of that instrument; and, if there should be any taking and giving, rather to add to the powers of the State Governments than to weaken them."

The above may not be exactly the words of my informant; but they explain, with tolerable clearness, the difference between the two great parties into which the people of the United States are divided, and are, in substance, a good enough answer to the question I asked. I may further add, on my own account, that, since the period of the above conversation, the two parties have changed their cognomens almost as often as the moon has changed. At the present time, (1838,) they go by the name of Whigs and Democrats. A third party has started of late—the Conservatives. The individuals belonging to the last, pretend to be Democrats in heart and core, except regarding a national bank—an abomination to the Democrats: but at the elections, somehow or other, all their votes go to the Whigs—a plain proof that they scarcely know on what side their bread is buttered. So much for politics just now.

I was remarkably well treated by Mr Owen; and although but a cotter, as we would say at home, yet he managed to spread out a table as well furnished, and everything as neat and clean, as if he had been worth thousands, and his wife brought up at a boarding-school. Perhaps I may be found fault with for recording such trifles: but, as I wish to give my friends on the other side of the Atlantic as correct an outline of American life as I can—so far as I have seen it—they must go along with me and take pot luck—the good and the bad as it comes. It is not by a single trait that an individual, much less a nation, can be described. To talk of the shrewdness of a Scotchman, the bluntness of an Englishman, the blunders of an Irishman, the levity of a Frenchman, the pride of a Spaniard, the treachery of a Portuguese, or the tricks and notions of a Yankee, is but going a very little way into a knowledge of the people. To know, we must become acquainted with them; we must visit them in their houses, sit at their tables, sleep in their beds, converse with them round their firesides, see them in their fields and workshops, and note them in all the outs and ins of their every-day life. The way that the British talk so much nonsense about the Americans, and the Americans about the British, is, because the one people knows little or nothing about the other; and the main reason of this ignorance is, because the travellers, who pretend to give the information, don't descend to particulars, but merely give some hearsays, or describe some of the prominent features which they have happened to get a glimpse of, in flying through the country with the speed of a locomotive.

In the course of the forenoon we went over to Mr Tarbet's, upon whose farm Owen worked, and were kindly received. He was a young man, but married, like most of the Americans; of a quiet and kindly disposition, and had a good farm, and, of course, plenty to eat and drink. I stayed with him two days. I afterwards crossed the Little Brandywine, and came to a small place called Oxford, where I stayed all night. It has one or two tolerably good inns, but no university. Somewhere near Oxford, I stopped at a small log-house, in order to rest a little. I knocked at the door, which was opened by one of the finest looking women I thought I had ever seen, who bade me come in, in a voice sweet as strain from an Eolian harp. She was young, and though not what you would call beautiful, yet there was an indescribable something about her manner, look, and shape, which, together with her virgin-like modesty, made her altogether irresistible. She took her infant from the cradle, and sat down at one side of the fire, while I took a seat at the other. She spoke not, nor did I; but look I could not help, as she bent with maternal tenderness over the babe at her breast. I am not overly much given to covetousness, but if ever I was in danger of breaking the tenth commandment, it was sitting by that fireside. I actually envied the husband of such a wife.

A few miles beyond Oxford, I entered Maryland. The boundary line, in this direction, between it and Pennsylvania, is a very diminutive stream, or rather ditch, so narrow that I could stand with one foot in Pennsylvania and the other in Maryland. Small though the separating line be, I could observe a material difference in the appearance of the two countries. The greater portion of Pennsylvania, that I had passed through, was rough and hilly, and latterly undulating; but after I entered Maryland, the face of the country became almost a dead level, with the soil light and sandy, and so continued until I arrived at the Susquehanna. The reason of this change was owing to my receding farther and farther from the mountains; for it must be remembered that Maryland, in the north-west, is very mountainous. The roads, too, were now better than in Pennsylvania.

In going along, I stopped at a house to look at a man taking the hair off what I took to be a young pig, which he had fastened by the heels to one of the porch pillars.

"That's a queer-looking pig you're flaying there," said I, to the man.

"It's not a pig, sir; it's a possum."

"An opossum! You surely don't pretend to eat opossums in Maryland, do ye?"

"No, we don't pretend to eat them, but we actually do; and first-rate eating they are—much better than pig."

His answer somewhat startled me, for I thought I had read a good deal of natural history and geography, and I did not recollect anything about eating opossums; but now having eaten them myself, I can assure the reader that, notwithstanding their ugly staring, gray fur, wide mouth, and rat-tail, they are actually first-rate eating. And why should they not? they live on Indian corn, nuts, &c.; and I believe that, in all respects, they are much more cleanly than the porkers. Since I am on gastronomy, I may as well add, that I have also eaten racoons, or coons, as they are commonly called in America; also a first-rate dish, much the same flavour as the opossum, and in great repute among the negroes.

On the same day I entered Maryland, I arrived at Port Deposit, on the Susquehanna—a ruinous-looking place, consisting of only one narrow street, running between a ridge of rocks and the river. Here are extensive quarries; and a great deal of stone is shipped down to Baltimore and other places. The most remarkable thing, however, about the place, is the stupendous bridge across the Susquehanna. I was nearly fourteen hours in going along it; but the reader must recollect that, about half-way over, you come to a small island, upon which is a tavern, where I stayed all night, deferring my exit at the other end till next morning. The bridge is, however, about a mile long, roofed in, with a gate at one end, where you pay toll. The tavern-keeper told me there was one still longer further up the river. Between this bridge and Baltimore, the country is undulating, road good, and the travel, upon the whole, pleasant. I entered Baltimore early on the morning of the 28th October; and, as soon as the stores were opened, called upon Mr G——, James, my old travelling companion's uncle. I was informed that he had given up business in Baltimore, and retired to the country; but that money had been sent to New York, and that the nephew was expected daily. Expecting my trunk down, with James, I thought it best to follow the uncle to the country, and wait there till he arrived; but, before starting, I took a peep at the city. Baltimore is a very handsome, stirring place, of great trade, as everybody knows, and, of course, filled with splendid stores. The most prominent object is the Washington monument, a splendid affair, and incontestably proving that Baltimore has more of gratitude than all the other cities of the Union put together; it has on this account been called the Monumental City. There is also another one, called the Battle Monument; but in commemoration of what battle I don't recollect—I suppose the battle of Baltimore. There are numerous handsome churches, among which the Catholic Cathedral takes the lead. Barnum's Hotel is a magnificent building. With regard to the streets, there is nothing very remarkable; they are neat and clean; and the main, or Market Street, as I think they call it, is a very fine, long, wide street, with the houses, in general, three stories high. The environs of Baltimore, like those of all other cities, are adorned with many handsome villas and country houses. I left the city in the afternoon, almost completely worn out by wandering up and down the streets: of course I proceeded only a few miles out of town before putting up for the night. In walking along, I came to a tree with fruit upon it, bearing a great resemblance to the large English plum. I had a good mind to eat some of them; but as they might not be plums after all, I thought it safest to defer my treat until I procured further information. This was soon supplied by an old woman whom I met.

"What kind of tree is that?" said I, to her.

"Persimmon tree."

"Is the fruit good for eating?"

"Yes; some people are very fond of them."

She passed on; and I made haste to pluck some persimmons—they looked so good. In my mouth one of them went; but not to stay long—I was so near choked. If I had flung into my throat a pound or two of powdered galls, with as much alum, the dry, astringent, choking sensation could not have been much greater. I fairly thought I was poisoned; and, of course, made many a ludicrous attempt to hawk and spit; but it was of no use, the fountains of my mouth were so completely sealed up. I have since eaten of these persimmons, after they were ripe, which is, after they have been well frosted; and then they are as full of sugar, or rather of manna, as they were before of tannin. I don't like them at all, although some people, as the old woman said, are very fond of them. They are very plentiful in some parts of the United States.

In the house I put up at over night, I saw them making buckwheat-cakes for the first time. I thought, at first, the woman was making pancakes; but, as they did not look like any pancakes I had ever seen, I concluded that she was making what the Scotch call beastin scones. Curious to know whether the Americans made the same use of the newly-calved cows' milk, I put the question to her, when she told me she was making buckwheat-cakes. The most common way of manufacturing these is, by forming the meal into a thin batter, and dropping it from a spoon upon a hot girdle, so as to form thin cakes about the size of a biscuit. They are remarkably good. I do not think the Americans make either beastin scones or cheese of the milk of the newly-calved cows—at least I have never seen nor heard of its being done. I may add here, that I never saw blood-puddings in America until I reached Louisiana. The Virginians, as far as I know them, hold the eating of blood as an abomination, and as contrary to Scripture. The Creoles, however, are not so scrupulous; and, whatever priest or Scripture may say, eat as many of the good things of this life as they can lay their teeth on, and blood-puddings among the rest.

A short walk beyond Scotenfield—the place I stayed at last night—brought me to the end of the lane leading down to the Thistle Factory, (cotton,) belonging to Fridge and Morris of Baltimore. Struck by the name, and, moreover, wishing to see the mill, I walked down to it. It is small, but well managed, and most romantically situated in a deep dell, through which foams the Patapsce, in its rocky channel. As there is little room for building in the dell itself, the store, school-house, and houses for the mill people, are built on the side of the hill—the whole forming an interesting little nook.

On coming out of the mill, a heavy shower of rain came on, which drove me, for shelter, into the house of the watchman, located at one corner of the yard. On entering, I accosted a neat-looking woman, who was sweeping the floor, and asked if I might rest a little, until the rain was over. Being answered in the affirmative, we entered into conversation; and, among other things, she said that, from my tongue, she did not think I was an American. Upon telling her I was from Scotland, and from what part, she threw down the broom with precipitation, ran to the foot of the stair which led to the garret, and bawled out, at the top of her voice—

"Oh, man, Jamie, come down! Here's a Scotchman!"

Jamie was not long in making his appearance; and, finding that we were what might be called near neighbours at home—that is, we both belonged to Ayrshire—we very soon got quite gracious. He gave me an invitation to stay a day or two with him; and, as it still rained heavily, and to-morrow was Sunday, I accepted it. During the Sabbath, a good many of the mill people dropped in to make a call—some, perhaps, through curiosity to see a wandering stranger—all very well dressed. Jamie, taking it for granted that I could not miss observing the difference between their Sunday suits and his coarse apparel, remarked that folks in general pit the maist on their backs; but, for his part, he liked to pit the maist in his belly; and, indeed, his Sunday dinner did not belie the observation, for I doubt if Fridge and Morris themselves had a better roast on their tables than he had. In the afternoon, we took a promenade down the side of the Patapsce—a most delightful walk, finely shaded by walnut trees. There were also plenty of wild grapes, the first I had seen. They are small, much resembling black currants, and make a good wine, although I can't say that I like the grapes themselves. They are very plentiful all over the southern states. On returning homewards, I observed two young lads hunting for wild turkeys. These were the first white people I ever saw fowling upon the Sabbath; but it is nothing new to me now.

On Monday, after leaving the Thistle Factory, another short travel brought me to Ellicott's Mills, among the most extensive in the Union for the manufactory of flour. Here are also iron works; and at this place the road to Fredericktown crosses the Patapsce. In two days' march, I passed through a turnpike gate, the first and the last I have seen in America. In the evening, I put up at Poplar Springs—a very good inn.

I left the above inn on a most beautiful morning, and was tripping it along right merrily, when I was overtaken by a gentleman—at least he had the appearance of one—on horseback, with a led horse. He accosted me; and asked me where I stayed last night, and whither I was going. Of course, I told him I stayed at Poplar Springs, and was going to Traptown.

"That's a long way to walk," says he. "If you choose, you may get upon this horse."

"I thank you, sir," says I. "I can't ride; and it will tire me more than walking."

He still kept coaxing and urging me to mount so much, that I plainly saw he wished to get rid of the horse; but, at the same time, in such a way as if he were doing me a favour. I did not like that; and positively told him I would not mount. We parted; but I had not proceeded far before I saw him halt, for me to get up with him. On my approach—

"Well, sir," said he, "this horse is so troublesome to me, that you will confer a great obligation if you take him off my hands."

I told him I could not ride with a saddle, much less bare-backed; but that, if I could be of any service to him, I would try.

"Oh, never mind trying," says he. "Get up, and you'll learn as you get along."

The animal was tall, and I was short; and, I can assure you, I trembled all over while I laid hold of the mane with one hand, and gave my left foot to the man to hoist me up. Up I went, however, like shot—missed stays in crossing the back of the animal, and would soon have been sprawling on the ground on the other side, if I had not caught hold of the horse by the foreleg, while the man held on to mine. Being pulled on again, and fairly balanced—but my head swimming from its height in the air—and all things, in the gentleman's opinion, in good sailing trim, we started in fine style—that is, at a good round trot. For a minute or two, all things went on tolerably enough—I can't say smoothly; for the trot was rather too round for me—but, after that short space, I found, as I anticipated, that I had got a most purgatorial job of it. In spite of my conscience, the "O Lords" and "woes" came forth thick and fast; and, to stop the swearing, my only resource was in stopping the horse, which I happily accomplished, after a few struggles at the bridle. One good quality my companion possessed, was that of leaving me behind to my fate, as soon as he himself got out of his trouble. Of course, he was soon out of sight, and I left to guide myself at discretion. When I got a sight of my man, he was about a quarter of a mile a-head, off the horse, and, in all appearance, waiting for my coming up. When I reached him, he was cutting a switch from a tree; but little did I dream it was for me, as my horse went by far too fast already. In fact, I intended to deliver up his property, and have done with him; but my gentleman intended no such thing. Like Sindbad's Old Man of the Sea, he was determined to cling to me; and, moreover, was determined that my movements, for the future, should have a little more of the "go" in them—be a little more sprightly—notwithstanding, as far as I was concerned, my movements had hitherto been sprightly enough; for, I am certain, it would have taken two men to have kept me anything like sedentary on the horse's back. I mentioned my intention of dismounting.

"Oh, no," says he; "you can't do that."

I spoke to him of my pains, of being sore all over, of being shaken all to pieces.

"Oh, never mind that; you'll soon get used to it. Here, take this switch, and touch him smartly with it."

I took the switch, but with little intention of making much use of it, although very willing to oblige the man. Some distance before us was a small town called Newmarket—a most ominous name. I was certain I would have a race of it before all was done; and the more so as the man talked of not stopping, but going through the town something like gentlemen. I told him I would go through it as genteelly as I could, but that the citizens could not expect much gentility from a man without a saddle. All things being ready, he put spurs to his horse; and, as before, never looked behind to see whether I was started or not, but rode on just as if I had been riding alongside of him, and was soon lost sight of among the houses. For my part, I was in no such hurry; and, as I had kept on the horse's back to please the owner, I was determined the horse should walk to please me; but whether the animal had some drops of racing blood in him, or was of the same mind as his master, or knew [the town, I know not; but I know the nearer we got to it, the faster he plied his legs. I flung away my switch as useless, and pulled at the bridle with all my might; but all to no purpose; yet faster and faster he went. I next let go the bridle, and stuck to the mane; and, I tell ye, we went down Newmarket sprightly enough. We went so fast down the street, that I was into the heart of the town before I ever saw a single house—the street on each side having merely the appearance of two long, dark-coloured, striped ribbons. It was flying, sure enough; but, I guess, I made a great many more fly beside myself. I only guess at it; for I did not see a living soul till within a hundred yards or so of the principal inn, where the horse began to slacken his pace, as he intended stopping there, and where all the upper windows were alive with young ladies witnessing my display of rough ridership. As I did not intend putting up there, whatever my horse might, and was, moreover, nettled at the giggling of the ladies, I thought I would let them see I was not such a bad horseman as they supposed; so, resuming the bridle, I turned my horse's head to the street; but, as bad luck would have it, there happened to be another inn right opposite, to which the horse directed himself in spite of me. He bolted right across; and, so suddenly did he bring himself to at the door, that I bolted off his back into the gutter; and so ended my Newmarket ride—a ride I did not get the better of for two months. Having gathered myself up, I took the bridle, and led, or rather hauled the animal through the remainder of the town—not waiting for the congratulations of the populace, of which it is commonly pretty prodigal, on such exhibitions of skill and dexterity. Having cleared the town, I waited for the gentleman, whom I saw returning to look for me. I delivered him his horse, telling him I thought I had obliged him enough, and he must next oblige me by taking him off my hands, as I could very well perform the rest of my journey on my own legs.—(To be continued.)

JEFFERSON'S DAUGHTER.

"It is asserted, on the authority of an American newspaper, that the daughter of Thomas Jefferson, late President of the United States, was sold at New Orleans for 1000 dollars."—Morning Chronicle.

CAN the blood that at Lexington poured o'er the plain,
When thy sons warred with tyrants their rights to uphold—

Can the tide of Niagara wipe out the stain?
No! Jefferson's child has been bartered for gold!

Do ye boast of your freedom? Peace, babblers, be still!
Prate not of the goddess who scarce deigns to hear.
Have ye power to unbind? Are ye wanting in will?
Must the groan of your bondsmen still torture the ear?

The daughter of Jefferson sold for a slave!
The child of a freeman, for dollars and francs!
The roar of applause when your orators rave
Is lost in the sound of her chain as it clanks.

Peace, then, ye blasphemers of Liberty's name!
Though red was the blood by your forefathers split;

Still redder your cheeks should be mantled with shame,
Till the spirit of freedom shall cancel the guilt.

But the brand of the slave is the tint of his skin,
Though his heart may beat loyal and true underneath;
While the soul of the tyrant is rotten within,
And his white the mere cloak to the blackness of death.

Are ye deaf to the plaints that each moment arise?
Is it thus ye forget the mild precepts of Penn—
Unheeding the clamour that "maddens the skies,"
As ye trample the rights of your dark fellow-men?

When the incense that glows before Liberty's shrine
Is unmix'd with the blood of the gall'd and oppress'd—
Oh! then, and then only, the boast may be thine,
That the stripes and stars wave o'er a land of the blest. E.

ODE TO LABOUR.

Hail labour! source, thro' bounteous Nature's aid,
Of ev'ry blessing which sustains mankind!—
Yea, Nature's frowns thy pow'r hath so ally'd,
That man thro' life need scarce an evil find
From sultry sun, or piercing wintry wind.

With wonder may we view what thou'st achiev'd,
So fetter'd as thou hitherto hast been;
But from thy trammels soon thou'lt be reliev'd,
And waft thy sons to happiness serene,
Which 'twere vain thought to contemplate unseen.

Amaz'd, we see thee, with a dauntless mind,
Into the bowels of the earth descend;
And Nature's boundless treasures, there confin'd,
From their long restingplace thou dost unbend—
Upraise to light—to human use's end.

Enraptur'd view yon beauteous fertile plain,
Late unproductive, desolate, and bare,
Where Nature vainly gave soil, sun, and rain,
Till thou did'st ply thy vig'rous arm with care,
Nor grain, nor herbage, flower nor fruit grew there.

Delighted, yonder splendid mart behold,
Or rich bazaar, where costly treasures shine;
The glare of light therein which doth unfold
The varied wealth, too num'rous to define;
They, each and all, have sprung from hands of thine!

On yon stupendous pile astonish'd gaze,
Which seems to hurl defiance to Old Time;
Each minute part thou'st form'd, the mass did'st raise,
As 'twere from chaos to a work sublime,
To shield each inmate from the changeful clime.

On yonder stately barque look with surprise,
Which dauntless ranges o'er the ocean wide;
By thee 'twas form'd—'tis stor'd where'er she lies,
Her sails thou'lt trim, or pow'rful engines guide:
To commerce spreads thy wealth on ev'ry side!

The electric shaft propell'd by yon dark cloud,
From human habitation thou'lt convey;
Thou' lightning glares and thunder speaks aloud,
We can the elemental strife survey
Unharm'd, if thou thy pow'rful aid display.

Yon gaudy, glitt'ring coach thy hands did rear,
And all the trappings which belong thereto,
The horses did supply, or steam prepare—
Produced each power, by which it onward flew:
Thy aid withdrawn, a useless thing thou'dst view!

Yon parchment deeds compactly seal'd and sign'd,
Thro' which vain idlers have usurped the soil,
Fleec'd thee and thine, by fraud and force combin'd,
And, by mere suff'rance thereon, let thee toil:
Yea skins, seals, wax thou'st form'd but to depoil.

Yon implements of horrid war thou'st made,
With which thy sacred rights are from thee wrest;
Ay, worse than all, thy dearest sons array'd,
Have held the deadly weapons to thy breast,
By tyrants forc'd, and destitution press'd.

Thy ingrate offspring—"Capital" by name—
Who should thy strength replenish and sustain,
Doth madly join all those who'd thee defame—
Thy sturdy limbs in fetters vile who'd chain,
Or fain thy life's-blood suck from ev'ry vein.

Too long, thou all productive power, thou'st worn
Contumely's garb. Yea, destitute, uncheer'd,
Too long the bitter taunt thou'st tamely borne,
Of those who've wanton'd in the wealth thou'st rear'd:—
Hail, happy change—thy arm's now rais'd and fear'd.

But tho' thy arm's in giant strength erect,
As infants', harmless, thou its pow'r will wield;
Thy sacred rights thou'lt grasp—each wrong correct,
Then act with mercy—not to vengeance yield:—
Wisdom and worth thou'lt succour—weakness shield!

AN INDUSTRIOUS ENGLISHMAN.

LAKE REMINISCENCES, FROM 1807 TO 1830.

BY THE ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

NO. IV.—WILLIAM WORDSWORTH AND ROBERT SOUTHEY.

THAT night—the first of my personal intercourse with Wordsworth—the first in which I saw him face to face—was (it is little, indeed, to say) memorable: it was marked by a change even in the physical condition of my nervous system. Long disappointment—hope for ever baffled, (and why should it be less painful because self-baffled?)—vexation and self-blame, almost self-contempt, at my own want of courage to face the man whom of all since the Flood I most yearned to behold:—these feelings had impressed upon my nervous sensibilities a character of irritation—agitation—restlessness—eternal self-dissatisfaction—which were gradually gathering into a distinct, well-defined type, that would, but for youth—almighty youth, and the spirit of youth—have shaped itself into some nervous complaint, wearing symptoms sui generis, (for most nervous complaints, in minds that are at all eccentric, will be sui generis;) and, perhaps, finally, have been immortalized in some medical journal as the anomalous malady of an interesting young gentleman, aged twenty-two, who was supposed to have studied too severely, and to have perplexed his brain with German metaphysics. To this result things tended; but, in one hour, all passed away. It was gone, never to return. The spiritual being whom I had anticipated—for, like Eloise,

“My fancy fram’d him of th’ angelic kind—
Some emanation of th’ all beauteous mind”—

this ideal creature had, at length, been seen—seen “in the flesh”—seen with fleshly eyes; and now, though he did not cease for years to wear something of the glory and the aureola which, in Popish legends, invests the head of superhuman beings, yet it was no longer as a being to be feared—it was as Raphael, the “affable” angel, who conversed on the terms of man with man, that I now regarded him.

It was four o’clock, perhaps, when we arrived. At that hour the daylight soon declined; and, in an hour and a half, we were all collected about the tea-table. This, with the Wordsworths, under the simple rustic system of habits which they cherished then, and for twenty years after, was the most delightful meal in the day; just as dinner is in great cities, and for the same reason—because it was prolonged into a meal of leisure and conversation. And the reason why any meal favours and encourages conversation is pretty much the same as that which accounts for the breaking down of so many lawyers, and generally their ill-success, in the House of Commons. In the courts of law, when a man is haranguing upon general and abstract topics, if at any moment he feels getting beyond his depth, if he finds his anchor driving, he can always bring up, and drop his anchor anew upon the terra firma of his case: the facts of this, as furnished by his brief, always assure him of a retreat as soon as he finds his more general thoughts failing him; and the consciousness of this retreat, by inspiring confidence, makes it much less probable that they should fail. But, in Parliament, where the advantage of a case with given facts and circumstances, or the details of a statistical report, does not offer itself once in a dozen times that a member has occasion to speak—where he has to seek unpremeditated arguments and reasonings of a general nature, from the impossibility of wholly evading the previous speeches that may have made an impression upon the House;—this necessity, at any rate a trying one to most people, is doubly so to one who has always walked in the leading-strings of a case—always swam with the help of bladders, in the conscious resource of his facts. The reason, therefore, why a lawyer succeeds ill as a senator, is to be found in the sudden removal of an artificial aid. Now, just such an artificial aid is furnished to timid or to unready men by a dinner-table, and the miscellaneous attentions, courtesies, or occupations which it enjoins or permits, as by the fixed memoranda of a brief. If a man finds the ground slipping from beneath him in a discussion—if, in a tide of illustration, he suddenly comes to a pause for want of matter—he can make a graceful close, a self-interruption, that shall wear the interpretation of forbearance, or even win the rhetorical credit of an aposiopesis, (according to circumstances,) by stopping to perform a duty of the occasion: pressed into a dilemma by some political partisan, one may evade it by pressing him to take a little of the dish before one; or, plagued for a reason which is not forthcoming, one may deprecate this logical rigour by inviting one’s tormentor to wine. In short, what I mean to say is, that a dinner party, or any meal which is made the meal for intellectual relaxation, must forever offer the advantages of a palæstra, in which the weapons are foils and the wounds not mortal: in which, whilst the interest is that of a real, the danger is that of a sham fight: in which, whilst there is always an opportunity for swimming into deep waters, there is always a retreat into shallow ones. And it may be laid down as a maxim, that no nation is civilized to the height of its capacity until it has one such meal. With our ancestors of sixty years back, this meal was supper: with the Athenians and Greeks it was dinner,* (cæna and δειπνον;) as with ourselves;

* A curious dissertation might be written on this subject. Meantime, it is remarkable that almost all modern nations have committed the blunder of supposing the Latin only that the hour was a very early one, in consequence, partly, of the early bedtime of these nations, (which again was occasioned by the dearness of candle-light to the mass of those who had political rights, on whose account the forensic meetings, the visits of clients to their patrons, &c., opened the political day by four hours earlier than with us,) and partly in consequence of the uncommercial habits of the ancients—commerce having at no time created an aristocracy of its own, and, therefore, having at no time and in no city (no, not Alexandria nor Carthage) dictated the household and social arrangements, or the distribution of its hours.

I have been led insensibly into this digression. I now resume the thread of my narrative. That night, after hearing conversation superior by much, in its tone and subject, to any which I had ever heard before—one exception only being made, in favour of Coleridge, whose style differed from Wordsworth's in this, that being far more agile and more comprehensive, consequently more showy and surprising, it was less impressive and weighty; for Wordsworth's was slow in its movement, solemn, majestic. After a luxury so rare as this, I found myself, about eleven at night, in a pretty bedroom, about fourteen feet by twelve. Much I feared that this might turn out the best room in the house; and it illustrates the hospitality of my new friends, to mention that it was. Early in the morning, I was awoke by a little voice, issuing from a little cottage bed in an opposite corner, soliloquizing in a low tone. I soon recognised the words—"Suffered under Pontius Pilate; was crucified, dead, and buried;" and the voice I easily conjectured to be that of the eldest amongst Wordsworth's children, a son, and at that time about three years old. He was a remarkably fine boy in strength and size, promising (which has in fact been realized) a much more powerful person, physically, than that of his father. Miss Wordsworth I found making breakfast in the little sitting-room. No urn was there; no glittering breakfast service; a kettle boiled upon the fire, and everything was in harmony with these unpretending arrangements. I, the son of a merchant, and naturally, therefore, in the midst of luxurious (though not ostentatious) display from my childhood, had never seen so humble a ménage: and contrasting the dignity of the man with this honourable poverty, and this courageous avowal of it, his utter absence of all effort to disguise the simple truth of the case, I felt my admiration increase to the utmost by all I saw. This, thought I to myself, is, indeed, in his own words—

"Plain living, and high thinking."

This is indeed to reserve the humility and the word for supper to be cena, and of dinner, prandium. Now, the essential definition of dinner is, that which is the main meal—(what the French call the great meal.) By that or any test, (for example, the time, three P.M.,) the Roman cena was dinner. Even Louis XII., whose death is partly ascribed to his having altered his dinner hour from nine to eleven A.M. in compliment to his young English bride, did not sup at three P.M.

parsimonies of life for its bodily enjoyments, and to apply its lavishness and its luxury to its enjoyments of the intellect. So might Milton have lived; so Marvel. Throughout the day—which was rainy—the same style of modest hospitality prevailed. Wordsworth and his sister—myself being of the party—walked out in spite of the rain, and made the circuit of the two lakes, Grasmere and its dependancy Rydal—a walk of about six miles. On the third day, Mrs Coleridge having now pursued her journey northward to Keswick, and having, at her departure, invited me, in her own name as well as Southey's, to come and see them, Wordsworth proposed that we should go thither in company, but not by the direct route—a distance of only thirteen miles: this we were to take in our road homeward; our outward-bound journey was to be by way of Ulleswater—a circuit of forty-three miles.

On the third morning after my arrival in Grasmere, I found the whole family, except the two children, prepared for the expedition across the mountains. I had heard of no horses, and took it for granted that we were to walk; however, at the moment of starting, a cart—the common farmers' cart of the country—made its appearance; and the driver was a bonny young woman of the vale. Such a vehicle I had never in my life seen used for such a purpose; but what was good enough for the Wordsworths was good enough for me; and, accordingly, we were all carted along to the little town, or large village, of Ambleside—three and a-half miles distant. Our style of travelling occasioned no astonishment; on the contrary, we met a smiling salutation wherever we appeared—Miss Wordsworth being, as I observed, the person most familiarly known of our party, and the one who took upon herself the whole expenses of the flying colloquies exchanged with stragglers on the road. What struck me with most astonishment, however, was the liberal manner of our fair driver, who made no scruple of taking a leap, with the reins in her hand, and seating herself dexterously upon the shafts (or, in Westmoreland phrase, the trams) of the cart. From Ambleside—and without one foot of intervening flat ground—begins to rise the famous ascent of Kirkstone; after which, for three long miles, all riding in a cart drawn by one horse becomes impossible. The ascent is computed at three miles, but is, probably, a little more. In some parts it is almost frightfully steep; for the road being only the original mountain track of shepherds, gradually widened and improved from age to age, (especially since the era of tourists began,) is carried over ground which no engineer, even in alpine countries, would have viewed as practicable. In ascending, this is felt chiefly as an obstruction and not as a peril, unless where there is a risk of the horses backing; but in the reverse order, some of these precipitous descents are terrific: and yet, once in utter darkness, after midnight, and the darkness irradiated only by continual streams of lightning, I was driven down this whole descent, at a full gallop, by a young woman—the carriage being a light one, the horses frightened, and the descents, at some critical parts of the road, so literally like the sides of a house, that it was difficult to keep the fore wheels from pressing upon the hind legs of the horses. Indeed, this is only according to the custom of the country, as I have before mentioned. The innkeeper of Ambleside, or Low-wood, will not mount this formidable hill without four horses. The leaders you are not required to take beyond the first three miles; but, of course, they are glad if you will take them on the whole stage of nine miles, to Patterdale; and, in that case, there is a real luxury at hand for those who enjoy velocity of motion. The descent into Patterdale is much above two miles; but such is the propensity for flying down hills in Westmoreland, that I have found the descent accomplished in about six minutes, which is at the rate of eighteen miles an-hour; the various turnings of the road making the speed much more sensible to the traveller. The pass, at the summit of this ascent, is nothing to be compared in sublimity with the pass under Great Gaviil from Wastdalehead; but it is solemn, and profoundly impressive. At a height so awful as this, it may be easily supposed that all human dwellings have been long left behind: no sound of human life, no bells of churches or chapels ever ascend so far. And, as is noticed in Wordsworth's fine stanzas upon this memorable pass, the only sound that, even in noon day, disturbs the sleep of the weary pedestrian, is that of the bee murmuring amongst the mountain flowers—a sound as ancient

This way, and (which, to the sentiment of the case, is an important point) this way, of necessity and inevitably, passed the Roman legions; for it is a mathematic impossibility that any other route could be found for an army nearer to the eastward of this pass than by way of Kendal and Shap; nearer to the westward, than by way of Legbesthwaite and St John's Vale, (and so by Threlkeld to Penrith.) Now, these two roads are exactly twenty-five miles apart; and, since a Roman cohort was stationed at Ambleside, (Amboglans), it is pretty evident that this cohort would not correspond with the more northerly stations by either of these remote routes—having immediately before it this direct though difficult pass of Kirkstone. On the solitary area of table-land which you find at the summit—though, heaven knows, you might almost cover it with a drawing-room carpet, so suddenly does the mountain take to its old trick of precipitous descent, on both sides alike—there are only two objects to remind you of man and his workmanship. One is a guide-post—always a picturesque and interesting object, because it expresses a wild country and a labyrinth of roads, and often made much more interesting (as in this case) by the lichens which cover it, and which record the generations of men to whom it has done its office; as also by the crucifix form which inevitably recall, in all mountainous regions, the crosses of Catholic lands, raised to the memory of way-faring men who have perished by the hand of the assassin. The other memorial of man is even more interesting:—Amongst the fragments of rock which lie in the confusion of a ruin on each side of the road, one there is which exceeds the rest in height, and which, in shape, presents a very close resemblance to a church. This lies to the left of the road as you are going from Ambleside; and, from its name, Churchstone, (Kirkstone), is derived the name of the pass, and from the pass the name of the mountain. The guide-post—which was really the work of man—tells those going southwards (for to those who go northwards it is useless, since, in that direction, there is no choice of roads) that the left hand track conducts you to Troutbeck, and Bowness, and Kendal; the right hand to Ambleside, and Hawkshead, and Ulverstone. The church—which is but a phantom of man's handiwork—might, however, really be mistaken for such, were it not that the rude and almost inaccessible state of the adjacent ground proclaims the truth. As to size, that is remarkably difficult to estimate upon wild heaths or mountain solitudes, where there are no leadings through gradations of distance, nor any artificial standards, from which height or breadth can be properly deduced. This mimic church, however, has a peculiarly fine effect in this wild situation, which leaves so far below the tumults of this world: the phantom church, by suggesting the phantom and evanescent image of a congregation, where never congregation met; of the pealing organ, where never sound was heard except of wild natural notes, or else of the wind rushing through these mighty gates of everlasting rock—in this way, the fanciful image that accompanies the traveller on his road, for half a mile or more, serves to bring out the antagonist feeling of intense and awful solitude, which is the natural and presiding sentiment—the religio loci—that broods for ever over the romantic pass.

Having walked up Kirkstone, we ascended our cart again; then rapidly descended to Brothers' Water—a lake which lies immediately below; and, about three miles further, through endless woods and under the shade of mighty fells, immediate dependencies and processes of the still more mighty Helvellyn, we approached the vale of Patterdale, when, by moonlight, we reached the inn. Here we found horses—by whom furnished I never asked nor heard; perhaps I owe somebody for a horse to this day. All I remember is—that through those most romantic woods and rocks of Stybarren—through those silent glens of Glencoin and Glenridding—through that most romantic of parks then belonging to the Duke of Norfolk, viz., Gobarrow Park—we saw alternately, for four miles, the most grotesque and the most awful spectacles—

"Abbey windows

And Moorish temples of the Hindoos,"

all fantastic, all as unreal and shadowy as the moonlight which created them; whilst, at every angle of the road, broad gleams came upwards of Ulleswater, stretching for nine miles northward, but, fortunately for its effect, broken into three watery chambers of almost equal length, and rarely visible at once. At the foot of the lake, in a house called Ewsmere, we passed the night, having accomplished about twenty-two miles only in our day's walking and riding. The next day Wordsworth and I, leaving at Ewsmere the rest of our party, spent the morning in roaming through the woods of Lowther; and, towards evening, we dined together at Emont Bridge, one mile short of Penrith. Afterwards, we walked into Penrith. There Wordsworth left me in excellent quarters—the house of Captain Wordsworth, from which the family happened to be absent. Whither he himself adjourned, I know not, nor on what business; however, it occupied him throughout the next day; and, therefore, I employed myself in sauntering along the road, about seventeen miles, to Keswick. There I had been directed to ask for Greta Hall, which, with some little difficulty, I found; for it stands out of the town a few hundred yards, upon a little eminence overhanging the river Greta. It was about seven o'clock when I reached Southey's door; for I had stopped to dine at a little public-house in Threlkeld, and had walked slowly for the last two hours in the dark. The arrival of a stranger occasioned a little sensation in the house; and, by the time the front door could be opened, I saw Mrs Coleridge, and a gentleman whom I could not doubt to be Southey, standing, very hospitably, to greet my entrance. Southey was, in person, somewhat taller than Wordsworth, being about five feet eleven in height, or a trifle more, whilst Wordsworth was about five feet ten; and, partly from having slenderer limbs, partly from being more symmetrically formed about the shoulders than Wordsworth, he struck one as a better and lighter figure, to the effect of which his dress contributed; for he wore pretty constantly a short jacket and pantaloons, and had much the air of a Tyrolese mountaineer. On the next day arrived Wordsworth. I could read at once, in the manner of the two authors, that they were not on particularly friendly, or rather, I should say, confidential terms. It seemed to me as if both had silently said—we are too much men of sense to quarrel, because we do not happen particularly to like each other's writings: we are neighbours, or what passes for such in the country. Let us shew each other the courtesies which are becoming to men of letters; and, for any closer connexion, our distance of thirteen miles may be always sufficient to keep us from that. In after life, it is true—fifteen years, perhaps, from this time—many circumstances combined to bring Southey and Wordsworth into more intimate terms of friendship: agreement in politics, sorrows which had happened to both alike in their domestic relations, and the sort of tolerance for different opinions in literature, or, indeed, in anything else, which advancing years and experience are sure to bring with them. But,

at this period, Southey and Wordsworth entertained a mutual esteem, but did not cordially like each other. Indeed, it would have been odd if they had. Wordsworth lived in the open air: Southey in his library, which Coleridge used to call his wife. Southey had particularly elegant habits (Wordsworth called them finical) in the use of books. Wordsworth, on the other hand, was so negligent, and so self-indulgent in the same case, that as Southey, laughing, expressed it to me some years afterwards, when I was staying at Greta Hall on a visit—"To introduce Wordsworth into one's library, is like letting a bear into a tulip garden." What I mean by self-indulgent is this: generally it happens that new books baffle and mock one's curiosity by their uncut leaves; and the trial is pretty much the same, as when, in some town, where you are utterly unknown, you meet the postman at a distance from your inn, with some letter for yourself from a dear, dear friend in foreign regions, without money to pay the postage. How is it with you, dear reader, in such a case? Are you not tempted (I am grievously) to snatch the letter from his tantalising hand, spite of the roar which you anticipate of "Stop thief!" and make off as fast as you can for some solitary street in the suburbs, where you may instantly effect an entrance upon your new estate before the purchase-money is paid down? Such were Wordsworth's feelings in regard to new books; of which the first exemplification I had was early in my acquaintance with him, and on occasion of a book which (if any could) justified the too summary style of his advances in rifling its charms. On a level with the eye, when sitting at the tea-table in my little cottage at Grasmere, stood the collective works of Edmund Burke. The book was to me an eye-sore and an ear-sore for many a year, in consequence of the cacophonous title lettered by the bookseller upon the back—"Burke's Works." I have heard it said, by the way, that Donne's intolerable defect of ear grew out of his own baptismal name, when harnessed to his own surname—John Donne. No man, it was said, who had listened to this hideous jingle from childish years, could fail to have his genius for discord, and the abominable in sound, improved to the utmost. Not less dreadful than John Donne was "Burke's Works;" which, however, on the old principle, that every day's work is no day's work, continued to annoy me for twenty-one years. Wordsworth took down the volume; unfortunately it was uncut: fortunately, and by a special Providence as to him, it seemed, tea was proceeding at the time. Dry toast required butter; butter required knives; and knives then lay on the table; but sad it was for the virgin purity of Mr Burke's as yet unsunned pages, that every knife bore upon its blade testimonies of the service it had rendered. Did that stop Wordsworth? Did that cause him to call for another knife? Not at all; he

"Look'd at the knife that caus'd his pain;

And look'd and sigh'd, and look'd and sigh'd again;"

and then, after this momentary tribute to regret, he tore his way into the heart of the volume with this knife that left its greasy honours behind it upon every page: and are they not there to this day? This personal experience just brought me acquainted with Wordsworth's habits, and that particular, especially, with his intense impatience for one minute's delay which would have brought a remedy; and yet the reader may believe, that it is no affectation in me to say, that fifty such cases could have given me but little pain, when I explain, that whatever could be made good by money at that time I did not regard. Had the book been an old black-letter book, having a value from its rarity, I should have been disturbed in an indescribable degree; but simply with reference to the utter impossibility of reproducing that mode of value. As to the Burke, it was a common book; I had bought the book, with many others, at the sale of Sir Cecil Wray's library, for about two-thirds of the selling price: I could easily replace it; and I mention the case at all only to illustrate the excess of Wordsworth's outrages on books, which made him, in Southey's eyes, a mere monster; for Southey's beautiful library was his estate; and this difference of habits would alone have sufficed to alienate him from Wordsworth. And so I argued in other cases of the same nature. Meantime, had Wordsworth done as Coleridge did, how cheerfully should I have acquiesced in his destruction (such it was, in a pecuniary sense) of books, as the very highest obligation he could confer. Coleridge often spoiled a book; but, in the course of doing this, he enriched that book with so many and so valuable notes, tossing about him with such lavish profusion, from such a cornucopia of discursive reading, and such a fusing intellect, commentaries so many-angled and so many-coloured, that I have envied many a man whose luck has placed him in the way of such injuries; and that man must have been a churl (though, God knows! too often this churl has existed) who could have found in his heart to complain. But Wordsworth rarely, indeed, wrote on the margin of books; and, when he did, nothing could less illustrate his intellectual superiority. The comments were such as might have been made by anybody. Once, I remember, before I had ever seen Wordsworth—probably a year before—I met a person who had once enjoyed the signal honour of travelling with him to London. It was in a stage-coach. But the person in question well knew who it was that had been his compagnon de voyage. Immediately he was glorified in my eyes. "And," said I, to this glorified gentleman, (who, par parenthèse, was also a donkey,) "now, as you travelled nearly three hundred miles in the company of Mr Wordsworth, consequently, (for this was in 1805,) "during two nights and two days, doubtless you must have heard many profound remarks that would inevitably fall from his lips." Nay, Coleridge had also been of the party; and, if Wordsworth solus could have been dull, was it within human possibilities that these gemini should have been so? "Was it possible?" I said; and, perhaps, my donkey, who looked like one that had been immoderately threatened, at last took courage; his eye brightened; and he intimated that he did remember something that Wordsworth had said—an "observe," as the Scotch call it.

"Ay, indeed; and what was it now? What did the great man say?"

"Why, sir, in fact, and to make a long story short, on coming near to London, we breakfasted at Baldock—you know Baldock? It's in Hertfordshire. Well, now, sir, would you believe it, though we were quite in regular time, the breakfast was precisely good for nothing?"

"And Wordsworth?"

"He observed"——

"What did he observe?"

"That the buttered toast looked, for all the world, as if it had been soaked in hot water."

Ye heavens! "buttered toast!" And was it this I waited for? Now, thought I, had Henry Mackenzie been breakfasting with Wordsworth, at Baldock, (and, strange enough! in years to come, I did breakfast with Henry Mackenzie, for the solitary time I ever met him, and at Wordsworth's house, in Rydal,) he would have carried off one sole reminiscence from the meeting—namely, a confirmation of his creed, that we English are all dedicated, from our very cradle, to the luxuries of the palate, and peculiarly to this.* Proh pudor! Yet, in sad sincerity, Wordsworth's pencil-notice in books were quite as disappointing. In Roderick Random, for example, I found a note upon a certain luscious description, to the effect "that such things should be left to the imagination of the reader—not expressed." In another place, that it was "improper;" and, in a third, "that the principle laid down was doubtful;" or, as Sir Roger de Coverley observes, "that much might be said on both sides." All this, however, indicates nothing more than that different men require to be roused by different stimulants. Wordsworth, in his marginal notes, thought of nothing but delivering himself of a strong feeling, with which he wished to challenge the reader's sympathy. Coleridge imagined an audience before him; and, however doubtful that consummation might seem, I am satisfied that he never wrote a line for which he did not feel the momentary inspiration of sympathy and applause, under the confidence that, sooner or later, all which he had committed to the chance margins of books would converge and assemble in some common reservoir of reception. Bread scattered upon the waters will be gathered after many days. This, perhaps, was the consolation that supported him; and the prospect that, for a time, his Arethusa of truth would flow under ground, did not, perhaps, disturb, but rather cheered and elevated the sublime old somnambulist.* Meantime, Wordsworth's habits of using books—which, I am satisfied, would, in those days, alone have kept him at a distance from most men with fine libraries—were not vulgar; not the habits of those who turn over the page by means of a wet finger, (though even this abomination I have seen perpetrated by a Cambridge tutor and fellow of a college; but then he had been bred up as a ploughman, and the son of a ploughman;) no; but his habits were more properly barbarous and licentious, and in the spirit of audacity belonging de jure to no man but him who could plead an income of four or five hundred thousand per annum, and to whom the Bodleian or the Vatican would be a three years' purchase. Gross, meantime, was his delusion upon this subject. Himself he regarded as the golden mean between the too little and the too much of care for books; and, as it happened that every one of his friends far exceeded him in this point, curiously felicitous was the explanation which he gave of this superfluous case, so as to bring it within the natural operation of some known fact in the man's peculiar situation. Southey (he was by nature something of an old bachelor) had his house filled with pretty articles—bijouterie, and so forth; and, naturally, he wished his books to be kept up to the same level—burnished and bright for show. Sir George Beaumont—this peculiarly elegant and accomplished man—was an old and most affectionate friend of Wordsworth's. Sir George Beaumont never had any children: if he had been so blessed, they, by familiarizing him with the spectacle of books ill-used—stained, torn, mutilated, &c.—would have lowered the standard of his requisitions. The short solution of the whole case was—and it illustrated the nature of his education—he had never lived in a regular family at a time when habits are moulded. From boyhood to manhood he had been enri juris.

* It is not known to the English, but it is a fact which I can vouch for, from my six or seven years' residence in Scotland, that the Scotch, one and all, believe it to be an inalienable characteristic of an Englishman to be fond of good eating. What indignation have I, and how many a time, had occasion to feel and utter on this subject? But of this at some other time. Meantime, the Man of Feeling had his creed in excess; and, in some paper, (of The Mirror or The Lounger,) he describes an English tourist in Scotland by saying—"I would not wish to be thought national; yet, in mere reverence for truth, I am bound to say, and to declare to all the world, (let who will be offended,) that the first innkeeper in Scotland under whose roof we met with genuine buttered toast, was an Englishman."

Returning to Southey and Greta Hall, both the house and the master may deserve a few words more of description. For the master, I have already sketched his person; and his face I profess myself unable to describe accurately. His hair was black, and yet his complexion was fair: his eyes I believe to be hazel and large; but I will not vouch for that fact: his nose aquiline; and he has a remarkable habit of looking up into the air, as if looking at abstractions. The expression of his face was that of a very acute and an aspiring man. So far, it was even noble, as it conveyed a feeling of a serene and gentle pride, habitually familiar with elevating subjects of contemplation. And yet it was impossible that this pride could have been offensive to any body, chastened as it was by the most unaffected modesty; and this modesty made evident and prominent by the constant expression of reverence for the great men of the age, (when he happened to esteem them such,) and for all the great patriarchs of our literature. The point in which Southey's manner failed the most in conciliating regard, was, in all which related to the external expressions of friendliness. No man could be more sincerely hospitable—no man more essentially disposed to give up even his time (the possession which he most valued) to the service of his friends. But there was an air of reserve and distance about him—the reserve of a lofty, self-respecting mind, but, perhaps, a little too freezing—in his treatment of all persons who were not amongst the corps of his ancient friends. Still, even towards the veriest strangers, it is but justice to notice his extreme courtesy in sacrificing his literary employments for the day, whatever they might be, to the duty (for such he made it) of doing the honours of the lake, and the adjacent mountains.

Southey was at that time, (1807,) and has continued ever since, the most industrious of all literary men on record. A certain task he prescribed to himself every morning before breakfast. This could not be a very long one, for he breakfasted at nine, or soon after, and never rose before eight, though he went to bed duly at half-past ten; but, as I have many times heard him say, less than nine hours' sleep he found insufficient. From breakfast to a latish dinner (about half after five or six) was his main period of literary toil. After dinner, according to the accident of having or not having visitors in the house, he sate over his wine; or he retired to his library again, from which, about eight, he was summoned to tea. But, generally speaking, he closed his literary toils at dinner; the whole of the hours after that meal being dedicated to his correspondence. This, it may be supposed, was unusually large, to occupy so much of his time, for his letters rarely extended to any length. At that period, the post, by way of Penrith, reached Keswick about six or seven in the evening. And so pointedly regular was Southey in all his habits, that, short as the time was, all letters were answered on the same evening which brought them. At tea he read the London papers. It was perfectly astonishing to men of less methodical habits, to find how much he got through of elaborate business by his unvarying system of arrangement in the distribution of his time. We often hear it said, in accounts of pattern ladies and gentlemen, (what Coleridge used contemptuously to style goody people,) that they found time for everything; that business never interrupted pleasure; that labours of love and charity never stood in the way of courtesy or personal enjoyment. This is easy to say—easy to put down as one feature of an imaginary portrait: but I must say, that in actual life I have seen few such cases. Southey, however, did find time for everything. It moved the sneers of some people, that even his poetry was composed according to a predetermined rule; that so many lines should be produced, by contract, as it were, before breakfast; so many at such an other definite interval. And I acknowledge, that so far I went along with the sneerers, as to marvel exceedingly how that could be possible. But if, a priori, one laughed and expected to see verses corresponding to this mechanic rule of construction, a posteriori one was bound to judge of the verses as one found them. Supposing them good, they were entitled to honour, no matter for the previous reasons which made it possible that they would not be good. And generally, however undubitably they ought to have been bad, the world has pronounced them good. In fact they are good; and the sole objection to them is, that they are too intensely objective—too much reflect the mind, as spreading itself out upon external things—too little exhibit the mind, as introverting itself upon its own thoughts and feelings. This, however, is an objection, which only seems to limit the range of the poetry—and all poetry is limited in its range: none comprehends more than a section of the human power. Meantime the prose of Southey was that by which he lived. The Quarterly Review it was by which, as he expressed it to myself in 1810, he “made the pot boil.” About the same time, possibly as early as 1808, (for I think that I remember in that journal an account of the Battle of Vimiera,) Southey was engaged by an Edinburgh publisher, [Constable, was it not?] to write the entire historical part of The Edinburgh Annual Register, at a salary of £400 per annum. Afterwards, the publisher, who was intensely national, and, doubtless, never from the first cordially relished the notion of importing English aid into a city teeming with briefless barristers and variety of talent, threw out a hint that perhaps he might reduce the salary to £300. Just about this time I happened to see Southey, who said laughingly—“If the man of Edinburgh does this, I shall strike for an advance of wages.” I presume that he did strike, and, like many other “operatives,” without effect. Those who work for lower wages during a strike are called snobs,* the men who stand out being nobs. Southey became a resolute nob; but some snob was found in Edinburgh, some youthful advocate, who accepted £300 per annum, and thenceforward Southey lost this part of his income. I once possessed the whole work; and in one part, viz. The Domestic Chronicle, I know that it is executed with a most culpable carelessness—the beginnings of cases being given without the ends, the ends without the beginnings—a defect but too common in public journals. The credit of the work, however, was staked upon its treatment of the current public history of Europe, and the tone of its politics in times so full of agitation, and teeming with new births in every year, some fated to prove abortive, but others bearing golden promises for the human race. Now, whatever might be the talent with which Southey's successor performed his duty, there was a loss in one point for which no talent of mere execution could make amends. The very prejudices of Southey tended to unity of feeling: they were in harmony with each other, and grew out of a strong moral feeling, which is the one sole secret for giving interest to an historical narration, fusing the incoherent details into one body, and carrying the reader fluently along the else monotonous recurrences and unmeaning details of military movements. Well or ill directed, a strong moral feeling, and a profound sympathy with elementary justice, is that which creates a soul under what else may well be denominated, Miltonically, “the ribs of death.” Now this, and a mind already made up even to obstinacy upon all public questions, were the peculiar qualifications which Southey brought to the task—qualifications not to be bought in any market, not to be compensated by any amount of mere intellectual talent, and almost impossible as the qualifications of a much younger man. As a pecuniary loss, though considerable, Southey was not unable to support it; for he had a pension from Government before this time, and under the following circumstances:—Charles Wynne, the brother of Sir Watkin, the great autocrat of North Wales—that C. W. who is almost equally well known for his knowledge of Parliamentary usage, which pointed him out to the notice of the House as an eligible person to fill the office of speaker, and for his unfortunately shrill voice, which chiefly it was that defeated his claim—(in fact, as is universally known, his brother and he, for different defects of voice and utterance, are called Bubble and Squeak)—this C. W. had believed himself to have been deeply indebted to Southey's high-toned moral example, and to his wise counsels, during the time when both were students at Oxford, for the fortunate direction given to his own wavering impulses. This sense of obligation he endeavoured to express, by settling a pension upon Southey from his own funds. At length, upon the death of Mr Pitt, early in 1806, an opening was made for the Fox and Grenville parties to come into office. Charles Wynne as a person connected by marriage with the house of Grenville, and united with them in political opinions, shared in the golden shower; he also received a place; and, upon the strength of his improving prospects, he married: upon which it occurred to Southey, that it was no longer right to tax the funds of one who was now called upon to support an establishment becoming his rank. Under that impression, he threw up his pension; and upon their part, to express their sense of what they considered a delicate and honourable sacrifice, the Grenvilles placed Southey upon the national pension list.

* Meantime, if it did not disturb him, it ought to disturb us, his immediate successors, who are at once the most likely to retrieve these loaves by direct efforts, and the least likely to benefit by any casual or indirect retrievals, such as will be produced by time. Surely a subscription should be set on foot to recover all books enriched by his marginal notes. I would subscribe; and I know others who would largely.

What might be the exact colour of Southey's political creed in this year, 1807, it is difficult to say. The great revolution, in his way of thinking upon such subjects, with which he has been so often upbraided as something equal in delinquency to a deliberate tergiversation or moral apostacy, could not have then taken place; and of this I am sure, from the following little anecdote connected with this visit:—On the day after my own arrival at Greta Hall, came Wordsworth following upon my steps from Penrith. We dined and passed that evening with Mr Southey. The next morning, after breakfast, previously to leaving Keswick, we were sitting in Southey's library; and he was discussing with Wordsworth the aspect of public affairs: for my part, I was far too diffident to take any part in such a conversation, for I had no opinions at all upon politics, nor any interest in public affairs, further than that I had a keen sympathy with the national honour, gloried in the name of Englishman, and had been bred up in a frenzied horror of jacobinism. Not having been old enough, at the first outbreak of the French Revolution, to participate (as else, undoubtedly, I should have done) in the golden hopes of its early dawn, my first youthful introduction to foreign politics had been in seasons and circumstances that taught me to approve of all I heard in abhorrence of French excesses, and to worship the name of Pitt; otherwise my whole heart had been so steadily fixed on a different world from the world of our daily experience that, for some years, I had never looked into a newspaper; nor, if I cared something for the movement made by nations from year to year, did I care one iota for their movement from week to week. Still, careless as I was on these subjects, it sounded as a novelty to me, and one which I had not dreamed of as a possibility, to hear men of education and liberal pursuits—men, besides, whom I regarded as so elevated in mind, and one of them as a person charmed and consecrated from error—giving utterance to sentiments which seemed absolutely disloyal. Yet now did I hear—and I heard with an emotion of sorrow, but a sorrow that instantly gave way to a conviction that it was myself who lay under a delusion, and simply because

—“from Abelard it came”— opinions avowed most hostile to the reigning family; not personally to them, but generally to a monarchical form of government. And that I could not be mistaken in my impression, that my memory cannot have played me false, is evident, from one relic of the conversation which rested upon my ear and has survived to this day—thirty and two years from the time. It had been agreed, that no good was to be hoped for, as respected England, until the royal family should be expatriated; and Southey, jestingly considering to what country they could be exiled, with mutual benefit for that country and themselves, had supposed the case—that, with a large allowance of money, such as might stimulate beneficially the industry of a rising colony, they should be transported to New South Wales; which project, amusing his fancy, he had, with the readiness and facility that characterises his mind, thrown extempore into verse; speaking off, as an improvisatore, about eight or ten lines, of which the three last I perfectly remember, and they were these, (by the way I should have mentioned, that they took the form of a petition addressed to the King:—)

“Therefore, old George, by George we pray
Of thee forthwith to extend thy sway
Over the great Botanic Bay.”

The sole doubt I have about the exact words regard the second line, which might have been (according to a various reading which equally clings to my ear)—

“That thou would'st please t' extend thy sway.”

But about the last I cannot be wrong; for I remember laughing with a sense of something peculiarly droll in the substitution of the stilted phrase—“the great Botanic Bay,” for our ordinary week-day name Botany Bay, so redolent of thieves and pickpockets.

Southey walked with us that morning for about five miles on our road towards Grasmere, which brought us to the southern side of Shoulthwaite Moss, and into the sweet solitary little vale of Legbesthwaite. And, by the way, he took leave of us at the gate of a house, one amongst the very few (five or six in all) just serving to redeem that valley from absolute solitude, which some years afterwards became, in a slight degree, remarkable to me from two little incidents by which it connected itself with my personal experiences. One was, perhaps, scarcely worth recording. It was simply this—that Wordsworth and myself having, through a long day's rambling, alternately walked and rode with a friend of his who happened to have a travelling carriage with him, and who was on his way to Keswick, agreed to wait hereabouts until Wordsworth's friend, in his abundant kindness, should send back his carriage to take us, on our return, to Grasmere, distant about eight miles. It was a lovely summer evening; but, as it had happened that we ate our breakfast early, and had eaten nothing at all throughout a long summer's day, we agreed to “sorn” upon the goodman of the house, whoever he might happen to be, Catholic or Protestant, Jew, Gentile, or Mahometan, and to take any bone that he would be pleased to toss to such hungry dogs as ourselves. Accordingly we repaired to his gate; we knocked, and forthwith it was opened to us by a man-mountain, who listened benignantly to our humble request, and ushered us into a comfortable parlour. All sorts of refreshments he continued to shower upon us for a space of two hours: it became evident that our introducer was the master of the house: we adored him in our thoughts as an earthly providence to hungry wayfarers; and we longed to make his acquaintance. But, for some inexplicable reason, that must continue to puzzle all future commentators on Wordsworth and his history, he never made his appearance. Could it be, we thought, that without the formality of a sign, he, in so solitary a region, more than twenty-five miles distant from Kendal, (the only town worthy of the name throughout the adjacent country,) exercised the functions of a landlord, and that we ought to pay him for his most liberal hospitality? Never was such a dilemma from the foundation of Legbesthwaite. To err, in either direction, was damnable: to go off without paying, if he were an innkeeper, made us swindlers; to offer payment, if he were not, and supposing that he had been inundating us with his hospitable bounties, simply in the character of a natural-born gentleman, made us the most unfeeling of mercenary ruffians. In the latter case we might expect a duel; in the former, of course, the treadmill. We were deliberating on this sad alternative, and I, for my part, was voting in favour of the treadmill, when the sound of wheels was heard, and, in one minute, the carriage of his friend drew up to the farmer's gate. The crisis had now arrived, and we perspired considerably; when in came the frank Cumberland lass who had been our attendant. To her we propounded our difficulty—and lucky it was we did so, for she assured us that her master was an awful man, and would have “brained” us both if we had insulted him with the offer of money. She, however, honoured us by accepting the price of some female ornament. I made a memorandum at the time, to ascertain the peculiar taste of this worthy Cumberland farmer, in order that I might, at some future opportunity, express my thanks to him for his courtesy; but, alas! for human resolutions, I have not done so to this moment; and is it likely that he, perhaps sixty years old at that time, (1813,) is alive at present, twenty-five years removed? Well, he may be; though I think that exceedingly doubtful, considering the next anecdote relating to the same house:—Two, or it may be three, years after this time, I was walking to Keswick from my own cottage, in Grasmere. The distance was thirteen miles; the time just nine o'clock; the night a cloudy moonlight, and intensely cold. I took the very greatest delight in these nocturnal walks, through the silent valleys of Cumberland and Westmoreland; and often at hours far later than the present. What I liked in this solitary rambling was, to trace the course of the evening through its household hieroglyphics, from the windows which I passed or saw; to see the blazing fires shining through the windows of houses, lurking in nooks far apart from neighbours; sometimes in solitudes that seemed abandoned to the owl, to catch the sounds of household mirth; then, some miles further, to perceive the time of going to bed; then the gradual sinking to silence of the house; then the drowsy reign of the cricket; at intervals, to hear church-clocks or a little solitary chapel-bell, under the brows of mighty hills, proclaiming the hours of the night, and flinging out their sullen knells over the graves where “the rude forefathers of the hamlet slept”—where the strength and the loveliness of Elizabeth's time, or Cromwell's, and through so many fleeting generations that have succeeded, had long ago sunk to rest. Such was the sort of pleasure which I reaped in my nightly walks—of which, however, considering the suspicions of lunacy which it has sometimes awoken, the less I say, perhaps, the better. Nine o'clock it was—and deadly cold as ever March night was made by the keenest of black frosts and by the bitterest of north winds—when I drew towards the gate of our huge and hospitable friend. A little garden there was before the house; and, in the centre of this garden was placed an arm-chair, upon which arm-chair was sitting composedly—but I rubbed my eyes, doubting the very evidence of my own eyesight—a or the huge man in his shirt-sleeves; yes, positively not sunning but *moon*ing himself—apricating himself in the occasional moonbeams; and, as if simple star-gazing from a sedentary station were not sufficient on such a night, absolutely pursuing his astrological studies, I repeat, in his shirt-sleeves! Could this be our hospitable friend, the man-mountain? Secondly, was it any man at all? Might it not be a scarecrow dressed up to frighten the birds? But from what—to frighten them from what at that season of the year? Yet, again, it might be an ancient scarecrow—a superannuated scarecrow, far advanced in years. But still, why should a scarecrow, young or old, sit in an arm-chair? Suppose I were to ask. Yet, where was the use of asking a scarecrow? And, if not a scarecrow, where was the safety of speaking too inquisitively, on his own premises, to a man-mountain? The old dilemma of the duel or the treadmill, if I should intrude upon his grounds at night, occurred to me; and I watched the anomalous object in silence for some minutes. At length the monster (for such at any rate it was, scarecrow or not scarecrow) solemnly raised his hand to his face, perhaps taking a pinch of snuff, and thereby settled one question. But that settled, only irritated my curiosity the more; upon a second, what hallucination of the brain was it that could induce a living man to adopt so very absurd a line of conduct? Once I thought of addressing him thus:—Might I presume so far upon your known courtesy to wayfaring strangers, as to ask—Is it the Devil who prompts you to sit in your shirt-sleeves, as if meditating a camisade, or to woo al fresco pleasures on such a night as this? But as Dr Y., on complaining that, whenever he looked out of the window, he was sure to see Mr X. lounging about the quadrangle, was effectually parried by Mr X. retorting—that, whenever he lounged in the quadrangle, he was sure to see the Doctor looking out of the window; so did I anticipate a puzzling rejoinder from the former, with regard to my own motives for haunting the roads as a nocturnal trampler, without any rational object that I could make intelligible. I thought, also, of the fate which attended the Calendars, and so many other notorious characters in the “Arabian Knights,” for unseasonable questions, or curiosity too vivacious. And, upon the whole, I judged it advisable to pursue my journey in silence, considering the time of night, the solitary place, and the fancy of our enormous friend for “braining” those whom he regarded as ugly customers. And thus it came about that this one house has been loaded in my memory with a double mystery, that too probably never can be explained ; and another torment has been prepared for the curious of future ages.

Of Southey, meantime, I had learned, upon this brief and hurried visit, so much in confirmation or in extension of my tolerably just preconceptions, with regard to his character and manners, as left me not a very great deal to add, and nothing at all to alter, through the many years which followed of occasional intercourse with his family, and domestic knowledge of his habits. A man of more serene and even temper could not be imagined ; nor more uniformly cheerful in his tone of spirits ; nor more unaffectedly polite and courteous in his demeanour to strangers ; nor more hospitable in his own wrong—I mean by the painful sacrifices, which hospitality entailed upon him, of time, so exceedingly precious that, during his winter and spring months of solitude, or whenever he was left absolute master of its distribution, every half hour in the day had its peculiar duty. In the still “weightier matters of the law,” in cases that involved appeals to conscience and high moral principle, I believe Southey to be as exemplary a man as can ever have lived. Were it to his own instant ruin, I am satisfied that he would do justice and fulfil his duty under any possible difficulties, and through the very strongest temptations to do otherwise. For honour the most delicate, for integrity the firmest, and for generosity within the limits of prudence, Southey cannot well have a superior ; and, in the lesser moralities—those which govern the daily habits, and transpire through the manners—he is certainly a better man—that is, (with reference to the minor principle concerned,) a more amiable man—than Wordsworth. He is less capable, for instance, of usurping an undue share of the conversation ; he is more uniformly disposed to be charitable in his transient colloquial judgments upon doubtful actions of his neighbours ; more gentle and winning in his concessions to inferior knowledge or powers of mind ; more willing to suppose it possible that he himself may have fallen into an error ; more tolerant of avowed indifference towards his own writings, (though, by the way, I shall have something to offer in justification of Wordsworth upon this charge ;) and, finally, if the reader will pardon a violent instance of anti-climax, much more ready to volunteer his assistance in carrying a lady’s reticule or parasol. As a more amiable man, (taking that word partly in the French sense, partly also in the loftier English sense,) it might be imagined that Southey would be a more eligible companion than Wordsworth. But this is not so ; and chiefly for three reasons which more than counterbalance Southey’s greater amiability : first, because the natural reserve of Southey, which I have mentioned before, makes it peculiarly difficult to place yourself on terms of intimacy with him ; secondly, because the range of his conversation is more limited than that of Wordsworth—dealing less with life and the interests of life—more exclusively with books ; thirdly, because the style of his conversation is less flowing and diffusive—less expansive—more apt to clothe itself in a keen, sparkling, aphoristic form—consequently much sooner and more frequently coming to an abrupt close. A sententious, epigrammatic form of delivering opinions has a certain effect of clenching a subject, which makes it difficult to pursue it without a corresponding smartness of expression, and something of the same antithetic point and equilibration of clauses. Not that the reader is to suppose in Southey a showy master of rhetoric and colloquial sword-play, seeking to strike and to dazzle by his brilliant hits or adroit evasions. The very opposite is the truth. He seeks, indeed, to be effective, not for the sake of display, but as the readiest means of retreating from display, and the necessity for display : feeling that his station in literature and his laurelled honours make him a mark for the curiosity and interest of the company—that a standing appeal is constantly turning to him for his opinion—a latent call always going on for his voice on the question of the moment—he is anxious to comply with this requisition at as slight a cost as may be of thought and time. His heart is continually reverting to his wife, viz., his library ; and that he may waste as little effort as possible upon his conversational exercises—that the little he wishes to say may appear pregnant with much meaning—he finds it advantageous, and, moreover, the style of his mind naturally prompts him, to adopt a trenchant, pungent, aculeated form of terse, glittering, stenographic sentences—sayings which have the air of laying down the law without any locus penitentiae or privilege of appeal, but are not meant to do so : in short, aiming at brevity for the company as well as for himself, by cutting off all opening for discussion and desultory talk, through the sudden winding up that belongs to a sententious aphorism. The hearer feels that “the record is closed ;” and he has a sense of this result as having been accomplished by something like an oracular laying down of the law ex cathedra : but this is an indirect collateral impression from Southey’s manner, and far from the one he meditates or wishes. An oracular manner he does certainly affect in certain dilemmas of a languishing or loitering conversation ; not the peremptoriness, meantime, not the imperiousness of the oracle is what he seeks for, but its brevity, its dispatch, its conclusiveness. Finally, as a fourth reason why Southey is less fitted for a genial companion than Wordsworth, his spirits have been, of late years, in a lower key than those of the latter. The tone of Southey’s animal spirits was never at any time raised beyond the standard of an ordinary sympathy ; there was in him no tumult, no agitation of passion ; his organic and constitutional sensibilities were healthy, sound, perhaps strong—but not profound, not excessive. Cheerful he was, and animated at all times ; but he levied no tributes on the spirits or the feelings beyond what all people could furnish. One reason why his bodily temperament never, like that of Wordsworth, threw him into a state of tumultuous excitement, which required intense and elaborate conversation to work off the excessive fervour, was, that, over and above his far less fervid constitution of mind and body, Southey rarely took any exercise; he led a life as sedentary, except for the occasional excursions in summer, (extorted from his sense of kindness and hospitality,) as that of a city tailor. And it was surprising to many people, who did not know by experience the prodigious effect upon the mere bodily health of regular and congenial mental labour, that Southey should be able to maintain health so regular, and cheerfulness so uniformly serene. Cheerful, however, he was, in those early years of my acquaintance with him; but it was manifest to a thoughtful observer, that his golden equanimity was bound up in a threefold chain, in a conscience clear of all offence, in the recurring enjoyments from his honourable industry, and in the gratification of his parental affections. If any one chord should give way, there (it seemed) would be an end to Southey's tranquillity. He had a son at that time, Herbert* Southey, a child in petticoats when I first knew him, very interesting even then, but annually putting forth fresh blossoms of unusual promise, that made even indifferent people fear for the safety of one so finely organized, so delicate in his sensibilities, and so prematurely accomplished. As to his father, it became evident, that he lived almost in the light of young Herbert's smiles, and that the very pulses of his heart played in unison to the sound of his son's laughter. There was in his manner towards this child, and towards this only, something that marked an excess of delirious doating, perfectly unlike the ordinary chastened movements of Southey's affections; and something also, which indicated a vague fear about him; a premature unhappiness as if already the inaudible tread of calamity could be perceived, as if already he had lost him which, for the latter; years of the boy's life, seemed to poison the blessing of his presence. A stronger evidence I cannot give of Southey's trembling apprehensiveness about this child, than that the only rude thing I ever knew him to do, the only discourteous thing, was done on his account. A party of us, chiefly composed of

* Why he was called Herbert, if my young readers inquire, I must reply that I do not precisely know; because I know of reasons too many by half why he might have been so called. Derwent Coleridge, the second son of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and first cousin of Herbert Southey, was so called from the lake of Keswick, commonly styled Derwent Water, which gave the title of Earl to the noble and the noble-minded, though erring family of the Ratcliffes, who gave up, like heroes and martyrs, their lives and the finest estates in England for one who was incapable of appreciating the service. One of the islands on this lake is dedicated to St Herbert, and this might have given a name to Southey's first-born child. But it is more probable, that he derived this name from Dr Herbert, uncle to the laureate.

Southey's family and his visitors, were in a sail-boat upon the lake. Herbert was one of this party; and at that time not above five or six years old. In landing upon one of the islands, most of the gentleman were occupied in assisting the ladies over the thwarts of the boat; and one gentleman, merely a stranger, observing this, good-naturedly took up Herbert in his arms, and was stepping with him most carefully from thwart to thwart, when Southey, in a perfect frenzy of anxiety for his boy, his "moon" as he used to call him, (I suppose from some pun of his own, or some mistake of the child's upon the equivocal word sun,) rushed forward, and tore him out of the arms of the stranger without one word of apology; nor, in fact, under the engrossing panic of the moment, lest an unsteady movement along with the rocking and undulating of the boat should throw his little boy overboard into the somewhat stormy waters of the lake, did Southey become aware of his own exceedingly discourteous action—fear for his boy quelled his very power of perception. That the stranger, on reflexion, understood, a race of emotions travelled over his countenance. I saw the whole, a silent observer from the shore. First a hasty blush of resentment mingled with astonishment: then a good-natured smile of indulgence to the naïveté of the paternal feeling as displaying itself in the act, and the accompanying gestures of frenzied impatience: finally, a considerate, grave expression of acquiescence in the whole act; but with a pitying look towards father and son, as too probably destined under such agony of affection to trials perhaps insupportable. If I interpreted aright the stranger's feelings, he did not read their destinies amiss. Herbert became, with his growing years, a child of more and more hope; but, therefore, the object of more and more fearful solicitude. He read, and read; and he became at last

"A very learned youth"—

to borrow a line from his uncle's beautiful poem on the wild boy, who fell into a heresy, whilst living under the patronage of a Spanish grandee, and, finally, escaped from a probable martyrdom, by sailing up a great American river, wide as any sea, after which he was never heard of again. The learned youth of the river Greta had an earlier and more sorrowful close to his career. Possibly from want of exercise, combined with inordinate exercise of the cerebral organs, a disease gradually developed itself in the heart. It was not a mere disorder in the functions, it was a disease in the structure of the organ, and admitted of no permanent relief, consequently of no final hope. He died; and with him died for ever the golden hopes, the radiant felicity, and the internal serenity, of the unhappy father. It was from Southey himself, speaking without external signs of agitation, calmly, dispassionately, almost coldly, but with the coldness of a settled despondency, that I heard, whilst accompanying him through Grasmere on his road homewards to Keswick, from some visit he had been paying to Wordsworth at Rydalmount, his settled feelings and convictions as connected with that loss ; for him, in this world, he said, happiness there could be none ; for that his tenderest affections, the very deepest by many degrees which he had ever known, were now buried in the grave with his youthful and too brilliant Herbert.

THE LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF MATTHEW GREGORY LEWIS.*

WHAT an ephemeral thing is a fashionable literary fame ! Bulwer has it, Monk Lewis had it, some one else will obtain and will lose it ; and thus the world wags. Monk Lewis was, at one period, as much over-rated as he is now unduly depreciated, or undeservedly forgotten. This work will help to revive the memory of the eccentric author, whose first invitation to Walter Scott to come and dine with him at his hotel, filled the future great Unknown, as he declared, with more elation than he had ever felt ; and of him of whom Byron after the kind of martyr-death of "the good-natured fopling"—the pet and plaything of fashionable circles—sang,

"I would give many a sugar-cane,
Monk Lewis were alive again."

He died, if not early—for he was above forty years of age—yet just as the higher qualities of a mind, naturally affectionate and generous, were beginning to be healthfully developed. The fashionable world, and his own vanity and frivolity, had spoiled him ; but there was a basis of real goodness of heart in Lewis ; and time and reflection were about to make a man out of the gifted fribble.

MONK LEWIS was not merely the greatest lion of his own day, but, as we think, of any modern period. Perhaps kitten or poodle might be the better term—your roaring lion rarely being the pet inmate of the boudoir, and only the occasional visitant of the crowded soirée or rout, where a great many may have a glimpse of him for his exhibitors' money. The vanity and the tastes of Lewis fitted him admirably for his vocation. He was discreet also ; and so ugly a little fellow, that there was no more danger to be apprehended from him than from any quadruped favourite, or those dwarfs with whom the refined female nobility of former days were wont to divert themselves. Lewis was one of the class of persons for whom Horace Walpole stands as the great type ; but as his birth and connexions were less aristocratic, he had more to endure, and more exertion to make, in blowing out that bubble, a boudoir reputation. That he was a man of genius, of undisciplined and extravagant genius, there can be no doubt ; and as to "the moral tendency" of his writings, what knew young Mat Lewis of morals or their tendencies, save that if gentlemen did certain things and were found out, they would be cut ; and that if ladies were not only naughty, but also very indiscreet, and did not manage well, they might be separated from their husbands, or divorced, and then nobody would visit them, and their damaged reputation might prove a bar to the proper establishment of their daughters ? His understanding was informed on these points, for he had had lessons and examples in his own family.

Who the author of this Memoir is, or how the Correspondence of Lewis—which is chiefly with his mother, and consequently "private and confidential," treating of matters of great delicacy and interest to the family—has been obtained, we are not informed ; but, in all probability, the surviving sisters of Lewis, and their families, would be quite as averse to the publication of these letters, as it appears they were to Mrs Lewis, their mother, appearing before the world as an authoress. This lady lived separated from her husband, from the time that Matthew, her first-born, was a mere youth, and her daughters children. But though his relatives, the Lushingtons and Sheddons, should disapprove of the publication, the world will gain by the free exhibition of that life behind the scenes which is so very rarely seen in biographies ; and enjoy the equally rare gratification, that the character of the hero becomes much more manly, respectable, and amiable, when seen in the deshabille in which, we fear, it would have dreadfully mortified him to have been openly represented. Lewis was far more deserving of respect in his private or concealed character than in his costume of society.

The father of Lewis was Deputy-Secretary-at-War, at a time when the emoluments and perquisites of office were of more value than they are now ; and his family possessed, besides, considerable West India property. His mother was a daughter of Sir Thomas Sewell, who was Master of the Rolls early in the reign of George III. She was a beauty, admired at Court, skilled in dancing, and passionately fond of music ; but, above all, devoted to pleasure and company. She lived surrounded by players and musicians, whom she patronized, or affected to patronize ; and her levity and extravagance seem to have alienated the affections of her husband—a sensible, and probably a stern man. Incompatibility of temper is alleged as the cause of separation, and something is left in mystery. The lady went into exile in France, and the children remained under the protection of their father. Though young Lewis never acted with indiscretion, he appears to have been, in many respects, his mother's own child. Whatever were her failings, she must have been a good-natured, generous, and affectionate woman ; and her son was most tenderly attached to her—most devotedly watchful for the promotion of her comfort and happiness, to the last hour of his life. For her solace, and the gratification of her tastes, he made sacrifices that very few young men would have incurred, even for a mother who stood far higher in the world's esteem. And this is the more meritorious, as he was perfectly sensible of her faults; which, when regard for his sisters required the painful effort, he did not scruple to lay before her. As a child, he had been her constant companion and plaything; sharing her favourite romance; listening to her ghost-stories; and making his appearance at her little concerts, and the miscellaneous parties, consisting of all kinds of odd geniuses, artists, and adventurers, whom she drew around her.

While Matthew Gregory Lewis was at Westminster School, the final separation of his parents took place; and, from that period, Lewis became as much the father as the son of his weak-minded but amiable mother. Her allowance, though handsome, was inadequate to the factitious wants of the cashiered fine lady, and these her son did his utmost to supply. The writer of the Life remarks that the petty luxuries of the drawing-room had become to Mrs Lewis of as vital importance as the air she breathed, and drained her son's slender resources to supply them. Young Lewis was by this time entered at Christ Church; and he was the only medium of communication between the unfortunate mother and her younger children. To him all her complaints and sorrows were poured out. What a painful letter for a son to have to write to a mother is the following, and yet in how fair and amiable a light it represents a youth of sixteen:—

"I need not tell you how much, how very much concerned I am for your illness; and it affords me a fresh obligation to my father. I shudder to think of what would have been your situation had he refused my request.

"Without money, without friends, sick in a foreign country! O my mother! the remembrance of you being in pain and sorrow often clouds the pleasures I enjoy; and I hardly conceive myself justified in partaking amusements, when you, perhaps, may be in want of common comforts. God bless you! my dear mother, and may you soon return to this country; where, whatever happens, you may at least have those you love, and who love you, near to assist you.

"The direction to my father's is No. 9, Devonshire Place, Upper Wimpole Street. I do not know whether I told you that it was a very good house, and fitted up very elegantly. The preparations for war paid entirely for the expense of it; and, as a war with Russia is expected, I hope he will make a tolerable year of it. I am sure no one deserves success more than he does.

"My sisters are perfectly well. Sophy is wonderfully pretty, but very little. She is so childish, so heedless, so inattentive, that she provokes everybody; and when anybody talks to her, she will cry vehemently, and play with the cat's tail all the while. She dances very prettily, has a very good ear for music, and a charming voice. In short, she may do very well, if she will. Maria improves every day; she is a charming and interesting girl; she plays really finely; and her understanding is infinitely superior to that of girls of her age. She is very tall, and has a very fine figure—she has quite outgrown me. I promise to be a remarkably little personage.

"Here I have run on to you, whilst I ought to have been crossing the Hellespont with Xerxes, or attending to the pleadings of Cicero; but when I once begin to write to you, I never know when to stop."

There was no abatement of this strong affection even to his dying hour. Lewis was thus early a writer of dramas; and one cause, we apprehend, of the sympathy between him and his mother, was her fervent admiration of every production of his fertile pen. She was at all times his literary confidant, and most indulgent critic. She was also the medium of sending his early pieces abroad, through newspapers and magazines, and she got his plays presented to the managers. One of his motives for trying his fortune as an author or dramatist, was to gain a few guineas to add to the allowance of his mother. His first attempts were neglected by the managers.

The situation of Lewis, between his father and mother, was one of great delicacy and embarrassment. The latter he loved tenderly, with all her faults. The former he highly esteemed, though affection was cooling. He held the balance equally between both. The mother was always in want of money; and, doating as she is said to have done upon her son, she does not seem to have been either considerate for him or just, when she imposed the disagreeable task of his frequently dunning a really generous father to supply her own imaginary necessities, or avert the consequences of her bad management. The character of this lady—and it was and is a too common one among thoughtless women of fashion—is displayed in this extract:—

"The date of this letter, my dear mother, will inform you that I am safely lodged in town; for which piece of news you may, perhaps, have been a little anxious. On my arrival, I found a blank sheet of paper from my father, enclosing the £20 I had requested of him; and I wish to know whether I shall send it to you by the same means that you receive this, or what other you prefer. When I had written my last to you, I recollected that I had burnt the letter from my father which I wished you to see; but I remember the particular expressions which struck me were these:—"The question is not whether you shall deny yourself pleasures to give satisfaction to others, but whether you shall continue to supply wants which perhaps are not necessary to a person to whom I have already been very liberal. If you continue to be found an easy exchequer, there will be no income I can allow you will be sufficient to satisfy their avidity who are imposing upon your mother."

"As to what you say about my calling myself your nephew, do about it as you think proper. I remember once you desired me, when in company, to speak of my father as my uncle; and you may wish me to call myself your nephew for the same reason at present; but, for my own part, it is immaterial to me. When I do not say that I have a mother living, I do it to give the shortest answer, and save myself from an explanation which must be very unpleasant to me."

Lewis was intended by his father for diplomacy; and, during the Oxford vacations, he went to France and Germany for general improvement, and to study the languages. In Germany his head-quarters was Weimar, where he became acquainted with Göethe and Schiller, and where his genius took that peculiar and un-English bias, by which it was ever afterwards distinguished. It was roundabout by Weimar that he now told his poor mother of her children, one of them a sickly boy, who pined for her, and who did not long survive. The profits of Lewis' first volume of poems were, as he intended it, to enrich his mother. It fell dead-born, and he consoled himself by an epigram. At Oxford he appears to have made some noble Scottish acquaintances; and, with them, while still very young, he visited Scotland. His first house of reception was Bothwell Castle, the seat of Lord Douglas; and, having agreeable talents, he quickly made his way into high society, being readily introduced by one noble family to another. It was at a much later visit that he first saw Scott, who was introduced to him by Lady Charlotte Campbell. The little poet and novelist, by the time he saw Scott, was at the zenith of his fame. He seems uniformly to have spent a part of his summers at Inverary Castle, where he became, at least poetically, the lover of the stately and high-born beauty, and bel-esprit of the family. Lady Charlotte Campbell was "his bright, particular star." His "Monk" had now been composed, and that in ten weeks! while he was living at the Hague as an attaché, and while still under twenty, and he was praised, but more effectually abused into fame, and became quite a rage in certain fashionable circles, and particularly among the ladies. He also got into Parliament for a Government burgh; but his genius was not towards state-craft; and his romances of evil fame, his literary propensities, and his dislike to all serious business, offended his father, who, latterly, under the influence of an intriguing woman, conceived what looked like a deadly hatred of his only son. While basking in the smiles of the fashionable world, the only real resting place which the affectionate heart of Lewis found was with his mother, in her obscure and constantly shifting lodgings. Here is part of the secret of their strong and continued attachment.

In his mother's residence, he always found a glad smile of greeting, and a heart equally ready to share his triumph or his woe. Often would he decline a seat at the courtly board, to spend a quiet evening in her society; when, after dinner, drawing his chair towards the fire, he would take some half-finished manuscript from his pocket, and read, for her approval, his labours of the preceding day. Or if a new play or opera had come out, which he imagined was likely to amuse her, he never failed to apprise her of it, and accompany her to the theatre. New books, also, he hunted out for her perusal; and, by a thousand little attentions—rendered yet more grateful to her by the comparative seclusion in which she lived—abundantly testified what he had before expressed in one of his letters, that he considered it to be "the first and dearest duty of humanity" to contribute to the comforts of a parent.

His letters to her are filled with his literary projects, and the progress made in his various compositions. He had now taken part of a little cottage at Barnes, that he might devote himself more exclusively to literature. His nominal town residence was still in his father's house. While such was his private life, and such his filial conduct towards a mother whose existence he concealed, Scott, who saw his frivolity, and who could have known little or nothing of those finer traits of mind, thus sums up his character after his premature death:—"How few friends one has whose faults are only ridiculous!"

He did much good by stealth, and was a most generous creature. Lewis was fonder of great people than he ought to have been, either as a man of talent or as a man of fashion. He had always Dukes and Duchesses in his mouth, and was pathetically fond of any one with a title. You would have sworn he was a parvenu of yesterday, yet he had lived all his life in good society. Mat had queerish eyes—they projected like those of some insects, and were flattened on the orbit.

He was the least man I ever saw to be strictly well and neatly made. He was a child—and a spoiled child—but a child of high imagination; and so he wasted himself on ghost stories and German romances. He had the finest ear for rhythm I ever met with—finer than Byron's." As to inordinate admiration of titles, there might, perhaps, have been a little common feeling between the poets; but Scott was all a man, and Lewis a dandy and a fribble—fond of seals and of all manner of bijouterie and gimcrackerie.

It was while this little man was wandering in the woods of Inverary, under the spells of Lady Charlotte Campbell, that he composed the song of Crazy Jane, which made so many crazy ballad-singers, and—immortal fame!—gave name to a bonnet. Under the name of Amoret he celebrated the lady of his love; though his passion, we trust, was not quite so desperate or afflicting as it is here represented. In those gay and charmed days, our noble Premier, then Mr William Lamb, the younger Sheridan, and other persons of fashionable notoriety, formed part of the usual summer visitors to Inverary; but the visits of Lewis were, for some years, regular.

Under his apparent vanity and frivolity there was always concealed what Johnson would have called "a bottom of good sense." Before he was twenty, we find him writing one of the most remarkable letters that ever son addressed to a mother.

"MY DEAR MOTHER,

"I was not conscious of shewing any coolness or reserve when I saw you. Believe that my affection is still as warm for you as ever; but since you desire me to tell you my thoughts, I will openly confess to you that I feel many very different sensations upon your subject. I feel for you the greatest regard, the most eager desire to do anything that can give you even the most trifling satisfaction; and, at the same time, I cannot help recollecting the pain and anxiety you have occasioned to my dear, my worthy father; and that it is owing to your conduct that my sisters are deprived of maternal care and attention, and of receiving the benefit of those little instructions and observations so necessary to make young women accomplished, and which are in the power of a mother alone to point out to them with success. You ask me how much I know of your difference with my father, and whether I could publicly make allowances for you. You suppose my father has been giving me instructions. You accuse him unjustly: he has never said a syllable to me with regard to you; and my behaviour is entirely such as is dictated by my own heart. If that is good, as yourself has often told me, my conduct must be the same; and if my conduct is wrong, my heart is the same, and it will be worth no one's while to seek to have a share of it. No; I will own to you openly, I could not declare in public that I can make allowances for you. In my heart I can excuse you, and believe that your own innocence, and the deceit of others, may have been the occasion of your errors. But these are arguments never received by the world, which is always eager to believe the worst side of everything. But let me put a case to you, and make you remember a circumstance which must speak to your own feelings:—My sisters are now at the age when their minds are most capable of receiving lasting impressions. They have been taught to regard me almost as attentively as their father; and, from my being more with them, and entering into their amusements with more vivacity than people who are not so near their own age can do, they readily adopt any sentiments they hear me declare. Can you then openly confess that you wish your conduct to be followed by your daughters? I will not say your conduct is to be condemned; but I cannot call it commendable, when I know the anxiety it has occasioned, and still occasions, to my father, and which, at your separation, was perfect frenzy. . . . You tell me that I ought to hear your arguments, as well as those on the other side. I have heard neither on one side nor the other; and you ought to consider it as a mark of generosity, that whilst it was in my father's power to have made my mind receive any impressions he chose to give it, he did not take the opportunity, but suffered me to draw my own sentiments from what I might afterwards hear and feel myself; for, in these circumstances, the heart must be the best and most impartial judge. You have put me into the most distressing and embarrassing situation in the world; you have made me almost an umpire between my parents. I know not how to extricate myself from the difficulty. I can only believe neither of you to be in the wrong; but I am not to determine which is in the right. Only believe that my affection for you is as great as ever, and that there is nothing which I can do to oblige, which shall not be done with the greatest readiness. When I am obliged not to see you, I deny myself a pleasure; and be convinced that I should not do it without good reasons. There are many reasons which make Oxford an improper abode for you. It is an uncommon thing to see a lady arrive there by herself; and as there are people who have a right to inquire into my actions, I should be subject to many unpleasant questions; and what answer would you have me give them? You wish to spend the ten pounds I offer you at Oxford, and you tell me your difficulties are over; but they may recur, and I imagine you would not wish positively to throw away ten pounds.

His stern and even implacable father, by a common process of natural affection, relented upon his death-bed; and it was then found that he had left Lewis the whole of his large fortune. One of Mat's first acts was to settle a thousand a-year upon his mother, independently of her other means; but, at the date of the above letter, and at all times, he opposed her desire of wishing to live again with his father, as he believed that, although his father consented, which was unlikely, it would injure the prospects of his sisters. The mother affirmed that the reconciliation would be of advantage to her daughters; but young Mat knew the world better, and he brings irrefragable reasons against the step.

"Your reunion with my father would certainly introduce you again into society; but still many women would be shy of coming to your house. This would be a disadvantage; but the great one is, that it would be a material obstacle to their establishment. I must give you an example of this in a conversation which I once was present at, and which cut my pride (if you will have it so) and my feelings for my sisters most severely. Lady J—— has had many slurs thrown upon her character, but she has never been separated from her husband, nor made so very public a subject of discourse. She was then the topic in a large assembly, when somebody said, 'It is very fortunate for her to have married her daughters so advantageously.' 'Yes,' answered another, 'and very extraordinary, too; for there should not be another girl in the world, before I'd marry the daughter of a woman who has been talked of so freely. This was in a large assembly; and I fear the opinion of three parts of the world are the same.'

The first announcement of "The Monk" appears in a letter from the Hague to Mrs Lewis; and the wild and indecent romance, written in ten weeks, had so furious a run, that we are told the Society for the Suppression of Vice at one time directed the Attorney-General to apply for an injunction to stop the sale! Lewis wrote an elaborate letter of explanation to his father when this clamour arose against him, and a vindication of his principles, religious and moral. And the book might bear its own excuse to the father, when the writer was, in consequence of it, "courted and caressed by the first names in rank and talent." Nor was the morality of fashion susceptible of any great damage from "The Monk," or any other book, if it be true that, "in spite of his somewhat plain features and insignificant figure, his romance made him a general favourite in the eyes of the fair—perhaps not the least gratifying reward of genius to a writer who has just completed his twentieth year." His eldest sister, who was married to Sir Henry Lushington, took care to purify his subsequent production, the "Castle Spectre," before it was submitted to the virtuous public.

Though Lewis fluttered away his life among fashionable blues, he could not endure the idea of his mother coming forward as an author; but then he trembled lest a public appearance might revive her story.

Lewis was altogether dependant upon his father, who needed not have left him a shilling; yet the part which he acted towards an equivocal personage, whether the friend or mistress of his father, does him much honour. This lady, a Mrs R——, was highly connected; and, while sowing disunion in the Lewis family, and exercising a very improper influence over its head, she contrived, by dexterity and her high connexions, to maintain her place in society; but Matthew, who loathed and despised her, would make no compromise, whatever might be the consequences to himself. His sisters were now married; but he would not permit himself to be supposed to sanction the conduct of his father to the woman, who was justly odious to the whole family. He was commanded by his father to be on good or decent terms with her; but would only submit on the understanding that he yielded from a sense of filial duty, and not from personal inclination. The feud was carried so high between father and son, that the poor mother, fearful of the future consequences of the wealthy father's lasting displeasure, humbled herself to entreat this Mrs R's influence in Matthew's favour, and in vain. He was expelled from his father's house and affections. In writing to his mother, he says—

"Nothing but absolute submission to Mrs R—— would be of the least use towards making my father endure me. She wants to separate him from me; and will succeed, by hook or by crook. I came up to-day to dine with Mrs White Locke in Devonshire Place, and found an order from my father, 'that as Mrs R—— was to dine there, I must not offend him by my appearance either at dinner or in the evening.'"

"I have never disobeyed him. I am ready to do anything but lie. The whole extent of my offence is, that I think ill of a woman to whom he is attached, with whom I ought to have nothing to do, and whom I look upon as my most bitter enemy. As to what you said about 'leaving my card;' with all my heart. I am not only ready to do this, but anything else which can be included in the proposal I have already made to him, and which follows:—'I am ready to do anything that my father chooses, provided it can be done consistent with truth.'

"I cannot 'set out anew' with Mrs R—. I know too much of her ever to be at my ease in her society: she has been the cause of almost every quarrel that has happened in our family ever since I can remember. While they were unmarried, she made the lives of my sisters miserable. She did all in her power to prevent Maria's marriage. Every one of my relations, except William Sewell, sees her in the same light as I do. Many years ago my sister refused to go into public with her; and, in consequence, the opera-box (which before they had jointly) was divided into alternate weeks. As to myself, she has professed the most decided hatred against me frequently; and how then can I 'set out anew with her?' All this I can forgive, so far as not to wish her any injury; but I cannot forget it, and thus, by putting myself in her power, give her an opportunity of injuring me."

The breach made by this woman was never healed until his father lay on his death-bed, many years afterwards. At that serious hour, her influence was counteracted. The elder Lewis left her merely a legacy of £500, but passed from a claim of sums advanced for her and her family. She seems to have been a widow.

The legitimate Mrs Lewis had always favourites, pensioners, and protégées hanging on about her. A young lady, who lived with her as a companion, and whom he wished to introduce to the stage, draws the following wise and generous caution from the more judicious son. It was written amidst the gaieties of a residence at Inverary.

"I must give you a caution about Miss L. She will find the theatre a very dangerous place for a young person. Many of the women with whom she must associate are of the worst principles and conduct; and many of the men are insolent and depraved to an excess. You ought also to be made aware that not only Sheridan is the most abandoned libertine that probably ever existed, but that Graham (though a very good-natured, worthy man, in other respects, as far as I know) passes for having very few scruples when women are in the case. If, therefore, she is to have anything to do with the theatre, you ought to take care of providing some elderly and discreet woman, to accompany her there and protect her; otherwise, however good may be her own principles, and regular her conduct, she will be continually exposed to a thousand insults. A theatre is, in fact, a place in which no woman of delicacy ought to set her foot, (behind the scenes, I mean,) unless protected by the presence of a husband. I hope you will find this kind of life answer for Miss L.; but I fear the contrary much. For a man, the case is very different."

Future letters respecting his mother's protégée, prove that he was indeed the generous creature which Scott calls him. To Scott, himself, he had opportunities of displaying kindness. He made his own bookseller—Bell, of London—publish the then obscure Sir Walter's first work—the translation of "Goetz von Berlichingen;" and he was the first to introduce the future hero of literature to the literary and fashionable circles of London, when, in the spring of 1799, Scott, now a married man, for the first time, visited the metropolis.

The family feud—of which Matthew was the chief, if not the only victim—occupies a great deal of the correspondence between the mother and the son. Mrs R. had said, that her friend (Lewis' father) only waited the death of his wife, to give her the greatest proof of his affection; and the connexion altogether, and the idea of this woman openly supplanting his mother and himself, were intolerable. His brother-in-law, Lushington, probably a prudent man, was, he imagined, gained over to her faction; though Captain Sheddton, the husband of his youngest sister, stood out. A peace was, on one occasion, patched up between him and his father; but he feared it was hollow. He writes to his mother:—

"Unfortunately, I am persuaded that this reconciliation is only apparent, and that every spark of real affection for me is extinguished in his bosom. However, I shall endeavour to make the best of it. As I knew the pleasure which this news would give you, I lose no time in conveying it to you. Mr Lushington is now Mrs R—'s professed supporter. Not contented with asking her to his own house, he came to Sheddton the other day, to persuade him to suffer Sophia to meet Mrs R— at dinner in Bedford Square, where he had kindly assembled a family party to meet her: in short, he has been currying favour with my father as much as possible, and trying to make his treatment of Mrs R— a glaring contrast to mine and Sheddton's, who will not suffer Sophia to accept Mrs R—'s invitations.

In the meanwhile, he was living between his chambers, in the Albany, and that pretty tiny cottage at Barnes, where he had the honour of entertaining the Duchess of York at a dejeuner. He occupied his time in composing poetry and dramas, and in making annual rounds of visits among the nobility. That long-famed lion-exhibitor, Lady Cork, was one of his particular friends; but he had them of all degrees of notoriety. He writes his mother:—

"Here has another great lady taken it into her head to shower down her civilities upon me. On Friday, the Princess of Wales (who, sans rime ou raison, has not spoken to me for these five years) chose to send for me into her box at the Argyle Rooms, made me sup with her, asked me to dinner yesterday, and kept me till three o'clock in the morning, and was extremely good-humoured and attentive. To-day I dine at York House, and then sup with the Princess of Wales at the Admiralty: so that, for these two days, I shall have a dose of royalty.

"I dined with both my sisters yesterday, who are quite well, and Maria dines with me to-morrow, at Barnes, to meet Mr Scott, the poet."

He was, about the same period, a visiter at Lewis an opportunity of telling his mother of a Oatlands, and a dinner-guest to the Duke of Clarence. A visit to the Duke of Bedford gives more princely style of living than he was in the habit of finding in the other great Whig houses.

I passed four days at the Duke of Bedford's very pleasantly, and was much pressed to stay longer; which I like on first visits, as it at least proves that I am not thought to have stayed too long already. The house, grounds, and mode of living, are all in a style of magnificence truly princely. We have turtle, venison, burgundy, and champagne, in profusion every day; and as an instance of the ordinary splendour, I shall tell you, as peculiar to Woburn, that at breakfast every person had a silver teapot appropriated to his own use. The party in the house was very large, and most of them not merely people whom I like, but whom I am very intimate with; among others, Lord and Lady Holland, and the Duke of Argyle. On Sunday last I came to Lady Charlotte Campbell's, in Buckinghamshire. This is a villa in a different style from Woburn Abbey, but nothing can be more beautiful in its kind. It is a long, low, white house, all over verandas, and rustic colonnades, and covered with fruit and flowers in profusion. For myself, I inhabit a small cottage, about a stone's throw from the house, consisting of only three rooms, opening into a flower-garden, and so quiet and pleasant that one would think it had been built with a view to my living in it.

The "bright, particular star" of his boyhood was now eclipsed; Lady Charlotte Campbell must have, by this time, been a widow; and we are told, that "from the embers of the poet's early passion arose a lasting and rational friendship, which found a ready echo in the bosom of her to whom it was dedicated—a friendship which remained unimpaired until dissolved by the hand of death." He, however, left her brother, Lord John, £1000 and his plate; to her, nothing.

In the following years, Lewis dramatized his "Bravo of Venice," under the title of Rugantino; composed his tragedy of "Adelgitha;" published the "Fendal Tyrants," "Tales of Terror," and "Romantic Tales;" and often lent, or rather gave his mother the money which he got from the booksellers. It might be worth some publisher's while to give the world a selection from Lewis' early poems and ballads. He has written much rubbish; but one would not willingly forget what he did to revive our ballad poetry; nor yet such pieces as "Bill Jones," "Blantyre Priory," or even "Alonzo the Brave and the Fair Imogen," &c. &c. Next to the "Castle Spectre," "Timour the Tartar" was the most popular of his dramatic pieces, and to it belongs the bad fame of having commenced that revolution which has finally converted the classic stage into a bear-garden or menagerie.

After a lingering illness of some months, the elder Lewis became so seriously indisposed, that the physicians attending him lost hopes of his recovery. In these circumstances, Lady Lushington ventured to mention her brother to her father, and to inform him how much his illness affected his son, on which he replied with kindness and interest, "Ah! he is a foolish boy." He intrusted his sister with a letter to his father, to be delivered at a fit time; and he writes to his mother from the Albany:—"My sister told my father on Sunday se'ennight that she had a letter from me to him, and that it could not but give him pleasure; but for eight whole days he has never asked for the letter or mentioned my name." The lady does not appear to have been very urgent; and it was the physicians who ultimately ventured to set before the unrelenting and dying father his injustice and cruelty to his only son. It seems not a little singular, yet quite true to the nature of a strong-minded and hard, but not ungenerous man, that all this while the whole of his property, with the exception of the legacy of £500 to the favourite, was bequeathed to the disowned son; while not so much as a token of remembrance was left to either of the dutiful daughters, who, with their husbands, had all along been on good or fair terms with him, and most studious to please him; and never, like Mat, flying in the face of his friend Mrs R. Before Lewis could have known anything of his father's settlements, and while he had every reason to believe that, if not disinherited altogether, he was very slenderly provided for, he writes thus candidly and dutifully to his constant confidant. his mother:—

You may believe that I am deeply affected by his danger; but yet I feel quite differently, I am persuaded, from what I should have done ten years ago. The recital of his sufferings pains me cruelly; but, at least, his alienation from me has spared me the agony of witnessing his gradual decay, day after day, which I really think would have been insupportable. Thus is every evil still attended with some good. At present, his illness makes me melancholy; his sufferings give me pain; I am sincerely anxious to hear of his being better. But as it is now above nine years since I have had any intercourse with him that carried with it any kindness, his loss will alter none of the habits of my life; I shall have but few remembrances of his affection; I shall not miss his place at the table, nor the morning welcome, nor the affectionate good-night. Often and often, in my early days, when I quite doated upon him, I have thought that my heart would break, if I were ever obliged to attend him on a death-bed. Nine years of constant harshness or indifference, on his part, have now made us strangers to each other; but still I dread so much the thoughts of witnessing his sufferings, that I scarcely know whether, for my own happiness, I ought to wish for a reconciliation now. To have been on such terms with him while he lived, as would have given me opportunities of contributing to make him happy, would have been worth any price; but I have done no wrong, and need not his forgiveness. In a mercenary view a reconciliation may be desirable for me, but in what other?

I have seen my father, and lose no time in telling it you, but I have seen him in a sad time. He was better yesterday morning: in the evening a visible alteration took place; now there is no likelihood of any favourable change happening again. He only said to me, "God bless you!" two or three times. I was ordered not to speak: I made it up in crying, as you may well believe. My head aches shockingly. I write to you from Devonshire Place; God bless you! my dearest mother. I have suffered cruelly this morning, and feel that I must suffer still more.

The first uses which Lewis made of his new-gotten wealth, exhibit both mother and son in a most favourable point of view. A Mrs S—, apparently a dependant relative of the elder Lewis, was not mentioned in his father's will, and he wrote to his mother—in the very letter in which he communicated the pleasant contents of the will to her—saying:—

What my circumstances will turn out, I have still no idea; but I confess the general terms of my father's bequest to "his beloved son," has justified [gratified?] my feelings beyond any sum that he could have left me; and if he meant to strengthen the claims upon me of all who are dear to him, he could not have taken a more effectual mode.

And now, my dear mother, I will give you a commission that will be perfectly to your taste. Mrs S— has formerly not acted by you as she should have done; in consequence of which, when she was in England, I shunned her; she perceived it, and therefore probably hopes for no favour from me. She is not mentioned in my father's will; her situation is, I believe, most forlorn, and his loss must be a terrible blow to her. Pray write a few lines to her, and tell her from me, that I am aware of my father's affection for her; am sensible how heavily she must feel his loss; and that I hope to find, that he has left me in circumstances that will permit me (without injustice to those who have stronger claims on me) to continue whatever little kindness he may have been in the custom of shewing her.

Poor woman! she must be in great affliction at this event. I know not her address, and therefore you had better send your letter to Sir H. Lushington. But pray write without loss of time, to relieve her anxiety. I am not quite well, but yet not ill, and rather in melancholy spirits than in a very agitated frame of mind.

Lewis, long before he came into possession of his large fortune, and while he was not in affluent circumstances, had undertaken to educate a boy, the son of the widow of an officer, who, to assist her family, became an authoress; and he afterwards provided for the young man in the War-Office. His protégé turned out a thorough scamp and profligate, who vexed and disgraced him in every way; yet his letters to or about the incorrigible young vagabond shew a degree of kindness and forbearance, and of oft-repeated forgiveness, which few fathers would have extended to a son so vicious and so ungrateful. This young man became too degraded in his habits to be intrusted with money; but, by his will, Lewis allowed him £104 a-year, to be paid to him weekly. He was, indeed, "a generous," and—what is more wonderful, when his early training is viewed—a most considerate "creature," deserving all the praise which Scott gave him.

Mrs Lewis was now permitted to give the rein more freely to her elegant tastes and charitable feelings. She was settled by her son in a pretty cottage, near Leatherhead, which she fitted up like a toy-shop. Her friends again drew round her, and the affection of her son never chilled. Soon after coming into possession of his fortune, Lewis made those visits to his estates in Jamaica of which he kept a journal, which was posthumously published under the title, "Journal of a West India proprietor." His principal object in these visits was to ameliorate the condition of his numerous slaves. He found the negroes on his estates in a better condition than he had expected. His picture of them is lively and picturesque; but amidst their revelry and gay-heartedness, the features of the slave are ever visible;—of ignorant, unreflecting, passionate, and degraded beings. Lewis, whose naturally good heart must have softened, and expanded in the consciousness of power, treated them with kindness and indulgence, which captivated their affections. They were enthusiastic in their demonstrations of love for "Massa." Justice from him—freedom, they perhaps, could scarce have appreciated.

After returning from Jamaica, Lewis visited the Continent, and lived for some time with, or near Byron and Shelley, in the environs of Geneva. He could not agree in the opinion of Wilberforce, that freedom was the right of his slaves; but, while in this society, he wrote a codicil to his will, to which his illustrious friends were witnesses, providing that his Jamaica estates should only be held upon the condition of the proprietor visiting them personally every three years, and passing three months on them. If the proprietor chanced to be a woman, she was bound to perform the condition by sending either her husband, brother, or son. The same codicil stipulated, that, if the heir to the estates did not abide by certain regulations laid down for the benefit of the negroes, the estate was to be forfeited. Lewis further stipulated that none of the slaves belonging to him at his death should be sold from the estate. The whole affair is a compromise between the strong sense of justice and benevolent feeling, and the very natural love of property; and, although Lewis did not do all which justice and enlightened principle demand from a Christian, he was so far in advance of his Jamaica contemporaries, that he deserves high praise.

Lewis made a second and fatal visit to Jamaica. Before going away, he wrote to a friend, that if anything should happen to his mother, he requested on no account to be informed. It would kill him, he said, in such a climate. He appears to have gone abroad with the presentiment of approaching evil. A young orphan girl chanced to go out by the same packet, to endeavour to wrest her inheritance from some of the Jamaica sharks. She had neither heard of "Monk Lewis," his fame, his fashion, nor his works; but he gathered her story from her own lips, and she lives to record his generous care of her interests, and great and delicate kindness.

Having learned my little history, he expressed the greatest interest in the success of my undertaking, and ultimately manifested his sympathy, by rendering me every assistance in his power when we reached Jamaica; where he not only procured for me the necessary legal advice, but, with the most unlimited generosity and munificence, offered the aid of his pecuniary resources, till my affairs should be brought into a train of settlement.

This lady gives an interesting account of his manners and pursuits on their tedious voyage; and his letter to the persons who had the power of doing her justice, speaks for itself. She was then very young, and she relates that—

Mr Lewis, whose nerves were in a very weak state, requested no guns might be fired, as is usual on board a vessel when in sight of her destination. I was, however, mischievous enough, in the joy of my heart at being near my friends, aided by some others in the ship, to set a lighted poker to the touch-hole of one of the guns on deck, and fire it off: an exploit that almost cost me my arm, from want of the necessary caution in withdrawing it quickly. I soon, however, made my peace with my offended friend, for this disregard to his nervous feelings; and in a few hours after we landed in safety.

The joy of his negroes when they heard that Lewis had arrived, evinced itself in a thousand acts of wild extravagance. His philanthropic consideration of their wants had endeared him to this simple-hearted race; and they regarded him rather in the light of a deity come to give laws, and make regulations for their happiness, than as a master whose property they were. This joy did not confine itself to the slaves belonging to his own plantations, for those on the other estates came pouring down with the rest to see "Massa Lewis," and the whole negro population in the island seemed determined to make or take a general holiday. Mr Lewis, well knowing their tastes, had stocked himself with trinkets and gilt ornaments, and many a sable bosom heaved proudly beneath the tinsel chain and pewter watch that "massa's own hands" had given. I question if the order of the garter, when bestowed by the hand of Majesty itself, ever conferred half the happiness on the wearer, as the Birmingham medals suspended from coloured strings did to these poor children of slavery, when presented by the hand of their "good mama." It was a scene of animation and universal joy.

To his mother, Lewis wrote:—

I find my estate overpays me for all that I have suffered in coming to see it. I have now been here a fortnight, (no packet has sailed since my arrival, or I should have written to you earlier,) and I have not yet found one single negro with so much as even an imaginary grievance. They were delighted to see me; but all said that everything during my absence had gone on just as if I had never left them; that all their superintendents were kind to them, treated them well, and they were quite easy and contented.

On the other hand, my attorneys declare themselves well satisfied with the general conduct of my negroes. One of them (who is also attorney for Lord Holland's estate, adjoining mine) owns that he finds it much more troublesome to manage Lord H.'s negroes than mine, and that mine work much better. In particular, they have already dug one hundred acres of cane-holes, without any hired assistance, for next year's planting, while Lord H.'s have not dug one acre, although he has forty negroes more, and pays near £400 a year for hired labour besides.

If all this had been written to me, I should not have believed a word of it; but I see it with my own eyes, and shall leave the island with a heart a thousand pounds lighter.

He went, at an unhealthy season, to visit an estate which he had not yet seen, but which was represented as a perfect paradise. He found it "an absolute hell." He effected a complete and speedy revolution—turned away overseer and book-keepers—redressed grievances, and granted indulgences—and did whatever he could "to secure the poor creatures from further ill-usage." In the midst of these exertions, he caught the Jamaica fever, which was prevalent, and to which he soon afterwards fell a martyr, at the beginning of the homeward voyage. The passengers and crew were nearly all sick, and Lewis was but one of the victims. The young lady, who had gone out with him a stranger in the same ship, was now returning home, having got her affairs arranged. She was very ill herself; but, from her melancholy recollections, draws a pathetic account of the last days of "Monk Lewis," and of his burial at sea. Few passages of the highest wrought fiction are, we think, more touching than her simple narrative:—

I last saw Mr Lewis about nine on the evening before I retired for the night, and promised to call out, to those who were watching in the outward cabin, the half-hour when he was to have a medicine given him. I did so. At two o'clock I heard him say, "Thank you, thank you!" All that night his groans were dreadful; I could only lie in my berth and listen to them, for illness rendered me powerless. By degrees, his moanings subsided into low convulsive sobs; they grew fainter and fainter, and became calmed into a gentle breathing, as though the sufferer slept. I was worn out, and lost all consciousness. From this state of stupor (for I can hardly call it sleep) I was roused by the steward, at a little past four on the morning of the 14th of May, calling me by name. He came to inform me that "Mr Lewis was no more."

With all the decencies that can be observed on such an occasion, the corpse of our lamented and regretted fellow-passenger, having been placed in a proper coffin, at that impressive sentence in the form of burial at sea, "We commit our brother to the deep!" was gently lowered into its ocean-tomb. Never shall I forget the sound of the splashing waters, as, for an instant, the ingulfing wave closed over his remains!

"Oh! that sound did knock Against my very heart."

The coffin, encased in its shroud-like hammock, rose again almost immediately; the end of the hammock having become unfastened, and the weights which had been enclosed escaping, the wind getting under the canvass acted as a sail, and the body was slowly borne down the current away from us, in the direction of Jamaica.

I remained on deck straining my eyes to watch, as it floated on its course, the last narrow home of him who had, indeed, been my friend; till—nearly blinded by my tears, and the distance that was gradually placed between the vessel and the object of my gaze—it became like a speck upon the waters, and I saw it no more!

Such is the sketch I have been able to afford of my acquaintance with this warm-hearted man. It is an incident in my life that I shall ever recur to with feelings of the deepest gratitude, mingled with regret for the untimely loss of a friend, whose character, I think, was never duly appreciated or properly understood; and whose eccentricities were more frequently canvassed and wondered at, than the goodness of heart and benevolence of purpose acknowledged, which was hidden beneath the singularities of his genius.

We could not leave the memory of Lewis with a more grateful impression on the mind of the reader, than is made by this lady's simple statement. It completely vindicates our opinion of Lewis—the dandy and fopling—the pet lion—having participated in a finer nature than either his writings or his position in society indicate. We must be pardoned for having, in this notice, left out everything that is merely amusing, or of literary interest, to give place to what is characteristic and genial. A piece of genuine biography rarely comes before us, and this, however imperfect, is real.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Historical Memorials relating to the Independents and Congregationalists: From their Rise to the Restoration of the Monarchy, A. D. 1660. By Benjamin Hanbury. Vol. I. 8vo. Pp. 588. London. 1839.

This is a work of very profound research and accurate information—the result of a long-continued and thoroughly con-amors endeavour to gather up the scattered fragments of denominational literature and history, which the fury of persecution and the tooth of time have spared to the religious body of which the author is a member. It is not so much a formal history of the Independent sect in England, as a connected series of notices of the character, conduct, and fortunes of its more distinguished founders and leaders up to the period specified on the title-page; of the opinions they held, the works they composed, the controversies in which they were engaged, the successes or failures with which they met, and the influence each appears to have exercised, so far as that can be traced, upon the fates of his party, or upon the age in which he lived. Mr Hanbury has sought to accomplish this object, chiefly by presenting his readers with copious extracts from works written and published at the time of which his narrative treats, many of which are so scarce, that none but such indefatigable collectors and inquirers as Mr H. so much as know of their existence. If this render his work less attractive to the more general reader, it will vastly enhance its value to the careful student of English history, whether Ecclesiastical or Civil. Little has hitherto been known of the internal history of the somewhat unobtrusive, but, withal, powerfully operative body to which this work relates; and this, not from indifference to the influence they have had upon the progress of civil and social improvement in England—for this no inquirer who makes the slightest pretensions to impartiality can overlook—but from the comparative deficiency of adequate materials for the formation of a full and correct detail of their affairs and fortunes. That deficiency is now in a great measure supplied in the work before us; at any rate, sufficient materials are now before the world to enable every one to form a correct opinion of the peculiarities by which the Independents are distinguished, and of the circumstances under which they have arisen to their present place among the religious denominations in this country. We congratulate Mr Hanbury on the manner in which he has discharged his labour of love and duty, and most cordially with him rejoice in his “having drawn from their long night of repose, treasures inestimable, retaining the charms of pristine freshness; relics of mind and conduct in bygone ages, and testimonies of superior wisdom, though not always,” as he honestly adds, “of perfect sobriety.”

The Iniquities of the Opium Trade with China.

By the Rev. A. S. Thelwall of Trinity College, Cambridge.

The Celestial Dynasty, assuming opium to be a most deleterious drug—destructive of the health and morals of its consumers, and, moreover, draining the empire of its silver and gold coin—have forbidden its use, under severe penalties, and prohibited its cultivation and importation. European cupidity, on the one hand, and the fondness of the Chinese people for opium, on the other, set penalties and prohibitions at defiance; and a most lucrative new branch of trade between India and China is, smuggling in the opium now extensively raised in Bengal, in spite of the laws and regulations of the empire, and, as Mr Thelwall labours to shew, in violation of the laws of morality and religion. He makes out a strong case—that is, admitting opium to be really the pernicious commodity described, and likewise, that severe prohibitions are the best way to put down smuggling, or prevent the taste for opium or anything else from spreading. Was not as much said against tobacco, tea, coffee, nay, even potatoes, on their first introduction, as is now said against opium, one of the best medicines that is known, though, haply, like every other sublunary blessing, liable to excessive abuse. If, however, the facts, collected from different and apparently authentic sources, by which Mr Thelwall supports his case, are admitted, we do not see upon what pretext the opium trade with China can be defended, independently altogether of its being illicit. We should feel comparatively little shame or remorse at our India merchants smuggling all innocent and useful commodities into China, desired by the people, whatever the Emperor might decree about their admission. The boldness and effrontery with which the trade is carried on, in defiance of the government, must be exceedingly irritating; but it may have the effect of teaching them a more liberal policy in dealing with their multitudinous subjects. We may now fairly anticipate an anti-opium agitation in England, and then the truth will be sure to come out.

Floreston; or, The New Lord of the Manor.

We would approve this “Tale of Humanity” for its benevolent purpose, although it possessed no other merit. It is a kind of Radical and philosophical romance; and, although Floreston is not quite our Utopia, a great deal too much depending upon the personal character of the Lord of the Manor for the time being, and his wife, to ensure the continued working of the new system, there is very much to love and admire in its details, and much truth and beauty in the faithful painting of the village characters, both in their original and their renewed state. One family, that of the old miller, whose daughter the Lord of Floreston marries, is quite a gem. We ought to take a special interest in the manor and its inhabitants, as we perceive that many of our most valued contributors have lately been paying a visit to the philanthropic Dove-dale, and inspecting his farms, schools, concert-rooms, &c. We wish we could at present give an ampler account of this unique work, which possesses very considerable literary merit, besides its higher moral purposes. Though it is not precisely our Utopia, how happy would England be to possess such villages! Here the labourers are paid five shillings a-day; the children are as well instructed, docile, and well-conditioned, as those educated in one of Mr Owen’s imaginary parallelograms; the aged poor are brought home from the Union Bastille, and most tenderly cared for; there are no paupers—the very name is unknown; no sectaries; no bad neighbours; no sporting characters or qualified gentlemen, save the rat-catcher. The basis of the system is Christianity; and the rector of the Established Church is the only religious instructor. Christianity is held to be the perfection of humanity and good manners. There is, in brief, much to commend, both in the spirit and management of this tale, of what the rural life of England might be, if the great did their duty. We give a short specimen of the work, premising that it belongs more to the instructive than the entertaining portions:—

There is, in all parts of the world, some real or imaginary standard of human improvement, beyond which it is deemed unsafe to venture; and in these happy realms of Great Britain and Ireland, that standard, that happy distinction, is generally allowed to be lodged in the landed aristocracy.

And of the importance attached to the subject of human improvement, without which all other improvements are valueless, by the most eminent of that class, some idea may be formed from the prizes offered by an associated body of them, calling themselves “The Agricultural Society,” in some very long and dull advertisements in the public newspapers, so recently as August, 1838. The Right Honourable Earl Spencer (a name not to be mentioned without a feeling of respect) was announced as the chairman, followed by a numerous committee of dukes, and other dignified persons. They offered many and splendid prizes for the best essays that should be written on black caterpillars, sowing-ploughs, the stall-feeding of oxen, weeds, gypsum, smut, and other similar branches of patrician study.

In the mean time, be it remembered, that all these great people have extensive estates, in various parts of the land, with men upon them, more or less in a state of personal, social, and moral degradation; yet no prize do they offer for any essays on the simplest and best means to better their condition, although, in ameliorating that condition, they would best consult their own dignities, secure and render far more valuable their own property, and invest themselves, each in his locality, with that moral strength, which can alone enable them to ward off the rude shocks and assaults which the times, and their own works, are assuredly preparing for them.

All their prizes, like the above, have reference to the production of fat, and to the making and saving of money;

but nothing beyond. And though the condition of man is daily becoming more and more anomalous, not a farthing do they offer in the way of prizes for essays to promote his moral or bodily health. Nothing to dispel any of his old and dangerous errors; nothing to dry up tears, nor to soothe aching hearts. Maggots, with them, are of more importance than men. For them, human comfort and human improvement have already advanced quite far enough; and, indeed, though the lords of the soil advance in the natural onward course of events, unless they advance as leaders, in one step more they must be left behind, which would be a great social calamity: for whatever may be said of the importance of a working, a commercial, or manufacturing class, the importance of a refined, wealthy, influential, located, and leisure class is still greater. And the objects of this history, and of the various observations with which it is interspersed, are to supply rational answers to those important questions—How can peace and order be placed on the surest foundation? How can property be rendered most secure? How can the influence of high rank be rendered most exemplary, permanent, and beneficial to all? And how ought the leisure of the leisure classes to be spent? Certainly, it must not be a feudal, a priestly, an Egyptian, a lazy leisure; not a powder-and-shot leisure; nor a profligate, stall-fed selfish, barbarous, nor destructive leisure: in short, a leisure class neither can nor ought to exist, but by an exemplary, refining, and conciliating influence over all other classes.

But it will be said, "The landed aristocracy do attempt to improve the condition of their poor tenants, sometimes!" They do; but to describe their ideas of improvement, would be to fill up a page of this book very disagreeably and unprofitably, besides appearing disrespectful and ungenerous towards a body of persons, who, notwithstanding their rank and wealth, are really, owing to the bad education of their youth, to the stupefying flatteries which beset their maturity, to their constant subjection through life to a variety of tyrannical customs, and to all kinds of deteriorating habits and prejudices, very much to be pitied.

And the penalties for attempting to live, as too many of them do, in a state of warfare against all the better affections of Humanity, are as well known as any other facts in history, sacred or profane. For in their latter days, the most magnificent of tyrants have had the most to say upon the subject of vain glory; their own insouciance having fearfully recoiled upon them, piercing them through with bitter and deadly sorrows. It will therefore be more befitting the office of a historian, to pursue the narrative; to leave the reader, as far as may be, to draw his own conclusions, and to make such applications only as candour shall appear to warrant.

The improvements which this history was undertaken to describe and to suggest, must now be supposed to be advancing more rapidly than the history itself. Work was now abundant in Floreston. Labour, in fact, had become a profession, and a profession not without honour and profit. Labourers were now enabled to pay rents; and, as payers of rents, were entitled to have, and were accommodated with, neat residences. Such were provided for them in great variety; small, but replete with conveniences. They were set upon high ground, a good distance apart; each surrounded with its little garden, and by all that is gay and fragrant; so that, in summer, it was a flowery bower. The eye once habituated to simple elegances, the mind takes its tone from external objects; and for every refined and generous sentiment that a labouring man shall be encouraged to cultivate at his home, abroad he will display ten virtues that have grown out of it.

Personal filchiness soon became horrible, even in contemplation. The labourers washed themselves all over in cold water, in a morning, (for which, and their evening ablutions, every cottage was provided with a convenience at once simple and effectual,) all the year round, before going to their work;—a simple, but invaluable privilege, which the All-bountiful has given us, whereby to guard ourselves against that slavishly-dreaded calamity, called "catching a cold." And on their return from work in the evening, by a detersive warm-water ablution, they removed those concentrated animal effluvia, which are formed into a kind of crust of chilled perspiration upon the surface of the epidermis, or outer skin, of the toilsome labourer—an insidious but active poison.

Fair Rosamond, an Historical Romance.

This traditional Beauty has been the subject of poems, tragedies, and paintings innumerable, but for the first time of a romance. The fact is, in the present dearth of themes, rather surprising. Fair Rosamond is an improvement on the author's "Royston Gower." His handling is broader and freer, and he has been more successful in interesting the sympathies of his reader, for his frail but lovely heroine. By a pardonable license, he has indeed saved her honour, at the expense of making Henry II. a bigamist. The King is secretly wedded to the daughter of the Earl of Clifford, from passionate love, which knew no abatement; but he afterwards, it seems, married Queen Eleanor from motives of ambition. The author has, moreover, endowed the secluded mistress with every feminine grace and attribute of sweetness and tenderness. The career of Becket contributes to the interest of a story of the school of Ivanhoe, and one which we venture to think will be highly popular among young romance readers. It contains all the elements of ordinary popularity.

The Banished,

Is the translation of a clever German historical romance, professedly of the school of Scott. The translator thinks that the waters of the Tweed cannot reflect a more brilliant hue than those of the Danube and the Neckar; nor the hills of Scotland be clothed with a lovelier green than the mountains of the Hartz or the Taunus, or the heights of the Black Forest; and that the maidens of Germany are as fair as those of "our own romantic land." No one will dispute it; nor yet the author's belief that Germany is not less rife in romantic events than other countries, and especially, can match the world in civil wars and intestine strifes. The period he has selected, is the struggle between Ulrich Duke of Wurtemberg and the Swabian League. As in "Waverley" or "Old Mortality," public events and characters are subsidiary to the personages of fiction, and to the interests of private life. The author has been no unprofitable reader of Wallenstein; and his fidelity to the costume and manners of the period delineated, is scrupulous even to homeliness. The romance seems well translated, and is well worthy of wearing an English garb. It is edited by Mr Morier, after the new, and we venture to think, idle custom of certain fashionable publishers, who fancy that a blazoned or an illuminated title-page is greatly ornamental to a work.

Argentine

Is an elegantly written tale, or fictitious autobiography, though its materials are neither very original nor peculiarly well chosen. The villain is a very black villain; the heroine, the most lovely and gentle of womankind; the father, all the benevolent gentleman; and the Jesuit, exactly like a thousand and one counterparts of Jesuitry. Matters proceed much in the ordinary course; and all ends well.

Temperance Rhymes. "Inscribed to the Working Men of Manchester, in the hope that they may act as another small weight on the right end of that lever which is to raise them in the scale of humanity." Simpkin, Marshall, & Co., London.

To the working men of every town and rural district in England, Ireland, and Scotland, we recommend the perusal of this excellent little work. We extract one from among the many vivid pictures which it presents of the appalling consequences of indulging in the vice of intemperance :—

Though no blood is on my hand
There is murder on my soul ;
And a pale, pale spectro-band
Round my pillow nightly roll !
First, there comes my martyred wife,
With her gentle face of woe,
As it look'd when, " Out of life,"
Faintly sighed she, " I must go ;"
When so tenderly she told me
The past was all forgiven ;
And she pray'd she might behold me
In the happy homes of heaven !
Next there comes my little Jane,
With her wan and shadowy face,
Whereon the hands of pinching pain
And want have left their trace ;
Just so as in her tiny shroud,
Like a snow-drop, crushed, she lay,
When sobbing, Neddy cried aloud,
" Not take poor Jane away."
With a sterner look, too, he
By his little sister stands—(Him they sent across the sea,
And he died in distant lands.)
'Tis the look he had that day,
When before the judge he said,
" Father drinks my wage away—Hunger made me steal the bread."
Never more comes round to me
Night with pleasant slumbers bleat ;
Still these phantom shapes I see—
Still they trouble all my rest.

See ! they come, they come again !
Whither, whither shall I flee ?
Flee ? alas ! 'tis all in vain,
Till I flee from memory !

I. Westmoreland and Cumberland Dialects.

II. John Noakes and Mary Styles, a Poem in the Essex Dialect.

III. Grose and Pegge's Provincial Glossary.

We have classed these three works together, as they have a common character. Captain Grose's work is well-known. A supplement, by Samuel Pegge, Esq., in some respects a congenial spirit, is now first incorporated with the glossary. " John Noakes and Mary Styles ;" or an " Essex's Calf's" visit to Triptree Races, is the composition of Charles Black, Esq., of Great Totham Hall, Essex. It will be a sealed book to many, though the dialect presents no great difficulty to those acquainted with the spoken language of the eastern coasts, from the mouth of the Thames to the mouth of the Dee or the Spey. The poem possesses considerable humour. The dialects of Westmoreland and Cumberland are happily illustrated in a large collection of local poems and songs, intermixed with dialogues, the productions of various modern provincial bards and minstrels.

History of the Dukes of Normandy, from the Time of Rollo to the Expulsion of King John.

By Jonathan Duncan, Esq.

This volume is intended to supply a deficiency in our historical literature. It is meant to portray the English sovereigns, of the Norman and Plantagenet line, in their character of Dukes of Normandy, with only an incidental or subsidiary notice of their higher office. The history, from its narrow limits, is either a mere outline, or often meagre ; and it goes less deeply into Norman literature and the state of the arts than we could have desired.

Hints on Horsemanship, to a Nephew and Niece, on the Common Sense and Common Errors of Common Riding.

A well-concocted treatise this, by a master of the subject, who is an officer of high rank in the Life Guards ; but, as he does not choose to give his name, neither shall we blazon it, though we consider it a guarantee for the practical soundness of the hints and directions, and for the judiciousness of the author's remarks on all branches of the manège. The single hint we copy out, if a homely, may yet prove a useful one. After some excellent observations on the humanity, and we should say the intelligence, with which young horses ought to be trained, and enjoining the necessity for abundant fresh air abroad, and for ventilation in the stable, it is said—

" Horses, in grazing, must doubtless swallow much earth. Those fed in stables, and feeding only on hay and oats, will often, if allowed, when out, seize any opportunity to eat earth ; or, when first unbridled in the stable, will lick every particle of it off their feet ; or, if they can get at the wall, will lick the white-wash off it. I think all horses should have a lump of rock-salt, and a lump of chalk, laid in their mangers ; and I very much doubt, whether, with this exception, they should, in any case, have any medicine whatever." The author considers that the diseases and unsoundness of horses are almost always owing either to too close confinement in ill-ventilated stables, or too much work ; and he particularly deprecates the use of all the patent horse-medicines. The little book is most elegantly printed, and embellished with equestrian groups, from the frieze of the Parthenon among the Elgin marbles.

Tour through Holland and Belgium, in the Autumn of 1838. By William Chambers.

This Tour contains a great mass of useful and popular information, given at first hand, and interspersed with many judicious reflections on the variety of objects which fell under the traveller's observation. Many of these were important, as Mr Chambers made a point of examining schools, manufactures, and public institutions, and other useful objects, which ordinary tourists too often neglect. The less need be said of the work, as it has already appeared in Chambers' widely circulated Journal ; and is so cheaply reproduced, as to be easily accessible to the People, for whom Chambers' meritorious cheap editions are chiefly intended.

The Life-Book of a Labourer. By a Working Clergyman.

These sketches are the production of the leisure hours of an amiable rural priest—albeit a desperate Tory and High Churchman. They are varied in their topics and interests ; and some of them embody either the real experiences of the author, or contain the reminiscences of those eminent persons whom the world would not willingly forget, with whom he and his friends have been connected. Among the personal sketches are notices of Coleridge, Robert Hall, and the late Mrs Fletcher, better known as Miss Jewsbury. What an unsentimental conclusion is the following to her romantic history :—

Her marriage excited the most unqualified astonishment of all who knew her. Mr Fletcher, though probably a very worthy person, was, in appearance, habits, and address, the very last man it was likely M. J. J. would have admired. She gave the strongest proof of her affection for him by accompanying him to India, whither he was going as Chaplain ; and he gave—so his friends affirm—the strongest proof of his affection for her, by marrying within eight months after her decease. . . . She died very soon after her arrival in India ; and Mr Fletcher, it is said, never wrote to her friends to apprise them of their bereavement. . . . It is, unquestionably, a fact, that no letter from Mr

Fletcher ever reached her friends, to apprise them of her demise; and, in the absence of all intelligence from an authentic source, they, with fond incredulity, persuaded themselves the report was groundless. At length Captain Biden, who took her out to India, returned from his second voyage, with the announcement that she had ceased to exist, and that he had married again.

The sketches are dedicated to Lord Lyndhurst, who will, probably, see nothing to wonder at in Mr Fletcher losing no time in choosing for himself a second helpmate; and who may, probably, consider as somewhat innocent the little stories, which we regard as amiable and pleasing, despite certain narrow views and small prejudices of their author.

Spencer's Travels in Circassia.

We see, with satisfaction, the third edition of a work from which we have received much pleasure. These travels have the zest and freshness which belonged to books of travels two centuries ago; when all was novel and delightful in the new lands and new races to which home-staying folks were for the first time introduced. Captain Spencer has improved this edition, especially to the politician, by the introduction of a considerable quantity of new matter, and of interesting speculation upon Russian policy, and the later events in the history of the patriotic struggle of the brave Circassians, for fatherland and national independence.

Urquhart's Spirit of the East.

A second edition of this singular book has appeared before we have had an opportunity of noticing the first. A review now would be somewhat tardy and uncalled for. We merely notice that, to be "not of the circumcision," or rather not of the Mussulman lineage and faith, the mind of Mr Urquhart is more deeply and thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Orientalism than any native of Western Europe who ever appeared before the public. He pushes his admiration to the extreme of bigotry. Compared with his beau idéal of an eastern gentleman, he seems to regard those of the tight garments, the abrupt and unsettled manners, and the round hat, much as a Yankee trader. He bears testimony to the fidelity of Lady Mary Wortley's delineations of Turkish manners, and describes Mr Lane's late admirable work on Egypt, as not only superior to all others, but the only book, in a European language, which correctly represents Eastern manners. Hold him to his word; and Mr Lane's delineation of Mr Urquhart's admired institutions, customs, usages, elaborate courtesy, and rigid etiquette, do not offer much to charm sober-minded Europeans.

Mrs Hemans' Poems.

The admirers of Mrs Hemans' poetry will be gratified to learn, that the first complete edition of her works is issuing in monthly volumes, and will be comprehended in six. The first volume is neatly occupied by a memoir of the poetess, written by her sister, in the tone and manner which was to be expected, and perhaps to be desired, from the near and tender relationship between the authoress and her subject. The work may take its place, from neatness and elegance, with any of the late serial editions of modern popular poets. It is published by Messrs Blackwood, and printed at the Ballantynes' press. It will form a most desirable addition to the drawing-room book-shelves and the lady's library.

The Countess of Blessington's Reflections and Desultory Thoughts.

A pretty little book for a lady's table, which does much credit to the Countess's neat and epigrammatic wit, and more honour to her solid judgment and knowledge of life and manners.

Answers to the objections commonly brought to Vaccination. By John Robertson, lately Senior Surgeon in the Manchester Lying-in Hospital, &c.

We should not have considered a treatise of this sort called for in our day; but as there seems no termination to the reign of ignorance and prejudice, there ought, consequently, to be none to the efforts of the humane and enlightened, in exposing error, and illuminating stupidity. The pamphlet contains nothing new to medical men, but, nevertheless, much that may be popularly useful.

A Tour in Connaught, &c., &c. By the Author of "Sketches in Ireland."

It was understood that Mr Cæsar Otway—not the author of "Venice Preserved, or a Plot Discovered"—was the author of the "Sketches in Ireland." Were Mr Otway not so very Orange—or, to speak it more gently, not so very Irish in his Protestantism—we should have accompanied him on his Ramble in Clonmacnoise, the Joyce country, and Achill, with unalloyed pleasure. To others, his tendency to discover, if not plots, yet the seeds of discords, stratagems, and spoils, may prove no objection; while his lively style and good humour, if not good nature, which is a very different quality, may recommend him to many as a westward guide or travelling companion. Mr Otway has the advantage of being previously well acquainted with the country which he traverses; and, besides being thoroughly Irish, he is well-informed, particularly in the legends, and traditionary, and imaginative stories of his country. Having premised that the illustrative wood-engravings are desperately hard and timber-toned, we shall stimulate the curiosity of readers with a few racy letter-press specimens of a tour in the most picturesque part of Ireland, by an Irish gentleman.

WELLINGTON'S YOUNG DAYS.

The Boyne flows lazily here amidst sedge and reeds—appearing but the dark drain of an immense morass—the discharge of the waste waters of the Bog of Allen. A strong position in time of war—Lord Wellington knows it well—he has often had his soldier eye upon it, his paternal mansion, Dangan, being not far off to the right, near Trim. How different was the young, fun-loving, comical, quizzing, gallanting Captain Arthur Wellesley, when residing in his shooting-lodge between Summerhill and Dangan, from the stern, cautious, careworn Fabius of the Peninsular War; the trifling, provoking, capricious sprig of nobility—half-dreaded, half-loated on by the women, hated by the men—the dry joker, the practical wit, the ne'er-do-well—despaired of, as good for nothing, by his own family; from the redoubtable warrior of Waterloo—the great prime minister of England—like Julius Cæsar, a rōuè converted into a hero.

THE BEGGARS OF KINNEGAD AND ELSEWHERE.

Kinnegad is, like most towns in east and west Meath, "a lean place amidst fat lands." What a sleepy spot: few up and doing, but the cur dogs and beggars. The bugle of the passing coach sends its clangor along the quiet street; it reverberates amongst the mud walls and dunghills—the lazy cobbler lifts his head from his last, and scratches, significantly, beneath his woollen nightcap—the tailor lays down his goose, scratches also ruminatingly at the organ of destructiveness, and stares at the passing vehicle—the tinker's ass brays responsively as the guard blows—the sow rises from her wallowing in the green puddle that bubbles and feasters before the huxter's door, to grunt in unison—mendicants and cur-dogs rush forth and surround us, the one barking, the other begging. Oh, why have we not the pencil of a Wilkie or an Ostade, a Callot or Della Bella, to picture the grouping of a coach changing horses at an Irish village? Here I challenge all the mendicant countries in Christendom to match me Ireland in the trade, or costume, or aptitude for begging. France, Italy—ay, even Spain itself must yield the palm. Where, under the sun, could you find such eloquence of complaint—such versatility of supplication—such aptitude of humour—suited, with felicitous tact, the appeal to the well-guessed character of the applicant? Observe, there is always a leader of the begging band, who controls the rest, and asserts a manifest superiority in striking the key-note of supplication. Take, for instance, the queen bee, or rather wasp, of the Kinnegad swarm that surrounded us—what a tall, sturdy, sinewy virago; her dark, unquiet eye bespeaking her quick spirit; her powerful form the danger of disputing with her; her sallow skin and sharp features, that the pabulum of her existence was drawn more from whisky than from wholesome eatables—alas! for the body, soul, and spirit of that being whose existence depends on whisky and potatoes! Look at her, with her filthy, faltering hand fixed now on the coach door, in the attitude of threatening requisition, and almost intentionally frightening a delicate female within into the reluctant bestowment of sixpence. Again, see with what a leer of cunning she addresses herself, in flattering guise, to an outside passenger, and how knowingly she smokes a youth with a cigar in his mouth; and, while coaxing him out of a penny, which he flung at her head, she played upon the puffer—offered to lend him her dudden—quizzed him for his parsimony in attempting to smoke and chew at the same time, from the same tobacco twist—and exhibited him off in the truth of his nature, as a Jackanapes. Then she moved off to the rear of the coach, and commenced flattering a farming sort of a young man, large, rude, and ruddy. “Och, then, is that yourself, Mr Tom! I hope your honour’s heifers sold well last market. Maybe it’s yourself that ham’t the pocketful o’ money coming out of Smithfield?—and long may your father and your father’s son reign, for it’s he that’s the good warrant to give to the poor. My blessing, and the blessing of poor Judy’s children, light upon him every day he gets up; for it’s he that never passes through Kinnegad without throwing me a silver shilling. Do, Master Tom, and the heavens be your bed, throw us a half-crown now, and we’ll divide dacently. Yes, your honour, I know you’ll be after putting your hand in your pocket. Molly, agra,” turning to another beggar woman, “what a sweet smile Master Tom carries! Isn’t he as like the dear man his father as if he was spit out of his mouth? But why shouldn’t he be good, seeing as how he’s the rale ould sort, none of your upstart jackeens.” Here a sixpence, thrown at her head, rewarded her pains; and immediately she turned to a respectable-looking man, with broad-brimmed hat and sad-coloured attire, who stood on the other side of the vehicle, preparing to mount. “Do, your Riverence, throw us a tester before you go, and soon and safe may you return, for the prayer of the fatherless and widow will be along wid yees—blessing on his sweet, charitable face—wouldn’t you see, Honor,” addressing herself to another beggarwoman, with the wink of an eye, “that there was a heart within him for the poor?” Here Honor interposed—“Judy Mulcahey, and bad luck to yees, why call the gentleman ‘his Riverence,’ when you know no more than my sucking child whether he be clergy at all, at all.” “Yes, but I do know, and for why shouldn’t I; dont I see his galigaakins covering so tight and nate his comfortable legs—blessings on his Riverence every day he rises;” and then, in an under voice, and turning to a beggarman behind her, “Jack, what matters it to the likes of us, whether he be the right sort or no—what consarn is to Judy and the childer, whether he be priest, parson, or methody preacher, so as I slewder him out of a sixpence. Do, your Riverence, do, and the poor widow’s blessing attend ye, throw something before yees go amongst us.” Thus she carried on her attacks—praised and joked—prayed and imprecated—now a blessing, now a blasphemy; and, when the guard sang out “all’s right,” and the coach drove off, she heaped curses, for sheer fun sake, upon all those whom, for herself and fellows, she failed to put under contribution—and then for the whisky shop, to dissolve, with all rapidity, the proceeds of her morning’s occupation.

PHAURICK NA MULLAUN.

There is a man living in Joyce Country, who, from the number of bullocks in his possession, is named Phaurick na Mullaun. This man, though pasturing his flocks and herds on many a hill, is perfectly illiterate, and speaks no language but the Irish; he is of ungovernable passions, and has never yet spared any means, pecuniary, physical, or, it may be said, brutal, to attain the gratification of his desires. When attempts at seduction or abduction have failed, he has arrived at his end by means the most abhorrent. Living in the fastnesses of this district, his establishment is like that of a Turcoman Aga, and his bawn or farm-yard is surrounded by cabins which he has found necessary to erect for his numerous females; who thus being kept in separate lodges, are, in some measure, but not altogether, kept from cabals, feuds, and fightings. Scarcely a month elapses but the magistrates of the adjoining petty sessions have their time occupied by complaints laid by the respective women of this harem against their lord and against their frail sisterhood. For this strong man—strong in his position, strong in the powerful faction to which he belongs, makes no difficulty in divorcing one wife to marry another, and is in fact as great a polygamist as any Moslem. A few years ago this man was accused of some nefarious deed, and on this occasion most characteristically chose not to clear himself by legal trial, but by resorting to the wild justice of Casey’s sword. He would turn the Lach na Fecheen,* to prove his innocence. Accordingly on an appointed day he resorted to the spot, attended by a man whose business it was to act as a sort of priest at this wild rite, and shew the adventurer how he was to turn the stone, and what to say upon the occasion. Now so it was that Phaurick na Mullaun’s courage, when it came to the sticking point, altogether failed; for he felt his guilt, and knew that if he invoked the terrible curses of the Lach na Fecheen, something horrible would await him; so he proposed to his companion to act as proxy for him, and offered him half-a-crown for the job. It would appear that this substitution was not unusual, for the man readily undertook, for the promised payment, to repeat the necessary prayers, invoke the awful imprecations, and turn the stone in the name of Satan. Accordingly the whole was gone through, and no immediate mischief ensued—the proxy’s neck was not twisted awry—his face was not turned round to his back—there he stood demanding the promised hire; which Phaurick, base man, refused to pay, and would have put the whole thing off as a joke; but this did not satisfy the proxy; a scuffle ensued, a fierce wrestle came on, and though Phaurick na Mullaun was stout, yet the wild Joyce was stouter, and, besides, Phaurick had on a neckcloth, inside which his antagonist fastened his left hand, and with his four knuckles squeezed upon his windpipe, got him under, and there he choking lay, his back on the Lach na Fecheen. To save his life then, Phaurick promised, with an oath, the repayment of the hire, and, on being let loose, they both adjourned to a neighbouring public-house, and it was agreed that the half-crown should be spent on whisky: a quart of which, when produced, Joyce took up, applied to his mouth, and attempted to swallow at a draught, and in the act he suddenly dropped dead. There is no doubt but that the spasm of the epiglottis, or trap-door of the wind-pipe, was the cause of the fellow’s death; but all the people round attributed it to his being proxy for Phaurick; in confirmation of which Phaurick made off into the mountains, and a coroner’s inquest was summoned. My friend, who as a medical practitioner residing in the vicinity was called in professionally on the extraordinary inquest, says that the scene was most imposing. The body exposed to view at a short distance from the fatal stone—the smiling lake beneath—the surrounding mountains, reposing in all the changeable varieties of light and shade—the occasional keening of the wild mountain women—loud voices, at times, of the leaders of the rival clans, as they passed their conflicting judgments on this fatal occasion; all this was calculated to fasten on the memory, and there leave a vivid impression of the Lach na Fecheen.

* Query, Clach, or Stone. This Stone is a wild ordeal, still sometimes tried by the common people, somewhat similar to the Black Stones of Icolmkill.—E. T. M.

AN IRISH SMUGGLER.

A man who was known to have a large mountain farm and extensive homestead in these hills was observed very frequently to ride into the town of B——, and he never made his appearance without a woman, supposed to be his wife, jogging steadily and uprightly on a pillion behind him. He was tall and gaunt in look—she large and rotund, and encumbered, as is the mode of all country wives, with a multitude of petticoats; they always rode into the yard of a man who kept a public-house, and before they alighted off their horse, the gate was carefully shut. It was known, moreover, that this publican acted as factor for this farmer in the sale of his butter; and so, for a length of time, things went on in a quiet and easy way, until one day it so happened (as, indeed, it is very common for idlers in a very idle country town to stand making remarks on the people as they come by) that the gauger, the innkeeper, and a squireen were lounging away their day, when the farmer slowly paced by, with his everlasting wife behind him. "Well," says the squireen, "of all the women I ever saw bumping on a pillion, that lump of a woman sits the awkwardest; she don't sit like a nathural born crathur at all; and do you see how modest she is, what with her flapped down beaver hat, and all the frills and fallals about her, not an inch of her sweet face is to be seen no more than an owl from out the ivy. I have a great mind to run up alongside of her and give her a pinch in the toe, to make old buckram look about her for once."—"O let her alone," says the innkeeper; "they're a decent couple from Joyce country. I'll be bound, what makes her sit so stiff, is all the eggs she is biingin' in to Mrs O'Mealy, who factors the butter for them." There was, while he said this, a cunning leer about the innkeeper's mouth, as much as to denote that there was, to his knowledge, however he came by it, something mysterious about this said couple; this was not lost on the subtle gauger, and he thought it no harm just to try more about the matter; and so he says in a frolicsome way—"Why then, for curiosity sake, I will just run up to them and give the mistress a pinch—somewhere—she won't notice me at all in the crowd, and maybe then she'll look up, and we'll see her own purty face." Accordingly, no sooner said than done—he ran over to where the farmer was getting on slowly through the market crowd; and, on the side of the pillion to which the woman's back was turned, attempted to give a sly pinch; but he might as well have pinched a pitcher; nor did the woman even lift up her head, or ask who is it that's hurting me. This emboldened him to give another knock with his knuckles; and this assault he found not opposed, as it should be, by petticoats and flesh, but by, what he felt to be, petticoats and metal. This is queer, thought the gauger—he now was more bold; and, with the butt-end of his walking-stick, he hit what was so hard a bang which sounded as if he had struck a tin pot. "Stop here, honest man," cried the gauger. "Let my wife alone, will you, before the people," cried the farmer. "Not till I see what this honest woman is made of," roared the gauger. So he pulled, and the farmer dug his heels into his colt to get on, but all would not do—in the struggle down came the wife into the street; and as she fell on the pavement, the whole street rang with the squash, and in a moment there is a gurgling as from a burst barrel, and a strong-smelling water comes flowing all about—and flat poor Norah lies, there being an irruption of all her intestines, which flowed down the gutters like pottewen whisky as eggs are like eggs.

The fact was, that our friend from the land of Joyce had got made, by some tinker, a tin vessel, with head and body the shape of a woman, and dressed it out as a proper country dame—in this way he carried his DARLINT behind him, and made much of her.

the stature assigned by imagination, Mr Cæsar Otway has made of him! It is ever thus: a frisky young pig becomes an ugly sow; a frolicsome kitten a demure, selfish mouser; a lovely young woman a roll-about matron or a withered hag; and a Big Jack Joyce the man here described.

I got nearly opposite a building, about two hundred yards from the road, which seemed but newly erected; a coarse, raw, ugly, unfinished edifice, that had, amongst other marks denoting it to be a public-house, a rude, uncushioned jaunting-car, resting on its shafts beside the door.

Considering this a rather curious place for a public-house, I asked whose it was, and was told it belonged to "Mr Big Jack Joyce."

"Why I thought, says I, he lived at Leenane; at least so he did when I passed through the country some years ago."

"'Tis true for you, your honour, he did live ther; but attorney K—— put him out of it last winter, and here he is now, and he keeps a public-house, as he always did, and, as I suppose, always will do."

I was determined to go and renew my acquaintance with my big friend, whom twelve years ago I found in all his might and glory as "mine host" at the head of the Killery—so I drove up to Jack's door, and inquired for Mr Joyce, and was answered by a very tall young woman, not uncomely, who informed me that Mr Joyce was within, but that, as he had been out all night after cattle on the hills, he was on the bed asleep; but his daughter (for such she was) said, that if I desired it she would call him. I certainly did not like to go away without seeing Big Jack. So he was called up; and as he came, loose, unclean, and frowzy, certainly my giant did not appear to advantage; for, somehow or other, I had let my imagination play the rogue with my judgment, and magnify my retrospect with regard to this man.

The first time I saw him, (as I say,) about twelve years ago, he made his appearance just as I drove up to his door, bouncing over the wall that divided the potato garden from the front of his house; and, I think, a finer specimen of a strong man, tall and yet well-proportioned, I could not conceive. Such do not look as tall as they really are. The great bullet-head, covered with crisp curls, the short, bull neck, the broad, square shoulders, the massive chest, all open and hirsute, the comparatively small sinewy loins, and pillar-like limbs, all bone and muscle—Milo of Crotona might have shaken hands with him as a brother, and the gifted sculptor of the Farnese Hercules might have selected Jack as his lay figure. Such was my beau idéal of Mr Joyce, from what I recollected of him since my former visit. But now, though I acknowledged the identity, yet, certainly, the man was greatly changed—but still, though I am sure my fancy had been playing tricks—he yet was tall, stout, and able; but I am sure I know fifty English and Irish men just as large. Having called for some liquor—reader, I hope you will believe me, not to drink, but just to put mine host in good humour—Jack and I got into chat, and to be sure he was full of the hard usage of the attorney who had put him out of Leenane; but he said he had got where he was a large and good farm, and all he wished was to see the head landlord, the provost of Trinity College, who was cheated entirely, entirely, by his middlemen, such as attorney K—— and others; but if he could but once get a sight of his Great Reverence, he would shew him how acres, and hundreds of acres, are kept from him.

Upon acquainting him that I had the honour of an intimate acquaintance with the greatest of all possible men, EXCEPT LORD LEITRIM, you may suppose he was mighty civil; and taking advantage of that desire to please, I endeavoured to get from him an account of his family, but he really could not tell anything about them; he seemed to think that size was not so much the characteristic of the tribe or name as of his own immediate family; and to shew me that he had not been the means of any degeneracy, he whistled to his son who was in a distant field, who came at the call, and certainly a taller and more comely stripping, of about twenty years of age, I have not seen. He was at least six feet four inches in height, and, I am sure, if fed on animal food, as an English farmer's son would be, he would prove a grand specimen of the human race. I left big Jack and his big family, receiving from them a thousand thanks for promising to introduce him to the notice of the new provost.

On my road towards Leenane, I met some persons with whom I entered into conversation about the neighbourhood, and about Jack Joyce. I found that he was not a favourite, that he was too apt to resort to his strength to settle disputes, when the fat he threw into the balance made the scale descend in his own favour. Indeed, he acknowledged to me, on my former visit, that, as a justice of the peace was a great way off, he used to settle differences amongst the neighbours, by taking the parties at variance by the nape of the neck, and battering their heads together, until they consented to shake hands and drink a pint of potteen together, which, of course, it was Jack's office to furnish for a consideration.

Before I go farther, I may as well tell all I know about this tribe of Joyces, that have given their name to this part of Connaught.

They were a troop or band that came over from Wales or the West of England, under the command of Birmingham of Athenry, in the reign of Edward I.: their name was Joyces or Jorse, and they were said to be descended from ancient British princes. Transplantation improved them in stature, for certainly the Welsh are not a tall race. This people not only settled in these western high lands, so very like those in Wales, but they became important in Galway town, and formed one of the thirteen tribes of that ancient and extraordinary corporation—the merry Joyces!!! For all tribes had their sobriquets, and perhaps a Duellist is positive, and a D'Arcy stout, (quere, fire-eating duellists), and a Martin litigious; and so on respecting each characteristic whereby they were formerly designated. Only this I think I have heard said, that however a Martin loved litigation in the good town of Galway, he allows no writs or issues of law to extend beyond his gateway at Oughterard, just twenty miles from his mansion-house.

Of the Joyces many were mayors and bailiffs of the capital of Connaught, and not only the men bustled and battled away against the rough-riding rogues, the O'Maddens and the ferocious O'Flaherties, but even the women were sometimes of big note; amongst others I may mention Margaret, the daughter of John Joyce, who one day going down to wash her household clothes in the broad transparent stream that runs out of Lough Corrib, and as she stood in the current, as did the daughters of Grecian kings in the time of Ulysses, who should come by but Don Domingo De Rona, a Biscayan merchant of great wealth and note, who had arrived at Galway with a carrack of Benecario wine, which was much in demand for doctoring the claret the Galway merchants were so famous for concocting.

Now, as fair Margaret beetled away in the stream, and as, with ruddy legs and untrammelled toes, (as straight and fair as her fingers, not a corn or bunion on one of them,) she trampled the linen, the Don was captivated with the maid; he made love as Spaniards do; produced proofs of his pedigree, and his cash, and in due time they were married, and proceeded to Corunna; but not long after he died, (as old cavaliers are apt to do who marry late,) and Donna De Rona came home a sparkling and wealthy widow, and by and by her hand was solicited by Oliver Oge Ffrench, one of the heads of that tribe, and in due time they were married, and after the marriage he became mayor and one of the greatest merchants of the city. He traded much to foreign ports; and as it was no shame to smuggle in those days, and as the good town of Galway never was allowed to be lighted by night, in order that smuggling might go on and prosper, so Oliver Oge was often on the sea, shewing a good example of enterprise and free trade—exporting wool and importing brandy and wine.

In the meanwhile the Donna was not idle; she was the greatest improver in the west: she had particularly a passion for building bridges. She might have made as good a pontifex as Pope Joan, and heaven's blessing was on her for her good works; for one day as she was superintending her masons, an eagle came soaring from the ocean, and balancing itself with poised wing just over the dame, it dropped at her feet a ring formed of a single stone, so strange and outlandish in its make and form, but yet so beautiful and so precious, that, though the most skilful lapidaries admired it, and would have given any price for it, none could say of what kind it was, or of what country or age was the workmanship; it has been kept in the family since. I wish I could tell the reader which of the Joyces now owns this precious relic. All I can say is, that it is not on the finger of big Jack, or his wife. But indeed the Joyces seem to have been a favoured race; it is a favour that they should be named and known as merry; for he who has "a merry heart hath a continual feast." I assume it to be a favour also that they were under the especial patronage of eagles. One of the family in the religious and valorous times, when men went to fight for the love of Christ against the Saracens, a fine, tall, stalwart fellow, a fair specimen of a Joyce, had gone to the wars of the Holy Land, and there he was taken prisoner by the Paynim, and there the dark, gazelle eye of an Arab maid fell on him, and she loved his blue eye and MERRY countenance, which even captivity could not sadden, and also his large proportions, and she set him free, and followed her Irish cavalier through Egypt, Barbary, and into Spain; and there they were wandering as pilgrims in sordid state and apparel, just favoured with food and lodging, because returning from Palestine, when the guardian eagle of the family, as they were winning their weary way over the Sierra Morena, came fluttering over his head, and gave such signs as led him along a certain path until he reached a spot where a Moorish king had deposited, after a defeat, all his treasures. How the stout Joyce contrived to appropriate and make his own these heaps of gold, history does not inform. All it says is, that he came (I hope not unaccompanied by his Arabian true love) in Galway, there lived and died, and shewed his gratitude to God, and his love to his country, by building churches and strengthening the town wall.

I must conclude my remarks on the Joyces by observing, that Mr Hardiman, in his excellent "History of Galway," says that he has heard and witnessed many instances of the size and strength of the Joyces. "I saw," says he, "an elderly man of that name of uncommon stature and strength, who, (as I was informed,) when in his youth, elevated by the native, never was satisfied until he had drove every man out of the fair green; those who knew his humour, and also his strength, generally retired beyond a certain small bridge; when his caprice was satisfied by submission, he permitted them to retire quietly; resistance would not only have been useless but almost certain destruction, for nineteen in twenty were of that name and all related; when I saw him he was the remains of a noble figure, remarkably gentle and kind to every one, and heard, with great regret, the pranks of his youth mentioned." So much for the Joyces; yet still I say, that I do not consider that (take them now as a tribe or race) they are superior in strength or stature to the well-fed mountaineers, who are not pressed on for the means of subsistence, in Connemara, Clare, Tipperary, or Kerry. I have a mountain farm in Tipperary, and I will engage (leaving Jack Joyce and his son out of the question) to produce ten men off that farm as tall and well-proportioned as those of any district of the same extent and population in Joyce's country.

These random specimens will, we venture to think, more than establish all we have said in commendation of this sprightly volume, which ought to form the travelling companion of every one who lands in Ireland in the present summer.

* As part of the litany of the Galwegians, it was piously inscribed on the town wall—"From the ferocious O'Flaherties, good Lord, deliver us."

Self-Culture. By Dr Channing of Boston.

This introductory discourse to the Franklin Lectures of last year, is among its author's most choice performances; if, rather, in importance of subject, truth, and elevation of spirit, it does not surpass them all. It is a small pamphlet, published by Fox of Paternoster Row, at not an exorbitant rate, though it ought to be, for the purpose of diffusion, and will be, far cheaper. From so slender a brochure—slender in bulk, though weighty in matter—it were needless to extract much; but, to incite the class to whom it is addressed to a full perusal, we will quote a few passages:—

I have expressed my strong interest in the mass of the people; and this is founded, not on their usefulness to the community, so much as on what they are in themselves. Their condition is indeed obscure; but their importance is not on this account a whit the less. The multitude of men cannot, from the nature of the case, be distinguished; for the very idea of distinction is, that a man stands out from the multitude. They make little noise, and draw little notice in their narrow spheres of action; but still they have their full proportion of personal worth, and even of greatness. Indeed every man, in every condition, is great: it is only our own diseased sight which makes him little. A man is great as a man, be he where or what he may. The grandeur of his nature turns to insignificance all outward distinctions. His powers of intellect, of conscience, of love, of knowing God, of perceiving the beautiful, of acting on his own mind, on outward nature, and on his fellow-creatures, these are glorious prerogatives. Through the vulgar error of undervaluing what is common, we are apt indeed to pass these by as of little worth. But as in the outward creation, so in the soul, the common is the most precious. Science and art may invent splendid modes of illuminating the apartments of the opulent; but these are all poor and worthless, compared with the common light which the sun sends into all our windows, which he pours freely, impartially, over hill and valley, which kindles daily the eastern and western sky; and so the common lights of reason, and conscience, and love, are of more worth and dignity than the rare endowments which give celebrity to a few. Let us not disparage that nature which is common to all men; for no thought can measure its grandeur. It is the image of God, the image even of his infinity; for no limits can be set to its unfolding. He who possesses the divine powers of the soul is a great being; be his place what it may. . . . The truly great are to be found everywhere; nor is it easy to say in what condition they spring up most plentifully. Real greatness has nothing to do with a man's sphere. It does not lie in the magnitude of his outward agency, in the extent of the effects which he produces. The greatest men may do comparatively little abroad. Perhaps the greatest in our city at this moment are buried in obscurity. Grandeur of character lies wholly in force of soul—that is, in the force of thought, moral principle, and love; and this may be found in the humblest condition of life. A man brought up to an obscure trade, and hemmed in by the wants of a growing family, may, in his narrow sphere, perceive more clearly, discriminate more keenly, weigh evidence more wisely, seize on the right means more decisively, and have more presence of mind in difficulty, than another who has accumulated vast stores of knowledge by laborious study; and he has more of intellectual greatness. Many a man, who has gone but a few miles from home, understands human nature better, detects motives and weighs character more sagaciously, than another who has travelled over the known world, and made a name by his reports of different countries. It is force of thought which measures intellectual, and so it is force of principle which measures moral greatness—that highest of human endowments, that brightest manifestation of the Divinity. The greatest man is he who chooses the Right with invincible resolution; who resists the sorest temptations from within and without; who bears the heaviest burdens cheerfully; who is calmest in storms, and most fearless under menace and frowns; whose reliance on truth, on virtue, on God, is most unfaltering. And is this a greatness which is apt to make a show, or which is most likely to abound in conspicuous station? The solemn conflicts of reason with passion; the victories of moral and religious principle over urgent and almost irresistible solicitations to self-indulgence; the hardest sacrifice of duty, those of deep-seated affection and of the heart's fondest hopes; the consolations, hopes, joys, and peace of disappointed, persecuted, scorned, deserted virtue—these are of course unseen: so that the true greatness of human life is almost wholly out of sight. Perhaps in our presence, the most heroic deed on earth is done in some silent spirit, the loftiest purpose cherished, the most generous sacrifice made, and we do not suspect it.

Self-culture, the proper subject of the discourse, intervenes, in its different phases of moral, religious, and intellectual; and also in its minute and subordinate relations and developements, in the cultivation of taste, in the perception of the beautiful, and the acquisition of accomplishments. Literature is especially commended as at once a means and an end in self-culture.

It is chiefly through books that we enjoy intercourse with superior minds; and those invaluable means of communication are in the reach of all. In the best books, great men talk to us, give us their most precious thoughts, and pour their souls into ours. God be thanked for books! They are the voices of the distant and the dead, and make us heirs of the spiritual life of past ages. Books are the true levellers. They give to all who will faithfully use them, the society, the spiritual presence of the best and greatest of our race. No matter how poor I am; no matter though the prosperous of my own time will not enter my obscure dwelling; if the sacred writers will enter and take up their abode under my roof; if Milton will cross my threshold to sing to me of Paradise; and Shakspeare to open to me the worlds of imagination and the workings of the human heart; and Franklin to enrich me with his practical wisdom—I shall not pine for want of intellectual companionship, and I may become a cultivated man, though excluded from what is called the best society in the place where I live.

Among lesser but most important subjects, the following is insisted on—and, although we have somehow conceived an utter horror of the orationing propensities and tastes of our transatlantic friends, we recognise the facility of correct and graceful speech to the labouring classes, as a talent which deserves all the commendation which the sagacity of Channing accords it.

There is another power, which each man should cultivate according to his ability, but which is very much neglected in the mass of the people, and that is the power of utterance. A man was not made to shut up his mind in itself; but to give it voice, and to exchange it for other minds. Speech is one of our grand distinctions from the brute. Our power over others lies not so much in the amount of thought within us as in the power of bringing it out. A man of more than ordinary intellectual vigour may, for want of expression, be a cipher, without significance, in society. And not only does a man influence others, but he greatly aids his own intellect, by giving distinct and forcible utterance to his thoughts. We understand ourselves better, our conceptions grow clearer, by the very effort to make them clear to another. Our social rank, too, depends a good deal on our power of utterance. The principal distinction between what are called gentlemen and the vulgar, lies in this, that the latter are awkward in manners, and are essentially wanting in propriety, clearness, grace, and force of utterance. A man who cannot open his lips without breaking a rule of grammar, without shewing in his dialect or brogue, or uncouth tones, his want of cultivation; or without darkening his meaning by a confused, unskilful mode of communication, cannot take the place to which, perhaps, his native good sense entitles him. To have intercourse with respectable people, we must speak their language.

What follows is in a higher strain, though perfectly in harmony with the more minute exhortations :—

The common notion has been, that the mass of the people need no other culture than is necessary to fit them for their various trades; and though this error is passing away, it is far from being exploded. But the ground of a man's culture lies in his nature, not in his calling. His powers are to be unfolded on account of their inherent dignity, not their outward direction. He is to be educated because he is a man, not because he is to make shoes, nails, or pins. A trade is plainly not the great end of his being, for his mind cannot be shut up in it; his force of thought cannot be exhausted on it. He has faculties to which it gives no action, and deep wants it cannot answer. Poems, and systems of theology and philosophy, which have made some noise in the world, have been wrought at the work-bench, and amidst the toils of the field. How often, when the arms are mechanically plying a trade, does the mind, lost in reverie or day dreams, escape to the ends of the earth! How often does the pious heart of woman mingle the greatest of all thoughts, that of God, with household drudgery! Undoubtedly a man is to perfect himself in his trade; for by it he is to earn his bread and to serve the community. But bread or subsistence is not his highest good; for if it were, his lot would be harder than that of the inferior animals, for whom nature spreads a table, and weaves a wardrobe, without a care of their own. Nor was he made chiefly to minister to the wants of the community. A rational, moral being cannot, without infinite wrong, be converted into a mere instrument of others' gratification. He is necessarily an end, not a means. A mind, in which are sown the seeds of wisdom, disinterestedness, firmness of purpose, and piety, is worth more than all the outward material interests of a world. It exists for itself, for its own perfection, and must not be enslaved to its own or others' animal wants. You tell me that a liberal culture is needed for men who are to fill high stations, but not for such as are doomed to vulgar labour. I answer, that MAN is a greater name than President or King.

In reply to the oft-repeated fallacy, that mental cultivation renders men unfit, or inapt for labour—unfit, in short, for duty—we find this spirited refutation :—

You think that a man without culture will do all the better what you call the drudgery of life. Go then to the southern plantation. There the slave is brought up to be a mere drudge. He is robbed of the rights of a man; his whole spiritual nature is starved that he may work, and do nothing but work: and in that slovenly agriculture, in that worn-out soil, in the rude state of the mechanic arts, you may find a comment on your doctrine, that by degrading men you make them more productive labourers.

But it is said that any considerable education lifts men above their work, makes them look with disgust on their trades as mean and low, makes drudgery intolerable. I reply, that a man becomes interested in labour, just in proportion as the mind works with the hands. An enlightened farmer, who understands agricultural chemistry, the laws of vegetation, the structure of plants, the properties of manures, the influences of climate, who looks intelligently on his work, and brings his knowledge to bear on exigencies, is a much more cheerful as well as more dignified labourer than the peasant, whose mind is akin to the clod on which he treads, and whose whole life is the same dull, unthinking, unimproving toil. But this is not all. Why is it, I ask, that we call manual labour low, that we associate with it the idea of meanness, and think that an intelligent people must scorn it? The great reason is, that, in most countries, so few intelligent people have been engaged in it. Once let cultivated men plough, and dig, and follow the commonest labours, and ploughing, digging, and trades will cease to be mean. It is the man who determines the dignity of the occupation, not the occupation which measures the dignity of the man. Physicians and surgeons perform operations less cleanly than fall to the lot of most mechanics. I have seen a distinguished chemist covered with dust like a labourer. Still these men were not degraded. Their intelligence gave dignity to their work; and so our labourers, once educated, will give dignity to their toils. Let me add, that I see little difference, in point of dignity, between the various vocations of men. When I see a clerk, spending his days in adding figures, perhaps merely copying, or a teller of a bank counting money, or a merchant selling shoes and hides, I cannot see in these occupations greater respectableness than in making leather, shoes, or furniture. I do not see in them greater intellectual activity than in several trades. A man in the field seems to have more chances of improvement in his work than a man behind the counter, or a man driving the quill. It is the sign of a narrow mind to imagine, as many seem to do, that there is a repugnance between the plain, coarse exterior of a labourer and mental culture, especially the more refining culture. The labourer, under his dust and sweat, carries the grand elements of humanity, and he may put forth its highest powers. I doubt not there is as genuine enthusiasm in the contemplation of nature, and in the perusal of works of genius, under a homespun garb as under finery. We have heard of a distinguished author, who never wrote so well as when he was full dressed for company. But profound thought and poetical inspiration have most generally visited men when, from narrow circumstances or negligent habits, the rent coat and shaggy face have made them quite unfit for polished saloons. A man may see truth, and may be thrilled with beauty, in one costume or dwelling as well as another; and he should respect himself the more for the hardships under which his intellectual force has been developed.

Surely these extracts will induce many of our countrymen to obtain possession of this pregnant discourse. Dr Channing may not be the very best, because not the most practical of popular teachers; but this is unquestionably the very best of his popular moral preachings to the people.

Chronicle of the Law Officers of Ireland, with an Outline of the Legal History of Ireland, Chronological Tables, &c., &c. By Constantine B. Smyth of Lincoln's Inn.

A work this which can only have value to the profession, and to a few Irish gentlemen; but one which does much credit to the research and industry of the author, and which may be presumed to form excellent training-exercise for a young lawyer. We give but one of its facts. The salary of the Irish Chancellor is £10,000 a-year! One is not surprised at the "ruffling of the Volscians" at the bare idea of this office being bestowed upon one of the learned members for our city, namely—her Majesty's Attorney-General.

Travels and Adventures in South Australia; with a Particular Description of the Town of Adelaide and Kangaroo Island, &c., &c. By W. H. Leigh, Esq.

This fresh account of the Land of Promise is more deplorable than any we have yet seen. The author was the surgeon of one of the Australian Company's ships. He states that he "left England warped by no party, biased by no prejudices," and that it has been his endeavour to give a plain and simple narrative of facts. His style or cast of thought is somewhat flighty; and he may not sufficiently discriminate between the unavoidable hardships attending every new colony, and its ultimate chances of prosperity; but his volume is, we are persuaded, far more trustworthy than many of the sanguine, if not wilfully delusive statements of some other of the Company's servants. Persons intending to emigrate should read everything, and Mr Leigh's book among the rest; but we have already so fully fulfilled honest and necessary duty in warning South Australian emigrants, that we do not consider it worth while to return to the charge, and therefore forbear quoting Mr Leigh's adventures and experiences.

Rhymes for the Nursery.

This is a very pretty book, very pretty, simple verses; very neat and nicely designed illustrative woodengravings. Everything is pleasing to the eye, and to the ear nothing offensive save such rhymes, as papa-er, and are; far and mamma-r; fellow (feller.) and tell her, which ought not to be admissible into the well-ordered nursery, and which disfigures an otherwise very nice little book. We do not affirm that the correct rhymes are accompanied by the printed vulgarisms; but the latter follow as a matter of course. They are necessitated by the rhyme.

Charles' Discoveries

Is a nice little book of natural history for young children, with lively cuts.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

Those who expected that the Ministry, on their reinstatement in office, would adopt the principles of Progressive Reform, have been signally disappointed, as we anticipated in last Register. The country is likely to obtain no beneficial measure except the Penny Postage; and this has been extorted from Ministers by the persevering and skilful agitation of its supporters. The Whigs have become more than ever the mere tools of the Tories; not venturing even to bring forward measures which are disagreeable to the Opposition, and carrying through for them measures which would hardly be proposed to Parliament were the situation of parties reversed. What must be sufficiently provoking, the Tories boast openly that they have the real influence of Government. At a Tory dinner, in Merchant Tailors' Hall, Sir Robert Peel said—"I know that political power and influence over the State are not the exclusive appendages of office at present; and I cannot but feel that, backed by your kindness, aided by the powerful talents of those joined with me, and supported by the voice of the public, I cannot but feel, I cannot conceal from myself and from you, that though not in office, we nightly, and night after night, exercise that power, and make use of that influence. You may depend upon it, that we will persevere in the steady upholding of the prerogative of the Monarchy—in the maintenance of the just rights of the Established Church—and in resisting all concession to popular feelings, and popular clamour unduly excited, which would have for their effect to change the character of the ancient institutions of the country, and convert our limited monarchy into a wild and ungovernable Democracy." The Ministry, of course, can only do what their opponents allow them. The grant for education was first postponed and then withdrawn. The Canada resolutions, Tory as they were in principle, were withdrawn on the mere threat of opposition by Lord Stanley; but on the suggestion of Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell was permitted to bring in a bill on the subject, pledging the House to nothing. Ministers joined the Tories in throwing out Sir Hesketh Fleetwood's bill, for extending the electoral qualification in counties to occupants of dwellings occupied at £10, contrary to an expectation very generally entertained. Lord John Russell talked of making some minor improvements in the registration and rate-paying clauses; but, of course, nothing of the kind will be done or attempted, simply because the Tories will not let him. No bill with regard to church-leases or church-rates is to be introduced this session; and the general impression is, that everything will be delayed that can be delayed, the rest huddled over in any way, and Parliament prorogued as soon as possible. Notwithstanding the electioneering bustle which took place a few weeks ago, there is no probability of a general election at present; for the simple reason, that Ministers see they would lose instead of gaining by such a step.

Mr Abercromby having resigned the Speakership, and having been raised to the peerage under the title of Baron Dunfermline, a contest took place for the office, between Mr Shaw Lefevre, the Whig candidate, and Mr Goulburn on the Tory interest; when the former was elected, by a majority of eighteen, in a house of 620 Members. During the month there has been plenty of talking in both houses, but we do not find there has been any legislation worthy of notice.

WHAT WILL THE MINISTRY DO?

This question involves another—What are the Ministers? Are they not, in word and deed, in the letter as well as in spirit, to the heart's core, Tories? Are Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Wellington the less Tories, because they conceded the Emancipation of the Catholics; a measure of unquestioned advancement to civil and religious liberty? Are Lord John Russell and Lord Melbourne, then, more entitled to the character of Reformers, because they conceded the extinction of certain rotten boroughs, and devised a measure which has yielded no advancement to civil or religious liberty; a measure whose impotency for good they strenuously and doggedly protect against the efforts to render it serviceable to Reform? Is there a single measure of Reform, bating those that Tories would equally give, which has not been openly repudiated or servilely abandoned by these Ministers? What title, then, have they to the name of Reformers? It is worse than idiocy to pander to this pitiful delusion. They who do so are worse than the offenders; nay, it is questionable whether the country has a better right to condemn the Government or its Radical parasites, who have pandered to a false confidence, and, with tortuous ingenuity, perverted each of the plainest evidences—nay, even actual assurances—of finality, into auguries of progress. Lord John is less a traitor than the preachers of "peace, peace," when he himself declared war to the march of Reform.

The declarations of the fourth June, coupled with the abandonment of the last lingering merit, the last shadow of distinctive principle in the education vote, have happily torn the mask to shreds which our trustful Liberals have persisted in holding before the Tory features of the Cabinet. Even to the plaintive petition of the philosophical Radicals, "Pray, pray, keep on your guise—do not desert us in the deception—lend legs to the lie, just till we ride over this one election!" even to the humble prayer of the men who have so often waded in the mud to serve the Whigs, the Whigs are obdurate! And the philosophers on their knees, praying for hypocrisy, have received their well-merited kick. The kick, however, was not "explicit." It is surprising to what an extent truckling renders men callous to humiliation! The cool contempt of Lord John Russell was no match for the tenacity of his parasites; so Sir Robert Peel rose to the assistance of Reformer Russell, and lent his vicarious vigour to the kick, and carried it home soundly to the ribs of the philosophers. Again, they were sure that the noble Lord did not approve—would not sanction—would give intimation that he did not sanction that very unkind kick applied in his name by the Right Honourable Baronet. But the Ministerial Reformer was silent. No Radical with a head on his shoulders has a right to be surprised at the present position of Reform. When the Cabinet refused the Ballot, the whole tale was told, and the sequel manifest. The foul influences were not denied to be swamping the electoral power of Reformers; the Ballot (demonstrably the best remedy) was peremptorily refused by those who had alone the power to give it; and no other remedy was proposed. Nothing but a power of delusion, beyond the wildest hallucinations on record, could have rendered it necessary for Lord John Russell to put it in type, that he never intended the Reform Bill to prevent the Tories from resuming office, and that he considered the existing mode of election a fair test of the desires of the people.

These opinions, and the various acts in strict accordance with these opinions, were just as plainly revealed on the first two nights of this Session as they have been by the events of the last month. If Eldon and Castlereagh arose from their graves, and resumed office, we could not have a Government more conservative of abuses than the government of the Whigs.

What the Ministers will do, will be precisely what Tories in their places would do. The Queen has identified Toryism with personal annoyance. The Ministers have their own convenience to consult as well as her Majesty's; and are zealously endeavouring to soften her Majesty's antipathy, and smooth matters for a Conservative Ministry. Whether that Ministry is to consist of the Peel Tories alone, or with an admixture of the Whig-Tories—with, perhaps, Lord Melbourne as a Palace Minister to gild the pill—a short time will shew. It is manifest that the Tory-Whigs are not ambitious of the undivided honour of their present Ministerial position; and it is equally manifest that Sir Robert Peel, in common Conservative honesty, cannot ask aid for them from the small fry of his phalanx, without a due share of the flesh-pots of Egypt. In what proportion the loaves and fishes will be shared by the nominal sections of the ruling few, is of no particular importance to the ruled many, who are secure of hunger and thirst under any conceivable appropriation of pelf among the plunderers. Toryism, and Tory-Whigism, are equally the Corn-Laws, equally the sinecures, equally the taxes, equally bribery, falsehood, sectarian tyranny, and the plague and pestilence of darkness. Some few minor benefits—the Penny Postage is one—we are like to have, as sops to Cerberus, whether they are flung to us by Pluto or Proserpine; but we are in Tartarus nevertheless, and are likely to remain there.

Who are we to thank for this pleasing predicament? Not the Tories, who are ever our open foes; not even the Whigs, who took every occasion to assure us they were not our friends; who but the parasites, the self-deceivers, and the diligent authors of the maze of delusion, enveloped in which the people have been decoyed down-hill, under the deception that they were ascending to the apex of their desires; the men who have voted black was white, and hallooed for Union with non-Reformers—doing servile homage to a name—dancing after the ignes fatui of their own baseless visions—rendering Parliament and the Press the trumpets of falsehood—and neglecting an opportunity of forwarding the cause of real reform, which the lottery of circumstances may not restore for a century. The Corn-Law agitation was left chiefly to the men most apparently interested in its success, and therefore the least able to achieve it single-handed; while the Chartist agitation was abandoned wholly to the men the most certain to ruin it, and materially to damage the mighty power which the working millions, when rationally pioneered, indubitably wield. It was a crisis—the sole one this country has witnessed for many a day—which admitted of the blended energy of wealth and numbers. It was an opportunity pregnant with the elements of victory to principle. All we wanted was men with honesty and courage enough to take the open field; but our leaders were too intently occupied in the dirty by-ways of party, or in beseeching smiles from Lord John Russell, to head or heed the people. The times were not wanting to the men, but the men to the times.

ENGLAND.

THE TABLES TURNED.—A short time since Lord John Russell forwarded, to the Lords-Lieutenant of several counties, a letter, intimating that, if respectable bodies of men chose to associate for the purpose of protecting life and property, the Government would furnish them with arms. In retaliation of the committal of some of the Chartists for drilling, they have been on the look-out to detect any of the "Russell armed Association men," in a similar offence; and they have at last succeeded; and four tradesmen, who had been drilling, are to be tried at the Rotherham sessions. Another instance of applying to the rich the law intended for the exclusive use of the poor, has occurred at Ilington. A great number of petty shopkeepers there had been prosecuted by the parish authorities for having their shops open on the Sunday; and with the view of ascertaining whether the maxim, that all are equal in the eye of the law, is of universal application, proceedings have been instituted against the Vicar's coachman "for exercising his worldly calling on the Sabbath," by driving his reverend master to church on the Lord's day, that not being a work of necessity or mercy, as the reverend gentleman was able to walk and preach on the same day. This prosecution has made quite a "sensation" among the carriage people; and we will venture to predict, if it succeed, that we shall hear less, from those in high places, about enforcing the better observance of the Sabbath. If the matter be strictly looked to, very few cases of necessity or mercy will be found to exist.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.—On the 14th June, the unusual spectacle presented itself of eight clergymen of the Established Church being rebuked by the Court for disobedience of the law, in ordaining the Rev. Mr Kesson as minister of the parish of Lethendy, after an interdict against such ordination had been issued by the Court. The clergy were distinctly informed, that if they ventured again to disobey the law, the punishment of imprisonment would undoubtedly be inflicted.

EFFECT OF MARSHES IN PRODUCING FEVER.—It has been disputed whether the artificial irrigation in this neighbourhood has been the cause of the increase of fever which has taken place of late years; but there can be no doubt that fever is always prevalent in the neighbourhood of marshes. Warden, in his account of the United States of America, remarks, "All low parts of the United States, along the banks of rivers and lakes, and near the borders of stagnant waters, and in marshy situations, where vegetable or animal substances, in a state of decay, are exposed to the action of the autumnal sun, are subject to an intermittent or bilious fever."—"In every low situation, where the rich vegetable soil is first exposed to the action of the sun, or where the water disappearing presents to its action a muddy surface, deleterious emanations are produced, which, ascending to the surface of a neighbouring hill, become the cause of disease there, as well as near the surface where they originated." He gives a great number of instances of fevers having broken out in America in the neighbourhood of marshes; and he also cites, from various authors, cases shewing the pestilential effect of marshes in Europe on the health. The Pontine marshes in Italy are well known to have produced for centuries numerous febrile diseases. Laccisi, physician to Pope Clement XI., relates, that in the vicinity of Rome, thirty persons of both sexes, and of the highest rank, being on a party of pleasure near the mouth of the Tiber, the wind suddenly changed, and blew from the south across putrid marshes; and that such was its effect, that all except one were suddenly seized with tertian fever. An inundation of the rivers in Hungary, which covered many parts of the country with stagnant waters, is said to have occasioned the loss of 40,000 of the Austrian army. The annual overflowing of the Nile has produced the same effect, from the earliest times, at Alexandria and other places. In August, 1765, a continued or remitting fever was produced among the soldiers and marines stationed in the island of Portosa, in the neighbourhood of stagnant waters, and a great number of them were carried off. Warden remarks, that "the most extraordinary fact regarding marsh miasms is, that their influence is more sensibly felt on the summit of the neighbouring hills, than on the very borders of the marsh whence they emanate. An invisible and pestiferous vapour, which rises by its lightness, or is wafted by currents of air, hovers on the summit during the hot season, and soon paralyses the strongest constitutions." He gives several instances where such pestilential exhalations had produced fevers at the distance of two miles. The short duration of human life in marshy districts, has been remarked by all writers on population. For example, the average duration of life is at least one-third lower in Holland than in England or France. In Switzerland, according to the observations of Muret, the probability of life, or the age to which half the born live, was as follows:—In nine parishes of the Alps, 47 years; in 41 parishes of the Pays de Vaud and Jura, 42; in 12 parishes where grain was cultivated, 40; in 18 parishes among the great vineyards, 37; in one marshy parish, 24!

But although there can be little doubt that the irrigation in the vicinity of Edinburgh must prove deleterious to the health of the inhabitants of this city, it is doubtful whether it can be stopped in any other way than by an application to Parliament. It was attempted in the year 1809, by proprietors at Restalrig, to prevent the irrigation, and the collecting of manure, from the common sewer which passes in that direction; but the Court of Session expressed an opinion, "that it was the right of the proprietors to detain all the alluvion in their power; that this had been done for half a century by every proprietor who chose; and that any proprietor, who had not previously done so, must be understood to have the option to do it when he pleased." The application for interdict was therefore dismissed, with expenses.

PRINTING THE BIBLE.—It was generally expected, that on the expiry of the present patent to the Queen's printers—which takes place on the 17th instant—the printing of Bibles would be thrown open entirely; whereby, as we will immediately shew, not only would the price be greatly reduced, but, in all probability, greater accuracy and elegance than has yet been reached, would be attained. Lord John Russell has, however, intimated, that it is the intention of Government to give the exclusive right of printing the Bible in Scotland to a Board, consisting of the Moderator of the General Assembly, two divines, and two laymen—all of the Church of Scotland. This Board is to have power to grant licenses to print Bibles, but under the condition that correctors of the press should be named by the Board, or persons to supervise the Bibles so printed to see that the version be correct. Another condition is, that Bibles printed in England are to be allowed to be freely imported into Scotland. The Dissenters very naturally object to this arrangement, as giving the Established Church a privilege they never had, nor pretended to claim before; and urge that the system of licenses will lead to favouritism and jobbing, for which the public will have to pay in the form of an increased price for their Bibles. The pretence for still making the printing of the Bible a monopoly, is to secure its accuracy; but one of the conditions of the grant is to be the free importation of English Bibles. Now, some years ago, there was a Committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the office of King's Printer; and the evidence taken by that Committee shews clearly, that accuracy in printing cannot be secured by patents and monopolies. Dr Lee stated—"I do not know any book of which it is so difficult to find a very correct edition as the English Bible." What in England is called the Standard Bible is that printed at Oxford in 1769, which was superintended by Dr Blyney; yet it has been ascertained that there are at least 116 errors in it. These errors were discovered in printing an edition in London in 1806, which has been considered very correct; yet Dr Lee says that that edition contains a great number of mistakes. The Rev. Dr Curtis, at Islington, corroborated Dr Lee's evidence. He stated his general impression to be, that the text of the English Bible is incorrect, and he gives a great variety of instances. Dr Adam Clarke, in his Preface to the Bible, states that he has corrected many thousand errors in the Italic, and that the Italic, in general, are said to be in a very incorrect state. Between the Oxford edition of 1830 and the Cambridge edition there are 800 variations in the Psalms alone. The Rev. Mr Horne, in his "Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures," makes the following observation:—"Bookellers' Edition, 1806.—In the course of printing, by Woodfall, this edition from the Cambridge copy, a great number of very gross errors was discovered in the latter, and the errors of the common Oxford edition are not so few as 1200." Mr Offer, a retired bookseller, who had made a collection of upwards of 400 Bibles of different editions, stated that he was not aware that any edition he had examined was without errors; but Pasham's Bible, in 1776, and another printed at Edinburgh, in 1811, were the most accurate and most beautiful he had found. Now, it will be observed that the former was printed by a private individual, the monopoly being evaded by putting at the bottom of the page very short notes, which were cut off in the binding. The same witness afterwards remarks, "that there never was an elegant edition of the Bible printed by the King's printers. The elegant editions have been those of Baskerville and Macklin; and Hepenstall, and Ritchie, and Bowyer; and the whole of these were printed with colourable notes. He also stated that the effect of the patents had been to limit the circulation of the Scriptures; and that, if the patents were intended to secure the purity of the text and improve the printing, they had certainly been productive of a very different result.

With regard, again, to the price of Bibles, all the persons unconnected with the patentees, who were examined, gave a very decided opinion that it was increased by the monopoly from 50 to 60 per cent. Several of the witnesses were printers and booksellers, and produced detailed estimates of the rates at which they were willing to furnish Bibles, of the same quality as those printed by the King's printers. These estimates, together with the evidence of the witnesses, were most rigidly scrutinized, not only by the members of the committee, but by persons connected with the monopolists; but they were not at all shaken. Dr Lee produced an estimate of the rate at which an eminent printer in Edinburgh would print such Bibles as were printed by the King's printers; and the difference was very great. Thus the 24mo Bible, sold by the Queen's printer to the trade, in sheets, for 2s., could be furnished for 9d. An octavo Bible, with marginal references, sold at present for 6s. 6d., could be furnished for 2s. 10d. A quarto Bible, sold at present for 9s. 6d., could be furnished for 3s. 8d. Mr John Childs, an extensive English printer, thus sums up the result of his calculations:—"The minion Testament, which sells wholesale at 1s., ought to be sold for 6d. or 7d.; the brier Testament, which sells for 10d., ought to be sold for 7d., or 7½d.; the small pica Bible, which sells for 7s. 3d., ought to be sold for 4s. 3d. or 4s. 6d.; the minion Bible, which sells for 4s. 8d., ought to be sold for 3s. or 3s. 3d." He also stated, that the Bible Society have, since the commencement of the institution, paid more, by half a million sterling, for Bibles, than they ought to have done. A great mass of evidence, to the same effect, will be found appended to the report. On the whole, the result of the opinions of the clergymen, booksellers, and printers examined is, that the monopoly enjoyed by the Queen's printer is most injurious to the accuracy and elegance of the Bible; that it has had no effect whatever in preserving the purity of the text; that it has increased from 50 to 60 per cent. the price of all descriptions of Bibles; and has tended most materially to limit the circulation of the Scriptures. The plan proposed by Lord John Russell will lessen the competition in printing Bibles; and will thus perpetuate, to a great extent, all the evils which the patents hitherto granted to the Queen's printers have been proved to produce.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

Manchester.—The state of trade is by no means improved; it is most difficult to effect sales, and profit is not thought of; all energies are devoted to selling and producing without loss. Many cases may be cited where parties have embarked £80,000 or £100,000 in machinery, and buildings for cotton-spinners, and are losing hundreds of pounds every week in wear and tear, interest, and fixed expenses. Owing to the high price of food in this country, foreign markets are gradually closing against our manufacturers. Lancashire used mainly to supply Russia with cotton manufactures; but, in 1820, cotton manufactures were commenced in Moscow; and now they are so much extended, that they supply nearly all the cotton goods consumed in Russia. Spinning, weaving, dyeing, and printing are going on with all the facilities which low-priced food, combined with British skill and British-made machinery, can give. Twist and some fine muslins we still export to Russia, but printed goods are strictly prohibited.—Oldham. The cotton trade in this town has become depressed, owing to the high price of the raw material, and the obstacles placed in the way of trade by the Corn-Laws. Four mills have been entirely stopped; twenty-eight are working short time—that is, from four to five days a-week; and only nine mills working full time.—Wigan. A great number of hands are wholly unemployed, and the high price of provisions adds to the distress of the poor.—Yorkshire. There has been a slight demand for coarse fabrics for exportation; the home demand for which has most materially declined, in consequence of the inability of the working classes to purchase clothing, from the exorbitant prices they have to pay for subsistence. This effect has been felt more sensibly in the agricultural districts than in towns; which shows that labourers are not benefited by dear corn.

Mr Spring Rice has renewed the existing exorbitant sugar duties: 24s. a cwt. on the produce of British colonies, and £3:3s. on foreign sugar. Mr Ewart and others wished such a reduction as would admit the latter into home consumption; but Mr Rice resisted, although he admitted that a reconsideration of the duties was desirable. They should be reduced to one-half or one-third of their present amount; and we doubt not that the increase of consumption would, in a few years—as took place in the case of coffee—produce more revenue than the high duties bring at present. Since the reduction of the duty on East India sugar, the consumption has increased fifty per cent. The discriminating duty between foreign and British plantation sugar ought either to be entirely removed, or at least greatly reduced, especially as we have paid twenty millions to the West Indian planters, and the price of sugar is rapidly rising. The Gazette average price of West India muscovado sugar, for the week ending 11th June, was 41s. 2d., and for the corresponding week last year, 34s. This is exclusive of duty.

INDELIBLE INK.—After all the efforts of the Edinburgh savans, it appears that indelible ink is yet a discovery to be made. Dr Traill's ink, as we understand the matter, is indelible only if written on unsized paper, so that it may sink into it and not be washed off, without the destruction of the paper itself. Dr Veitch's corrodes the paper; so that with either of them, there must be cloth, a stronger paper, or some other substance attached to the back of the paper written on; a circumstance which will effectually prevent either from ever being extensively used in practice. Within these few months, the Edinburgh banks have lost considerable sums by means of alterations on letters of credit: in one case, instead of four pounds, the real amount, four hundred was substituted; and several other frauds of a similar kind have been successfully perpetrated. The objections against using a peculiar kind of paper, as proposed by the Committee of the Society of Arts, who examined Dr Traill's ink, are numerous and obvious; but, perhaps, one of the most important is, that a letter written on the peculiar paper, would be speedily recognised by every one; the consequence of which would be, that the chance of its safe transmission would be diminished in a very great degree, and the risk of loss, which at present, in the case of letters of credit, lies on the bank, would, in general, be shifted to the public. We suspect that, in the execution, subscription, and authentication of documents, much more faith is given to the present methods than they deserve, and that the time is not far distant when very little credit indeed will be attached to a written document of itself, whether it be a bank note, letter of credit, or solemn deed, unless there be some collateral evidence to support it. We are afraid that there is taking place in this species of defence against fraud, the same thing which occurred a century and a-half ago in the science of fortification—viz., that the attack is becoming too powerful for the defence. Before the days of Vauban and Cohorn, places fortified according to the rules of art were impregnable; but these engineers devised a system of attack which no fortress, unless situated on a high and inaccessible rock, or surrounded by water, could resist for two months. Two of the latest instances of this irresistible power of attack was the capture of Huningue, near Basle, in 1814, and of Antwerp, one of the strongest fortresses in Europe, in less than eight weeks in the middle of the winter of 1832. In the same way, the forgers appear to have got too strong for the safeguard so long held to be impregnable, afforded by written instruments and signatures; and at present there appears to be little chance of their defeat. We observe that, in England, an ink made, or pretended to be made, from the oxide of manganese, is said to be indelible, after being written with “for a length of time”—how long is not specified; and we strongly suspect that the proprietor will not venture to send any specimens for trial to this city, nor subject it to the test of chloride of lime.

AGRICULTURE.

In all parts of the country the crops have suffered much by the long-continued cold and dry weather; and they are generally thin on the ground. Wheat, however, if we have a few showers of rain soon, promises to be an average crop; and the same may be said of oats and barley. Notwithstanding the dryness of the soil when potatoes were planted, we have heard of very few instances of a failure. Turnips were sown in the finest order, but few fields have yet braided. Pastures are barer than they have been at this season since 1826, and the hay crop will everywhere turn out very short. The red-clover is hardly to be seen in most fields; and as it has become, of late years, more and more difficult to rear, it is worthy of the attention of agriculturists, whether some other of the numerous species of clovers, or congenerous plants, ought not to be substituted for it. Some experiments ought to be made whether the steeping of the seeds of the red clover in some liquid before sowing, would not make them germinate more freely. Many years ago, Humboldt found that seeds, twenty or thirty years old, and which constantly refused to germinate, grew very readily when steeped, previously to being sown, in the following solution:—A cubic inch of water, a teaspoonful of common muriatic acid or spirit of salt, and two teaspoonfuls of the black oxide of manganese. These materials are cheap, and may be procured in any apothecary's shop. The seeds must be taken out of the mixture as soon as there is the least appearance of germination, otherwise they will be destroyed. This method of treating seeds, which have lost, in a great measure, their power of germination, by long keeping, has been repeated with success, by Jacquin, and other botanists, but has never, we believe, been applied to agriculture. The average price of wheat having risen, the duty fell to 6s. 8d., and 180,000 quarters were entered in London alone, at that duty; leaving only 20,000 in bond. This shews the general opinion of corn-merchants, that prices are not likely to rise much for some months. Some doubt has been expressed how far the lowering of the duty was fairly brought about. This much is certain, that in the twenty weeks ending 1st June, the average supply of wheat at Boston was 1191 quarters; but, in the week ending 8th June, the quantity suddenly rose to 6971 quarters. The machine for making drain-tiles, invented by the Marquis of Tweeddale, is found to answer admirably. With one man and two boys to attend, it will make 10,000 drain-tiles, fifteen inches long, in a day, and 20,000 of the flat tiles for the bottom of the drain. A man with two assistants, under the old system, could not make more than 1000 drain-tiles, twelve inches long, in a day. Hence the invention must lessen the price of tiles, and encourage the frequent-draining system.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

AUGUST, 1839.

THE LION OF THE COTERIES.*

WE took up this fiction, expecting nothing more from its catching title than, at best, a clever fashionable novel of the current season, 1839. And this it is, and a brilliant one; but had it not been something more, it would not be considered worthy of a formal introduction to the readers of this Magazine. In the remarkable novel of "Ethel Churchill," Miss Landon traced the career of a genius and literary adventurer, the real though the poetical hero of her beautiful and unhealthy romance; but her Man of Genius was invested with far more dignity and intellectual vigour than the modern "Lion of the Coteries." He too is a genius—all lions are geniuses—and, if a much less noble animal than the creation of L. E. L., he is one far more likely to be met with in the higher latitudes; so that the moral of the tale, if less pathetic, is of wider application, and, therefore, more likely to be useful to British lions and their hunters, exhibitors, and torturers. We are beginning to indulge a selfish hope that America may supply us with the greater part of our lions, as we, in turn, furnish it with stars. Meanwhile the genus, in its grand characteristics and nicer distinctions, has never been half so well described before. Robert Brandon is a born genius; he is of the poetical temperament; he is a vain, shy, sensitive, selfish, and feeble-minded young poet, educated in unfortunate social circumstances, and, as he grows up, gradually developing all the features of the lion tribe. A little more heart, or a little more firm principle, would have saved him; but, with a very slender share of either, though his selfish weakness takes the semblance of tenderness, he gradually becomes ambitious of the poor distinctions of lionism in fashionable and literary circles, and deservedly incurs the whips and spurs which every weak and low-born aspirant after such honours must sooner or later bear.

The moral of the tale lies deep in the morbid vanity and selfishness of what are supposed the finer natures among our species. Ostensibly it hinges upon the ridiculous folly of the female patronesses of literary talent, and upon the silly and contemptible pursuits, and sickly vanity and conceit of literary aspirants. And never, we imagine, were warnings, lessons, and solemn and severe rebuke, more required than at the present moment, when hosts of young persons, much less favoured by Nature than "The Lion of the Coteries," begin to write before they can well read, or, at all events, before they have read more than Robert Brandon, when he composed those poems, novels, and dramas, which his chief exhibitor, Lady Garston, pronounced worthy of Scott or Coleridge. Were the thousand and one rhymsters contented with composition merely, no great harm and much good might result. At the worst, the infliction of bad or mediocre poetry could not extend beyond the immediate circle of the poet, nor be more intolerable than those indifferent musical performances which, by tacit consent, half the fashionable world is privileged to inflict upon the other half. "Listen to my ode, if I must hear your overture," would be but a fair bargain, and the world none the loser. But the misery is, that one and all must publish, and insist upon being read; and are seriously affronted if they be not exhibited, carressed, praised, and dandled as a magnificent if fangless lion. It is fortunate for "his own peace," when inordinate vanity leads the lion into the fond belief that it is the cupidity of publishers, or the secret envy and malevolence of friends, that prevent the approbation due to his transcendent genius, and that all the booksellers in London are in a conspiracy to stifle his productions, save the one who, publishing them, either neglects the work, or else enriches himself upon the plunder of the luckless author.

But the calamities of literary lionism form but one though the prominent feature of this very clever novel.

"How do you like my book?" is the question put by the anonymous author to the public after his friend had damped his hopes; and we venture to reply, in name of a large portion of that public—"Vastly do we like your book, combining, as it really does—and no joke—French brilliancy, with German pathos and that sound masculine stamen which is so eminently characteristic of our own favoured island."

And thus the wondrous book opens:—In a nameless county in England stood Merivale Abbey, to which, one mild autumn afternoont Sir Frank, afterwards Lord Merivale, brough, home his bride. Their's had been a love match, for Lady Merivale was, it was whispered, only a physician's daughter; but then, in one word, "she was," in form and mind, "like one of Shakspeare's women;" and we leave it to imagination to fill up the glorious outline. In an old gallery-chamber of the Abbey, full of gorgeous antique decorations and pictures—to which the young bride and her bridesmaids were conducted by the lord of the mansion—two children were found at play; one was a thoughtful-looking and intelligent but plain girl of twelve years of age, supporting and partly bending over a sleeping boy, many years younger than herself, and beautiful as a slumbering Cupid. He was the little thoughtful maiden's nephew, and already the object of all her love and care—an infant Shakspeare: in short, an embryo poet, though he only turned out "The Lion of the Coterie." The waking eyes of the boy, who was roughly shaken up by Mrs Latimer, "the fat faithful housekeeper," rested on the floating vision of a stately and lovely lady; and by that wondering gaze were they first unsealed, and privileged to hold communion with the spiritual world of beauty and romance. Robin Brandon—for that was the homely appellation of the infant poet—and his guardian genius, Ursula, sometimes came, by the gracious consent of Mrs Latimer, to this grand old gallery, not to play, but to look at the pictures; and already Robin had singled out, for admiration and worship, a fine portrait of Sir Philip Sydney, because the housekeeper said he had been a great poet. The little sedate maiden, colouring deeply, declined the gold which Lady Merivale offered her; and, tying on the large straw hat of her self-chosen charge, she curtsied once again, and led him away, while the fascinated child stole one more look of the beautiful lady of his future romance. How so matter-of-fact, hard, and stern a man as old John Brandon, the merchant's clerk, came to be the father of the kind-hearted, womanly, and disinterested Ursula, and the grandfather of the embryo poet, would not, we apprehend, be easily accounted for upon phrenological principles; but Ursula's estimable character was probably of Heaven's direct formation, not of parental transmission; and as to the boy, with the weakness and vacillation of his father, "old Brandon's" only child by his first wife—as Ursula, after many years, was his sole offspring by a second marriage—the infant genius, with the feeble moral energies of his father, might have inherited the poetical temperament of his Italian mother. Her's was a melancholy story. She was the penniless daughter of a decayed Italian nobleman. Young Brandon had become enamoured of her while clerk in a Leghorn house, and they made an imprudent marriage. Shortly after their marriage, he was accidentally drowned; and the child, whose birth the young widow did not survive, arrived, to the unwelcome surprise of the regular, formal, and parsimonious old clerk, at his wifeless domicile. Shortly afterwards he retired to the red-brick dwelling, with its oyster-shell bordered grass plat, and clipped cypress trees, in the vicinity of Merivale. As old Brandon supplied the vacancies in his matrimonial affections upon the same principle which led him to get a new leger when the old one was completely filled, he was now about choosing a third helpmate in the well-gathered Mrs Latimer, and hence the admittance which the children found to the Abbey, amidst whose glades and glooms the Genius was fostered.

Your Lion of the coterie is rarely, if ever, found in the first order of genius,—in that of genius, "resolute, aspiring, but cheerful also," or as a Genius who cheerfully fulfils duties to which he feels himself superior; or who, nobler still—

"The humblest duties on himself does lay"—the genius unconscious, and yet instinct with the feeling of his own powers, and of the immortality which, in spite of every obstacle, shall one day grace his name, if he work for and deserve it. Such a genius was not Robert Brandon; but let his fashioner describe him; for, though not intentionally, we fancy he occasionally rather overrates the morbid vain-glorious order, which, upon the whole, he describes with exquisite skill and discrimination.

He belonged to that second and (to the million) more interesting order of spirits, who are ardent, warm, and sensitive; worshipping, indeed, Truth and Beauty, but aiming how they shall make themselves, rather than their divinity, eminent;—scorning the world in outward deed, but, in heart, craving with an unhealthy appetite for the world's sympathy, and preferring even its enmity to its total indifference.

Brought up from his earliest infancy without toys—his only playmate in sobriety ten years older than himself, and a girl—everything in which he took delight, the books, the shows, nay, the very walks wherein he fed his passion for natural beauty, ministered to him surreptitiously, and at best scantily. Aware that an impassable chasm separated him from his guardian and natural protector, it is hardly to be wondered that he became self-engrossed at an unusually early age. Even at the early age of twelve years, there may be felt a passion for "the pomps and vanities," as strong as ever stimulated the least lazy among the epicureans. The same imagination which, at one time, steeped Robert in visions of rocks and waterfalls, of enchanted damsels and knights "pricking o'er the plain," of grim phantoms looming large over the mountain's brow, or milder angels floating in the last crimson of day—in another reverie would stir him up to hunger after wealth and magnificence, to think wistfully of the great ones of the earth, whose gratified wish was thrice valuable because it was far-fetched and dearly bought.

Robert had not wandered through the gilded chambers of Merivale Abbey in vain. Many a tear had he wept on returning to his hard little bed at home, while he prayed for but a dream which should change him into a rich man's son and heir.

The Genius was, on many accounts, unpopular at school. He was shabbily dressed, without pocket-money, and, if not cowardly, nervous and inept at ball, marbles, and leap-frog; victimized by his richer, ruder, and more manly companions, and loathing at last the very name of his unsuitable school. The social educational circumstances under which the character of the Genius was formed and developed were not healthy. His grandfather's excess of cold severity, and the equally pernicious excess of tenderness and indulgence displayed by his youthful aunt, had alike fostered his selfishness, and the school finished their work. After leaving the hated school, the first trial of the boy of genius was being put apprentice to a merchant. "What would you be?" asked his tender, sympathizing, and strong-minded aunt, now a woman of twenty-two years, while Robert remained a dreaming child of fifteen—"What would you be, had you the power to choose to-morrow?"

"What is the use of choosing—what is the use of fancying things which can never be?"

"Never is not a man's word, Robin!"

"But my grandfather has fixed for me; I am to go into that hateful office of Mr Turnham's; where is the use of thinking?"

"Your grandfather has done his best for you; but why should you not do better for yourself if you can? For shame! to talk in that doleful way before you are fifteen. . . . What have you been writing all these mornings, when you have got up so early?"

"Oh, nothing—don't ask me," replied Robert, blushing like a girl.

"What a strange, strange fellow you are! To be sure I don't understand your verses—some of them—and you are wrong to make them all so dismal—but there's no earthly reason why you should say, 'Nothing, don't ask me!' to me! What is it about this time?"

"I'll tell you what it is about, Ursula," replied the boy, to whose taste the turn which the conversation was taking was very consoling—"perhaps a pair of lovers I saw walking across Church Meadow on Friday, and talking so earnestly—a pair of lovers, I am positive, Aunt Ursula! Philip Warren was one of them too."

It was now the maiden's turn to reddens.—

At sixteen, Robert was fixed in his mercantile apprenticeship, in spite of the entreaties and remonstrances of Ursula, who told her father she was sure he would not make a good man of business, and that he would be uncomfortable. "Uncomfortable indeed! I suppose nothing will make him comfortable but to turn a play-actor! Has Mrs Latimer walked down to-day?" Poor Ursula! her own private cares had been increasing, and those which sprang from the Genius overwhelmed her. There was a coarse step-dame in prospect; and her lover, Philip Warren, was unworthy of her. To a capitally-painted set of clerks, Robin was duly introduced. First, Mr Dickinson, who had a political bias, though no one could tell to what side, at home, as it was foreign dynasties in which he took the principal interest; next, Mr Wigley, a little pale-faced man, with weak eyes, and a head covered with soft fur rather than hair, and who had a propensity towards natural history, kept a dormouse and a bottled snake under his desk, and was the receiver-general of all the gigantic moths, or Lilliputian and queerly constructed beetles found near the premises; and, finally, old Mr Godsal, who was a bit of a beau, and an admirer of the ladies, Ursula especially; with Mr Ashmole, who was serious, and had been suspected of preaching under trees, on Sundays, in some of the neighbouring villages. He seldom spoke in the office, save to reprove Dickinson for swearing, or the boy Robin, whom he instructed, for reading profane plays. About this time, there came a rumour of Lord Merivale being put in nomination for the borough of Merivale upon the Liberal interest; and many gossiping stories in consequence appeared in The John Bull, insinuating, among other things, that the admired Lady Merivale was no better than she should be, and lived on very bad terms with her husband. Among their political opponents was the Reverend Mr Russett, a jovial, gourmandizing, Tory parson, who, one morning, came to old Brandon, to fix the marriage between his worthless nephew and own Ursula, or rather to advance the interests of the Tory candidate. The Merivales had lived too much abroad for his taste.

"Too much Popery there, sir, for people to touch and not get a taste of! What with their Sunday doings, and their crosses, and their churches open all day, and then those Carbonated fellows in Italy—some of the first families mixed up with that, The John Bull says—and who knows if Lord Merivale has kept out of their way, even if my Lady hadn't had odd fancies of her own."

"My Lady?" repeated Ursula, in spite of herself, listening and interested at this part of the conversation.

"Ay, God bless her! she's— we won't say what she is, if all tales are true. Did you read the skit in The John Bull, sir, about her, last week? . . . Depend upon it, they're sharp fellows in that John Bull—nothing gets put in for nothing. I say, sir, that paper is a fine thing for the country; and those people who have married nobodies—what better is one to expect from them."

The reverend admirer of The John Bull had begun to joke John Brandon on the charms and other good gifts of Mrs Latimer, when the bashful old gentleman exclaimed—

"Pshaw! Mr Russett—do let us come to the business in hand."

"In a moment, sir, when I have finished my tea and toast. Business, at breakfast, to my mind, is just as much out of place as prayers at a wedding-party—and that's the Ranters' fashion, sir. When my cousin, Helen Russett, married Mr Macviper—Macviccar, I mean—there they all were, after breakfast, on their knees, and turning up the whites of their eyes—shocking! shocking! 'Good folks,' said I, 'there's no devotion here to my mind; and, as an old-fashioned clergyman, I can't sanction any such doings, so I shall go into a corner, and read the Luminary, till you have done.' Dreadful work, sir, those Ranters make of it! One of them took it into his head to talk to me about my latter end. 'Sir,' replied I, 'I am old enough to be your father, and have preached the Gospel these forty years. You never heard me tell, did you, that people could not go to heaven, save they went through my turnpike?' He'll never attack me again, I promise you.—Another cup, Miss Ursula:—you see I eat a country breakfast."

Ursula, overcome by that near prospect of the advent of Mrs Latimer which this conversation indicated, escaped to a charming rural walk, whither she was followed by her lover, Mr Russett's nephew;

A handsome young man, with a countenance rather gay than intelligent, and a liveliness in the colours of his dress, and a vivacity in his motions, which might have caused those who forget that in love, like does not always attract like, to wonder that such a youth should have sought to marry the sober, placid, thoughtful Ursula. Slanderous tongues, it is true, had assigned as reason for such a choice the pretty fortune it was expected she would inherit on her father's death.

The pleadings of this gay admirer for an early marriage were damped by the maternal concern of Ursula for her poor boy, Robin, between whom and her father she could scarcely keep peace. Her petulant lover told her that she was looking ten years older, and that she had worn herself out with her care for that boy.

"What would you have? I have stood in a mother's place to the boy ever since he was born—and he has a sweet noble nature of his own, if it had only fair play."

"I see nothing but selfishness, Ursula."

She winced as if stung—for what could prompt so cutting a remark but temper—selfish temper? But a true woman forgets and loves on.

Ursula refused to marry while her mind was encumbered by heavy cares for Robin; but, in her heart, she felt that Philip might have pleaded with greater energy and earnestness. The intended marriage of her father had made her a less desirable match to Mr Sparker's spendthrift clerk; and when, after a long distressing conversation, they parted, Ursula clasped her hands firmly together, and said—"It is all over between us!" Meanwhile, the contested election was coming on; and Robin, hating his employment and his companions, was daily angering his grandfather by taking long romantic strolls in the park of the Abbey, and composing poetry.

One of Robert's fellow apprentices, and his familiar, (Anthony Cherry by name,) is, take him for all in all, a creation which does more honour to the lively talents of the author than the Genius himself. The young man is first introduced in contrast with Robin, who is leaning over his desk, furtively writing impassioned verses.

"Well, that's poetry, I suppose," spoke one who leaned over his shoulder, and was not to be restrained, by any delicacy, from deliberately acquainting himself with the whole contents of Robin's half-hidden treasure. Never were two heads more strikingly contrasted than that of the poet, beautifully formed, and pensive, and gentle in its features, and the bullet-head—garnished with rebellious wiry hair, and shrewd, keen, dancing eyes, and an ugly triangular nose, queer enough to have been stolen from some ancient idol—which belonged to his friend and crony, Anthony Cherry. "Well, that's poetry, I suppose; and this is how he never gets his books balanced. Come, come, Robin, this will never do; Rockliff will be round in ten minutes, and I'll bet any money you are not ready for him. Shake yourself, I say; they'll say you have been out larking last night, and, God knows, what not."

"Oh—I beg your pardon—I am sorry—Cherry, is that you? What a dream you have disturbed me in."

"Hang it! what right have you to be dreaming this time of day—it's an old man's work. How are you to get on in the world with your dreams, think you? Come, let's see—I'll run up that column in a moment, for I'm sure, before I look at it, it's wrong. Bundle your poetry out of the way, and let me come. Six and four are ten, and—they say Sparker's coming down this morning in full fig to canvass the office—seventy-one—five—eighty-three—why, what a fellow you are!—nine and tenpence, not nine and eightpence. What's there? another scrap of poetry? Well, I'd rather not be you, if Rockliff gets hold of it. Have you a headach again, man? It's a shame—five thousand nine hundred and sixty-five pounds eighteen and tenpence. There's your balance for you—stick in the figures yourself. Devil take it! can't you even do that without making a blot? You've not got the right use of your hands, I must say. Keep away! I'll scratch it out for you."

"Oh, thank you, Cherry, thank you very much."

"So you ought. What would you do without me, I should be glad to know? and why couldn't you do all that before you began to dream?"

Mr Sparker, the Tory candidate, was the sleeping partner of this house; and the clerks were mostly voters, and ought to have been all

Tories. The ostentatious merchant, with his taste for the fine arts, is well described before he arrives to canvass them. Of Ashmole alone he was doubtful; but he reckoned without his host.

"Did you hear Ashmole?" said Cherry, taking Brandon by the arm. "Did you see Ashmole's tough look this morning? I fancy the Squire don't expect it; but it is not the last of the kind he'll get, I promise him. What are you, Robin? a Tory?"

"I a Tory! no, indeed, Cherry; my grandfather is a Tory."

"Ay, I thought your opinions would go so—that's the way many make up their minds. Well, I'm not a Tory either, though I don't know much about my grandfather. Anyhow, I'll be hanged if I'm going to work for Sparker."—"Work?"—"Work, to be sure; and what a pity it is that you have not a better notion of working, Robin. Lord, if I were you, I'd do something with myself. What was I four years ago? Why, a little shabby errand-boy in a printer's office—I don't care who knows it!—kicked out of doors because my father happened to have too many children, and my mother did not care about me because I was so like him. Well, they are both safe in Canada, that's lucky. Give me only elbow-room, and I'll get on, as sure as my name's Cherry."

And he did get on. His keen eye to the main chance, his high animal spirits, alertness, imperturbable assurance, and perfect self-possession, were ultimately irresistible. They were so from his very first start. He had had the luck to oblige old Turnham, the printer, in some small matter; but he was not going to be an errand-boy all his life, not he, nor yet a printer. He kept his eyes open, and picked up what he could, scraped and saved, and bought a book or two, and finally accumulated enough, by his industry, to buy a new coat.

"Never ask any one to help you when you're seedy," said Cherry, "help yourself, and shew you can do 'em some credit before you ask them to do anything for you. Well, Turnham was glad enough to have me; some of his young hands, I suspect, are but a heavy bargain! I'd not go on as you do if you'd pay me for it. Why, rather than do nothing, I'd even make money of my verses, if I could not help rhyming."

Robin blushed like a girl, to hear his art spoken of so disrespectfully! and to be told in the same breath of the chances it gave him of advancing himself! . . . He wished Cherry would go, and leave him to digest his thoughts. "Are you coming along with me to Merivale?"

"Part of the way, I am, for I want to talk to you. I say, let me have some of your fine poetry, and let me see whether the people in The Flying Post will give you anything for it. I've heard of poetry being paid for.—Write a welcome home to Lord Merivale—or a squib about Sparker; something folks want to hear about; none of your Masquerades of Silence, and so forth, which no one can understand.—Come you shall make a squib about Sparker!"

"But, Cherry, you don't understand these things—make a squib?"

"It's you who don't understand—Lord! there are plenty of good stories of Sparker—how when he went to Rossington, he took the Lady's maid for Lady Milsom—can't you get up a ballad upon that, and you might make it out that he kissed her; and how he got done in London out of a hundred pounds by one of those sharpers—a fellow who set up for a lord. I say, Robin, I should like to try my luck in London—they won't do me, though! Or make it about how he got drunk at the coursing meeting, and wanted to fight Colonel Green—and who made the apology next morning. Sparker is a sneak! he asked Turnham whether he'd taken me off the parish, and I heard Turnham answer, 'he'll be of famous use at your election,—‘Will I?’ thinks I, ‘that’s not office work—and I’m booked for Lord Merivale.’—Always stick by a real nobleman, Robin, and not one of your would-be fine fellows, if you mean to get on. We’ll have famous fun with Sparker!—and I’ll take care he never knows who works him—Ay, and he grudged me the fifty pounds a-year they’re going to give me, and said, ‘why don’t you make that other lazy fellow work?’—Gad, he’d make a handsome lady’s footman. He was you, Robin—how would you like to wait upon Ma’am’selle?”

“Sparker make me work!—Cherry, I never tried to write a squib—but I do think I will try. I hope Lord Merivale will get the election.”

“That’s right! that’s politics! but besides having a grudge against Sparker, I am for liberty and no taxes!—Leave me alone, and see if I don’t get in with Lord Merivale—Ay, and you too—if you will do as one bids you, like a man.”

Robin’s conscience, or his pride, was dissatisfied with the task assigned him; but he wrote serious poetry, and The Flying Post published it; and the editor begged to hear again from his “gifted correspondent.” The Genius, besides dislike of Sparker, was secretly fascinated by the old aristocratic family, the venerable Abbey, and, above all, the stately and beautiful lady of the gallery-chamber, whose encouraging smiles were again, so whispered vanity, to be won by his verses, as they had been by his infant beauty.

It so chanced that he was near the gate of the Abbey, with his crony and master-spirit, Cherry, when Lord Merivale and his Lady arrived. He would have fled, overpowered by his feelings; but Cherry held him fast. His maxim was, never lose a sight when you can get it; and long after the carriage had swept on, there Robert lingered, dreaming, and spell-bound. They had passed in an instant; but it was enough. He had seen the sweet and never-to-be-forgotten smile which lit up the pale but splendid features of Lady Merivale; and he was an imaginative genius and a young poet, and his historian believes that to such a temperament the age of chivalry never will be over.

“Won’t you come away now, Robin? One never knows what to make of you geniuses. I’m all in a shiver with standing, and there’s nothing more to be seen now, I fancy.—You shall come along.—Well, I’m glad Lord Merivale is at home again, if it’s only to put Sparker down. Did you hear of his saying, that all the grand gardens yonder were only fit for a potato-ground for Blottingley? Can’t you put that in your squib? What a pretty woman that Lady Merivale is, I say!”

Brandon turned round, almost fiercely.

“Oh, you’ll move at last! come along then! and I shall make your grandfather and Miss Ursula give me a cup of tea, for bringing you home safely. But not a word of Sparker before him, and not a word of Warren before her, I fancy, eh? Does she know that he is becoming fond of drinking?”

Robin did not hear. Neither Cherry’s audacious self-invitation disturbed his reverie, nor yet the insinuation cast out against the temperance of his one only friend’s betrothed husband. That brilliant speaking smile was still before him, beckoning his fancy onward—onward—whither he stayed not to inquire.

They reached old Brandon’s house while a deeply agitating conversation was going on between the father and daughter, of which he was the subject. She had warned her father of the fearful consequences of his tyranny to the boy, and was quitting the room when she was encountered in the doorway by the complacent face and brisk civility of Cherry.

“Robin’s gone up stairs in one of his fits, and left me to find my way in.—Good evening, Miss Ursula; Good evening, Mr Brandon.—We saw Lord and Lady Merivale come home just now!”

This piece of news was Cherry’s salvation. He was invited to sit down—and then the old man, feeling, perhaps, the presence of a third party to be a relief, asked him to stay and take tea. Robin did not make his appearance;—he was busy up stairs, pouring out rhymes and fantasies, as fast as a shaking hand could pen them.

Cherry had bespoken a squib, but a legend was far more congenial to the young poet, and all night he toiled at the legend which was somehow to be presented to Lady Merivale. The biographer of the Genius must surely have had some personal experiences:—

How eagerly did the young genius toil that night! his pen flying over page after page, with delicious self-confidence, while the perspiration streamed from his brow like rain, and the passage of Time might almost have been counted by the audible throb of his pulses.

“I am wrong,” exclaimed he, springing to his feet, throwing the casement wide, and leaning forth into the gray morning, when his tired hand and burning eye could accomplish no more. “I am wrong and cowardly to bury myself here, wearing my heart out! I will go to London, come what will! Cherry is right—I know I shall be great and famous.”

He began to meditate breaking his indentures and repairing instantly to the metropolis, to become one of its great literary characters. The thoughts of Ursula pressed slightly on his conscience; but she was going to be married, and he could make her such presents.

Great was the disdain of the energetic Cherry, to find that the diatribe was not forthcoming. “Hang it, Robin, what is the good, I wonder, of caring for you? of trying to push you? If you could not make all the squib, you might, at least, have got up a sample to shew a fellow. But a squib there shall be, or my name’s not Anthony. I’ll post off at once to Grimsby, and make him, somehow or other, get me the speech of that P. Z. that makes the verses in his paper—whom all the women are running after—and he shall write one. He’ll do it, I dare say, for half-a-crown or less. None of those sort of folks know the full value of money.”

“Don’t be too sure that he’ll do it at all,” replied Robert, in whose ear the voice of the charmer could hardly have sounded more sweetly than part of Cherry’s speech.—“Running after me—I.”

A round oath of surprise cut him short.

“Me! by George! And so that’s the mystery, to be sure! Why, if that P. Z. be only you, I’ve twenty minds to take and do the thing myself. What can there be in it? Me! who can’t so much as add up a column of figures.”

“Try” replied Brandon, a little piqued; “but what did you mean about people running after me?”

“People! he won’t say women! ha! ha! ha! Why, Robin, do you think I’m such a donkey as to tell you? Let’s get hold of that squib, by ten o’clock to-morrow, and may be I shall enlighten you then. People!—Will you never grow up to be a man, and speak out like a man? Hush! here comes Sparker! Oh, it is to be all civility to-day too, seemingly.”

Sparker was all civility. He graciously gave the Genius a confidential message and a half holiday; and Robin, as of old, lounged away his hours in delicious poetic dreams, in the solemn avenues of Merivale Park, where every tree, every tuft of violets, were to him like old familiar friends. The Merivale post-boy—whom he had been tremulously expecting—chanced to take a near out, through the park, and crossing a stile, met with and gave Robin a London letter; and, light-hearted wretch! whistled on, all unconscious or unheeding of the high import of the missive. Wound up to ecstasy, on the high top-gallant of hope, the Genius durst not yet open the document which was to form his title to a niche in the Temple of Fame. It could only be perused in one chosen spot, under his favourite fir tree, and in deeper solitude; and there, after a little "sweet, reluctant, amorous delay," the letter was opened:—

Alas! for his hopes. Alas! for his certainties. The letter was not even a written one; it was a printed circular, with blanks filled up by a clerk's hand, in which the Editor of The ——— "begged to inform the author of the papers signed 'Vivian,' that in consequence of their being unsuitable for his purpose, they were left as directed, at the office, waiting his disposal!"

The poor feverish author read this doom of his hopes full three times ere he comprehended its whole meaning. Then an intense and scorching blush rose to his features, as if the trees had been cognisant of his foolish and premature exultation; as if they could mock him for the wreck of his dreams, and whisper to each other jeers of the fool who had walked among them, and fancied himself a king and a ruler! . . . "If I were dead," he murmured to himself, "my grandfather would be satisfied, and aunt Ursula married; and myself—I shall never come to good."

"Oh! don't startle me so again," exclaimed a voice close on the other side of an adjacent tree, as much to his amazement as his exclamation had been to its owner's. "Are you come for me? why, there is nobody after all, and yet I am sure a voice told me I should never come to good."

There was another dreamer, in the White Lady's haunted walk, that afternoon; a young girl, also of "the poetical temperament," who had fancied she heard the ghost of Lady Hester Merivale, the subject of Robin's legend. As she fled, she dropt her nosegay, and a book into which all the P. Z.'s—all Robin's poetry had been written in a beautiful hand;—the whole book was devoted to the exulting finder, and from between every page dropped out her marks, rose leaves, and jasmine flowers, and wings of butterflies! and, dearer still, pencilled on the side, were many marks of admiration. Could the unknown owner of the book be the beauty of the gallery-chamber of Merivale? The dream, faintly indulged, was rudely dispelled. Lord Merivale, who rode by with his steward, sharply reproved the intruder upon a solitude where Lady Merivale was likely often to walk; and, finally, said, tossing a shilling to him, "And boy, as you are here, open the gate, and have the goodness never to leave the high-road again."

It was not many days after this that Lady Merivale read to her husband and her guests the Legend of Merivale Abbey; and, when she had finished, inquired if her husband would not like to know who had woven so romantic a story (which had been laid before her by the scheming Latimer) about the two old pictures in the wizard's closet.

"I think," replied Lord Merivale, in his driest tone, "that the writer, whoever he be, might have spent his time better than in manufacturing such ———. It is the little boy, I suppose, of whom you reminded me just now; and so he is to turn out 'the mute inglorious Milton' of the parish, Isabella?"

His tone did not encourage Lady Merivale to proceed, and she wisely resolved to defer further mention of her prodigy to another hearing.

We intend to cut the fashionables, and all their scandals and tracasseries; also the electioneering, the politicians, and all their arts and tricks, and to stick to the Genius; but another group—the three Miss Warbles, as represented by Miss Warble, are irresistible.

The family of the Abbey, and their guests, were one day caught in a hail-storm, when out on horseback, and forced to take shelter under a stable-yard portal.

They had not been here two moments, before there issued from the portly mansion to which their shelter was an appendage, the properest of middle-aged footmen, clad in a rich livery, and bursting with civility and consequence. "His ladies," he said, with a flourish, "desired their best compliments, and were quite ashamed that it should hail so; but they hoped that the party would do them the honour to alight, and take shelter till the storm should be over. "Miss Warble," he added, "would have come out herself, but for her hoarseness."

"Miss Warble—does she live here still?" exclaimed Lord Merivale, in the blitheest tone his lady had heard for many a day. "You must have heard me talk, Isabella, of the famous luncheons she used to give me when I was a Harrow boy, shooting down at Merivale. We shall be most happy to avail ourselves of her hospitality. Come, Isabella, here is a charming opportunity for you to practice popularity-seeking. The best soul in the world! and a little blue!"

A few steps across a court-yard, and the pursy Mercury, throwing open a glass door, ushered the Merivale party into the mansion of the Warbles. Comfort was everywhere visible even in its outworks—soft carpets, massive shutters, doors, through which no wind could pierce. A rich, but not a coarse odour of cookery, suggested the neighbourhood of a kitchen, while works of art, numerous rather than choice, in the shape of framed embroideries, landscapes, maps, &c., hung about in the passages, proved that the owners of this paradise were liberal in mind, as well as in purse.

"O my Lord; O my Lady; O!" . . . was the greeting of the foremost Miss Warble, as she ambled forward to receive her guests—"What a pleasure is this—What an honour!" and a cluster of tassels which hung from her broad-spreading turban, nodded, responsive to her welcome. "I was saying, do you know, to our good friend the Archdeacon, only yesterday, that I really thought I might venture, for old acquaintance sake, to pay my respects to your Lordship at the Abbey—but now! . . . My Lady, will you allow me to present my sisters to you—Miss Joanna Warble, Miss Pyarea Warble," and two more turbans nodded sociable things, as the party sat down. Miss Warble, however, continued to be the principal speaker. Miss Joanna, in fact, was a trifle serious as it is styled, and not disposed to be fluent, save in her own coterie. She was, nevertheless, a pious charitable woman. Miss Pyarea had yet fewer claims on society; she had little to say, save to echo her sisters; but she had accomplishments—was indefatigably notable. The Queen had seen some of her cuttings in paper at a bazaar, and had asked who had done them.

"Now, I am sure, I had quite a presentiment at breakfast time—had I not Joanna? that something was about to happen to-day. Well, my Lady, and so you are really come back to make us all happy, by settling among us; and Lord Merivale, too, going to do our town honour. It is quite delightful: I was saying so to the girls this very morning. You've enjoyed your tour, I'm sure; but then you travel everywhere with such advantages. Now with us poor spinsters it is up-hill work. I declare, I always put Mrs Warble upon my trunks, when I go about—and it is hard, for I'm as fond of a journey as I was when I was sixteen. Would you not take any thing after your ride? Agnes, ring the bell for Crombie. Where's Agnes Gray?"

"Here, Aunt," said a gentle voice, as a girl in deep mourning crept timidly from behind the shelter of an ample bow-window curtain to obey the summons.

"A little charge of ours," Lady Merivale, sadly timid and strange, poor thing; but she will be cured, by and by; and the sweetest singer. Well, but my Lord, I must not have all the talk to myself. And, so you really are going to be so obliging as to stand for our town?"

"I am glad you take it so kindly, Miss Warble; then I may hope for your interest."

"Surely, my Lord, surely. O dear, yes! my interest, indeed. I don't see, though, why women should not vote. Joanna, there, I am afraid, would be against you, my Lord; she's very fond of the Church, and we have our little disputes sometimes. But I'm a Liberal! I cannot bear being behind the time. Why, if the world goes round, should not we go with it? And our friend, the Archdeacon, when I say so to him, asks me how I should like a Republic. Crombie—luncheon."

"Lord Merivale remembers your luncheons, Miss Warble, and most tenderly, I assure you."

"I am sorry to hear it, my Lady," every feature of her honest countenance belying her words; "having come to an awkward age for remembrances. And so you have been to see Lady Lillias' tomb? I call that a great curiosity, and I am something, as you may see, of a curiosity lover. I like too to encourage the arts in my little way—Agnes Gray, fetch my box of fossils for Lady Merivale."

A suppressed laugh from one of the party behind her had very nearly overset Lady Merivale's good-natured composure; but the further trial of the box of fossils was spared by the entrance of Crombie with the luncheon, and the beaming hospitality of her hostess, who dispensed the riches of her table, cordially, but without officiousness—for Miss Warble piqued herself on having emancipated herself from "the old school" in all her proceedings.

Matters went on so well that Miss Warble ventured another step—an invitation to dinner to Lord and Lady Merivale.

Your own day—your own hour—our's is six. We have had the pleasure of receiving guests from the Abbey before. Perhaps Lord Merivale may meet a constituent or two. No one, of course, of the Blottingley colour.

"Of course, my Lady, we have no great temptations to hold out to you who have travelled, and with such advantages! but we have a few talented acquaintances, and . . . Agnes Gray, go and find that song of P. Z.'s, which I cut out of Friday's Flying Post, for Lady Merivale to look at—between the leaves of my album you will find it. There's never a bit of poetry worth reading in the Luminary, Mr Sparker's paper."

Lady Merivale rose. She, too, rather feared the reading:—"Pray, my Lady . . . this is such a very brief pleasure—a rose leaf wasted, as Tom Moore would say; but I dare say you have better claims on your time. But Agnes won't be a minute; I wonder whether she will bring the 'Sunset,' or the 'Ruined Well'—that's her favourite, Lady Merivale, for she always deals in the dismal. Must you go, my Lord; I fear Joanna has been letting off some of her tracts at you. She's quite a Dorcas; now, Charity and no cant is my motto! Well, if you must, you must. Piddy, ring the bell. I shall send you my little note in a day or two. My Lord, I wish you all manner of success. That's a shake of the hand I like! Make it a circular, and you win, or my name's not Christiana Warble."

"They went off, leaving the head of the house floating about the room, with a jubilant and nimble step; the last remains of a large store of dancing experience. "A sweet charming woman, a delicious acquisition, and as thorough a lady as ever walked! Here's Agnes at last. Sighing again, always sighing? it's the most foolish habit possible—but to-day it may be for your lost book, so it is not so very unreasonable."

Agnes Gray's sighing, however, was not totally caused less, or to be ascribed to a discontented temper. The story of her birth was one of the many causes of the deep and suspicious resentment entertained by Miss Warble against the owner of Blottingley. Eighteen years ago Lettice Gray had been the confidential servant of the three whimsical sisters. Just then, too, young Sparker had passed the verge of boyhood, insolent with the consciousness of great wealth, which had come upon him with his father's death, and, flushed with that intense desire to distinguish himself as a man of the world, which has prompted many a vulgar and aspiring spirit to plunge out of calculation into the licenses, into which the more generous are hurried by passion. Almost enough is told.

The orphan daughter of the dying Lettice was kindly received by the three spinsters, and treated with the utmost tenderness; but she grew up a melancholy musing girl, and, even as a child, "sighed amid her playthings," and never got rid of the habit.

As the election drew near, a Radical candidate—a capital specimen—started in opposition to both Whig and Tory. Cherry, meanwhile, cheated them all. His character is an argument either for or against the ballot, we cannot say which. He looked with utter contempt on the ragged and haggard Radical tail of the Honourable Mr Pierrepont, though there was something about it which the young poet felt awfully impressive; and he looked with secret admiration at the gallant shows of the Tories.

"After all, Sparker's people have the fun with them. But could you have fancied them such a set of donkeys? They have none of 'em found out which colour I belong to. They have no notion, I warrant them, of a fellow being Independent!"

"That is, wearing one colour, and working for another," said Robert, whom thinking already sometimes made sarcastic.

"Ay, P. Z., is that you? I suppose you would have me kicked out of my office, before I have got hold of Lord Merivale's people! Why, they suspect you, much more than they do me, I can tell you. You sit still, and always look discontented. I rattle about with them, and make a noise, and all's right; but no one knows, eh? what a lot of things I have picked up for Merivale's committee on the sly."

The share Cherry had in the election, and his contemptible opinion of the pounce-box or Exquisite Radical candidate, who lost his election because he could not dine till eight o'clock, are admirably told. In the election tumult, Robert got himself severely hurt in protecting Agnes Gray, who, in going along the street, had been insulted by the Tory mob for wearing the Merivale colours. He was carried to the Miss Warbles'; and Miss Christians thus explains all:—

"Piddy was quite in a fright to see you when you came home yesterday with your bonnet all torn to ribbons. It will be a warning to you, how you lose your way again at election time. But I am glad to get my P. Z. book back again; what a surprise to see it tumble out when they took off his coat, poor thing!—so interesting; and with that pretty new poem, 'To the Unknown Lady!' You'll soon have it by heart, Miss."

For the first time, Robert wished he had chosen a more euphonic signature; but the dialogue, or monologue, was very consoling.

"Quite a little romance, I do declare," resumed Miss Warble; "quite a thing for dear Miss Porter to work up—Ah! that's a sweet book, her 'Thaddeus'; and I long to talk to him about it. We must do something for him, love—for he is not very strong, Mr Cherry says; and yet he could fight like a lion to get you clear of those impudent tipsy creatures. Joanna, poor girl! had no such friend, when Sir Paul's butler kissed her by mistake, last election. I know what it shall be. I will ask him to meet Lord and Lady Merivale—I always love to produce native talent. That was he sneezing! Yes it was, I am sure—Just peep in, gently—very gently—for I promised his aunt (a very proper person she seems) that I would keep a strict watch over him. Do peep in, love—my hands are so full of this netting that I cannot get up.—It is quite proper.”

And in another instant the slightest possible creaking of the door was heard. A friendly aperture at one side of the bed permitted our hero not only to see, but to study the face which presented itself.

There is a delicious mute interview. The Genius was spell-bound, and the imaginative girl was already ages gone in love with P. Z.

“Every thing is quite still—I do not think he is awake, Miss Warble.”

“Why, then, I almost wish he was. I do so long to hear him talk; I wonder whether he talks as prettily as those P. Z.’s. What luck to have been the first to have found him out! I hope the Archdeacon will notice him! but those cathedral people are so proud! Miss Gillibrand would not call on that nice Mrs Pratt, because she said she was only related to the writer of Crabbe’s Tales!”

There was something that grated upon Robert’s ear in the last speech. But then it was something to be spoken of as a person of importance, a P. Z., who was fit for the company of the Merivales! It was deliciously flattering—a compensation in full.

Kind Miss Warble helped on the poet’s infatuation.—Sparker had somehow learned that his young apprentice could make verses, and, in a secret conference, he attempted to win from his virgin muse “a filthy ballad” upon Lady Merivale, of which he offered him a prose scroll, containing all the falsehoods and calumnies. Robert was brimful of indignation.

“Perhaps ten guineas is too little,” said Sparker, mistaking the cause of his silence; “throw in a verse or two more, and make it twenty. The labourer is worthy of his hire.”

“Hire!” echoed Robert; and the proud insulted Genius, rather than the well-principled youth, defied his master, who, in turn, ordered him from the office. Robert, in going, vowed that Lord Merivale should hear of his infamous scheme. Sparker called him back in alarm, but he would not return; and, as he passed out, all the clerks, Cherry not excepted, shrunk from their disgraced comrade, all save the puritan Ashmole, who was openly in opposition to his master, and on the Radical interest, and who now gave the trembling youth his arm.

A little time passed; scandal was busy with the good name of Lady Merivale; old Brandon had married coarse jocular Mrs Latimer; Ursula was breaking her heart in silence; and the Genius was the declared lover of Agnes Gray. Luck, or his own impudence and management, had, meanwhile, put Cherry in possession of a few of Sparker’s important secrets, and of Ashmole’s place and a large increase of salary. Miss Warble called him “a rising young man.” The day of the election arrived, and Miss Warble, at the Whig window, almost pulled caps with an antagonist Tory lady. A ballad, stuck upon the wall, attracted all eyes.

“They have got it,” exclaimed the young poet, as a burst of derisive laughter came from the mob. “Mr Sparker forgot that squib-making, like everything else, has two sides.”

His squib had at last been written, and in the office of The Flying Post, in a moment of hot resentment, just as he had been dismissed from the counting-house by Sparker.

The reverend Mr Russett and his nephew, the profligate lover of Ursula Brandon, had been particularly active for Sparker:—

“D—— that squib!” hiccupped Ursula’s hopeful betrothed. “If I only knew the fellow that wrote it, if I would not break every bone in his body! Ten pounds!” continued he, raising his voice lustily, “to any one that pulls those affairs down before Sparker comes up!”

“Shall I do it?” whispered a voice in Robert’s ear. “Don’t turn your head, or I must bolt; it will never answer for us to be seen talking together to-day! Shall I? I should not mind touching the ten guineas, and I know the trick of the blind window out upon the leads from the next house as well as the fellow who stuck ‘em up! Sparker won’t be here for a while yet. Snack another squib as I could put you up to!

“Hark! are those the drums? I’m off!”

Robin got posted near Miss Warble and Agnes Gray, and a tender whispering conversation, most grateful to the poet’s vanity, took place, even amidst the storm of the election raging below. At the close of the poll Lord Merivale was found far a-head.

“How is it, how is it,” almost screamed the spokeswoman of the Whig window. “Not that there can be any doubt, though! There go the bells! John Tompion, the sexton, is a Radical, but that has nothing to do with it. Oh, all’s right! all’s right! Down with the blue colours—low enough, God knows!—they were always low! Dearest Lady Merivale, with all my heart I rejoice with you! A glass of water here, for Lady Merivale. No wonder we are all overcome!”

Robert darted forward to obey Miss Warble’s behest.

“Ay, that is right; that is just as it should be. Charming! charming! and, Lady Merivale, this is my friend—our young Genius—my Lord’s poet—Mr Brandon, you know!”

It was with difficulty that Lady Merivale was commanding herself after such a day’s excitement; but even then she needed not the recommendation of Robert’s name. She had a kind thought and a gracious word for the child of the picture-gallery.

“There is no time for anything in the bustle,” she said, a little faintly; “I must speak to Mr Brandon some other day.”

“Delightful! delightful! I knew they would suit. I told Mr Archdeacon so; that’s repayment for all, is it not, Robert?—the dear boy, he can’t say anything. Well, I love modesty. But here comes the victor.”

And Miss Warble gave him a hearty kiss, while Robert and Agnes Gray stole off in the bustle; the Genius, abstracted and silent, dreaming of the vision of his childhood, the beautiful lady of the Abbey gallery, the girl thinking but of him.

After the glories of this great triumph had somewhat faded, Ursula Brandon stood one day at the door of the Miss Warbles’ comfortable dwelling, in which her nephew, turned out of doors by her father, still found a home. Neither he nor, as Crombie emphatically remarked, Miss Gray were at home; nor yet Miss Christiana; and Miss Joanna was shut up reading with a gentleman, and could not be disturbed. Ursula was turning away in despair, when the wheels of a carriage and a jocund voice were heard.

"Stop! stop! Crombie, will you stop that lady, when I tell you. Do turn back, Miss Brandon, I beg and desire. I was going to send for you. Such news! He has told you—so provoking! when I meant my own self to have had that pleasure."

No. She had not seen Robert. He was out.

"Out! at this time in the morning. Oh, it is a mistake of Crombie's; he is growing fat and perfectly inadequate. I know better. He is at home, I assure you. It was quite an accident that took me out so early—merely to convey our friend, the Archdeacon, to the early coach. Come in, come in."

There was no resisting Miss Warble, who led the way with a hospitable alacrity, even greater than usual.

"O mercy! don't open that door; Joanna is shut up there, reading Horne Tooke on the Psalms, with Mr Ashmole. She will be as fierce as a wild animal if they are disturbed. Out, indeed; I've a notion . . . but who would have thought they could be so sly? Ay, I thought as much. Here he is," continued the lady, throwing wide the door of a little book-room which communicated with the drawing-room, and thence by a mashed door, upon a terrace. The latter outlet was open.

"Here, Robert, you graceless fellow! here's your aunt come to see you—but where's Agnes Gray?"

The Genius was taken by surprise, and, to judge from appearances, a little discomposed, by the intrusion. But the edict of exclusion could not have been intended to reach his aunt; for, in another moment, radiant with a buoyancy and excitement she had never witnessed in him, and which almost repaid her past cares and sacrifices in his behalf, Robert rose hastily—ran to her—flung his arms round her neck, and kissed her tenderly.

"There! there! you'll destroy her bonnet strings! But it is natural, and I should be ashamed of us all if we were not delighted. Sit down, and let me tell you, Miss Brandon. It is done—we have done it. Have you written to Mr Cherry, Robin, to tell him? I thought not; shut up with Agnes, instead. You should never forget kind friends when you are prosperous."

It was a place in a public office, "a very good place," procured for Robert by Lady Merivale, who had been quite touched with his persecution on account of the affair of the squib. "But Robert must be in London next week," continued Miss Warble.

The intelligence to be gathered from this confused strain of gladness might not wholly take Ursula by surprise, for she knew that nothing short of the realizing of one of Robert's dreams could thus excite him. But, steady-hearted and unselfish as she was, she could not for a moment speak. A vision of her own desertion would make way—it passed directly, however, and she asked quietly—"Is Robin going to London?"

"That's the arena, indeed, for youth and aspirancy, as Mr Archdeacon says! Now some of those who could see nothing in him, forsooth, will have an opportunity of being corrected. I did—from the very first P. Z. I did. Plenty of leisure—for the office hours are very light—not like Clare Street West—all the sons of gentlemen—and Lord Merivale's introduction to all the geniuses. . .

"Well, well—as it must be, I suppose, I am very thankful. You will come over and acquaint your grandfather."

"You will be able to come down, and let me look at you sometimes, Robin," said his aunt, a little sorrowful.

"That I shall, Ursula; six weeks in every year. And you will always be coming up to see me! How I shall enjoy shewing you all the sights! and taking you to my play, when it is acted. And when I am rich enough, you will come and live with us!"

"Ahem! Ahem!" and Miss Warble bit her lips mysteriously—"Well, I shall go after Agnes Gray. Perhaps she is in my dressing-room with Piddy. I left her hard at work on the Poet in the bower—it is her best cutting, she says, with Agnes peeping in over the rails. Robert's very image—his identical curls! So now I shall leave you to have your talk out."

A dead silence succeeded to the closing of the door.

Miss Warble's parting speech would have told sufficiently what was to be told, had Ursula been able to collect her ideas.

When she did, she protested strongly against Robert's love for Miss Gray, and his early engagement, which was an evil of which she had not been aware. The infatuated boy was not to be convinced; and if uncomfortable for a time, when he thought of his aunt's warnings, Agnes had but timidly to creep to his side in the twilight, and to repeat to him one of his poems in her low, sweet, melancholy voice, and efface all recollection of Ursula's warnings.

Those twilight repetitions, foolishly countenanced by Miss Warble, who was imprudently sympathetic and triumphant throughout the whole affair, were the halcyon days of poor Agnes! how was the memory of every attitude—every word—every change of the thickening shadows—to be impressed upon her mind! Halcyon days, already numbered!

Let us next fancy two years gone by, and Robert not yet a rampant lion, but in the fair way to become one, and already as testy, excitable, and nervous as ever was a sensitive wayward genius, fretting over trifles, and liable to all the infirmities of temper and self-love of his order of the irascible tribe. One summer day, the street musician who grinded discord below the window of his humble lodging, was doubly torturing to the poet in the agony of composition, for the man played the well-remembered tune to which poor Agnes Gray had once sung his own ditty of the Lowly Lady. Among the literary and miscellaneous litter on his table was a card placed conspicuously—Lady Merivale at home; and, in close neighbourhood, a letter, two days received, and the seal still unbroken! the fond letter of Agnes Gray. Its supporter was a dirty white satin slipper, and a three-cornered billet, smelling villanously of musk, and containing a proclamation of passionate love and constancy, ten times as emphatic as the letter of poor Agnes. Robert had become ambitious of adding the name of a gallant to his other trophies; though the lady of the three-cornered billet, and of those pink feathers, which so excited the spleen of his landlady, had latterly become to him an object of terror and disgust.

Lord Merivale, in his new character of statesman, had occasionally employed the young man to transcribe and get printed for him a series of political essays, which he entitled, "Plato's Letters," of which Lady Merivale herself, fondly as the noble pair were attached, and frank as were all their confidences, did not know the true authorship; and a fashionable publisher, who could coin money out of a lord's name, even by proxy, was about to risk publishing Robert's poetry, on the strength of "Plato's Letters." The puff preliminary had been diffused over all London. Brandon was Britain's rising genius! "Was it wonderful that Miss Warble's protégé, though he had not ceased to blush, should believe a little in his own fame?" He was approaching the most dangerous crisis of a young genius; he was daily getting more vain, and more excitable: he was also getting in debt; and his fantastic style of dressing and wearing his hair in long curling looks, and his moustaches were scarcely admired enough by the picturesque-loving young ladies, to atone for the sneers of the men and women of sense. The unhappy Lion!

Fevered by this hollow and dangerous encouragement, he had just completed a novel, the like of which, according to his staunch proneurs, had never been seen. "No sooner was it advertised," said the newspapers, "than the Prime Minister and the Lord Chamberlain had met together, at the express instance of a Royal Personage, to consult upon the prudence of buying up the entire first edition:—"The Prince and the Alchemist"—what might not a Plato contrive to write under cover of so comprehensive a title?

Hitherto, however, these brilliantly-devised and boldly-practised artifices had availed little to advance our Genius in society. Then, his old tastes for magnificence and luxury had grown up with him; and the fair words lavished on him by Messrs — were not golden enough to supply both the wherewithal for tailors, and bootmakers, and jewellers; and the lavish, but useless presents which, from time to time, kept his memory alive at Merivale, cheaply satisfied his conscience, and served to convince his simple well-wishers there of his thriving.

There was at this time a Lady Garston, the greatest private lion-hunter and exhibitor in London, who had commissioned Mr Suffield—a man of some small fortune and family-consequence, who had dipt in literature, as a gentleman-author—to fetch her Brandon. The wit, malice, heartlessness, and savoir faire of the roué Suffield, are very skilfully delineated; but he is too cold-hearted, too ironical and scornful, to be long tolerable. Better do we relish Cherry. Suffield found his way, in despite of the vulgar landlord's 'Not at home,' to the rapt poet, in his obscure lodgings, and, after some desultory conversation, went on:—

"Got rid of the pink parasol yet, eh? Come, dress quickly, and," with a look of genteel disgust, "I will take a book till you are ready. Now, I remember it, I didn't send you her note. Her . . . Blushing! It's not Lady Merivale this time; but Lady Garston who wants to know you. Come, you have no better engagement, I am sure. Give me Shelley—and don't be long. Why, you have half your wardrobe about your heels already! Pah! I shall smoke, unless you can find me a pastille to burn! How do you exist in this hole?"

"Lady Garston . . . But do tell me?"

"As we go along—I have a headach yet, owing to her insisting upon having me knocked up in the middle of the night, to get me to take you there. A tidy room you keep, Brandon. Now begone: and be as tigerish as you like. It would take, in her house, if you had curls down to your waist, like Edward Irving."

Robert was not long in equipping himself, but his visiter was still quicker with his observations.

"A strange set of books you have, Brandon? Your cravat is there—Pha! with absolutely a crumb of cheese upon it! Come, I'll tie it for you. Do you ever read, though, or confine your studies merely to nature, in dirty white satin shoes, eh? Were I you, I'd keep those things out of sight for my prohibited library, as my good friend the Archbishop of Tarentum used to do with Voltaire and Crebillon."

Robert "had no time to study much—his office duties engrossed him so."

"But you have time enough to write! And where does Plato come from, then? It is odd that nobody has time to read now-a-days. You are going to throw yourself away, like all the rest of us."

Suffield was a sort of Lion himself, was, or had been; but now he depended upon other talents and capacities. In Lady Garston's menagerie we are introduced to another growling specimen, Mr Almond, a worthy man, though a jealous, irascible author. He said he had read some of Mr Brandon's pretty verses, and the epithet grated unpleasantly through Robert's curled locks on his sensitive ears, and he did not recover himself until he had reached the salon, where all the wonders of British and foreign genius were exhibited weekly during the season, by Lady Garston.

She, a faded pretty little woman, was hovering within the gate of her own paradise, with a fan to her lips, apparently choosing to receive her guests in dumb show, and without the customary announcements. One wild-looking creature, with a crane neck, and hair which might have been dressed with a rod, so strange was its disorder, was spirited away, into a far-away boudoir, to discuss political economy, with "a Unitarian clergyman, from the country, who had come early." A superb party of three American ladies, mountains of marigold satin, blonde, and feathers, heralding themselves by every scent which Chardin Houbigant can dispense, were greeted, in like noiseless fashion, with a comprehensive curtsy, which provoked a strongly-whispered compliment, concerning its "winning style."

"Suffield!" was her exclamation. "Well, how charming! what a good, good child you are! the very best of my chevaliers! And this is Mr Brandon! I am enchanted, at last, to make your acquaintance. What a countenance! what hair!" she added, in a very audible aside. "Those are only the Jodrells," (following with her eye the sister pair just described,) "you know the name, of course, Mr Brandon—nothing in what they write! One does not know how to make people understand that every one is not desired to come every night. One of the little difficulties of an open house, Mr Suffield."

"And what else have you in your cage to-night, Lady Garston?"

"Cage! well I give you leave. Why, I have Walsingham describing his adventures in the Nizam's country—those Hindoos you saw below, he was so good as borrow for me from some one of the Geographical Society. Don't they quite produce an effect? I was in, hopas he would have come in his violet velvet pantaloons and yellow stockings, as he went to the opera the other night; but it appears he goes from me to D— House. My young friends are quite enchanted with him; his eyes glisten so when he talks, and he has let down his beard to oblige them. It is not cut off, and he keeps it always packed away behind his cravat. But he is so particular about there not being the least noise when he is telling one of his tales, that I am forced to impose silence. He's just done, however. Do you know who those Americans are that came in just before you? I lost their names, and it is a little awkward. I met them at the Ambassador's."

"The Florida Strongfellows," said Suffield, putting up his glass; "yes, it is they—I should have thought her turban was not to be forgotten."

"Thank you—Mrs Florida!—now I recollect! One wants odd figures to fill up corners."

Lord Merivale never came to Lady Garston's parties. He was absorbed in politics, and she declared—

I never desire to see political people here. The arts, literature, and a little science—voilà tout—though dear Lord Edinborough used to say—"I wonder you don't intrigue, Lady Garston. So pretty as you are, you might carry anything." No politics for me! I am a weak woman, not an esprit fort. I declare here are the Cottess again! Well, really, for such people to come every night . . . a reviewer, Mr Brandon—enormous influence with the press—he may be of untold use to you!"

Little guessed the pair in question, of the half-finished comment which their appearance had provoked. Their day was over and gone. Miss Cotton, in spite of all her brother's asseverations, could no longer be accepted for a second Corinne. Then, success had made her like other people: and that was an offence. So long as she had rejoiced in a wig, stuck round with natural heath-flowers, by way of grande toilette, she had furnished a figure original at least, and, as such, desirable at parties. . . . But her brother still contrived to wind up every anecdote, dialogue, or harangue, with something about "Sylvia's fame"—and how she herself was the same artless unspoilt creature she had been at sixteen. There were not wanting some who averred, that a certain parish register recorded the baptism of Sally (not Sylvia) Cotton.

Sylvia—a rather colossal figure to be addressed by that nursery title of endearment—and in whose well-fed and rosy cheeks, at least, there was little sign of study or of self-denial—took an ample survey of our hero from head to foot, and, being pleased therewith, and one of those excellent persons who talk philanthropy and sympathy, à discretion, betook herself to complimenting Brandon, handsomely, and with the least possible delay. Her praise was as high sounding, and twice as much to the purpose as Lady Garston's. . . . "Immense success—new undertakings—publisher's arrangements—foreign translators—subsequent editions—portrait to be engraved in the line manner—(Pratt could recommend an excellent engraver, and not ruinous)—praise, without doubt, in the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and Westminster Reviews—(though, to be sure, no Radical notice was worth having)"—all these, and many more grand words, rolled charmingly off her tongue. Well they might; being constantly at the service of any one, whom there was the least chance of victimizing.

"Here is Lady Merivale at last! So happy to see you! dear Lady Merivale at last! such a favour! Oh, those sweet, sweet Tasso letters you sent me! If Pasta had not been coming, I do not know that I should have ventured to solicit your company. But, perhaps you have been to Semiramide?"

Brandon was not exactly in love with Lady Merivale, but his dreams of her were taking form instead of being dispelled. There was to him something hazy and dangerous in their slight intercourse. This evening her greeting had been more than usually cordial. It had been so noticed by the malicious Suffield, so felt by Brandon himself. Yet this one patroness, in the kindest spirit, gave him the best counsel. We hear a good deal about the American lionesses, but, tiring of their passion for albums and autographs, we pass to Lady Garston returning to the latest caught, "Come, Mr Brandon. How brilliant, Mr Suffield!"

"Thank you for coming in such force! It is as good as a leaf out of the 'Rejected Addresses.' I could have had the Smiths, by the way, but I thought . . . and now I must shew Mr Brandon a little. Mrs Maxwell is dying to see him—and Lady Dickenson wants him for her balls, and Mr Shanklin for one of his breakfasts," &c., &c.

An affray arose from Miss Florida getting into fits at seeing the body of a female infant dwarf, (the Palermo Fairy,) which Lady Garston had bribed the keeper of an anatomical museum to lend her for the night. Lady Merivale, disgusted by this bit of lionism, wished to be off, and looked round for Brandon to order her carriage. But the Lion was now fairly engulfed.

His turn was come: and round and round the room was he dragged, blushing like a girl, but not at heart reluctant to be exhibited, as a genius, a poet, a friend of Lady Merivale's—a novelist, who was to beat Scott, (as yet the star of Bulwer had not arisen.) "Mr Suffield was his intimate friend—the witty Mr Suffield!—charming to see two such clever people in such a state of concord! Mr Walsingham" (alas! for truth) "had inconvenienced himself to come there expressly to make his acquaintance!—Mr Wicksteed had stayed for an introduction—Count Fortebraccio and the great American fortunes were enchanted with him! 'Something of a most inspired style on his forehead,' had been Mrs Florida Strongfellow's remark! And, bowed with a shame which vanity had not yet wholly stifled, our hero found himself the cynosure of eager eyes—the centre of wise questions—"How could he find time to write so much and so well?"—and "Did he write best, morning or evening?" and the like. One lady entreated him to fix an evening—she must have his judgment on Kean!—another had a cousin who had translated Sophocles—and she again was thrust aside by a sprightlier dame, who must postpone her Strawberry Hill party till Mr Brandon could join it as their cicerone—"Quite a Walpole turn in his talk!"

"I cicerone!" thought Robert, blushing for his own ignorance; but Suffield's sarcastic eye was upon him, and he could not own it: so the party was fixed. Even Lord Alton, the buttoned-up exclusive, began to be haunted by an idea, (a rare guest,) in addition to the notion that "those writers sometimes shew up persons of quality in their books; and that it was as well to be civil." So he bowed his eyebrows at our Genius, and vouchsafed him his address. Mrs Florida Strongfellow returned from her apologetic promenade just in time to witness all these glories.

"Pray let me get near him, Miss. I have come to Europe on purpose to make me and my daughter acquainted with its literary magnets! When will you gratify us with your book, sir? I shall lose no time in perusing it as soon as ever it is in the stores!" accompanying her compliment with a huge gaudy card for a breakfast, about the fiftieth of a pack, with which his pockets already overflowed.

A public reading of one of Brandon's poems followed, though the authorship was affectingly concealed in respect to the youth's modesty. Suffield was the reader, and threatened to inflict on them his own ballad of Peter Bell. Sylvia tried to evade the reading, but her brother had his reasons for remaining. The fictitious reading at Lady Garston's is not quite so good as Mrs Trollope's grave description of that at which she assisted at the Abbaye, when Chateaubriand's precious morsels were discussed by an adoring female circle. Truth must ever surpass fiction. But Lady Garston's exhibition was not amiss. The American ladies were particularly alive. "An hour of musing," the sweet title! The verses are really fine.

"How charming!—how mystical!" Lady Garston was the first to exclaim, almost before the reading was over. "Do you understand it?"

"Charming!" exclaimed the Cottons, stoutly, and in Italica.

"Very delicious! most delicious indeed!" was Mrs Florida Strongfellow's comment. "There are some of Mrs Sigourney's little touches—the American Heemans, ma'am—in that last verse."

"Exquisitely read, Mr Suffield," said the hostess, hoping to avoid the threatened ballad. "Well, Mr Brandon, I call that perfect! So it is not to be in the May number? — sent me a sight of it—however; Coleridge might have been proud of it, or Moore, or Byron. Now, might they not, Miss Cotton?"

"Indeed they might," replied Sylvia, almost choked by the praise which, thus extorted, there was no withholding. The absurdity of the compliment, the hollow falseness of its echo, struck forcibly upon Brandon's heart. His powers of observation were not yet blinded; his self-knowledge had not yet wholly merged in that gross and indiscriminate appetite for praise, which will swallow any flattery," however absurd. He had been talking to Lady Merivale, and was always raised by her conversation, and the visionary half-owned feelings he permitted it to encourage, to a noble and generous tone of sentiment. She had spoken of a fame better than the senseless or interested suffrage of those who were crowding round him; and he had been warned, because there was in him, with all his foibles, a touch of the true poetical spirit. . . . There was more of a poem in that involuntary reverie than in all the verses he ever wrote. He must be alone!—and abruptly he disengaged himself from the admiring circle, now loquacious in his praise! "Rapt even now! So modest—what elegant manners!—that lovely long hair of his!" These ecstasies were almost like insults in his ear.

"Una alla volta! per carità!" exclaimed Suffield; "my charge, you see, has not face enough to support his bays! He'll mend. Come away, Brandon," drawing his now really bewildered and ashamed companion out of the circle. "It is wise always to leave people something to look for. Never stay in one place too long—not even in Merivale House. To see how you blush! ha! ha! I am going to D— House, for half an hour; but we meet at Lettrill's—supper at one o'clock—eh?"

"Yes—no, I shall not go—I am tired."

"Please yourself," replied Suffield, in the same tone of insupportable rally: "don't let me seduce you into any of my wicked ways; I dare say Lady Merivale would warn you against me as a dangerous acquaintance."

"I shall be there," said our Genius, spiritedly.

Lettrill's was a gaming-house to which he had once been tempted, and to which the weak-minded youth returned, goaded by Suffield's taunt. On the midnight streets, he encountered Philip Warren, the ruined profligate, the hardened criminal, now flying from justice. Before Sparker's bank had failed, and half the inhabitants of Merivale been ruined, the generous and womanly-hearted Ursula had secretly devoted the little independence left her by her mother to rescue her abandoned lover from debt and disgrace—all save one fifty pounds which she reserved, lest Robin might feel want. The scene of their encounter is striking. In the midnight pandemonium, Brandon also encountered Sparker, coolly won his money, and exasperated his passions. The frenzied bankrupt burst into open rage, and taunted the Genius in the presence of Suffield and of several noble friends with having been his errand-boy, and with wanting to marry his natural daughter. The heart of the fashionable Lion, which had never been in its right place, was already alienated from Agnes, and this confirmed his disgust. He had not known the secret of her birth, and his fashionable friends had laughed at the idea of any marriage engagement with a country girl; but with the natural daughter of a bankrupt gaming-house bully! It was too preposterous! Robert had been felicitated by the serpent mockers around him, and he had blushed to the temples, (and perhaps farther, if his ambrosial curls had not concealed the rosy suffusion,) at their intoxicating flattery, upon his having made large progress in the graces of the most talked-of and the most difficult woman in London.

Pity that he did not also hear the sneering laugh into which the trio had burst, when his back was turned. 'A flight, by Jove, even for a Genius! The fellow will next fancy that Lady Merivale's going to fling herself at his head!'

In the meanwhile, Ashmole, who was now high in favour with the saintly Joanna Warble, had come up to London, bringing letters from Agnes and Ursula. The failure of Sparker's bank and the persecution of Mr Godsall, whom her father insisted she should marry; nay, the idea that Philip was there—the lost Philip, and that she might reclaim him—had induced Ursula to resolve upon seeking some employment by which to earn her bread in London; and Agnes, compelled to leave the Miss Warbles', prayed to go with her.

Ashmole returned with very painful accounts of the Lion, from whom he brought no letters in reply to the anxious epistles of Ursula and the betrothed, and whom he had been unable to see, so incessant was the round of dissipation in which Robert was engaged. Let us turn for a moment from the career of the Genius to the up-breaking household of the spinsters, where love and money had both broken in to sow disgust.

It had become a scene of disagreement as well as of leave-taking. Loud voices were to be heard; cheeks reddened with anger rather than luncheon to be found in the parlour where the two sisters sat. Even Pyarea was disturbed by the excitement of the moment, and Agnes Gray was hiding herself somewhere or other, to weep away the wretchedness caused by Mr Ashmole's recital, on his return. She had, of late, become sonder than ever of "getting by herself;" and it was not the least bitter of Joanna's taunts, that Agnes, she did believe, was "bitten too, and trying—poor foolish child—to turn poetess; because that youth whom you choose to spoil, Christiana, has turned poet, and taken to bad ways, like the rest of them." Joanna had, of late, begun to deal in aggravating speeches.

"I repeat my question," said she, in a voice one tone shriller than on her first inquiry—"What is to become of Agnes Gray! for, if I must give my opinion, your whole plan, sister, is a presumptuous piece of midsummer madness."

"Indeed? But, Joanna, I did not ask your opinion, dear—I repose on our friend the Archdeacon's better judgment. You used to respect that once, as long as you were in your rational senses. But I always foresaw what all your chapel-ing would land you in."

Joanna was hardly likely to be pacified with such a reply—"To go abroad, at your time of life!—preposterous! [Miss Warble was going to Belgium with the Archdeacon.] No woman can expose herself to the licentious contact of continental manners, without losing some of her modesty, Christiana! And what will you do on Sundays?—go to play-houses, and see those bold creatures dance, without proper clothes to cover them, I suppose."

"No, miss, I shall not. But you are only borrowing a leaf out of Mr Ashmole's prayer-book. It's worth a good rubber to see you sit there so prim. Depend upon it, at my time of life, I know how to take care of myself, without a serious helpmate."

"And why shouldn't I go abroad to improve myself, I wonder?" continued Miss Warble, with a more than usually impatient flirt of the shuttle with which she played at working; "every one does now. There were the Cottrelles—older than me, and after Lizzy had broken her leg; and she dropped in for a German Prince, (I don't think much of those German Princes, however;) and they have twins. And to think of Miss Tipping—she saw all the Holy Week at Rome; and didn't come home a Papist, sister! And the George Doves—did you not hear what the Archdeacon said, the other night, about their going to India overland, across the desert?—riding on camel-back, for aught I can tell—and they must ride camels like gentlemen, ladies must, you know. Come, Jo; I'm not going to be quite so venturesome—and you used to swear by the George Doves, Jo, as long as you were a Christian!"

"Sister, your frivolity is very painful; but I trust I am not going to lose my temper on account of your idle words." And here followed a severer text than the last. "If you will make yourself ridiculous . . ."

"Ridiculous! Mrs Ashmole that is to be! Those that have stone windows, ought not to throw glasses. Ha! ha! what a capital piece of malaprop! You can't vex me, you see, Jo.—Ridiculous! come now, if you will go and marry one who is little better than a ranting preacher, I think you might be mute when your sister chooses to travel with a dignitary of the Church and his family. Not that I have a word against Mr Ashmole, though. He's a thoroughly decent man!"

"Decent, indeed!"

"And he would not be so bad-looking" (with another saucy jerk of the shuttle) "if his clothes fitted him. Do, love, put him into proper leggings—Crombie quite tittered the last time he let him in."

"Your displeasure might pain me, Christians, if your profane levity did not place me beyond the reach of your tongue. Well, I leave you to better teaching. But you have not told me yet what becomes of Agnes Gray?"

"That's shabby, Jo, to ask me in such a tone. You know it is a pinching question; and you do so to provoke me, because you can't and won't help me."

"I have offered her a home with us," replied Joanna, doggedly.

"Mr Ashmole did, you mean—I honour him for it—but you'd pine her to death in a week. She wants cherishing, not crushing. . . . I wish," she added, in a tone of heartfelt kindness, "that the thing were either on or off—that Robert Brandon would either marry her, or make an end of it, and say as much. But I'll take to him, as we pass through London."

"And why oppose her going with Ursula?"

"Who is to keep her when she gets there, I ask you? . . . O, Jo! Jo! what need was there for you to marry, and make all this breaking up? The loss of money would have been little, as far as I am concerned, so we had but kept together. And you can set up your face to me, and palaver about my folly!"

In the general break-up at Merivale, Cherry also resolved on trying his luck in London; and, in his usual free-and-easy manner, he first called upon Miss Warble to announce and facilitate his purpose. Miss Warble's invincible good-nature was put to a severe test by Mr Cherry—"a very excellent person in his way, but to ask for letters of introduction point blank—its really a little free. Wanted me to ask our friend the Archdeacon for letters for him, when I even hesitated to interest him to get a place for Crombie;" but Cherry could make his own way.

In the evening of the same day that the depression of poor Agnes had so grieved her kind-hearted patroness, the girl was found in wildly-joyous spirits, singing one of Robert's beautiful songs, and packing her trunk. She had received a letter from Robert, and it had contained money—money, the reward of her secret literary attempts—the reward of the poetry she had secretly written, and at last found courage to send to her lover!

"O dear Miss Warble, don't be angry with me, when I am happier than I ever was in my whole life. Don't be angry that I have been so hard at work, and never told you anything about my secret. I never dreamed I should succeed yet, for this long, long time!"

"Succeed?"

Poor Agnes! It was all a vision; ending in bitter disappointment, despair, madness, and death. Arrived in London with Ursula, whose utmost exertions were required for their joint maintenance, she devoted her little hoard to secretly printing, at her own risk, her Coralie, which no publisher would undertake. It was treated with neglect by the public, and unconsciously spoken of in her hearing with contempt by Robert; and this trial, with the evident coldness, the faithlessness of her lover, was more than the reason of the delicate and gentle-hearted girl, who never told her griefs, could long endure. Miss Warble figures prominently in the Lion's history during her hasty transit over London. She attended at the grand breakfast given by Mrs Florida Strongfellow, and, with Agnes, exultingly witnessed the apotheosis of the Lion. He had been inquired for particularly by the eminent Dr Codrington, the President of — College, "as the true Plato," whose political letters had set all London in a flame, and introduced "as the real and true Plato" by the exulting Lady Garston; and while the modest genius and the great scholar and philosopher whispered—

There stood poor Agnes, so far from seeing any inequality in the conjunction, enraptured at such a public testimony to her lover's fame; and there stood Miss Warble, who curtsied with ecstasy, as she bethought her what a proud tale her protégé's latest promotion, witnessed by herself, would be for her to tell "our friend, the Archdeacon!"

Cherry, now in town, had also made his way to Mrs Florida's dejeuner, and, among other dexterous feats, had appropriated to himself the anonymous billet which one of the "Kentuck" misses had intended for the dear young poet, with whose verses and curls she had fallen full fathom five in love! By dint of diligently reading the Minerva Press novels, and the "Corresponding Lover's Assistant," Cherry hoped to manage the anonymous love-affair, he had adopted, triumphantly. We have a great hankering after Cherry. He is, so far as ready impudence and selfishness go, quite a male Barnaby.

At a moderately late hour one morning, Cherry presented himself in Brandon's dingy drawing-room. The neglected kettle had already been growing cold on the hearth, the slovenly breakfast becoming stale on the table, for some two hours. Robert's habit of early rising had gone from him.

"A fresh lot of notes," was Cherry's soliloquy, as he turned over the contents of the table, with his usual want of ceremony. "A crest—let's see, the Merivale Arms are three herons. Well, it's a famous thing to be in with all those lords. Somebody wanting him to shew off for 'em, doubtless. Didn't I see that Mr Suffield winking to him behind his back? Plain Cherry's the best, perhaps, after all. I suppose that pink concern is from some woman—another anonymous, eh? Well, I wonder how I'm going to thrive in that affair. Hang it! he ought to be able to spare me one of his loves. I've always had a great opinion of getting a lift in the helress line. Here he comes at last, with eyes as dead as oysters six weeks out of water. Well, Robin, if that's a London complexion, give me Clare Street West, and your Masquerade of Silence to boot, I should say, rather than such a noisy piece of business as last night's. Dull and vulgar, I take it."

"Why, Cherry—good morning—has London made you critical already? Capital!"

"What, I suppose you highfyers fancy nobody's to know the difference between trumpery and a prime article, that hasn't been apprenticed to it. Catch me out, though. Do you call everybody quizzing everybody else good manners? and what's not good manners is vulgar—logic, ain't it? And was not everybody too fine, and afraid of everybody, for anybody to be sociable and comfortable together? What's dull, if that's not dull? I have eyes in my head, I hope. You look precious knocked up, I promise you—ten per. cent worse than you did on Sunday."

"Only a headach; but, if you had as much to do as I have"—and Robert pointed, with some little parade, to a table groaning under its weight of papers—"you would be weary too."

"Oh, then, you have found out that hard work is hard work, after all, whether it be keeping a set of books or keeping company with grantees and learned folks. I knew it must come to that. I say, what fools your fine acquaintances are! Does Lady Garston always talk that way? I used to fancy Miss Warble wonderful enough, in the way she tossed her words about; but it's nothing to this. You could not come the Masquerade of Silence over her, I fancy?"

"Lady Garston is very attentive to me," returned Robert, piqued at hearing the celebrities of London so unceremoniously dissected.

"I take it—and so you put up with her. So was Ashmole—taught you to write straight—but Ashmole was a bore, I fancy. And yonder Mr Suffield—he is very attentive to you, I suppose, too; and so you let him quizz you? He has plenty to say for himself. It's the way here. One feels quite abashed among 'em."

"Oh, as to Suffield, every one knows Suffield's way. Was he sarcastic upon you?"

"Me!—what could he quizz me about? Don't stir; I'll ring the bell, if you want it. Eat your poor breakfast in peace, if—(aside)—you can put up with it, such as it is—and I never set up for nice!"

"Cherry, you are making game of me!"

"Not I. I'm not offering to let my hair grow by way of imitation!—that would be a joke!—though I am wanting you to help me on a little. There goes your mouth! pursed up in a moment. Don't be frightened—I am not asking you to push me—I say—beyond one of those Miss Floridas.—You'll make her over to me, eh?"

There was something so irresistibly odd, impudent, and knavish, in Cherry's countenance, as he ventured this modest proposal, (anything but unpleasing in its implied flattery,) that Robert leaned back in his chair, and laughed till the tears streamed down his cheeks. Cherry's temper was imperturbable, and Brandon's mirth was contagious—so he laughed too.

"I suppose you think I have no chance, Master Brandon? Do you know, I'm just the man cut out for an American—thriving and commonsensical. Come, it's a bargain—for you're no fancy, I take it, for the land of Promise. No time for poetry, there! Even that long-necked Mr Thrushton is a cashier in somebody's bank."

It was this same morning that Robert first found time from his fashionable engagements to visit his aunt, at the humble but comfortable lodging which he had hired for her on her writing to him, and in which he had lived himself until he grew into a great Lion.

Ursula was waiting in almost the sickness of suspense to ascertain how matters really stood with Brandon. She had more than feared. Never was any woman less exacting—less given to jealousy. So often as she had endeavoured to rouse her pride, her resentment, her indignation, there had risen before her the helpless, grateful, dependent child, with his long hair and his confiding smile, who had slept on her knees in the gallery-chamber at Merivale Abbey. But even this calming vision could not for ever stand between her and the harsh, naked truth, that the world had seized her nephew, and he was theirs no longer.

She met him—when at last they did meet—with her old affectionate embrace. He returned it warmly; he slipped into her hands a cheque for a small sum of money; but he was hurried—uneasy—restrained. She questioned him concerning his literary successes; and he told her of his increasing engagements in society. She inquired how far he felt at ease in his office; what companions he had there; and he replied, something pompously, by talking of "his friend, Lord Alton—his friend, Suffield—his friend, Fullarton."

"Friend," repeated Ursula, quietly, but with some little hesitation; "I thought friends were only to be proved by their wearing. But I am glad you have found so many."

Robert was anxious to escape from this conference. She had more to say, and of a nature about which conscience unpleasantly whispered. He pleaded an engagement with Suffield, "Let him wait for once," said Ursula; and she calmly began to question him on his intentions towards Agnes, who had, he now learned, for his sake, refused a very wealthy and respectable lover—Colonel Blayne—with three thousand a-year. Robert was affected by this proof of tenderness, and by his aunt's conversation: but the anticipated and remembered sneers of Suffield were too powerful for his transient generous emotions, and Ursula continued her pleading.

"And she has even made herself a poet, Robin!" she continued, when she had, as she thought, encouraged her nephew, by extolling the more obvious merits of Agnes. "The pains which she has taken—and so humble all the while!—to render herself more worthy of you. So proud she was of your commendation, of the money you sent her! That decided us to come up to London."

The weak-principled Genius compromised with his conscience; and, to avoid a present difficulty, plunged himself deeper and deeper, until his own protestations excited his enthusiastic feelings, and he almost believed himself the generous and constant being he feigned to be: The deception is not uncommon. Delay was his hope—and Agnes—she, too, might change. Poor Ursula remembered her own early feelings; and they were still tenderly affectionate towards the degraded being, who was now skulking about London, a hunted criminal, with a price on his head. Her pent-up heart opened; and she, who never complained, nor spoke of her many past trials, listened with fondness to her nephew's assurance, that they were all over now—and they should all be so happy! In the casual midnight rencontre which Robert had with the proscribed and hunted forger, who had some of the soul of goodness lingering about him still—the wretched man entrusted to his care a packet to be delivered to Ursula. "Answer me one little question," said the faithful woman—"Did he look ill when he gave you the packet for me? Very wretched? You shake your head: it is enough. . .

. . . I might have known from my own heart, that, loving as you did, you could not change in two little years."

Alas! for poor Ursula's penetration! And, on the result of this conversation, Miss Warble was permitted to set forth on her journey with the Doves, leaving Agnes under the protection of the aunt of her betrothed.

"By Jove!" exclaimed Cherry, when Ursula, with a heedless confidence which betrayed what her misgivings had been, acquainted him with the arrangement, "I am delighted to hear it. I always knew our Robin was a thoroughly honest fellow. He'll settle; and they'll be very happy together, in a quiet sort of a way—for," dropping his voice, he added to himself, "Grub Street isn't quite the Mint, I perceive; and prices are as fluctuating there as in the indigo-market. Let's see what I can do with them, to help number One. His fine friends would never forgive his making a fool of himself, by marrying that laughing-stock of a woman's daughter. Good enough for the city, though—oh! Preserved Knott's heiress. That would be a specie!"

And Cherry forthwith began to study romantic love-letter writing as we have noticed, and soon acquired enough of the science to satisfy Miss Florida Strongfellows.

The disappointment of Agnes, as one Magazine after another appeared, and none of her poetry—the poetry of which she had received the price from Robert—found a place; the adventures of Miss Warble on the Continent, related in her voluble letters to Agnes and Ursula; and the schemes and calumnies of the set of fine people, men and women, whom envy and hate induced to undermine the domestic peace of the Merivales,—are each and all skilfully, cleverly, or effectively told; but everything with us must give way to the march of the Lion. His long-announced and well-puffed tragedy was to be brought forward at last, after endless delays and alterations; and to the favoured theatre trooped his literary and his fashionable friends, his patrons and patronesses, the Florida Strongfellows, and the Cottons and Jodrells, and the newspaper critics; and there too came Ursula and poor Agnes Gray, now knowing herself forsaken—humbled, heart-broken, but loving still. With anxious and beating hearts, and striving to conceal themselves, they came. The skulking ruffian, Philip Warren, was also in that theatre, and his late master, Sparker, though on a quest of their own; and, last of all, appeared old Brandon, coming no one could tell from whence. The parsimonious cold-hearted grandfather, was discovered sitting in the pit, as if to blast the eyes of his grandson. Much to the man of Genius depended upon the success of this play. His novel, in spite of all its fame, had turned out unproductive; and his gains at the gaming-table, which he had resolved, from feelings of delicacy, to devote to merely trifles and luxuries, and from which Agnes had obtained the imaginary rewards of her poetry, had given him a taste for expense. He had got into a shabby genteel, but expensive lodging, and

There was no going, in a common street-vehicle, to Lord —'s, or — House; no refusing to join in the dinners out of town, which the Suffields, Altons, and Fallartons gave; never troubling themselves which of their tradesmen must wait, while they rioted at Black-wall or Richmond. And the greater became his embarrassments, (the heaviest of them a mere joke to the men whom he aspired to emulate,) the more impatient was he of their being guessed. The play was to bring all right for him, as well as for Agnes Gray.

The play broke down under circumstances of provoking, but irresistibly ludicrous disgrace; and Agnes, in agony, stopped her ears to shut out the hissing.

The roar, the agony of mirth, was indescribable.—Suffield laughed, if Lady Dereham was to be believed, till his stays parted—and Cherry, to whom all that had passed had as yet been but "leather and prunella," shouted, loud enough for the house to hear—"Now that's famous, I call it! Bravo! Robin! Encore! en-cors! Who would have thought he had so much fun in him?"

"Let us go home," said Ursula, observing Agnes to be severely distressed. "I would have spared you this. I would have given much that you had not come here."

"Go home!" cried Agnes, almost indignantly. "If his own friends forsake him!" . . . But she stopped; her words were choked by the thought that he could be a forsaker also!

"So there's an end to poor Mr Brandon!" said Suffield, when his ears had drank in the last howl, and the last hiss had subsided; "desperately cut up he will be. Well, we have done our duty by it! I will never believe but Lady Merivale read it in manuscript, and had too much tact to come and see its execution."

"Well," continued Suffield, as they drove off, "never before did I feel the full force of an abbreviation. But this poor Brandon's play—it is of serious consequence to him. I wonder where he is."

He was at home—haunted by his grandfather's words and face, like a curse. The veil was torn from before his eyes. Now only he felt the full worthlessness of his life—the full madness of his conduct—the miserable, miserable incompetence of his genius—the ungrateful selfishness of his heart.

And then he cast his eyes on Agnes Gray's simple letter of leave-taking, and shuddered to feel that he could not, as a man of honour, claim her forgiveness, and renew the vows which would have made her only too proud to weep for him and to comfort him. The last waking thing he saw, was her dejected willowy figure, shrinking from that frightful derision which (every sound taking a shape) haunted his pillow long after he had fallen asleep! And this was to have been the night of his apotheosis!

A fever was the consequence of this terrible disappointment, and of an overturn in a cabriolet; by which accident, Robert was laid up for weeks, and as it chanced, in the residence of Lord Merivale. And thither wandered Agnes Gray, almost as pretty and pathetic in her madness, and in her jealousy of the noble and beautiful enchantress, who had unconsciously fascinated the imagination of her faithless lover, as Ophelia herself; and when long weeks had elapsed, and Ursula was away in the benevolent Almond's cottage, watching and nursing the unfortunate girl, and Lord and Lady Merivale were gone to their country seat, Mr Cherry made his frequent appearance to inquire for Brandon; and was at last permitted, by the careful nurse, to come up stairs "to chat with," as he said, "and cheer poor Robin," who had got into such good quarters.

"Well," said that brisk personage, in spite of promises and cautions, beginning to talk as soon as he was within the door, "a pretty business this has been, Master Robin. Tumbling from a cab, indeed! How ever did you manage it? . . . Don't stir; I'll seat myself. Why what six long weeks they must have seemed to you."

"Long, indeed; and so lonely, I thought you had all forgotten me."

"Oh, nonsense, it's only you geniuses who do that sort of thing. Nay, now, I did not mean to make you cry. How weak you must be! You got a note from Ursula this morning? . . . Ay, she is a good creature, if there ever was one. So hard-working, so humble, so forgiving; thinks of everybody before herself. Everybody is charmed with her. Lady Merivale cannot speak highly enough of her. . . . By way of news, I may advise you that I'm going off too to New York, in August. Lots of money to be picked up there; and all old Preserved Knott's business connexion tumbling to pieces, for want of a head among 'em, as Mrs Florida said, the other night. . . ."

"Mrs Florida. Oh, I recollect. I think my memory is sadly shaken;" and he added, with a faint smile—"Do you go to New York as a single man, Cherry?"

"Perhaps yes—perhaps no; I'll look before I leap, depend upon it, and Miss Florida wants lots of training before she's fit for the nuptial state, as Godal used to call it in his prim way. London's a spoiling place, Robin; indeed I won't answer for it, that my head's not roy-ther turned. You've had your day. Be glad of it; now you'll settle, I hope and trust, and make a man of yourself."

"But, Cherry, I must know the worst, and I can ask nobody but you: Ursula is at Almond Nook, I know. Is she there alone? Where . . . where is . . ."

"I'm off, if you question me; because I promised faithfully I would not talk to you about domestic subjects. . . . Come," resumed Cherry, after an awkward pause, "you don't ask after any of your old friends and acquaintances; Lady Garston, for instance . . ."

If Cherry refused to answer any question about domestic affairs, he was quite free on all other topics. One of the most delicately traced characters in the book is Almond, but we dare not venture to spoil, by a shred or a swatch. Almond the jealous, irascible, semi-lion of the coteries, though the generous and tender-hearted master of the hospitable cottage of Almond Nook; Almond, prone to affection for the sex, and jealous lest those he admired should laugh at a lover of fifty, had become enamoured of the beautiful nature of Ursula Brandon, who gave him no hope. It was in his cottage that she tended the dying Agnes; and thither Lady Merivale, on her return to town, took the now convalescent Brandon.

"I would have spared you this visit," said Lady Merivale, gently, but seriously, "had it been possible—but she has asked for you so earnestly! You could not but go."

Robert did not attempt an answer. He only grew paler, and shrank lower down into the corner of the carriage.

"If you feel unequal to the meeting, say so," resumed the lady after a short pause. "Distress you it must; but I fear that a very long delay . . . You will find her very gentle, however, if she knows you; for the last four-and-twenty hours, they tell me have changed her greatly. I dare not deceive you;—this will be your farewell visit!"

"Good God!" burst out Robert, in a passion of remorse, "and this has been my doing!—Why did I not die myself?"

"Hush!" said the lady, gently, but solemnly. "I will not be so false to you as to bid you not to blame yourself! but, as God has spared your life, you are not to despair. You are not to make regret torture. All the physicians tell me that, under any circumstances, this disorder might probably have manifested itself in her sooner or later. It is well she is called away now, for both of you! I trust," she added, more impressively, "I think that you will not forget this day;" and again there was silence.

They entered the house. Almond was not visible; but Ursula met them with a finger on her lips. She burst into tears when she saw them; but, restraining herself, threw open the door of the little parlour, and invited Lady Merivale to enter. Then, taking Robert by the hand, she disappeared with him, no word being spoken.

In the parlour sat one, all in tears, whom, nevertheless, no sorrow could utterly subdue into silence. "Ah! dearest Lady Merivale," exclaimed good Miss Warble, squeezing the visitor's hand, "this, is, indeed, a time of sorrow! a sore welcome home for me! Poor Agnes! They told us, when she became rational again, she could not be spared to us many hours longer; and now, they are momentarily expecting up stairs . . . I came away, because I could not bear to stay. . . . How I used to scold her for sighing. Dear lamb! I doubt I was too harsh with her."

Lady Merivale could very honestly administer comfort. . . . "O you're very good to say so; and, indeed, I could not bear it now, if I had been provoking and fidgety with her. Single women will, you know, sometimes. And Joanna too, she was fond of her, though more of a lecturer than I am. Joanna will regret her sincerely. Poor Jo——; matrimony has sweetened her; and that was more than one dared to pray for. Let me pour you out a glass of wine, Lady Merivale. It is really choice; the last of our travelling stock."

"And dear Brandon too," resumed the kind creature, drinking by herself when her offers were declined, "how he will feel it, when he recollects all her tender little ways, and how fond she was of his P. Z.'s from the very first. Such a terrible, terrible shock for him; though he must be blamed most severely that all was broken off between them. What creatures men are, the best of them: even the Archdeacon is forced to admit it. . . . Bless her, dear Ursula, what a life she has led among them! But there's something better, I hope, in store for her. I do not mean that she is to marry Mr Almond, valuable as he is. O dear, no; that would be a palpable mistake—Your Ladyship agrees with me."

"Entirely—Ursula will never marry. She still loves the memory of that unfortunate man, who, they tell me, is going to be transported, better than any other living being, save her nephew. I hope they will live together now. He wishes it; and I trust she need not be afraid of his changing again. If he has not now learned to value his true friends as they deserve, I will give him up as hopeless."

Oh, surely, surely;—the dear youth, I am sure, will be steady now. Nothing, after all, like one's own flesh and blood. If Joanna and I set up house again together, (and really Mr Ashmole presses it so, that I can't find in my heart to refuse him,) could there be a stronger proof that there are no ties like home ties? I was beginning to be tired of gazing about in foreign parts, though the Archdeacon was all we could desire—and to think myself an old fool for!"

In the pause which ensued, after the worthy gentleman had talked herself out of breath, Lady Merivale was struck by the quicker and more careless treading of feet in the chamber above: then by a sudden and heavy sound, like the falling of some one to the floor. After that, all was still. She rose, foreboding what this meant; while Miss Warble, unable to speak, grasped her hand tightly, and then, falling on her knees, began to pray as well as she could for weeping. In another instant, a step was heard upon the stairs, slowly descending, and a hand was on the lock of the door. It opened quietly, and Mrs Sherbrooke presented herself: hardly less pale and agitated than themselves. "All is over, ladies," she said, "and the poor young gentleman has fainted on the floor beside her. She was so fond of him!"

And thus closes our account of the adventures of "The Lion of the Coteries." Even these "garbled extracts" must vindicate our high opinion, and shew that this novel, with great wit and brilliancy, possesses rarer and higher qualities. We have not touched upon the powerful London-Life episode of Philip Warren, and the womanly-hearted Ursula; nor yet on the personalities and peculiarities of Almond, and his old inmate Judith, and the Merivale satellites. The genteel comedy of the piece, we leave nearly unnoticed, without much regret. We have had all manner of School for Scandal and May Fair comfit, and spicy characters, or their shadows, served up to us again and again, and never better than here; but the Almonds, the Cherrys, the Warbles, the Ashmoles, and the Roundheads, are the daily bread of life; without which we die, and the Mrs and Misses Florida Strongfellows, and Dr Wykehames, its relishing and natural sauce. Both are abounding here. The higher-wrought and pathetic scenes of Agnes' suffering, and of Ursula's stronghearted endurance, we have not ventured to profane.

In conclusion, we must remark, that if this be the production of a new writer, which, however, is not likely, the best among the old stagers will need to look to their laurels.

MR ENSOR'S RETROSPECTIVE VIEW OF THE MOVEMENT.

It is advisable, in order to obtain a clear view of the posture of our affairs, to note some particulars which occurred preparatory to the introduction of the late Reform Bill into Parliament. Men have little memory either for good or evil—few events affect their minds more deeply than the fretted lines do the sea-shore, which the coming tide smooths and obliterates, again to suffer impressions equally transient and superficial. The people—the working people—have now commenced the project of Reform, to promote which, many, with that sacred name in their mouths, are in effect mere gossips, who talk without object or interest; and, in fact, the genteel advocates for reform may generally be classed among trimmers, renegades, and impostors. Some of the most strenuous friends of liberty in speech have laughed at the fancy, and one in particular, it is said, avowed “that Parliamentary Reform was a fit thing to be made use of in argument in the House of Commons, but not to be carried into execution.” Mr Pitt stood high among the exalted talkers about reform in 1782 and 1783; and, in 1785, when he was Minister, he made motions on this subject in Parliament. The ups and downs in political life, by the same persons, terrify the sincere, and disgrace the whole political world. Sir W. Curtis, who officiated as a kilted mountebank to George the Fourth in Edinburgh, and was loyal from top to toe, had canvassed the freeholders

Middlesex for John Wilkes; and if consistency was to be heightened by double changes, Wilkes and Luttrell exchanged sides. Wilkes propitiated the court in the city of London—he became a most loyal alderman, and he was favoured at St James’;* while Luttrell, in his old age, raised the standard of revolt against the King’s Ministry. The war with America was declared to be a war against rebels—for were they not virtually represented in the British Parliament?—a fiction for a fact, in which verbiage our constitution so gloriously rejoices. And it was farther stated in Parliament, to satisfy the American colonists, that they were not worse treated than millions in England, who were taxed and retaxed, yet had not one vote among them all for a single Member in the British legislation. Such insults and such illustrations did not satisfy the Americans; while the exasperated British Reformers roused a spirit of inquiry, which occasionally excited expressions of alarm and indignation against the minions of power. The American War had in France a still greater effect. France was incomparably worse governed than England; and the soldiers, paid and voluntary, had not only participated in the war of freedom, but had shared the crown of victory with those who, having beaten their oppressors, had permanently achieved their liberty. Thence the French turned their eyes and thoughts on their own miserable state—they felt their disgrace—they contrasted their own strength with their own weakness—that they who had mainly snatched the colonists from a foreign enemy, could not relieve themselves from their own wholesale domestic oppression; for they, without a shade of representation, without Senate or Commons’ House, had no voice in any public concern; and that, while different opulent orders had prerogatives, and privileges, and exemptions from fiscal exactions, the people and the poor were borne down with peculiar and extraordinary charges, while a ban was pronounced against their merited advancement. The American War, also, as it increased the financial embarrassments of the French Government, improved the opportunities of the French Reformers—and they profited off them. The Revolution was effected with little violence: money was not forthcoming, and the Exchequer was closed. This Revolution was hailed by many who rejoiced at the emancipation of the American colonies; and consistent men could only have felt similar sympathy in a corresponding event. Among those who triumphed in the result, Mr Fox’s voice was the loudest. George the Third and his courtiers, of course, sympathized with the monarchy—as Joseph of Germany, when asked, would he not join the convention—“No,” said the Radical Emperor; “royalty is my order.” It is stated, that Mr Pitt at first did not participate in their terrors; he was then, however, implicated in an attempt to awe Russia, and prevent her from possessing Oczakow. On this occasion Mr Jenkinson distinguished himself in defence of the British armament by an elaborate speech about the balance of power, which, it would seem, he considered to be suspended on that port on the Black Sea. Disgrace followed the conduct of the British Ministry: millions were expended to no purpose; and, in order to conciliate the people for the failure and the waste, Mr Pitt reduced some inconsiderable taxes. Here is one of the many impostures which grow out of a small representation of the people in Parliament; and the hush-money, corresponding to the secret-service money, reduces the fictitious representation to something worse than nothing. Yet all this but prefaces the ignorance or imposition which immediately followed: the Parliament met the 30th January, 1793; the King’s speech states, “That the general state of affairs in Europe appears to promise to my subjects the continuance of the present tranquillity;” and Mr Pitt, in accordance with the declamation from the throne, delivered a most imposing speech on the budget. He said that the sinking-fund (the bubble-fund) would, with a continued peace, complete the object of its institution in the year 1808—that is, the national debt would be liquidated in sixteen years from that period. During this Parliamentary parade, different tumults occurred in England. Dr Kippis honoured the French Revolution by a public commemoration: Dr Priestley wished to follow the precedent in Birmingham: a Church-and-King mob made war on Dr Priestley's house, and, after irreparable injury, forced him to take refuge in America. Have the Reformers of Birmingham paid a tribute to his memory?—Not that they can honour him, for honour is self-derived, but as a judgment against their townsmen, who, by that act, in some measure stigmatized their town. This and similar outrages, perhaps, farther increased the spirit of the people in favour of the French Revolution and Radical Reform. Then the associations which began with American resistance were recruited or re-organized, and the support which they had given to the American Colonists was easily transferred to the Reformers of France. Some members dropped off—some turned on their associates. Mr Burke declared against clubs, &c.; yet he admitted that he belonged to more clubs than one, “in which the principles of the Glorious Revolution are held in the highest reverence.”—Reflections, p. 2. And what was this glorious revolution? He says, “It was a revolution not made but prevented. We made no revolution; no, nor any alteration at all.”* A glorious, truly a most inglorious revolution; and such, in fact, have been the reforms of the laws—civil, judicial, fiscal, constitutional—by our patriotic, overweening egotists. Such was the last Reform Bill, as is now evident and admitted; and it will become less and less a reform. There is an accruing indemnity for the paucity of good intended by its framers, in the law of property, which nullifies all reform. Primogeniture, so honoured by Burke and the Tory faction, adds and superadds to individuals masses of wealth; while the law of descent in France is equitable, distributing wealth and diffusing power. There the aristocracy of riches may rise in the spring head; but it must soon refresh the surrounding country. Wealth may accumulate in the hands of a few; but the law transfers it, in the next descent, among many heirs; which is repeated in each successive generation. Mr Burke assailed the French Revolution at its commencement; for it was not a sham, like the glorious English Revolution. He wrote his most abusive “Letter,” &c., in 1789, against the People and their proceedings; and, passing over many questionable points, we may ask, if some excesses did occur thus early, who were to blame? The People? no. And Macchiavelli discharges the People. On such occasions, he imputes the discredit of such offences to their masters. He says, that a people who had lived under a Prince, are like a savage animal, which, after being reduced to slavery, and pent up in a prison, escapes by accident into the country, runs riot, and, in ignorance of its aptitudes and means of defence, becomes the prey of others. Macchiavel does not revile the People, but the Princes who, having weakened or depraved them by their power, disable them from enjoying their liberty with discretion. He also defends, in a long chapter, the people from the charge of ingratitude, fixing that vice also on the Princes. Further, I may remark a strong contrast between Mr Burke's observations and Macchiavel's. The former would honour a revolution in proportion as it effected little; while the Florentine secretary declared that the capital defect of revolutions had been that they had not gone far enough. This imperfection the French people, or, if the fact be charged truly, the philosophers, did not commit. Some of the laws of radical excellence have been abolished or obscured, but the law of equal inheritance, with the small breach of the majorats, continues, with the satisfaction of all the French. This was a dreadful crime, socially and politically, in Burke's estimation. He honoured primogeniture; glorified the great landholders, even more than Lord John Russell's Reform Bill; called them the ballast of the constitution—a ballast that sinks us, stinting our people of their food, and the manufacturers of their market. Mr Burke has been treated with culpable partiality, in a late number of the Edinburgh Review. He passed for a Whig, yet he was, as Johnson said of him and himself—“He is as great a Tory as I am.” He began his official career with gross sycophancy. He called the King's message, in 1782, “the best of messages to the best of People, from the best of Kings”—The best of Kings! Is this Burke the Whig?—Rather one of the Omrahs mentioned by Bernier, who relates—“When the King speaks, they hold up their hands and cry, wonder, wonder!” The best of Kings!—and this uttered immediately after the war with the American colonies, which Burke had denounced; a war which this best of Kings was probably the first to urge, and, as he himself said to the American Ambassador, the last to renounce. All existing Kings were the best. George was superlative, Louis XVI. something more; but the People were worse and worse. Right-mindedness and royalty at one side; error and the People on the other. Yet, what said this very man, not speaking at large, but after having fixed the reader's attention to particulars? In his pamphlet on the “Present Discontents,” he quotes Sully, who declared that revolutions do not come by chance or caprice, and that the populace never rise from a passion to attack, but from impatience to endure—Burke adding, “These are the words of a great man; of a Minister of State, and zealous assertor of monarchy. They are applied to a system of favouritism, which was adopted by Henry III. of France, and to the dreadful consequences it produced. What he said of revolutions is equally true of all great disturbances.” Yet this same Mr Burke, in respect to the revolution in France, professed to consider it an inexplicable casualty, or, if not causeless, the creature of Voltaire, Rousseau, Condorcet, Mably, and the other Encyclopædists. Spleen and Scribblers seem to have taken full possession of his faculties. What was new was discredited; yet novelty is neither good nor bad; and the historian Hume says, "That the chief improvements in the British constitution have been effected by violent innovation." He played the sophist egregiously in his vocation, talking of morally true and politically false; he defended monkeries; and, still farther tampering with truth, he defended mitred fronts in courts and palaces, and nobility—the Corinthian capitals in society; but the working classes—the Caryatides in his political architecture—he condemned, heaping on them a quotation from Ecclesiasticus—"for their talk is of oxen." He also quotes most approvingly from the preceding verse—"And he that hath little business shall become wiser;" hence Parliament is called the collective wisdom. Certainly few can have less to do than Members of Parliament, and the laws are monuments of their idleness and wisdom. He praised the Queen of France in such terms as a premature schoolboy would his first love for a Miss in her teens. Then came chivalry emblazoned—an antiquated foppery, and kindred to the elder Holy Alliance. When, about the beginning of the 13th century, the rage for violence and plundering abated, the Society of Militès Jesu Christi de Narbonna ceased its dignity. Mr Burke vaunted that, under the tutelage of chivalry, "vice lost half its evil, by losing all its grossness." The French memoirs of lords and ladies are filthy in the extreme. Even Moliere's pieces, composed for the court, notwithstanding their exquisite merit, are equally disgusting as to the refinement of vice among the chivalrous French. To be sure, much reserve was shewn by the lady mothers who furnished a continual stream of retiring virtue to the Regent's parc aux cerfs; and what peerless vice was his who declared, qu'il n'aimoit pas les plaisirs innocens! Yet Mr Burke's eloquence and learning are advanced, as if they could cover his political hostility to reform, and qualify his outrages against a people daring to emerge from despotism, with its category of grinding vexations. Mr Burke is most anxious to justify his consistency. When he came into office with the Whigs, he began his placemanship in England by a plan of economical reform throughout the whole civil expenditure. And the Annual Register, 1782, p. 180—his own Register—stated, that on this occasion he spoke with great emotion. This was catching; for his seconder, Mr Powys, also spoke with signs of great emotion. How far was this theatrical? for we know that Mr Burke, improving on Macbeth and the air-drawn dagger, and suiting the action to the word, threw on the floor of the House of Commons a dagger, when he announced that three thousand substantial daggers had been lately manufactured in Birmingham. This sentimental economist, always consistent, did, for the tare and tret for his well-acted virtue, receive an enormous pension out of the very fund on which he declared no pension should be charged. Yet Mr Burke's consistency, even in this case, may be reconciled by the following concluding paragraph of his Reflections, &c.:—"These come from one who wishes to preserve consistency, but would preserve consistency by varying his means to secure the unity of his end." The Edinburgh Review not only glossed over this man's character, but pronounced him a peculiar prophet. Never did man exhibit less foreknowledge. He said—Annual Register, 1793, p. 181—in order to promote the war, that the most expensive part of a war was always the beginning. The French war was prodigiously the reverse. He, so far from being prospective, could not see, or would not recognise what was obvious to all. He said, in 1790, in reply to Mr Flood, in his speech for Parliamentary Reform, that the people were indifferent to reform; yet, he says, he published his thoughts on the French Constitution, to prevent them from being induced to imitate it. On the contrary, the people were in great commotion. Hence we had Mr Windham praising the happy constitution of the House of Commons—Annual Register, 1790, p. 80; Mr Jenkinson, asserting the confidence of the people in it, thus—"Could any gentleman prove, that at any time the decisions of the House of Commons were not in unison with the opinions of the nation? He maintained they could not in a single instance." Mr Pitt took up the same theme, and advised Mr Burke to cease abusing the French constitution, and substitute the praise of the English, though it was difficult to determine whether he more glorified the one or more vilified the other—they were to Mr Burke the "Beauty and the Beast." Every incident proved that the spirit of reform was vigorous, by the means taken to awe the malecontents—the fright and desertions of the talking patriots—the Duke of Richmond, who changed his purpose from reform to strengthen the People's power, to the construction of round towers along the coast, to prevent them being surprised seawards. Mr Pitt, a brother Reformer, withdrew his name also from the reforming firm, and condemned the clubs of which he had been a member. The alarm and panic of the Constitutionals were prodigious. Mr Burke objected to relieving the Bohemians from feudal servitude; and, in a private conversation with Mr Curwen, he started into a paroxysm of rage, because he, Mr Curwen, affirmed facts derived from his own direct knowledge of the country.—(Curwen's Letters on Ireland, v. ii., p. 92.) Indeed, such was the terror of the Aristocracy of the spread of popular sentiments, that the abolition of the Slave Trade was declared in the Lords to be connected with the levelling system and the Rights of Man.—(Annual Register, 1793, p. 90.)

During this period two games were playing, by the King and Ministry, at the same time. First, it was said the people were indifferent to Reform, and most comfortable, present and prospectively; for, as I have said, Mr Pitt calculated on a long peace, and a clearance of the National Debt in a few years. And he further stated, that, (the 30th of April, 1792,) "by the blessing of Providence, we enjoy an unexampled state of political happiness." This halcyon announcement was soon changed; for, in the next month, May 21, a proclamation was issued denouncing the endeavours to bring into contempt the wise and wholesome provisions made at the time of the glorious Revolution, and since strengthened and enforced by consequent laws, for the preservation and security of the rights and liberties of our faithful and loving subjects, &c. This state of perplexity was soon decided by the principals of the European confederacy, the mighty friends of order, and religion, and property, and peace—the Emperor of Germany and the King of Prussia—who prepared to march into France at the head, it was said, of 200,000 men. Of this force, the Duke of Brunswick, supposed to be the greatest captain of the age, was generalissimo. Some time before, he had, at the head of a Prussian army, mastered the Dutch Patriots. He issued a proclamation from Coblentz, July the 25th, 1792, in which he declared, that he entered France “to put an end to the attacks made on the throne and the altar; to restore the King to his legitimate power, to liberty and safety. That the Emperor and King do not mean to meddle in the government of France;” (Russia, another confederate, had just extinguished the constitution of Poland, and was overrunning the country, which was a third time to be divided between her and her allies;) “and that, if the Parisians do not immediately comply with this command, they shall suffer the most exemplary and avenging punishment, by giving up the city of Paris to military execution, and exposing it to total destruction,” &c. The Duke issued another proclamation, two days after, denouncing similar vengeance against the inhabitants of other towns in France who might transgress his behests; and yet, after these dreadful threats, thundered throughout the extent of France, it was held a crying sin that the French rose in their might, became an armed nation, tried their King, who had been seized flying to join the German invaders, and that they confiscated the property of the emigrants marshalled to assist them. The Duke’s proclamation tested not merely the spirit but the common sense of the French; they were to decide on their own lives, and the existence of France as a nation. Had the assailing Emperor and Kings succeeded, probably France would have also been partitioned, and another Nicholas might now, having seized the remnant, sent its brave inhabitants to join the Poles in their beggary and dispersion throughout Europe. The Germans marched on, proclaiming the Bourbons and legitimacy. They entered Champagne. Sour grapes, they say, forced those who promised to inflict such unexampled horrors on the Parisians, to retreat. Had they succeeded, and only reinstated the King, and clergy, and noblesse in power, France would have fallen back, as Spain did when a French army marched through that country, and restored the often sworn Ferdinand to absolute power. Then, indeed, might have been truly said of France, as the celebrated Oxenstiern did sarcastically, on returning to

Spain, after a long absence, “Il n’y a rien changé.” Had the Bourbons and the royal satellites been restored under the auspices of these German despots, there would have been a change, and for the worse; for in what way did they reform themselves after their banishment, and vagrancy, and distress, and restoration, and rejection, and re-restoration?—It was truly said of the emigrants, royal, and noble, and ecclesiastical, that “they learned nothing, and forgot nothing;” and Charles X., and Polignac, and their ordinances, proved that they were determined on perdition—the curse of irredeemable bigotry and tyranny was stamped on their heart; and they were finally dethroned and expatriated in the famous days of July, with little more agitation and bloodshed, so entirely had they worn out their credit, than occurs in some tithe quarrels between the Irish peasantry and the Protestant parsons.

But to return to our own affairs, from which the French convulsion and the allied sovereignties of Germany for a while carried us, beyond the immediate sequence of events:—The proclamation of the English King, dated the 21st of May, 1792, relative to the endeavours of the lieges to bring into contempt the wise laws of our incomparable constitution, was followed by an augmentation of the forces by sea and land; by building barracks—for soldiers could not be trusted among citizens. The militia was called out; Hanoverians were introduced into England; the Habeas Corpus act was suspended, five millions were voted to sustain commercial credit; with secret committees; green bags; the alien bill; bills respecting foreign correspondence; Post-Office spies, and spies of all kinds; and secret-service money. Then began prodigious trials, and still more prodigious convictions and judgments. Muir and Palmer were tried for leasing-making in Scotland, and sentenced to be transported to Botany Bay for fourteen years. At this trial, a judge held that no one not having land had any right publicly to discuss political questions. This judgment was justified in Parliament; and Mr Dundas backed the law-officer who stated that the English laws were not sufficiently severe. This Dundas found that the English laws were sufficiently severe—“He shall have judgment without mercy who has had no mercy.” Then came the trials of Horne Tooke, Hardy, Joyce, &c. They were members of societies which had arisen towards the close of the American War, which obliged the Government to do justice to public opinion. Mr Pitt was summoned to give evidence on these trials, in order that he might exonerate certain societies from odium, by avowing himself to have belonged to them. For once his recollection failed him; but Mr Sheridan refreshed his memory, and he afterwards retracted his testimony. The accused, triumphantly, and with general approbation, were declared not guilty. Yet they were pronounced, by the heartless and murderous crown counsel, acquitted felons. To all these things add the resistance of France: which the prophet

Burke declared could not long continue ; for, he said, France was extinguished—a void in Europe—and that the warrior spirit of its once brave people had passed away ; quoting “ Gallos olim bello floruisse.” The reverse was soon proved. To the retreat of the allied arms under the Duke of Brunswick, was added the defeat of the Duke of York at Dunkirk. Notwithstanding every obstacle raised to the expression of public opinion, mismanagement and defeats forced the People openly to resume their opposition. In Copenhagen Fields, a hundred thousand persons met to petition for peace ; and the King was assailed, on going to Parliament, with cries of “ Peace !—Bread !” Then the Seditious-Meetings Bill passed ; and Mr Windham said Ministers were determined to exert vigour beyond the law. So they did in the American War, as they have done on the present Canadian outbreak ; so they did repeatedly in the French war ; but it never occurred to them to reform the evils in these or other cases, till they had fought themselves into difficulties, and disgrace, and debt. As to America so to France—they thought they could conquer the colonies, they were assured they could conquer France, and thus have the English Reformers at their mercy. And what was the issue ? In the next year, 1797, Bonaparte, at the head of young France against old Europe, succeeded in eighty-four engagements, fourteen of which were pitched battles ; and had not Bonaparte undertaken the Russian war, while the fate of Spain was undecided, England would have been prostrate before this man’s omnipotent vengeance. As to Parliamentary Reform, how has the French war, advocated by our Lives-and-Fortunes Men, and the defenders of our property and constitution, left both property and constitution ? The King, Ministry, and corruptionists began this war with a taxation of about sixteen millions, which now, after twenty-one years’ peace, nearly equals fifty-two millions, with a debt increased to eight hundred millions. The debt, at the former period, as I before stated, Mr Pitt calculated, would have been cleared in 1808 ; yet the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, instead of calculating National Debt or interest, confines his financial expectation to saving, by some economical arrangement, £3,000 in twenty years from the present time. In contemplating this debt, I am happy to quote, approvingly, a remark of one whom hitherto I could not conscientiously praise. Mr Burke, in his “ Reflections,” p. 229, says—“ Nations are wading, deeper and deeper, into an ocean of boundless debt. Public debts, which at first were a security to governments, by interesting many in the public tranquillity, are likely, in their excess, to become the means of their subversion.” Debt was the immediate cause of the French Revolution ; yet, last Session, Sir Robert Peel talked of “ the beautiful simplicity of the 3 per cents.” They will be further simplified. Political retribution has been postponed by the French war, as a dam impedes a coming flood. The People are pressing for Universal Suffrage.

I shall stop for the present with a quotation from Sir J. Mackintosh, published at the beginning of the French Revolution—“ Political inequality is equally inconsistent with the principles of natural right, and the objects of civil institution ; men retain a right to share in their government, because the exercise of the right by one man is not inconsistent with its possession by another, which is evidently the case when the surrender of a natural right can be created by society.” Vindiciæ Gallicæ, p. 225. Universal Suffrage is the movement question now, as it was formerly. The nation is at peace—the people are greatly improved in ability and knowledge—and the want of popular authority in the representation is felt both by consumers and producers ; and by all, not placemen, in the excess of expenditure, and in the overwhelming amount of taxation.

GEORGE ENSOR.

Address, 1839.

A CHAPTER OF POPULAR POETRY.

The changing or progressive spirit of every age is manifested in nothing more distinctly than in its contemporaneous popular poetry. Nay, it might probably be more correct to say, that popular poetry is one marked embodiment of that spirit. It is not, however, among the lingering imitators of Byron, or of the elegant and mellifluous Hemans and her tuneful confraternity, that we are to look for the poetry which reveals the expanding and brooding heart of the People, and which, wherever it may germinate, is sure first to break forth at the plough, the loom, the forge, in the village school, or in the workshop of the skilled artisan ;—at one period, if religious excitement be the prevailing cause, in rude satire and ruder hymns ; at another, in such patriotic lyrics as “ The Marseillaise March,” or the impassioned strains of Körner. The popular poetry of the present day is quite as significant a token of the times as ever was “ Hudibras” or “ Lillebulerloo ;” and it possesses, with a higher, as distinctive a character—thoughtful, energetic, earnest, suggestive, bursting with real feeling and deep meanings. As the most potent utterers of the human heart and soul in this new mode, we may instance Ebenezer Elliott, in England, and Béranger, in France ; the one trained at the forge, the other in the printing-office, and both in boyhood intellectually excited by the strife of social elements—the heavings of the society breaking up around them. Poetry—or call it what we may—that impassioned language in which men deeply moved are compelled to give utterance to their thoughts and feelings, has formed a leading feature in the lighter department of this Magazine from its commencement, so that a volume of purely Radical Poetry, of no every-day quality, could now be collected from its pages. The humble poet of this new order may sometimes be rude in speech and manner; for in giving utterance to the yearnings of his heart and the soarings of his imagination, his aim is not, as of old, to please, but to rouse, vivify, and illuminate. But whatever may be wanting in the accomplishment of verse, is more than made up by vigour and downright earnestness, by pure and lofty feeling, and by the large interfusion of the spirit of truth and love.

Popular poetry, as a sign of the times, is not limited to the expression of political or sectarian opinion. Where bacchanalian songs predominated, we have Temperance lays, which are far from being milk and water compositions. Instead of the laudations of those who have steeped the earth in misery and blood, which have resounded through the popular verse of all ages, the people begin to chant the praises of such heroic benefactors of their kind as Milton and Washington, Franklin or James Watt. Though the love and admiration of Nature has grown and must ever grow with mental cultivation, and the consequent refinement of taste, instead of Addresses to the Moon, or Sonnets to the Glow-worm, and such other trivial if pretty themes, we meet with Odes to Labour, passionate assertions of the unalienable rights of the whole human race, and eulogies on those who have entitled themselves to its gratitude and blessing. The high destinies of mankind, and the progressive amelioration of society, are among the august themes of the new order of popular bards; and we may affirm of all of them, that, if they fail in the higher order of poetry, not one is seduced by that rapid, tinkling sing-song, which has so long been mistaken for poetry. From our accumulated stores of this species of modern verse—the Poetry of the People—we now propose to select a few specimens, differing in style and metres, but with a common origin, and possessing many family features. By thus disposing of the sterner spirits, we shall also clear the way for that Annual Feast of the Poets, which it has been our good custom to celebrate in September. Let us, then, without farther preamble, open with this emphatic question—

WHO ARE EARTH'S MIGHTY ONES?

Who are earth's mighty ones?

The sceptred monarchs, and the lords of power,
Whose wide dominions

Stretch over land and sea, from shore to shore?

Who are earth's mighty ones?

Warriors whose red hands grasp the battle blade—
Anarchy's ruthless sons,

Whose breath a universe in anguish laid?

Who are earth's mighty ones?

Priests who bind souls in superstition's spell—

Whose foul contagion runs

Thro' every breast, dark, wild, and terrible?

Are these earth's mighty ones,—

Such as she boasts, with heaven, equality?

Are these her glorious sons,

Who win her name an immortality?

O Earth, where is thy shame,

That thou should'st bear such children in thy womb?

Where is the voice of fame,

To call the mighty from oblivion's tomb?

Where is the patriot hand,
The strength of honour, and the trust of faith?
Where is the deathless band,
Who drew in glory at their earliest breath?

Where is the Freeman's boast—
The proudest, man can utter—"I am free;"
Which, when all else is lost,
Remains with him to all eternity?

Where is the sound that raised
The flame of victory in each high heart?
Where are those actions praised
In song, whose lustre never can depart?

These are earth's mighty ones—
These win the meed of an undying name—
These are her glorious sons,
Heirs of her trust, inheritors of fame!

No tyrant diadem—
Badge of a people's suffering—binds their wraith:
Their coronet 's the gem
Formed from the crystal of affection's breath.

We cannot follow this with any piece so appropriate as the praise of one of Earth's truest "mighty ones," one of her most glorious sons.

ODE TO WASHINGTON.

"Dignum laude virum musa vetat mori.
Cæsis musæ beat." HORACE.

A name that all with blessings greet! Yes, go
Where'er th' inconstant sun illumines this world—
As far as waves may waft or winds shall blow;
Where'er the flag of freedom is unfurld—
(The tyrant to the dust for ever hurld!)

Or where the Slaveon cringes to the lash,
And the indignant lip is never curld.
Ye thunderbolts, why speed ye not to dash
Your ruin on the tyrant with avenging crash?

Yes, far and wide, great stream! as on thy shore,
Gaunt *Mesachebe is proclaimed his name;
As a divinity, for ever more,

Men hail it with a worshipping acclaim!
For his alone is an unsullied fame
That blooms immortal—blooms on earth, on high,
Knowing no winter; in its pride, the same
As when thy banks reverberated a nation's cry,
Grateful for peace and well-earned independency.

His cause was justice, freedom, and his home:
Britons, could you resist a cause so just?
Ye who had fought for "equal rights" whilome,
And dared to curb a tyrant's lawless lust;
And ye prevailed. Faithful to the trust
Of liberty, your sons beyond the seas,
E'en like yourselves, have struck for freedom: must Oppression, like some rancorous disease,
Exterminate your sons because your tyrants please?

Firm, but not lawless—resolute, not rash;
Patriots awake when freedom calls: the call
Is like the thunder-roar: th' awakening flash
Heralds to freedom and the tyrant's fall,
Proclaiming freedom to the slave—to all.
Great is the cause—a cause for gods to fight—
To burst man's shackles—trample down his thrall.
Contend for home, and liberty, and right;
And, should the price be life, resign it with delight!

This Acrostic, which comes to us from one of our largest manufacturing towns, will be its own interpreter. It follows naturally in the order of arrangement.

ACROSTIC.

Henry, thou hast in British hearts a home—
Enshrind in love thy peaceful glories are;
Nor can the chroniclers of Greece or Rome
Reveal the beaming of so bright a star;
Yes, freedom's sons have hailed its rays afar!

* The Indian name for the Mississippi.

Light of an intellectual galaxy
Of statesmen great, and worthies known to fame,—
Rise in thy brightness o'er the stormy sea,
Day-star, come forth and blazing truths proclaim.

Bards, raise the song, to tell what wondrous deeds
Renowned heroes have achiev'd in war;
Of scenes of carnage, where the mighty bleeds
Unnotic'd, laid beneath destruction's car.

Go, strike your harps to chant a patriot's praise—
Have ye a nobler earthly theme than this?
A land of freemen will the tribute raise,
Millions rejoicing in their homes of bliss.

THE SPIRIT OF FREEDOM.

O search not for me on the hills,
Nor in a thousand living rills,
Whose stream the boundless river fills,
Nor in the rushing wind;

O search not for me on the plain,
'Mid pastured flocks and golden grain;
E'en on the rock ye'll seek in vain,
For that ye may not find.

O search not for me in the sea,
Where the waves bound exultingly;
Nor in the swift clouds wild and free,
Nor in the trackless air;

Nor in the flight of mountain bird,
When coming tempest's voice is heard—
When rocks are rent, and forests stirred,
Ye may not find me there.

O seek me not, when banners flying
Upon the breeze, all storms defying—
Above the field where dead and dying
Attest how fierce the fight;
Where the tumult rages thick and fast,
And black with smoke the deadly blast,
As carnage, sweeps careering past,
In all destruction's might.

These feat o'er other fields than mine—
The clarion's shrilly notes may join
With shouts of joy, that thousands pine
In the bonds of slavery;

But in the heart, there deep thoughts dwell,
Close in the soul's mysterious cell—
'Twas there I wrought my silent spell—
'Tis there you'll seek for me!

Our next specimens, like the preceding, spring from the mind of one of that numerous class of men to whom our intelligent legislators, and, what is worse, a great number of the ten-pound electors, would deny the franchise.

MY OWN FIRESIDE.

There's a smiling spot in the poor man's home,
That is known not to pride in its gilded dome;
And he loveth it well, for 'tis hallowed by all
That hath bound him to life, or is dear to his soul:
By the memory sweet of his boyish years—
By a father's smiles and a mother's tears;
And earth hath no spot on its surface wide
So dear to him as his own fireside.

I boast not the pomp of a tapestried hall,
Whose grandeur mocks at the sorrowful thrall;
But a humbler lovelier dwelling is mine,
Around whose wall clings the sweet woodbine.
'Tis the altar from whence pure thoughts ascend
To the poor man's God—to the mourner's friend;
'Tis the shrine where my hopes and fears abide;
And no spot is so dear as my own fireside.

When the wintry blast is loud and wild,
And the fire with the blazing faggot piled,
I could almost bless my humble lot,
As on Shakespeare's page, or the mighty Scott,
With a feeling heart I calmly pore,
Tracing the depths of each sage's lore.
The proud may disdain, and the rich deride,
But they know not the joys of a calm fireside.

They are gone, they are gone, who have been to me
As the guiding stars of my destiny;
But their memory sweet, it shall ne'er depart,
But cling, like a tendril, still to my heart;
For a brother's laugh, unquench'd by care,
And a sister's smile still welcome me there;
And no matter if weal or woe betide—
I can meet it content by my own fireside. W. L.

MY MOUNTAIN HOME.

My mountain home!—What is it binds
My heart to this wild spot?
The rock and fell, the foam and flood,
The rude and lonely cot:
For these I shun the city proud,
Where halls and temples rear;
For thought and word alike are free,
Free as my footsteps here.

What heed I of the princely dome,
The pride of rank or wealth,
While free o'er heath and fell to roam,
With Nature's blessing—health.
Talk not to me of beauty rare,
With coroneted brow;
The mountain girl hath face as fair,
And heart as blithe and true.

But there's a nobler feeling far
That binds me to this spot,
Which makes me scorn the pomp of state,
And love my lowly lot:
'Tis that the soul, in scenes like these,
Can free communion hold
With Nature's vast and awful works,
And learn what they unfold.

I love—when thunders rock the hills,
And the red bolt is gleaming,
Till lake, and wood, and mountain peak,
In that wild light are beaming—
I love to look upon these scenes,
And read their awful charm:
How frail is human power compared
To an Almighty arm!

'Tis here the monarch proud might learn
How brief his mortal span,
And throw his gilded trappings by,
To own himself but man:
The courtier too, who at his feet
Fawns out his little hour,
Might learn, methinks, to bow to nought
Save an Almighty power.

My mountain home—in flowery spring,
When summer decks the tree,
Or autumn's fruits are rich and ripe—
'Tis still the same to me.
How sweetly, too, by this rude hearth,
When the fire's ruddy light
Brightens each loved and laughing cheek,
Doth pass the wintry night!

My mountain home! a thousand ties
Bind me as with a spell
To thy rude walls, where all most dear—
The loved and lovely—dwell.
A thousand nameless ties, I ween,
Which ne'er may broken be,
Are those which form the magic chain
That links my soul to thee. W. L.*

From the same pen we have a copy of verses on the Year 1838, from which we cull a few stanzas.

THE LAST YEAR.

Thou hast heard an abbey's walls resound
With the shouts of a madden'd throng,
Whose sorrows seem'd, like the maniac's, drown'd
In a wild unmeaning song;

* This contributor will, we trust, find his private query speedily and satisfactorily answered by Mr Rowland Hill's plan of penny postage.

For a maiden was crown'd mid hymn and prayer
Of dread and heathen mummery.

Thou hast seen proud Durham dress'd out for war,
And his gilded trappings fail,
Though decked with the badge of a bloody Czar,
While making the freeborn quail.

Thou hast heard the mighty Brougham proclaim
Each freeman's rights, nought recking,
That the puny Whigs all hoot his name,
Like owls at the falcon pecking.

Thou hast heard the poor man's hut as it rung
With his famish'd children's cry;
While he whose wealth from the bread-tax sprung
With a careless sneer passed by.

And thou hast heard a voice go forth
That must sound oppression's knell;
For a million souls of might and worth
Have risen their wrongs to tell.

Let their hearts be true as their cause is right,
Their voices be as one;
And a breath will shiver the tyrant's might,
Ere another year be gone!

W.

The author of the subjoined lines is already known by the publication of a meritorious small volume, containing much of the true Poetry of the People.

THE GENIUS-STARVATION PRINCIPLE,
With a small bit of Advice to would-be Authors.

A grave fat Dean told Thomson once—
Th' illustrious author of "The Seasons"—
That genius should be aye kept poor,
For this, 'mongst many more good reasons :—
That hunger may be whip and spur
To urge its victim to exertion,
And easy-minded worldly folks
Gain fresh instruction or diversion.
Toil on, ye ill-requited race!
To please fat Deans ransack your brains;
And when at length you've given your all,
Then die neglected for your pains.
Ye would-be authors, O beware!
If ye are poor throw by the pen:
Go dig the earth, or sweep the streets,
For ye may write for bread in vain.
Whene'er I see a starving bard,
Or gifted painter, poor and mean,
I sigh, and wish him better trade,
And think there's many a grave fat Dean!

A JOURNEYMAN MECHANIC.

Let no one really humane be offended by this exposure of modern spurious or canting charity.

THE DEAN AND THE COUNTESS.

"'Twas a beautiful sermon, Dear Doctor, you gave us,
Last Sunday, on Meekness and Charity—
'Twill rouse the poor wretches in hundreds to crave us,
And tease us with smells and vulgarity."
"Lady B., I am horrified—what do you think?
An old ragged beggar had heard me!
Good God! that such brutes into churches should alink:
From preaching 'twould almost discard me.
"An old palsied wretch, with a famishing cur—
Lean, haggard, and tattered, and cold—
Hobbled up to me yesterday, whimpering—'O, sir!
O, pity the hungry and old!'"
"O, nauseous! the groundling!" the Countess exclaimed.
"I bade him begone," quoth the priest.
"The Radical scum!—how the rabble untamed Stand in need of bloodletting at least!
"The altar's profaned, and the church is in danger;
But the Count—hath he gone to the races?
Then adieu—I have wagered five hundred on Ranger;
I must go and examine his paces,"

"One moment, Dear Doctor," her ladyship cries;
"I am down a cool hundred for missions:
I shall stand at the head of the list—but advise
On these want-and-starvation petitions."
"Miller Bob for two guineas—the Radical vile," Quoth the priest, as he glanced at the scroll;
"On the wreck of our fortunes the wretches would smile—
Let them starve for the health of the soul."

CYRUS.

EYLAU, OR GLORY.

The night-star shone bright over Muscovy's plain,
And hushed was each echo and silent each strain
Of the trumpets which rung out their peals on that day—
Now sleepless, yet noiseless, the hostile hosts lay.
Some looked on that sky which would usher the morn,
When each pennon, unfurled, to the breeze should be borne—
When musketeon, cannon, and arquebuse roar,
Should wake with their voices the slumbering war.
There were Italy's sons—there were peasants of France—
From the vines and the roses of sunny Provence,
Who had wandered in peace on the Garonne's fair track—
Now come to the land of the frozen Cossack.
Again the night planet shone bright in the sky,
And proudly the moon held her journey on high;
Again lay that squadron stretched over the plain,
But ne'er shall a morrow awake them again!
There was he who from Tuscany's valleys came forth,
Lying stretched side by side with the child of the north,—
And ne'er shall yon Provençal child of the sun
Ere welcome the waves of his lovely Garonne.
The watch-fires may gleam o'er that desert of snow,
And the clarions may sound where the valiant lay low:
They have poured forth their blood in the tumult's wildrage,
To fill half a column of history's page.

From our translators we select two effusions of patriotic ardour from men of acknowledged genius.

LE VIEUX SERGEANT.

(From the French of Béranger.)

The scarred and veteran sergeant has forgot,
Beside his daughter's chair, his cares awhile:
And with one arm, disabled by a shot,
Rocks his twin grandchildren with happy smile.
Thus, seated tranquil in his native cot,
His refuge from the wars and perils past,
He cried—"Our birth is not our finished lot;
May you, dear babes, die gloriously at last!"
What hears he now? the drum's arousing roll!
He sees a squadron marching o'er the plain;
His bald brow flashes to his ardent soul:
Oh! the old war-horse feels the spur again!
"But whose these stranger banners?" And his glance Sunk to the earth with sudden shame o'ercast.
"Oh! would ye yet revenge the wrongs of France—
May you, dear babes, die gloriously at last!"
"Who will give back," exclaimed the veteran,
"The brave young peasants who, beneath the sign
Of the Republic, at her bidding ran
To stern Jemappe, and Fleurus, and the Rhine?
Shoeless and hungry, deaf to base alarms,
They marched to glory fearlessly and fast.
The Rhine shall yet re-temper our old arms.
May you, dear babes, die gloriously at last!"
"How shone thro' all, in battle's fiery hour,
By victory ever worn, the garb of blue!
Blent with the hail of freedom's crashing shower,
Sceptres and chains in broken splinters flew.
The nations, freed in our victorious right, Crowned our brave sons with laurels where they pass'd;
Happy who perished in those days of light!
May you, dear babes, die gloriously at last!"
"Too soon our patriot glory passed away;
For dignities our chiefs forsook the ranks;
Still dark from the cartouch they basely pay
To tyrant power their homages and thanks,

Freedom : in arms departs to every throne,
Offering their swords, they turn with shameless haste;
Our tears are measured by our glories gone—
May you, dear babes, die gloriously at last !”
Checking his long complaint, his daughter here,
Still as she spins, with voice half-murmuring, sings
Those choruses proscribed, whose words of fear
With sudden start arouse the slumbering kings :
“ People, ’tis time that heard in turn, at large
Your songs should echo round on every blast.”
Softly he then said, bending o’er his charge,
“ May you, dear babes, die gloriously at last.”

W. D.

If any of our English, Irish, or Scotch critical readers shall pick faults with the following translation, we can only say, that when they turn German into French or Italian with equal facility, fulness, and exactitude of meaning, we shall pronounce them accomplished persons. Our English translation is made by a young Dane.

THE CALL TO PRUSSIA.

(From the German of Theodore Körner.)

Up, my country, up ! the beacons flame on high !
Clear from the north burst forth thy freedom’s light ;
Thou, in foemen’s heart, thy steel shalt redly dye.
Up, my country, up ! the beacons flame on high !
The seed is ripe : then haste, with sickle bright.
Our chiefest hope remains—our own true brand ;
Come, press into our hearts the steel right deep,
’Tis freedom’s only road ; cleanse our fatherland,
That German blood thy soil may nobly steep.
Not ours the heartless strife of king ’gainst king ;
No, ’tis a hallow’d and a glorious war :
Virtue, right, and faith, the despot’s hand hath wrung
From our breast—all to which our free hearts have clung ;
But we will save them yet from victory’s car.
The plaint of the graybeard moans, “ Arise ! arise !”
The ruined cot doth curse the robber brood ;
While thy daughters’ infamy for vengeance cries ;
Thy children’s murder calls aloud for blood !
Break the ploughshare—let the chisel quickly fall—
Untouched the loom—unsung the minstrel’s lay ;
Forsaken the lov’d homes, the cot, the hall :
Before our King plant on high the banner tall,
Let onward press the people’s close array ;
For they, in their freedom’s fair, eternal light,
Shall rear aloft a monumental pile ;
Stones, that erst our swords have hewn, shall be its site,
And warriors’ shades be hov’ring round its aisle.
Wherefore do ye, maids and matrons, loudly weep
That for you no bright falchion’s blade is steel’d ?
While we to the combat may joyously leap,
’Mid the spoilers’ bands our laurels bravely reap ;
Unknown to you the joy that battles yield,
Oh ! rather let your steps to God’s altars wend—
He heals with gentle love each wounded breast ;
May his holy peace upon your prayers attend,
And piety around your brows be prest !
Pray that ancient strength on us again may light,
That we as heirs of victory may stand ;
Call to her, the martyr of our German right—
Call to her, the genius of our vengeance’ night—
The angel of our true and faithful band :
O Louise ! be thou our guide to victory,
And cast thy blessing o’er our doubtful way ;
Come forth, ye shades of German warriors free,
Forth where our banners in the breezes play !
Heaven strikes for us—oppression’s hell must bow ;
“ Forth, forth, thou nation brave !” is freedom’s call :
Thy heart beats high : oaks their boughs around thee throw.
Heed not the lofty pile of thy slain below,
But rear, on freedom’s mount, the standard tall.
Yet if e’er, my country, thou, by fortune blest,
Shouldst see, upon thy brows, the laurel fall,
Forget not then thy faithful dead in their rest,
But deck with oaken wreaths our fun’ral pall.

* The Queen of Prussia.

The foregoing is the voice of the Prussian, not the British people ; or it is perhaps the echo of a time gone by. We return to our own land and our own day, venturing a shrewd guess that our contributor, however incongruous it may appear, is a member of the Society of Friends.

AN OLD BOURBONISM VERSIFIED.

What can black Sambo, upon Congo’s coast,
Know of the rigour of an Arctic frost ?
Or what the oil-fed son of Labrador,
Of Lybia’s sands, or Guinea’s burning shore ?
Tell the poor negro of that frozen zone
Where water turns almost as hard as stone ;
Through fields of white will roll his sceptic eye—
“ Massa, no true ! him tell a much big lie !”
Thanks be to science and our happy lot,
We know such facts, e’en though we see them not :
Thanks be to Ross, and such like navigators—
To Waterton, and eke his alligators.
It matters not how strange a thing, or new,
We swallow all, if you but prove it true !
Tell the plain fact, and give the why and wherefore—
There’s Q. E. D., and that is all we care for.
But I digress—’twas my intent to sing
A simple story of a simple king ;
(But here the Muse would fain her manners shew,
And make to Majesty a curtsy low :
Indeed, she’s one of the Parnassian Nine,
And has a reverence for the “ right divine :”
She toddled, when a very little thing,
About the court of Jove—that mighty king !)
It chanced upon a time, a king of Gaul—
But neither name nor date can I recall ;
So, by your leave, what I mean now to do is—
Sans more delay to dub him simply Lewis.
This Lewis was a pleasant kind of fellow—
Play’d whist, and sometimes got a little mellow ;
Liked a soft bed, and seldom got up early ;
Verged towards embonpoint—(we call it burly.)
He carried on the business of a court,
Exactly as all decent monarchs ought :
Could have his hand kissed with becoming grace,
And sometimes with a smile illumed his face.
Au reste, he loved good eating and good drinking,
And did not vex his kingship much with thinking.
This thinking’s a plebeian sort of thing,
And scarcely suits the genius of a king !
But to our tale.—It chanced, one summer’s day,
Lewis had dozed the afternoon away ;
At length at Tee-to-tum he played a game,
At a large table, with a courtly dame ;
Blessed was the toy that touched his royal hand !
Its head was turned, scarce could Tee-to-tum stand :
Pleased with the action of his gracious thumb,
Lo ! Majesty applauded Tee-to-tum !
If monarchs always leisure moments spent
In sport as dignified and innocent,
Of Nero’s pranks historians ne’er had told,
Nor Charles’s head on Cromwell’s scaffold roll’d ;
But pass we that—Tee-to-tum to a tee
Engrossed just then King Lewis to-tal-ly.
“ Take up,” “ Put down,” was all the monarch uttered,
Save now and then “ Parbleu,” he gently muttered.
At Fortune’s freaks the King began to whinge,
When, lo ! the portal turned upon its hinge :
In rushed the Ministers with dire alarms—
“ Paris rebels—the city is in arms !”
“ Is that all,” said the monarch, with a hum,
(Twirling again the neglected Tee-to-tum),
“ Is that all ? Double the Swiss guard to-night,
And bid them put this low canaille to flight.”
“ Sire,” quoth the minister, with troubled air,
“ It may not be, the city’s in despair.
These rascals find taxation is so high,
And food so dear, that wages can’t supply
Enough to keep the bodies from starvation,
Of half of our Parisian population.”

St Louis' seed, of hunger-knew as much,
As negroes know of ice or I of Dutch.
It won't surprise you that he answered thus :—
"About starvation do they make this fuss?
Go—let these fellows know, sir, if you please,
Rather than starve, I'd live on bread and cheese!"

E.

Ought we to apologise for placing this scene so far down in our list? Is it possible that wherever met it can come wrong while the enormity it exposes exists and gains strength?

THE CORN-LAWS.

"Every system, endeavouring, by extraordinary means, to draw towards a particular species of industry a greater share of the capital than would naturally fall into it, retards, instead of accelerating, the progress of society towards real wealth and greatness."

ADAM SMITH.

SCENE—Near Westminster Abbey.
CONSERVITAS AND PUBLICUS.

Pub. Well met, Conservitas! what news? how fares
That cause, in which all Britain—Europe! shares?
I know your principles, yet frankly say,
In yonder House, how doth opinion sway?

Cons. Still undecided is the great event—
An "Open Question"—theme for argument.
Fitzwilliam prompts his sturdy champions on—
Our wiser Lords support brave Wellington.

Pub. Methought your "march to victory" were brief,
Under safe-conduct of the iron chief?
With times men alter. Once I saw him wield
His sword—war's sickle—o'er the harvest-field;
Now to the earth his closing labours tend,
And "Villianton"* becomes the Landlords' friend.

Cons. There, pardon me! the fact you quite mistake—
His zeal is only "for the People's sake;"
But, had our vallant Nestor still the power
Which fortune granted to a happier hour,
When gloriously the Royal Standard flew
Above his prostrate foes at Waterloo!†

Pub. Ay! but those days are gone; the reign of peace Demands no prostrate foes—no victors—

Cons. Cease!
How little do you know the human mind,
Restless itself, must still some pretext find
For discontent or discord; when no more
Invasions threaten from a hostile shore,
Then the gaunt war-hound, cheated of his prey,
On his own brood life's instinct doth allay:
War is a law of Nature—God ordains—

Pub. What! that this earth, those fair and fertile plains,
Should be a sanguine theatre for strife?
That man should rob his fellow-man of life?
Forbid it, gracious heaven! though such may be
The Statesman's selfish creed and "policy;"
As those whose weak enclosures durst not bide
The swelling waters—turn their course aside;
So England hath been brought her strength to waste
In needless conflicts, that her Lords might taste
Their cherished wealth and luxuries, whate'er
The fearful cost—war, bloodshed, or despair!

Cons. Hard censures oft proceed from those who boast
The nation's welfare, yet neglect it most;
But not for idle clamour we'll abate
Our steady guardianship, nor leave the State
Humbly dependant for her "home supplies"
On the light promises of false allies,
Who, when our native tillage is o'erthrown,
And bounteous Ceres hath affrighted frown,
Might, on some trivial grounds or pretext vain,
Shut up their ports—refuse our merchants grain.
Then war and famine could at once assail
Our weakened land, and, haply too, prevail!

* "Wellington or 'Villianton'—for Fame Sounds the heroic syllables both ways."

BYRON.

† Modern Philosophy!—

"Slaughter
Is God's daughter."

ROBT. SOUTHLEY.

Pub. I grant—in such a case—your fears are right
Now, place the subject in another light :—
Behold those islands of the Southern Sea,*
Whose sons subsist by social industry—
Should we, affecting commerce to maintain,
Tax their yams, plantains, bread-fruit, and restrain
Their ancient neighbours' friendly intercourse
With barker of productions? Should we force,
By harsh "restrictions," traders from their shore?
Would not those wretched islanders deplore
Our thriftless interference? Yet we see
In this a picture of our misery—
The slaves of taxes and monopoly!
Oh! that in strength our country would arise—
Shake off her wrongs—

Cons. At what a sacrifice!
Think of the thousands who must suffer.

Pub. Nay!
Think of the millions' sufferings every day!
Long have the juggling priests of Government
Drawn our hearts' stream in taxes, tithes, and rent.
Too long have they who ruled, short-sighted, blind!
Repressed each better feeling of the mind;
Forgot those human sympathies, which make
The serf regarded, e'en for interest's sake;
But tension snaps the cord—one feather more
Brought down the camel at his master's door.

Cons. These are the tenets our Reformers spread!
The evil consequence be on their head;
Should rash compliance meet the bold demand,
Distress expels our farmers from the land!

Pub. Yet wherefore? when to fallen prices rent
Is duly levell'd—

Cons. Ha! shall WE consent?
Sooner might ruin overtake the whole,
Than I would "systemize" my "yearly roll."

Pub. Enough, my friend! I now the demon see
Which rules our Senate—'tis PROPRIETRY!
But, ere we part, take hence this sure conviction—
That time will yet remove each base restriction,
And Britain's commerce, unrestrained and free,
Shall be the safe-guard of her husbandry.† E. M.

The Church, as the sect established by the State is usually named in all the countries of Europe, has afforded a theme to the popular poets of England from the era of Pierce Plow- man, to that of Cowper, or The Village Curate.
All laymen take pleasure in hearing about, or detecting, the little peccadilloes of those whose trade is the gain of godliness.

THE PERFECT CHURCH.

Our holy, law-established Church
Deserves right well its golden perch,
And may contemn the pert research
Of those all prone to schism;
Indeed, should give them flame and birch,
Like her of Romanism.

'Tis wondrous that the Parliament
Could let its judgment be so bent,
As to give schism breath and vent,

* See Lord Fitzwilliam's speech on this question.

† Never until the last of our prescriptive—mis-called "protective"—duties is repealed, can Great Britain hope to enjoy the benefit of her own produce and manufactures, or those of other countries. One change in legislative government inevitably leads to many. The Repeal of the Corn-Laws, alone, would force the agricultural capital into other channels; and not only should we suffer the melancholy consequences of "transition," but one of our most essential and active branches of industry would be reduced below its just value (as it formerly was artificially raised above it) by the still existing protections, or promissus extended to monopolists. In justice, therefore, to the landed interest, we shall be compelled to abandon the protective system altogether; and those who are now the most determined opponents of the Corn-Laws' Abolition, will then become our most zealous partisans for an equalization of privileges.

By soft'ning down the laws,
For whiners, who will spread Dissent
Till halters stop their jaws.
Could Laud, with his chaste spirit, rise
To see the sects he did despise,
Pushing their scouts to hundred skies,
Converting half the world—
How would his pious wrath arise !—
How would his curse be hurled !

What !—dare to venture ev'rywhere,
And simple Scripture truths declare,
Without the "Book of Common Prayer?"
Without the Bishop's dub ?

Such unordained, officious care,
'Tis heavenly grace to smother.

In fact, there ne'er, since Eden's bow'rs,
Has been a church so pure as ours,
Though so boast by golden showers,
And tithes, and fruits of land ;
And hence she has those magic powers
Especial in her hand.

No penitence, no trumpery
Of vile Dissenting trickery,
She needs from very devilry,

To make a youth a priest ;
Give her a rake, and speedily
He's deaconized at least !

She only asks a good bold lie,
To say, an impulse from the sky
For ordination spurs the cry,

And (paid your college fees)
The sacred bishop's pat is nigh,
If you swear as he please.

(And, as the people are but asses,
No voice have they in all that passes,
Except a few in higher classes,

Who Livings have to give.
Who cares for souls of vulgar masses,
If vicars well may live ?)

And so, by sale or private favour,
Each clergyman becomes your neighbour ;
Nor seeks, by gentleness or labour,
'To gain or mend his flock ;

The poor to treat as did our Saviour
These gentlemen would shock.

And faith, they're very wondrous men :
One will sustain the charge of ten,
Without consulting where or when,

In a plurality ;
And all their flocks enjoin, by pen,
To mind morality.

Church fellowship they've g'ien the rout ;
We ramble in and ramble out,
Nobody asking what about,

If we but pay our tithes,
Nor hear at meeting-house about
Our souls and holy lives.

Our bishops, too, grow men of worth.
Give me the meekest man on earth,
And soon he's free from all his dearth,
If once he's in a see ;

Ennobled quickly in that berth,
He and his progeny.

Not that we know not how to fast ;
But then it is a lower caste
Of which that starving task is ask'd :

Of curates and such slaves ;
Whose penance through whole years will last,
And, sometimes, to their graves.

Ye know not what our priests can do,
Except convert a Turk or Jew,
Or form a sinner's life anew ;

Such would defile their hands :
Yet they'll address an empty pew,
If well endowed with lands.

'Tis clear they are our learned betters,
And cannot limp in common fetters ;
But, though no great example-setters,

They tell us what is good ;
And not to ape them we are debtors,

But what they say we should.
For Charles—who used to crop the ears
Of those who dared to tell their fears ;
About the course our true Church steers—

They have a form of prayer ;
And for his son, and black-eyed dears,
They praise pure heaven's care.

And then we have cathedral chants,
And bishops' coronation flaunts,
And many other claims and vaunts
About the true succession ;
And various grades through which hope pants,
To peerage in possession.

But, I must stop my prattling pen,
Or Southey will arouse again,
To praise the Church and mitred men,
And throw me in the dark ;

Or spread his ample sail, and then
Run down my little barque.

SIMON MÆSUS, Jun.

Let us hope that the subjoined lines will induce our juvenile readers to peruse the ennobling Memoir referred to. A very cheap and beautiful edition of it has lately appeared in Smith's "Standard Library."

Lines on Reading the Memoirs of Colonel HUT-CHINSON, "THE REGICIDE," BY HIS WIFE, LUCY.

Dark was the chamber where he lay, and damp
Stood, dew-like, trembling on the massive walls,
Whose base the sullen ocean wash'd ; and salt
Exhaled from out all objects round about,
And mix'd with noisome vapours, sunk like fog
Upon the feeble breath of life. All things Spoke but of wo and desolation, such
As tyrants pile on those they fear and hate ;
And bolts and bars, with endless clank of chains,
And grates, through which the daylight dimly stream'd,
Combin'd with utter solitude to shew
That he was one of them. But yet the mind
Triumph'd o'er nature's weakness ; and the hand
Of Death, though heavy laid, was powerless
To quench the soul's light beaming in his eye.
Though lonely thus and sick, he was not sad
Nor lost to hope and this world's visions—still,
Still on the past his memory would stray,
And from each cross and trouble of his life,
Which honesty and patriot zeal had quell'd,
Would gather courage to contest.

And she
Whose love had brighten'd all his days was there ;
Her calm eye beaming strength to undergo,
For his sake, more than tyranny inflicts,
With all its petty instruments of spleen ;
For his sake, and the "Glorious Cause"—which dash'd
A wretched monarch from his crumbling throne,
And told the world, in blood most justly shed,
That "right divine" meant not to "govern wrong."—
She bore all woes and persecutions hard ;
She loved him as her life, her hope, her all,
Her husband by whose side her days had pass'd
In love and happiness—with whom she grew
From girl to womanhood, from youth to age,
The father of her children, and the stay
Of a time-honour'd and respected house ;
And yet she mourn'd not for his fate. Her heart
Was set on holy things, more high than aught
This persecuted life can yield of bonds
Of fond affection. She did love him less
As lover of her younger days, and friend
Of years mature, than as the patriot sage,
Of valour stern and honesty, whose voice
Was ever firm amid the shiftest times,
Whose arm was foremost in the battle's rout
Whose ev'ry word and action proved his worth,
His Christian courage, and his patriot soul
Of staid temper—one whose virtue breathes

Fragrance and balm amid the scenes of blood,
 Apostasy, and crime, that soil'd the age,
 As violets shed a perfume all unseen
 Amid the poisons that grow rankly by.

He died !—the noble spirit burst its clay
 And join'd the great Eternal One, whose seal
 Stamp'd on his brow an universal fame.
 The pamper'd slave that, in his halls obscene,
 Held wine and wassail in his harlot court—
 Whose very breath bore poison, and whose hands
 Were reeking yet with infamy and shame—
 The "Lord's anointed" ribald, who, in scorn,
 Proclaim'd by day his deeds of nightly lust,
 And with the daughters of Corruption hurl'd
 The gauntlet of defiance in the face
 Of all we love of virtuous, chastest, best—
 Smiled as he heard the patriot martyr's knell ;
 And, gorged with revel, held his reign secure.
 Vain profligate ! when in the hand of God
 The trembling balances shall weigh thy acts—
 When, face to face before the Almighty's throne,
 The monarch and his victim shall appear,
 Stripp'd of all titles, power, and rank, and wealth—
 No courtly parasites to form thy guard—
 No venal judge to pardon or condemn—
 No witnesses save naked Truth—say, then,
 Will aught of this world's outward show protect,
 Or kingly diadem avert thy doom ?
 No ! in the courts above supreme reigns justice ;
 Mortality is void of rank ; the blaze
 Of regal splendour hides not scarlet sin ;
 And wrong'd and wronger meet alike their fate.

He died !—beside his couch no tear was shed
 Save that of pure affection ; and her eye
 Was dim but for a moment ; for the pride,
 Republican, of woman's heart restrain'd
 The bitter tax of unavailing tears.
 As she had lived the first and best of wives
 To one of England's brightest patriots, she Grieved not for him at any "common rate"
 Of those who mourn their lords with outward show ;
 But, more intent his memory to preserve
 Than aught bewail with foolish tears, her pen
 Traced on the deathless page his words and deeds,
 And left posterity example rare
 Of what we seldom see—the warrior's life,
 And sage's, patriot's, scholar's, all combin'd
 With honesty of purpose, and a soul
 Above temptation as above all praise.

O fair historian ! as a boy I loved
 To read thy history, and oft did wish
 My lot in life were cast with one like thee,
 To sweeten sorrows with a smile sedate ;
 And, when the wrongs of men had weighed me down,
 And crushed my limbs beneath the load of chains,
 To point the path to Liberty and Truth,
 And make a realm within of tranquil joy,
 The mind's Republic, where no King might reign,
 Potentate nor Priest, Emperor nor Czar,
 With all their cant of Kingcraft—where no thought
 Save thine, and thy bright image, might reflect
 A peaceful light amid the prison's gloom,
 And cheer the spirit as the body fail'd.

Perchance an eye may wander o'er the page
 Whose light, of all things, most resembles thine
 In speaking fortitude to those that need ;
 And, ever bright amid our earthly ills,
 Shines purer through the night, like some fair star
 The pilgrim spies upon the desert's verge,
 And lifts his heart to Heav'n, in prayer, to bless.

Shine on, thou peaceful planet ! by thy ray
 My foot shall tread the rugged wilderness,
 And meet no thorn : upon thy silver orb,
 Trembling in ether, like a vestal lamp,
 Mine eyes shall fix, though dimm'd with bitter tears,
 And thou, from thy high station, be to one
 The orient light fair LUCY shines to all

THE POOR MAN TO HIS CHILD.

Come nearer, my boy ! let me gaze on those features—
 Let me part the bright locks that are shading thy brow ;
 They call me a beggar, but none of God's creatures
 Can boast of a treasure more costly than thou !
 Ay, come to this bosom ! these arms that infold thee,
 Though weakened by sickness, affection can move :
 Long, long may they shield thee, for none else would hold thee,
 Or speak to my child in the accents of love !
 Oh, no ! when I rest from my toil in the grave,
 'Neath the same grassy mound, where thy mother hath lain,
 There are few who would yield thee the food ye may crave,
 There are none who will fondle the orphan again !
 Young heir to my sorrow ! for all I can give thee,
 Is the anguish I feel at thy desolate lot :
 God grant that it may not long after survive me,
 But be with the woes of thy father forgot !
 It pains me to gaze on those eyes that are gleaming,
 So lightsome and joyous as once were my own ;
 And picture them hence, when the tears will be streaming,
 And the rapture that kindles them now will be gone :
 It grieves me to think how that heart will be riven,
 When the finger of scorn will be tracing thy birth :
 O then ! my sweet infant, look upwards to Heav'n,
 For He will regard the forsaken of earth !
 Laugh on, thus unconscious of sorrow to come—
 I would that thy spirits were always as free !
 For though lowly the shed we are calling our home,
 Thou hast made it a palace of pleasure to me !
 My blessing be with thee, my darling !—my own !
 Come, sit on my knee, while I tell in thy ear
 Some tales of the land where thy mother has gone,
 And we'll strive to forget the cold world and its care !

"HAT HOMAGE."

George Fox.

They call me very clown,
 Gruff, surly, and all that,
 Because upon my crown
 I've learn'd to keep my hat ;
 The gales of courtesy
 I vow shall raise it ne'er—
 My self-respect shall bird-lime be
 To fix it to my hair.

In vain they lecture me :
 I never will—that's flat ;
 To all the shams that be,
 I'll never doff my hat.

My laird comes down to see
 (When Parliament is o'er)
 How fare his tenantry,
 And grouse it on the moor.
 "Hurrah !" his serfs will cry,
 And bow with cap in hand ;
 I pay my rent—and bow ? not I—
 Still more erect I stand.

No more he claims of me ;
 No more I'll give—that's flat ;
 To such a thing as he
 I'll never doff my hat.

The factor of the laird
 Is a mightier man than he—
 He who his wrath has dared
 May well cry "Gramercy."
 I humour not his whim,
 Nor yet his pompous self—
 He kens me well—and I ken him—
 And so we never mell."

He's naething mair than me,
 My laird's his laird—that's flat ;
 And he must bide a wee
 Before I doff my hat.

* Mix.

I cannot, with a grace,
Bow even to a king,
Deck'd with the pomp of place—
A silly sceptred thing.

While eager thousands throng
To worship at its feet,
I only smile, and pass along,
But doff no hat to it.

Fools who are willing may;
I cannot stoop—that's flat;
To idol forms of clay
I'll never doff my hat.

I bow not to the Priest—

I incense not his shrine;
My only hope is Christ,
My creed the Book Divine.
The tithe-gorg'd Hog! to him
I pay no willing fee;
His form might be starvation alim
For all he'd get from me.

He threatens his ready hell
In vain—to him, (that's flat,)
The surplis'd Infidel,
I'll never doff my hat.

The rich, the great, the gay,
Who roll along our street,
In luxury's array,
I bow not when I meet:
When every head is down,
And every bonnet's doff'd,
I fix my hat, and sough a tune,
And lift my poll aloft.

Not half so soft my skin,
Nor sides so sleek and fat;
The stuff's as good within;
I'll never doff my hat.

Yet deem me nowise dead
To love's true courtesies,
Nor blind to lustre shed
O'er human life by these:
My heart takes off its hat,
To worth in weal or woe,
I never scruple that—
I only hate the show.

The serf-sign I refuse,
And ever will—that's flat:
He never trod in shoes
To whom I'll doff my hat.

The man who bears him with
All a man's manliness—
Whose heart is virtue's pith,
His outside virtue's dress.
He may be lowly born,
And own no penny-fee—
Wi' him I'd face a world of scorn,
Yea, gang to harribee.*

I'll shake his hand of horn,
Love, honour, and all that;
But to man of woman born
I'll never doff my hat.

LAKE REMINISCENCES, FROM 1807 TO 1830.

BY THE ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

NO. V.—SOUTHEY, WORDSWORTH, AND COLERIDGE.

A CIRCUMSTANCE which, as much as anything, expounded to the very eye the characteristic distinctions between Wordsworth and Southey, and would not suffer a stranger to forget it for a moment, was the insignificant place and consideration allowed to the small book-collection of the former, contrasted with the splendid library of the latter. The two or three hundred volumes of Wordsworth occupied a little, homely, painted book-case, fixed into one of two shallow recesses, formed on each side of the fireplace by the projection of the chimney in the little sitting-room up stairs, which he had already described as his half kitchen and half parlour. They were ill bound, or not bound at all—in boards, sometimes in tatters; many were imperfect as to the number of volumes, mutilated as to the number of pages: sometimes, where it seemed worth while, the defects being supplied by manuscript; sometimes not: in short, everything shewed that the books were for use, and not for show; and their limited amount shewed that their possessor must have independent sources of enjoyment to fill up the major part of his time. In reality, when the weather was tolerable, I believe that Wordsworth rarely resorted to his books, (unless, perhaps, to some little pocket edition of a poet, which accompanied him in his rambles,) except in the evenings, or after he had tired himself by walking. On the other hand, Southey's collection occupied a separate room, the largest, and, every way, the most agreeable in the house; and this room was styled, and not ostentatiously, (for it really merited that name,) the library. The house itself, Greta Hall, stood upon a little eminence, (as I have before mentioned,) overhanging the river Greta. There was nothing remarkable in its internal arrangements: in all respects, it was a very plain unadorned family dwelling; large enough, by a little contrivance, to accommodate two or, in some sense, three families, viz. Mr Southey, and his family; Mr Coleridge, and his; together with Mrs Lovell, who, when her son was with her, might be said to compose a third. Mrs Coleridge, Mrs Southey, and Mrs Lovell, were sisters; all having come originally from Bristol; and, as the different sets of children in this one house had each three several aunts, all the ladies, by turns, assuming that relation twice over, it was one of Southey's many amusing jests, to call the hill on which Greta Hall was placed, the ant-hill. Mrs Lovell was the widow of Mr Robert Lovell, who had published a volume of poems, in conjunction with Southey, somewhere about the year 1797, under the signatures of Bion and Moschus. This lady, having one only son, did not require any large suite of rooms; and the less so, as her son quitted her, at an early age, to pursue a professional education. The house had therefore been divided (not by absolute partition, into two distinct* apartments, but by an amicable distribution of rooms) between the two families of Mr Coleridge and Mr Southey; Mr Coleridge had a separate study, which was distinguished by nothing except by an organ amongst its furniture, and by a magnificent view from its window, (or windows,) if that could be considered a distinction, in a situation whose local necessities presented you with magnificent objects in whatever direction you might happen to turn your eyes. In the morning, the two families might live apart; but they met at dinner, and in a common drawing-room; and Southey's library, in both senses of the word, was placed at the service of all the ladies alike. However, they did not intrude upon him, except in cases where they wished for a larger reception room, or a more interesting place for suggesting the topics of conversation. Interesting this room was, indeed, and in a degree not often rivalled. The library—the collection of books, I mean, which formed the most conspicuous part of its furniture within—was in all senses a good one. The books were chiefly English, Spanish, and Portuguese; well selected, being the great cardinal classics of the three literatures; fine copies, and decorated externally with a reasonable elegance, so as to make them in harmony with the other embellishments of the room. This effect was aided by the horizontal arrangement upon brackets, of many rare manuscripts—Spanish or Portuguese. Made thus gay within, this room stood in little need of attractions from without. Yet, even upon the gloomiest day of winter, the landscape from the different windows was too permanently commanding in its grandeur, too essentially independent of the seasons or the pomp of woods, to fail in fascinating the gaze of the coldest and dullest of spectators. The lake of Derwent Water in one direction, with its lovely islands—a lake about ten miles in circuit, and shaped pretty much like a boy's kite; the lake of Bassinethwaite in another; the mountains of Newlands arranging themselves like pavilions; the gorgeous confusion of Borrowdale just revealing its sublime chaos through the narrow vista of its gorge; all these objects lay in different angles to the front; whilst the sullen rear, not fully visible on this side of the house, was closed for many a league by the vast and towering masses of Skiddaw and Blencathara—mountains which are rather to be considered as frontier barriers, and chains of hilly ground, cutting the county of Cumberland into great chambers and different climates, than as insulated eminences; so vast is the area which they occupy; though there are also such separate and insulated heights, and nearly amongst the highest in the country. Southey's lot had therefore fallen, locally considered, into a goodly heritage. This grand panorama of mountain scenery, so varied, so expansive, and yet having the delightful feeling about it of a deep seclusion and dell-like sequestration from the world—a feeling which, in the midst of so expansive an area, spread out below his windows, could not have been sustained by any barriers less elevated than Glaramara, Skiddaw, or (which could be also descried) “the mighty Helvellyn and Catchedicam;” this congregation of hill and lake, so wide, and yet so prison-like, in its separation from all beyond it, lay for ever under the eyes of Southey. His position locally and, in some respects, intellectually reminded one of Gibbon: but with great advantage in the comparison to Southey. The little town of Keswick and its adjacent lake bore something of the same relation to mighty London that Geneva and its lake may be thought to bear towards brilliant Paris. Southey, like Gibbon, was a miscellaneous scholar; he, like Gibbon, of vast historical research; he, like Gibbon, signally industrious, and patient, and elaborate in collecting the materials for his historical works. Like Gibbon, he had dedicated a life of competent ease, in a pecuniary sense, to literature; like Gibbon, he had gathered to the shores of a beautiful lake, remote from great capitals, a large, or, at least, sufficient library; (in each case, I believe, the library ranged, as to numerical amount, between seven and ten thousand;) and, like Gibbon, he was the most accomplished litterateur amongst the erudite scholars of his time, and the most of an erudite scholar amongst the accomplished litterateurs. After all these points of agreement known, it remains as a pure advantage on the side of Southey—a mere lucro ponatur—that he was a poet; and, by all men's confession, a respectable poet, brilliant in his descriptive powers, and fascinating in his narration, however much he might want of

It is remarkable amongst the series of parallels that have been or might be pursued between two men, both had the honour of retreating from a parliamentary life; Gibbon, after some silent and inert experience of that warfare; Southey, with a prudent foresight of the ruin to his health and literary usefulness, won from the experience of his nearest friends.

I took leave of Southey in 1807, at the descent into the vale of Legbesthwaite, as I have already noticed. One year afterwards, I became a permanent resident in his neighbourhood; and, although, on various accounts, my intercourse with him was at no time very strict, partly from the very uncongenial constitution of my own mind, and the different direction of my studies, partly from my reluctance to levy any tax on time so precious and so fully employed, I was yet on such terms for the next ten or eleven years, that I might, in a qualified sense, call myself his friend.

Yes! there were long years, through which

Southey might respect me, I am. But the years came—for I have lived too long, reader, in relation to many things! and the report of me would have been better, or more uniform at least, had I died some twenty years ago—the years came in which circumstances made me an Opium-Eater; years through which a shadow as of sad eclipses sat and rested upon my faculties; years through which I was careless of all but those who lived within my inner circle, within “my heart of hearts;” years—ah! heavenly years!—through which I lived, beloved, with thee, to thee, for thee, by thee! Ah! happy, happy years! in which I was a mere football of reproach, but in which every wind and sounding hurricane of wrath or contempt flew by like chasing enemies past some defying gates of adamant, and left me too blessed in thy smiles—angel of life!—to heed the curses or the mocking which sometimes I heard raving outside of our impregnable Eden. What any man said of me in those days, what he thought, did I ask? did I care? Then it was, or nearly then, that I ceased to see, ceased to hear of Southey; as much abstracted from all which concerned the world outside, and from the Southey, or even the Coleridges, in its van, as though I had lived with the darlings of my heart in the centre of Canadian forests, and all men else in the centre of Hindostan.

But, before I part from Greta Hall and its distinguished master, one word let me say, to protect myself from the imputation of sharing in some peculiar opinions of Southey with respect to political economy, which have been but too familiar to the world; and some opinions of the world, hardly less familiar, with respect to Southey himself and his accomplishments. Probably, with respect to the first, before this paper will be made public, I shall have sufficiently vindicated my own opinions in these matters by a distinct treatment of some great questions which lie at the base of all sound political economy; above all, the radical question of value, upon which no man has ever seen the full truth, except Mr Ricardo; and, unfortunately, he had but little of the *polemic skill which is required to meet the errors of his opponents. For it is noticeable, that the most conspicuous of those opponents, viz. Mr Malthus, though too much, I fear, actuated by a spirit of jealousy, and, therefore, likely enough to have scattered sophistry and disingenuous quibbling over the subject, had no need whatever of any further confusion for darkening and perplexing his themes than what inevitably belonged to his own most chaotic understanding. He and Say, the Frenchman, were both plagued by understandings of the same quality—having a clear vision in shallow waters, and thus misleading them into the belief that they saw with equal clearness through the remote and the obscure; whereas, universally, their acuteness is like that of Hobbes—the gift of shallowness, and the result of not being subtle or profound enough to apprehend the true locus of the difficulty; and the barriers, which to them limit the view, and give to it, together with the contraction, all the distinctness and definite outline of limitation, are, in nine cases out of ten, the product of their own defective and aberrating vision, and not real barriers at all. Meantime, until I write fully and deliberately upon this subject, I shall observe simply, that all “the Lake Poets,” as they are called, were not only in error, but most presumptuously in error, upon these subjects. They were ignorant of every principle belonging to every question alike in political economy, and they were obstinately bent upon learning nothing; they were all alike too proud to acknowledge that any man knew better than they, unless it were upon some purely professional subject, or some art remote from all intellectual bearings, such as conferred no honour in its possession. Wordsworth was the least tainted with error upon political economy; and that because he rarely applied his thoughts to any question of that nature, and, in fact, despised every study of a moral or political aspect unless it drew its materials from such revelations of truth as could be won from the prima philosophia of human nature approached with the poet’s eye. Coleridge was the one whom Nature and his own multifarious studies had the best qualified for thinking justly on a theme such as this; but he also was shut out from the possibility of knowledge by presumption, and the habit of despising all the analytic studies of his own day—a habit for which he certainly had some warrant in the peculiar feebleness of all that has offered itself for philosophy in modern England. In particular, the religious discussions of the age, which touch inevitably at every point upon the profounder philosophy of man and his constitution, had laid bare the weakness of his own age to Coleridge’s eye; and, because all was hollow and trivial in this direction, he chose to think that it was so in every other. And hence he has laid himself open to the just scoffs of persons far inferior to himself. In a foot-note in some late number of The Westminster Review, it is most truly asserted, (not in these words, but to this effect,) that Coleridge’s “Table-Talk” exhibits a superannuation of error fit only for two centuries before. And what gave peculiar point to this display of ignorance was, that Coleridge did not, like Wordsworth, dismiss political economy from his notice, disdainfully, as a puerile tissue of truisms, or of falsehoods not less obvious, but actually addressed himself to the subject; fancied he had made discoveries in the science ; and even promised us a systematic work on its whole compass.

* Polemic skill.—The word polemic is falsely interpreted by the majority of mere English readers. Having seldom seen it used except in a case of theological controversy, they fancy that it has some original and etymological appropriation to such a use: whereas it expresses, with regard to all subjects, without restriction, the functions of the debater as opposed to those of the original orator; the functions of him who meets error and unravels confusion or misrepresentation, opposed to those of him who lays down the abstract truth; truth absolute and without relation to the modes of viewing it. As well might the word Radical be limited to a political use as Polemic to controversial divinity.

To give a sample of this new and reformed political economy, it cannot well be necessary to trouble the reader with more than one chimera culled from those which Mr Coleridge first brought forward in his early model of "The Friend." He there propounds, as an original hypothesis of his own, that taxation never burthens a people, or, as a mere possibility, can burthen a people, simply by its amount. And why? Surely it draws from the purse of him who pays his quota a sum which may be very difficult or even ruinous for him to pay, were it no more important in a public point of view than as so much deducted from his own unproductive expenditure, and which may happen to have even a national importance if it should chance to be deducted from the funds destined to productive industry. What is Mr Coleridge's answer to these little objections? Why, thus: the latter case he evades entirely, apparently not adverting to it as a case in any respect distinguished from the other ; and this other—how is that answered? Doubtless, says Mr Coleridge, it may be inconvenient to John or Samuel that a sum of money, otherwise disposable for their own separate uses, should be abstracted for the purchase of bayonets or grape-shot ; but with this the public, the commonwealth, have nothing to do, any more than with the losses at a gaming-table, where A's loss is B's gain—the total funds of the nation remaining exactly the same. It is, in fact, nothing but the accidental distribution of the funds which is affected—possibly for the worse, (no other "worse," however, is contemplated than shifting it into hands less deserving,) but also, by possibility, for the better : and the better and the worse may be well supposed, in the long run, to balance each other. And that this is Mr Coleridge's meaning cannot be doubted, upon looking into his illustrative image in support of it : he says that money raised by Government in the shape of taxes is like moisture exhaled from the earth—doubtless, for the moment, injurious to the crops, but reacting abundantly for their final benefit when returning in the shape of showers. So natural, so obvious, so inevitable, by the way, is this conceit, (or, to speak less harshly, this hypothesis,) and so equally natural, obvious, and inevitable is the illustration from the abstraction and restoration of moisture, the exhalations and rains which affect this earth of ours, like the systole and diastole of the heart, the flux and reflux of the ocean, that precisely the same doctrine, and precisely the same exemplification of that doctrine, is to be found in a Parliamentary speech,* of some orator in the famous Long Parliament, about the year 1642. And to my mind it was a bitter humiliation, to find, about 150 years afterwards, in a shallow French work, the famous "Compte Rendu" of the French Chancellor of the Exchequer, (Comptroller of the Finances)—Neckar—in that work, most humiliating it was to me, on a certain day, that I found this idle Coleridgean fantasy, not merely repeated, as it had been by scores—not merely anticipated by full twenty and two years, so that these French people had been beforehand with him, and had made Coleridge, to all appearance, their plagiarist, but also (hear it, ye gods!) answered, satisfactorily refuted, by this very feeble old sentimentalist, Neckar. Yes ; positively Neckar, the alipshod old system-fancier and political driveller, had been so much above falling into the shallow snare, that he had, on sound principles, exposed its specious delusions. Coleridge, the subtlest of men, in his proper walk, had brought forward, as a novel hypothesis of his own, in 1810, what Neckar, the rickety old Charlatan, had scarcely condescended, in a hurried foot-note, to expose as a vulgar error and the shallowest of sophisms, in 1787-8. There was another enormous blunder which Coleridge was constantly authorizing, both in his writings and his conversation. Quoting a passage from Sir James Stuart, in which he speaks of a vine-dresser as adding nothing to the public wealth, unless his labour did something more than replace his own consumption—that is, unless it reproduced it together with a profit ; he asks contemptuously, whether the happiness and moral dignity that may have been exhibited in the vine-dresser's family are to pass for nothing? And then he proceeds to abuse the economists, because they take no account of such important considerations. Doubtless these are invaluable elements of social grandeur, in a total estimate of those elements. But what has political economy to do with them, a science openly professing to insulate and to treat apart from all other constituents of national well-being, those which concern the production and circulation of wealth? So far from gaining any thing by enlarging its field in the way demanded by Coleridge's critic, political economy would be as idly travelling out of the limits indicated and held forth in its very name, as if logic were to teach ethics, or ethics to teach diplomacy. With re-

* In fact, the exposure is as perfect in the case of an individual as in that of a nation, and more easily apprehended. Levy from an individual clothier £1000 in taxes, and afterwards return to him the whole of this sum in payment for the clothing of a regiment. Then, supposing profits to be at the rate of 15 per cent., he will have replaced £150 of his previous loss ; even his gains will simply reinstate him in something that he had lost, and the remaining £850 will continue to be a dead loss ; since the £850 restored to him, exactly replaces, by the terms of this case, his disbursements in wages and materials ; if it did more, profits would not be at 15 per cent., according to the supposition. But Government may spend more than the £1000 with this clothier ; they may spend £10,000. Doubtless, and in that case, on the same supposition as to profits, he will receive £1500 as a nominal gain ; and £500 will be a real gain, marked with the positive sign, (+.) But such a case would only prove, that nine other taxpayers, to an equal amount, had been left without any reimbursement at all. Strange, that so clear a case for an individual, should become obscure when it regards a nation.

* Reported at length in a small quarto volume, of the well-known quarto size so much in use for Tracts, Pamphlets, &c., throughout the life of Milton—1608-73.

spect to the Malthusian doctrine of population, it is difficult to know who was the true proprietor of the arguments urged against it sometimes by Southey sometimes by Coleridge. Those used by Southey are chiefly to be found up and down the Quarterly Review. But a more elaborate attack was published by Hazlitt; and this must be supposed to speak the peculiar objections of Coleridge, for he was in the habit of charging Hazlitt with having pillaged his conversation, and occasionally garbled it throughout the whole of this book. One single argument there was, undoubtedly just, and it was one which others stumbled upon no less than Coleridge, exposing the fallacy of the supposed different laws of increase for vegetable and animal life. But though this frail prop withdrawn took away from Mr Malthus's theory all its scientific rigour, the main practical conclusions were still valid as respected any argument from the lakers; for the strongest of these arguments that ever came to my knowledge was a mere appeal—not ad verendum, in the ordinary sense of the phrase, but ad honestatem, as if it were shocking to the honestum of Roman ethics, (the honnêteté of French minor ethics,) that the check derived from self-restraint should not be supposed amply competent to redress all the dangers from a redundant population, under any certain knowledge generally diffused that such dangers existed. But these are topics which it is sufficient in this place to have noticed, currente calamo. I was anxious however to protest against the probable imputation, that I, because generally so intense an admirer of these men, adopted their blind and hasty reveries in political economy.

There were (and perhaps more justly I might say there are) two other notions currently received about Southey, one of which is altogether erroneous, and the other true only in a limited sense. The first is, the belief that he belonged to what is known as the lake school in poetry; with respect to which all that I need say in this place, is involved in his own declaration frankly made to myself in Easedale, during the summer of 1812; that he considered Wordsworth's theory of poetic diction, and still more his principles as to the selection of subjects, and as to what constituted a poetic treatment, as founded on error. There is certainly some community of phraseology between Southey and the other lakers, naturally arising out of their joint reverence for Scriptural language: this was a field in which they met in common: else it shews but little discernment and power of valuing the essences of things, to have classed Southey in the same school with Wordsworth and Coleridge. The other popular notion about Southey, which I conceive to be expressed with much too little limitation, regards his style. He has been praised, and justly, for his plain, manly, unaffected English, until the parrot echoers of other men's judgments, who adopt all they relish with undistinguishing blindness, have begun to hold him up as a great master of his own language, and a classical model of fine composition. Now, if the error were only in the degree, it would not be worth while to notice it; but the truth is, that Southey's defects in this particular power, are as striking as his characteristic graces. Let a subject arise—and almost in any path, there is a ready possibility that it should—in which a higher tone is required, of splendid declamation, or of impassionate fervour, and Southey's style will immediately betray its want of the loftier qualities as flagrantly as it now asserts its powers in that unpretending form which is best suited to his level character of writing and his humbler choice of themes. It is to mistake the character of Southey's mind, which is elevated but not sustained by the higher modes of enthusiasm, to think otherwise. Were a magnificent dedication required, moving with a stately and measured solemnity, and putting forward some majestic pretensions, arising out of a long and laborious life; were a pleading required against some capital abuse of the earth—war, slavery, oppression in its thousand forms; were a Defensio pro Populo Anglicano required; Southey's is not the mind, and, by a necessary consequence, Southey's is not the style, for carrying such purposes into full and memorable effect. His style is therefore good, because it has been suited to his themes; and those themes have hitherto been either narrative, which usually imposes a modest diction, and a modest structure of sentences, or argumentation in that class which is too overburthened with details, with replies, with interruption, and every mode of discontinuity, to allow a thought of eloquence, or of the periodic style which a perfect eloquence instinctively seeks.

I here close my separate notice of the Lake Poets—meaning those three who were originally so denominated—three men upon whom posterity, in every age, will look back with interest as profound as, perhaps, belongs to any other names of our era; for it happens, not unfrequently, that the personal interest in the author is not in the direct ratio of that which belongs to his works: and the character of an author, better qualified to command a vast popularity for the creations of his pen, is oftentimes more of a universal character, less peculiar, less fitted to stimulate the curiosity, or to sustain the sympathy of the intellectual, than the profounder and more ascetic solemnity of a Wordsworth, or the prodigal and magnificent eccentricities of a Coleridge.* With respect to both of these gifted men, some interesting notices still remain in arrear; but these will more properly come forward in their natural places, as they happen to arise in after years in connexion with my own memoirs.

These I shall resume, from the moment of my leaving Wordsworth's cottage, after one week of delightful intercourse with him and his sister, about the 12th of November, 1807.

THE WAR IN INDIA.

It is quite wonderful how little interest the British public take in the contest which is at present carrying on in India, though there is not the least doubt whatever that it is, by far, the greatest movement which has been made during the eighty years and upwards which have elapsed since Clive moved out of the Factory of Calcutta, fought the battle of Plassey, and made England the virtual sovereign of Bengal. Before the commencement of the present war, with the exception of one small corner on the north-west frontier of India—the country of the Seiks—we were directly, or indirectly, in possession of every foot of territory that, from fertility in the soil, or docility in the population, would pay the cost of conquering or maintaining. This does not satisfy us. We are uneasy in our possession, conscious that all is not sound within; and, with evil consciences, conjure up imaginary dangers and alarms. The phantom which troubles us just now, and which has induced us to march a great army across our frontier, through deserts and among mountain fastnesses occupied by warlike clans, is the apprehension of a Russian invasion. The whole narrative of this transaction would be ludicrous, were it not likely to be attended with most serious consequences, in the loss of life, property, and national faith, with which it is likely to be accompanied.

In 1808, when we were in apprehension of a French invasion of India, we entered into an alliance with Persia, in order that Persia might prove a barrier against an invasion of India. This was all very well, as against France, that had no territory conterminous with Persia. Russia is in a different position. For a hundred and fifty years she has had conterminous territory with Persia; and, a few years ago, a quarrel had arisen between these governments, and Russia, as might easily be foreseen, gave the Persians a severe drubbing, seized and kept several of their provinces, and established a complete influence over the Persian court. England, all the while, looked quietly on, moving neither hand nor foot, and tamely saw the supposed bulwark against Indian invasion pulled to pieces before her eyes. The old treaty with Persia has become, in fact, a dead letter or worse, converting Persia, by our own acknowledgment, from a barrier into a stepping-stone; and the embassies and missions of thirty years, with the stores and subsidies which have been supplied to the Persian government, and which, from first to last, cannot have amounted to a less sum than four millions sterling, have been absolutely wasted for no earthly good purpose.*

Dissatisfied with our Persian alliance, we become sullen, refuse to fulfil the letter of the treaty, talk of its spirit—a thing which writing never conveyed—and, for some one pretext or other, have withdrawn our envoy. The plain tale is this:—With the Persian government we have three successive treaties; in every one of which stands the following article, without the smallest doubt, from its character, dictated by ourselves—"If war should arise between the Persian and Afghan governments, the English government shall take no part in it; nor shall it give assistance to either party, except as a mediator, at the solicitation of both parties, for the purpose of producing peace." A war arises between the Persians and the Afghans, and the cause was this:—In a moment of disorder in the Persian government, the Afghan chief of Herat makes an incursion into the Persian province of Khe-rassan, burns its towns and villages, and, carrying off twelve thousand of its inhabitants, sells them in the public market as slaves. The King of Persia, justly indignant, marches an army upon Herat, to punish the brutal robbery. "The only thought I have in this journey," said the Shah, to one of our diplomatic agents, "is to put a stop to the taking away into slavery of my people. Three millions of prisoners are in Bokhara, Khiva, and Herat." The justice of this war is fully admitted, even by the British envoy himself. "There cannot, I think, be a doubt," says he, "that the Shah is fully justified in making war on Prince Kamran; and, though the capture of Herat by Persia would certainly be an evil of great magnitude, we could not wonder if the Shah were to disregard our remonstrances, and to assert his right to make war on an enemy who has given him the greatest provocation, and whom he may regard himself as bound in duty to his subjects to punish, or even to put down." One might naturally have expected that the Whig magnates of Downing Street and Calcutta, the authors of the abolition of the slave-trade, and the men who obtained twenty millions from the people of England for the abolition of colonial slavery, would have had some sympathy for an ally who was proceeding to punish man-stealers on a great scale; or, at all events, some regard for the solemn pledges of a treaty. Nothing of the kind. The slavery and the treaty are utterly blinked; and the envoy—without being asked by either party, while his interference is expressly repudiated by one of them—forthwith commences a series of solemn protests against the Persian war with the Afghan chief. A travelling agent of the Governor-General, a skilful engineer, throws himself into Herat, and defends it; the British envoy asks for his passports; a fleet of five men-of-war, and a detachment of military, take possession of a portion of the Shah's territories in the Persian Gulf; and the Whig Governor-General of India being, at the moment, like a well-fed condor, quietly and comfortably perched on a pinnacle of the Himalaya, issues from thence his orders for the march of an army of forty thousand men through the Great Desert; and this in order to dethrone a friend of the Shah, and raise the siege of the beleaguered city of the particular friend of the Governor-General, the man-stealer in question. The plan succeeds—the Persian army raises the siege, and the King publishes an edict, ordered to be read in every mosque, telling the people, that England, in violation of a solemn treaty, had compelled him to desist, and would not allow him to punish an insult and an outrage. At the same moment, we quarrelled with the Shah for an affront to a servant of the English mission, a Persian subject, and a mere messenger.

While all this is done, in the very teeth of the clear letter of a treaty, the imperturbable and complacent effrontery with which we make charges of underhand intrigues and projects of ambition on the part of Russia, is truly worthy of all wonder. The Russians have no treaty at all with the Afghans, and none with the Persians that binds them to any particular line of policy in quarrels with the Afghans. Our envoy, however, surmises that the Russian ambassador at the Shah's court urged the Shah to attack Herat; that he directed a particular assault; and that an officer of his suite assisted the siege. There is just one other ground, and one only, on which is founded our apprehension of a Russian invasion of India. The Russians, in return for a mission sent to them by the Afghan chief of Cabul, sent to this chieftain a certain lieutenant of infantry, with the intention of forming commercial relations with Russia, "in order," as Count Nesselrode expresses it, "to ascertain the advantages, and the degree of security which such an enterprise might offer to our merchants, in a country hitherto unknown to Russia." Now, we say, we are bound to believe the Russians, when they make this assertion, not because we have implicit reliance upon their political veracity, but from the perfect reasonableness of the thing itself, and the utter unreasonableness of supposing that they are so devoid of knowledge, common sense, and forecast, as seriously to entertain so wild and impracticable, or rather so impossible a project, as the invasion of British India. We, ourselves, have sent missions, purely commercial, to China, to Cochin-China, to Siam, to Birmah, to Thibet, and to this very Cabul itself—nay, for that matter, into the very heart of Africa. The French, the Dutch, and the Americans have done similar things; even the Russians, before, have sent commercial missions to China, Japan, Bokhara, and Khiva. Why, then, should they not send one to Cabul? But the mission of the lieutenant of infantry is construed, by the distempered fancies of our politicians, into a dangerous political intrigue, for the invasion and conquest of an empire of a hundred millions of people—the great majority of them and their fathers born British subjects—an empire defended by a well-organized and well-paid army of two hundred thousand men, backed by the fleets, and the commerce, and the power of England. The whole thing is preposterous, and highly discreditable to our political courage and sagacity.*

The impracticability—or rather, the impossibility—of a Russian invasion of India, will appear clear enough from what we shall afterwards say of the vast bulwark which guards India against invasion from the westward. It is very true that, in former times, India was invaded by various nations from the west. Some two-and-twenty centuries ago, Alexander and his Greeks took a peep at the north-west frontier of India, and then retired. The Arabs, who conquered Persia and Toorkestan, never attempted the conquest or even invasion of India. It was not until four centuries after the Mohammedan era, that tribes of converted Turks and Persians made formidable incursions into India; it was not until two centuries later that they formed any permanent establishments; and it took seven whole centuries to form a foreign empire in India of tolerable cohesion, which, however, dropped to pieces almost as soon as it was formed. By whom was India invaded all this while? By shepherd nations, with clouds of cavalry, few infantry, no artillery, little baggage, and who fed themselves as they could in the countries they passed through, and in the countries they were conquering. Who defended India? The Hindoos alone—always, as a people, timid, docile, and divided. The army of Nicholas, that shall invade India, is differently constituted, and must move in a very different manner from the army of Timour. It must march with heavy infantry as well as its Cossacks; with its battering and its field cannon; with its hospitals, its commisariat, and its tent equipage, from the eastern confines of Persia, (supposing it to be there,) over 1600 miles of mountain and of desert. When it arrives safely in the British territory, it is not the Hindoos that it has to encounter, but the organized army and resources of British India. It has something even more formidable to encounter: the fleets, and armies, and financial resources of Britain, which could send

* So little do our Diplomats know about the dangerous Russian agent, who commenced the overthrow of the empire which Clive, and Warren Hastings, and Wellesley founded, that they have not even ascertained how to spell his name! They give him the travelling one of Captain Vicovich; and, even after Nesselrode has told them that he was Lieutenant Witkewitch, the accomplished Lord Palmerston—who might just as well have dubbed him Vichineore—perseveres in his Vicovich!

an army from the banks of the Thames to those of the Hyphasis, in less time than the Russian army would take to march from Herat to the same river. When Hyder Ally was urged by his counsellors, who saw only as far as their noses, to attack the English power in India in its then infancy, he replied, like a man of sense, "It is not what I see before my eyes that I am afraid of, but the invisible power that is behind, and of which I know nothing." It is not to be supposed that Nesselrode and Nicholas, who know everything, should be less discreet than the barbarian, Hyder Ally, was sixty years ago.

The despatch of Count Nesselrode to Count Pozzo di Borgo, which the latter is directed to present to the British Cabinet, expresses the whole common sense of the question:—"The idea of assailing the security and tranquillity of the state of possession of Great Britain in India has, consequently, never presented itself, and will never present itself, to the mind of our august master. He desires only what is just, and what is possible. For this twofold reason, he cannot entertain any combination whatever directed against the British power in India. It would not be just, because nothing would have given cause for it. It would not be possible, by reason of the immense distance which separates us—the sacrifices which must be made, the difficulties which must be overcome—and all this to realize an adventurous scheme which could never be in accordance with sound and reasonable policy. A single glance at the map ought to be sufficient to dissipate, in this respect, all prejudice, and to convince every impartial and enlightened man that no hostile design against England can direct the policy of our Cabinet in Asia." If Russia be intent on difficult enterprises, there are some which are difficult enough, yet far easier than the conquest of British India, which present themselves to her. She might, for instance, invade China or Japan, to both of which she is next neighbour, and has been so for more than a century. But to Russia, even these enterprises of minor difficulty appear too arduous, and she does not attempt them.

We have now to say a few words of the barrier against Indian invasion from the west, to which we have alluded. This is, for the most part, the country which, from the ruling nation within it, is commonly called Afghanistan. We have here a vast territory, of at least eight hundred thousand square miles, of hot and sandy deserts—of a table land, as cold as northern Europe—of hot valleys—and of mountain chains, on which the snow never melts. The thinly-scattered inhabitants are computed at no more than twelve millions; a poor fifteen to the square mile. The ruling nation, the Afghans, which inhabits the table land—a table land which overlooks every country to the east, west, and south of it—exceeds four millions in number. The Beloochees, and the naturalized Tartars and Persians, exceed three millions, and are hardly less warlike than the Afghans themselves. The naturalized Indians, the only unwarlike portion of the population, are computed at five millions: by their industry, but not by their arms, they contribute to the resources of the country. The Afghans, the ruling nation, are a people of clans, something like our Scottish Highlanders; with this difference, that the attachment here is not to a chief, but to the clan itself; which constitutes a kind of Republic. We shall give, from Mr Elphinstone's excellent narrative, a graphic account of the people:—"If a man could be transported from England to the Afghan country, without seeing Turkey or Persia, he would be amazed at the wide and unfrequented deserts, and the mountains covered with perpetual snow. Even in the cultivated part of the country he would discover a wild assemblage of hills and wastes, unmarked by enclosures, not embellished by trees, and destitute of navigable canals or public roads. He would find the towns few, and far distant from each other," &c. "When he entered into the society, he would notice the absence of regular courts of justice, and of everything like an organized police. He would be surprised at the fluctuation and instability of the civil institutions. He would find it difficult to comprehend how a nation could subsist in such disorder; and would pity those who were compelled to pass their days in such a scene, and whose minds were trained by their unhappy situation. Yet, he would scarce fail to admire their martial and lofty spirit, their hospitality, and their bold and simple manners—equally removed from the suppleness of a citizen, and the awkward rusticity of a clown. He would admire their strong and active forms; their fair complexions, and European features; their industry and enterprise; the hospitality, sobriety, and contempt of pleasure, which appear in all their habits; and, above all, the independence and energy of their character."* Mr Elphinstone further adds—"The Afghans themselves exult in the free spirit of their institutions. Those who are little under the royal authority, are proud of their independence, which those under the King (although not exposed to the tyranny common in every other country in the East) admire, and fain would imitate. They all endeavour to maintain that all Afghans are equal, which, though it is not, nor ever was true, still shews their notions and their wishes. I once strongly urged, to a very intelligent old man, of the tribe of Meankhail, the superiority of a quiet and secure life, under a powerful monarch, to the discord, the alarms, and the blood which they owed to the present system. The old man replied with great warmth, and thus concluded an indignant harangue against arbitrary power:—"We are content with discord, we are content with alarms, we are content with blood, but we will never be content with a master."† "In Afghanistan," (Mr Elphinstone is contrasting that government with those of Persia and India,) "the internal government of the tribes answers its end so well, that the utmost disorders of the royal government never derange its operations, nor disturb the lives of the people. A number of organized and high-spirited Republics are ready to defend their rugged country against a tyrant, and are able to defy the feeble efforts of a party in a civil war."* The following passage shews of what stuff they are physically made:—"All the Afghans are remarkably hardy and active. From the nature of the country, they are exposed to the necessity of enduring cold and heat, and accustomed to the exertion of climbing mountains, making long journeys on foot and on horseback, and swimming broad and rapid rivers. Nor is this confined to the lower orders or to men in the vigour of youth."†

But what, it may be asked, has been the history of the people thus described? It may be briefly told:—The Arabs who, almost immediately after Mohammed, conquered Persia and Toorkistan, never conquered the Afghans; and it took them even three hundred years to convert them. For two centuries they gave a dynasty of sovereigns to Upper Hindostan, and settled and colonized in various parts of India, where they still constitute the most robust and warlike portion of the population. Their own country has, in reality, never been conquered. No invader ever entered India without being harassed and opposed by them. They harassed Alexander, and Timour, and Nadir; and would, unquestionably, harass the Persians, with their Russian allies; for from the Persians they differ in language and in manners, while in religion the discrepancy is as complete as between a rigid Presbyterian and a bigoted Catholic. We shall give one sample of the enterprise of the Afghans:—Ahmed Shah Durrannee, an Afghan, was one of the generals of Nadir Shah. Upon the assassination of his leader, he set up for himself, established an empire, conquered nearly the whole kingdom of Persia; entered Hindostan, conquered Delhi and the neighbouring provinces, and, with an army of forty thousand men, chiefly cavalry, routed a Mahratta army, computed at three hundred thousand men, nearly at the moment when Clive was engaged in conquering the opposite extremity of our present dominions. This is the account of a Hindoo historian, an eye-witness of the celebrated battle of Panniput:—"Ahmed Shah Durannee," says he, "pitched a small tent, in front of the camp, at the distance of a mile and a-half; visited every part of the army in person; reconnoitred the enemy's camp, riding every day from sixty to seventy-five miles. He used to say to the Mohammedan chiefs of India, who had joined him—'Do you sleep; I will take care that no harm befalls you.' When the Hindostanee chiefs were out of all patience with the delay, his constant answer was—'This is a matter of war with which you are not acquainted: in other affairs do as you please, but leave this to me. Military operations must not be precipitated: you shall see how I will manage this affair, and, at a proper opportunity, will bring it to a successful conclusion.'"

The character of this remarkable man shews what the Afghans are capable of accomplishing, and that it is no contemptible foe that we are provoking. We are marching to place on the throne a man whom we are compelled to admit is an imbecile, and to dethrone one whom we admit to be distinguished for his love of justice, his assiduity in business, his moderation, and his patronage of commerce; and, in short, who, according to Sir Alexander Burnes, at present the most active agent in dethroning him, "affords a constant theme of praise to all his subjects."

The offence of this man is, that he preferred a Persian alliance to ours; and this for a plain and obvious reason, that we had allied ourselves to the bitterest enemy of his family and nation, the chief of the Seiks. It may also be an aggravation, that he had discovered the restless ambition of our Indian rulers. "Even," says he, in a letter to the King of Persia, "if my affairs should fall into disorder, and even if your Majesty should not direct your attention to the condition of these countries, nevertheless, I shall persist in contending with the Seiks as long as I am able; but should it prove that I am unable to resist that diabolical tribe, then I have no choice, and must connect myself with the English, who will thus obtain complete authority over the whole of Afghanistan; and it remains to be seen hereafter, to what place and what extent the flame of the violence of that nation may be carried."

The results of our present enterprise may be easily seen. If we succeed in conquering the assailed country, we gain, at an enormous price, a country that will never pay the cost of its maintenance. If we fail, we shall lose the flower of the Indian army, and there will be a revolt in our rear, while the blow inflicted on our Indian power will never be recovered. In either case we shall expend millions of money—be forced to raise new loans and impose new taxes on a people already groaning under the weight of taxation. It is clear that the weak head of Lord Auckland has put the dividends at the India House to great hazard. The Burmese War—a contest with a paltry enemy, and near home—cost us £15,000,000. The present, carried on at a distance of 1500 miles from our frontier, with a desert intervening, will, at least, double this amount. There is no ready money now in the Indian treasury, and the amount must be borrowed, while the interest of the loan will add one-fifth to the present taxation of the Hindoos. This, then, is one of the last deeds of what was once called "the Reform Ministry;" and "the Reformed Parliament" has, as yet, expressed no disapprobation."

MORE fashionable scandal! Not quite so racy and piquant, indeed, as the first morsels served up to a voracious public, but still sufficiently peppery and stimulating. We were not among the more virulent of the critical dissectors of the two previous volumes; save that the scandal has not grown dry with age, that the green and festering remains have not withered into the in-offensive mummy state, and that the cant of morality, and the affectation of an impious or irreverent piety, were not attributes of the age of Grammont, Lady Mary Wortley, Pope, and Horace Walpole, we could see little morally to condemn in the Diary, which did not once exist under circumstances as blameworthy in the now popular memoirs, satires, and letters of those distinguished persons; they are all alike pictures of court life, and of aristocratic character, drawn by those best qualified for such delineation. Mr Jeffrey, in a review of "Burns' Poems and Letters," speaks admiringly upon the discovery of so much talent and information existing among the humble friends and contemporaries of the poet—among a class which, until then, had obtained from their countrymen of higher rank very little credit for the degree of mental and literary cultivation which they were unexpectedly found to possess. The same sort of insight into the intellectual condition of the peasantry of Scotland afforded by the correspondence of Burns, is obtained into the moral state of the fashionable and aristocratic world by this Diary, with this very different result, that there we were taught to admire humble genius and to revere humble worth; while in those pages we are too often startled and disgusted by the naked and heartless depravity of so many of the principal personages; which heartlessness seems, in these portrayings and correspondences, the most distinguishing characteristic of the class. Half the volumes are drawn from the author's correspondence, and the Diary is resumed in Rome, where the Lady of the Bed-chamber resided for a time, in the course of a long tour on the Continent. The Diarist gives us a key to her own character and position in this sentence:—

I sometimes think with regret of the opportunity once had of being wealthy. I despised riches then; but twenty years make a vast difference in one's feelings on these matters. . . . Some maintain that the heart does not change—that, despite experience and knowledge of the world, there are minds which retain their original simplicity, their first aspirations, untainted and unsubdued. But I, for one, cannot agree with this opinion. Contempt at our poverty, from the world is general—neglect from those we love, because we are insignificant and powerless—the constant abnegation of our most innocent wishes; all these combine to teach a lesson which is not taught in vain: in short, I am grown worldly, and I do love money.

She visited all the usual sights of Rome, and attended Torlonia's assemblies. But foreign affairs are ever less interesting than the home department, and so, without preface, we select this apt illustration of that paragon of all the virtues and proprieties of a Court—Queen Charlotte:—

The Duchess of ———, a great favourite at court, besought Queen Charlotte to receive her niece, Mrs ———, at the drawing-room, there having been reports bruited about which were injurious to that lady's reputation. The Duchess implored the Queen's clemency and indulgence on a point so wholly without any just foundation; and, finally, when about to retire from the royal presence, she asked, beseechingly, "O Madam, what shall I say to my poor niece?" to which Queen Charlotte replied, "Say you did not dare make such a request to the Queen." The Duchess of ——— was so hurt by this unfeeling denial to her entreaties, that she resigned her situation in the royal household.

There are many other stories told of Queen Charlotte, which do not bespeak much tenderness of heart. When Princess Charlotte was christened, Lady Townsend, who held the royal babe during the ceremony, (being herself with child at the time,) appeared much fatigued; and the Princess of Wales whispered to the Queen—"Will your Majesty command Lady Townsend to sit down?"—to which the Queen replied, blowing the snuff from her fingers, "She may stand—she may stand." Again, I have heard that the Queen seldom permitted her own children to sit down in her presence; and when she was playing at whist, one of the royal progeny has been known to fall asleep whilst standing behind the Queen's chair. Truly, such strict attention to etiquette is very Germanic, to say the best of it. I should not think such a course politic if her Majesty wished for her offspring's love.

The entries relating to the Princess of Wales, though more guarded than in the former volumes, are to the same import; amounting to the fact, that she was, though an ill-used yet a headstrong and most imprudent Princess, else she might—for that is the gist of it—have maintained, in defiance of her husband, a position that would have enabled her to have things comfortable about her, and to afford the ladies and gentlemen of her household good salaries and handsome vails. A good many letters, said to be from the Princess, appear; but although they should be all genuine, they are more effusions of civility, graciousness, and kindness, than utterances of the heart.

The Princess Charlotte was, in those days, it would appear, imagined to have had an inclination matrimonial for the Duke of ———, [Devonshire;] we do not choose to tantalize our readers with these endless blanks and perplexing initials, which disguise nothing and nobody. The alliance with a native-born subject could not be permitted; and the Princess is said to have decidedly refused to marry the Prince of Orange, because "she ascertained that he was pledged to concur with the Regent in the ruin of her mother." Here is another full-length of the second Duchess of Devonshire—she who was so freely painted in the early part of the Diary. The Duchess was by this time established in Rome, where Cardinal Gonsalvi was her very particular friend:—

I went to see the Duchess of D———. There I instance, for example, where charm of countenance and of manner fascinate, and make one like her, despite of all that has been reported of her character. Her room is filled with books, and literature is now the pursuit in which she takes, or pretends to take, an interest. For my part, I suspect she is come to that time when nothing of this world's amusements can charm; she has tasted pleasure in all its varieties; she has drank it to the very dregs; and the less are bitter. If there be a source of interest to her, it is the Cardinal. A small lute is generally placed by her side; yet no one ever heard her Grace play on it.

Since we are among the Duchesses, let us have another, but in Paris:—

We dined one day en famille with the Duchess of Gordon, who mixes much in French society, and whose chief conversation, from morning till night, consists in abusing England. She must have some scheme in this, which nobody can comprehend. . . . We were one night at a ball, given by the Duchess of Gordon. In one room we found people dancing French dances; Lady Georgina* even danced a minuet and gavotte with old Vestris. Another room was occupied by a gaming-table with its votaries, among whom her Grace and other ladies were now and then observed.

Here, again, we have their two illustrious Graces in collision, and a story of the future Duchess of Bedford to boot:—

In the evening I went to the Duchess of D——, where people were all laughing at the Duchess of G——'s ignorance of the French language. She is reported to have said to the boxkeeper at a theatre, not long ago, at Paris, "Ne laissez aucun Anglais entrer dans ma boîte." It is also said her Grace wished Beauharnais to marry her daughter, Lady Georgina. What an odd wish for a great English lady to form for her child! When I heard them all laughing at the Duchess last night, I could not help thinking how mean people are; since, if they had been invited to a party at her house, they would have flocked to it with eagerness, just as they used to do in England, though it was the fashion to quiz her assemblies.

Sir Joseph C——y was wont to ask, "Are you going to Scotch collups to-night?" Yet he was the first to go thither. Lady —— observed, when the Duchess of —— was under discussion, "Well, let those laugh that win." The Duchess has married all her daughters greatly; and she is one of the most powerful women of her time.

Since that period, another of the Duchess of ——'s daughters has made a great alliance; and, like her sisters, it is said, owes the possession of her ducal coronet to the diplomacy of her clever mother. The present Duke of —— was commissioned by his deceased mother to carry a parcel to Lady ——, who received the noble messenger in widow's weeds, and so captivated, or deceived the new heir, by her grief for the loss of her affianced husband, that he offered her his hand; which the lady, nothing loth, accepted, and so became Duchess of —— [Bedford.]

Sir —— told me, he was in great alarm for his friend the Duchess of G——, who, he had heard, was seriously indisposed. "She is a good soul," he said, "and will be a great loss to the ungrateful world of fashion, who have profited by her brilliant assemblies, and been more nobly entertained under her roof than by almost any other lady of equal consequence in her time; yet it has laughed at the good Duchess because she is not varnished over with the polish of refinement."

"But is Her Grace not very deficient in high breeding?" I asked.

"Never on essential points," was his reply; "for good-hearted feeling has always prompted her manners and speech; but rude and rough in dialect she was, especially on her first arrival in London after her marriage; as a well known reply of hers to George III. testifies. When he inquired how she liked London, the Duchess answered, 'Not at all, your Majesty; for it is knock, knock, knock, all day; and friz, friz, friz, all night;' alluding to the mode of dressing the hair in those days."

* Now Duchess of Bedford.

Her Grace was driving about the streets in search of a house, when all of a sudden she exclaimed—"I've got one!" and desired the coachman to drive to Lord Fife's. My Lord was not at home; but she made her way up stairs and found him at a late breakfast.

"My Lord, you were in love with me five-and-twenty years ago, and I am now come to ask a favour of you."

"Ma'am, I admit the fact; but as I cannot boast of any favour your Grace bestowed upon me, I don't see what claim you derive from that circumstance."

"My Lord, it matters not; I have a favour to ask, nor shall I stir from this chair till it is granted."

She then asked for Lord Fife's house. In vain he remonstrated, and gave her a great many reasons why it could not be. Nevertheless, he was out of it in a week, and her Grace in full possession. Nor has she lost any time in opening it—balls, petit soupers, &c. But what improves the story much is—what I dare say you know—that the two families have been at daggers drawn for these fifteen years on account of politics.

The same lady, when attending upon Lady Louisa Broome, in her lying-in, turned round to the doctor:—

"Remember, sir, I engage you for this time twelvemonth. My Georgie is just going to be married—mind you are engaged to her."

The spite—the demoniacal malice of the Regent to his wife—was passing the meanest spite of woman scorned. When the grand ball at White's was to be given by the peers to the allied sovereigns then in London—

A message came from a great person to the committee, to desire to know what style of company they meant to ask to their ball, or some clumsy hint of this sort; which the committee however understood, for they sent back word that they meant to request the Regent himself to invite all the Royalties whom he wished should be there, and that they should send a number of tickets to him for that purpose. But this was not deemed secure enough to exclude the obnoxious individual; for some member, a friend to the Regent—it was said to be Lord Y—— [Yarmouth]—made a motion that no members should give away his tickets except to his relations, or that some line of rank should be drawn, such as that no one but peers' daughters should be invited; so as to exclude oisaille and higher rank likewise. Upon this Lord S——n [Sefton] got up and said, it was easy to see these confused proposals were meant to exclude the Princess of Wales; and he observed, that as one of the members, every ticket he subscribed for was his own, and every one of them he intended to send to the Princess, to be disposed of as she pleased. Fourteen other members said the same; but as they were not the majority, and as those who were to pay for the diversion were not to have leave to do what they pleased at it, they determined they would give no ball at all. "I for one," added Mr North, "quite rejoiced that for once the Regent's mean spite should fail in its object. Ah!" said he, "I could write a book on that man. I never heard of such dirty motives, except in a foolish novel, where the characters are all devils or angels, such as one never looks for in real life. Certainly his rancour is unlike the noble insouciance of the common run of men and women of the world, who are content to keep out of the way of those they hate, and think that revenge sufficient."

How painful to read of such "follies of the wise," as those with which an anonymous old baronet, primed with anecdote, charged Chatham:—

Sir —— related many anecdotes I could wish to remember. In speaking of Lord Chatham, with whom he was very intimate, he said: "From the moment of Lord Chatham's beatific vision of the King, which preceded his entry into the cabinet, he became intoxicated to a degree of absurdity with the honours of the court, with its etiquette, and all the gracious mummeries of the harem. He sank so instantaneously in my esteem, and even respect, that I could hardly look at him without contempt."

Sir — also said, with reference to Lord Chatham : "At that time, I thought his whole system, intellectual and bodily, had undergone a change for the worse, and the splendour of his equipage, and the high aristocratic airs that he assumed, betokened a disorder in his judgment. On one occasion, when he came from Bath, after a tedious fit of the gout, to appear in the House of Lords, he was detained some little time at Marlborough, where his bill at the inn amounted to upwards of a hundred pounds, from the extravagant number of his attendants, &c.; and he lived altogether in a style befitting a man of great estate; so that in a very few years all that had been given him by the folly of P — and the generosity of others, was wasted and destroyed, and he literally died a bankrupt, with six thousand a-year, either from the public or from legacies, after having risen from a cornet of dragoons. He made a great exit," continued Sir —, "and died in character. What a lucky speech for his family was his last in the House of Lords! I am persuaded, had not this accident cost him his life, he would have died out like an airy meteor, and left no trace behind him. Fortune, not prudence or foresight, regulates the affairs of this world."

Our next transcripts from the Diary, shall be sheer gossip. The scene is again Rome, the Duchess still she of Devonshire, whose somewhat promiscuous hospitality is not very gratefully requited by the Diarist :—

I dined at Lady W.'s. There were only Sir H. and Lady Davy, Mr and Mrs Dodwell, General Ramsay, and the Comte Korsakoff; and they were all particularly dull and silent.

From St Peter's I went to see the Duchess of D—. Heard the mellow tones of Madame R—'s divine voice, and talked to her husband. He appears gentle, and seems sensible; yet they do not convey to me the idea of living happily together. She is very unhappy, and more so I think than mere poverty could make her. C— S— came in whilst I was there. She is transmogrified into an Italian, and married to General St A—. In her personal appearance she is improved; but it was very melancholy to me to think of her excellent father and mother, and the situation and advantages she had in England, moral and physical, being all resigned. I am not by any means a John Bull, in the broad sense of the word, yet I did not spare her on this subject. Her calm, determined manner of answering me, her apparent composure of happiness, offered a wonderful field for fancy to expatiate upon. I do not yet read her motives; but it is best now that they should not be changed.

The only English news I heard was, that Lord W—'s marriage with Miss F—y is certainly to take place. The Duchess said she heard his family are much displeased with him; and, added she, as he is not very wise, and as her family are very clever, it is supposed he has been taken in.

I could not help laughing at the droll conclusion to Sir — remarks on Mrs Siddons. When I asked him if the theatrical air and manner of speaking did not mar her powers of pleasing in private society, and had not often rendered her liable to the ridicule of persons far beneath her in every respect, he answered—"Oh, yes, frequently; I once heard her myself ask for the salad bowl, in a tone of voice, and with an emphasis on the personal pronoun, which made every body at table laugh. She said, 'Give me the bowl,' with a grandeur worthy of Lady Macbeth, but which sounded ridiculous when so applied." I further questioned Sir — as to her being vain. "Was she so, (I said,) to the inordinate degree of which she has been accused?" "Certainly," he replied; "she is aware of her unrivalled talent as an actress; and she has often betrayed that she is so, in a manner so simple, but so injudicious, that persons have been glad to seize upon the foible and magnify it tenfold; whereas Mrs Siddons's knowledge of her own genius is as impartial an opinion as though she entertained it of some other individual than herself."

The celebrated Duchess of Devonshire, her intimate connexion with her successor, and the alleged secret exchange of their children, that an heir-male might not be wanted to a noble house, were duly recorded in the first part of this Diary; but the history of this unfortunate lady is more fully summed up here. The novel referred to below, was entitled, "A Winter in London;" and we remember to have entertained a green or juvenile wonder of what the people of other civilized or Christian nations would think on reading the publisher's daily advertisement—to the fourth, fifth, or sixth edition—of the "Winter in London," "which had broken the heart of the most beautiful woman in England!"

Lady — and myself then discussed the merit of Miss Owenson, and agreed, as I believe most people do, in thinking her a very extraordinary woman, with genius of a very high stamp. When I told Lady — I had never read the Novice of St. Dominic, she was much surprised, and said, "Read it without delay, for the enthusiasm and exquisite sentiments which are conspicuous throughout the whole work will enchant you. It is a most fascinating book. Perhaps you will find the half of the volume heavy, and the language, though beautiful in parts, inflated. But I greatly prefer Imogen to the super-human Corinne, whose character, though pleasing as a whole, is not always natural or consistent."

Lady — spoke of the late Duchess of —, and said, "Poor thing, with all her faults, she was very ardently loved by her friends, who severely felt her loss. Among them none were more sincerely affected than the Prince of Wales. The Duke cried bitterly and incessantly for a week before her death, and apparently felt much sorrow on her account. Her friend, Lady —, was her constant nurse, and was also said to be in great grief. The Duchess, to the last moment, expressed the warmest attachment for her, and Lady — said she never could believe the scandalous stories told of the reason of their friendship. The Duchess was attended by almost all the physicians in London; but she had an accumulation of disorders, liver complaint, &c. The immediate cause of her death, however, was a fever, and this fever, Lady — said, was brought on, she believed, by the vexation and agitation of mind caused by a novel published a short time before her death. A character was introduced in it, supposed to be meant for the Duchess, and who is made to swindle and do all sorts of dishonourable actions; at the same time, suffering deep remorse, and struggling against amiable feelings and much natural sensibility. It was astonishing, how, in consequence of the report of this novel having hastened her death, it was universally read, and with the greatest avidity. Lady — added, that her debts were immense, and she suffered the most dreadful agitations from a constant fear of discovery, and the many exigencies she was driven to.

This Scotch Sir Somebody, is apropos to everything and everybody. Here is his Mr Jeffrey:—

Sir — next mentioned Mr J—. He said that he knew no person so clever, whose manners are in such bad taste, and whose appearance is so little prepossessing.

If the traditional crim. con. stories floating round Edinburgh required revival, they find it here. But we shall presume they do not, in so intelligent (about their neighbours' affairs) a community as Mr Lockhart describes that of the northern metropolis. Indeed, the Diarist has a more regular supply of the scandal and gossip of Scotland, from her correspondents, than of that of London. This is of Miss Ferrier's novel, and the great house of Argyle. We are also tempted by the great heiress of that day, Miss Mercer; but let her pass.

I visited Lady —, who was engaged in reading Miss F —'s new novel. I told her, I heard she did not acknowledge being the authoress. Lady — observed it was surprising she should be so well acquainted with the living, talking, &c., of fashionable people, as she had heard that Miss — knew nobody belonging to that class of persons except the A — family.

Lady — is at present occupied in copying an original picture of Emma, Lady Hamilton, by Madame Le Brun. It is the portrait of a graceful woman, but though handsome, she must, I think, to judge by this likeness, have had a hard vulgar expression of face. There is nothing soft or feminine in her countenance: in short, this portrait conveys the idea of a woman who would go through thick and thin, and think nothing of seeing an old man of eighty hung up at the yard-arm!

In the next pages figure Lord Byron and Mrs Shelley:—

I like Lord Byron's conversations; that is to say, they interest me.

I wish he had lived to grow better; which I think he would have done when he was old. Captain Medwin, I dare say, is bad enough himself. He praises Mrs —, who, I have always heard, was anything but amiable. Her own father, G —, said so, and reproached himself with her errors, as having originated in the education he gave her.

We may as well despatch all the literary people.

On my return home, I found several letters from England; amongst them, one from Miss —, in which she speaks of W —'s "Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life;" and her opinion is valuable and curious, as being that of a clever writer. She says—"I hear you were charmed with the 'Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life.'" Some of them I think beautiful, some of them ridiculous, and all want truth and reality; for though I still can relish a fairy tale or a romance, yet I do not like fiction in the garb of truth. As mere creations of fancy they are fine; as pictures of Scottish life and human nature they are false. But do not let me forget this Mr — is an awful man to have for one's enemy.

Though the initials have, in many instances, been somewhat damaged by the printer, or neglected by the editor, here we have, for certain, the marriage of the Marquis of Northampton with a Miss M'Laine, a Mull heiress, and the ward of Sir Walter Scott:—

I am informed Lord C —, Lord W —'s son, married, in Edinburgh, lately, a Scotch heiress, a Miss M — of K —. I never heard of her before. The story goes that W — S — gave her away. This appears a mésalliance for a future Marquis. After the wedding, W — S — set out immediately for Brussels, as he is engaged to write a poem on the battle of Waterloo. Miss W — made up her marriage on the road home—not at Nice. I think she requires a great deal of dress and candle-light to set her off, and wonder at a man falling in love with her in a packet-boat.

The young ladies receive the following piece of sober advice from an experienced counsellor, who sincerely admires "repenting in a coach-and-six:—"

Every woman should make it her business, as a duty she owes herself, to find a husband; for no other interest in life is ever stable, abiding, or sufficient to the happiness of a woman. I never yet knew or heard of female friend-

* Alluding to the well-known story of Lady Hamilton's having persuaded Lord Nelson to take summary vengeance on C —, the enemy of the Neapolitan sovereign, who was hung at the yard-arm, and his body committed to the deep; but, owing to some accident, it rose again to the surface of the waters, and floated in an erect posture before the vessel, to the infinite horror of all who beheld it, who deemed it a judgment on his executors.

ships answering completely to both parties, or enduring throughout life.

The following painful and instructive story is, we believe, faithful to the truth in all parts:—

In talking of Lord —, Lady — told me some curious instances about his wife, Lady A. C —. In the first instance, Lord — would not even marry her until she was ennobled; and he went to the king, and obtained for her a title, after which he made her his wife. For a time they lived well together; but she soon fell in love with Sir J. C —, and made known her resolution, to Lord —, her husband, to run off with her lover. The former behaved most nobly to her, and said if she would promise never to see Sir J. C — again, he would forgive her what she had done, and save her from public disgrace. But this offer she refused. She told Lord — that she had wronged him to the utmost—that she loved Sir — passionately, and that she would elope with him. Lord — then replied—"So be it;" and he promised to arrange matters for her departure. But this also she rejected, and sent to the neighbouring village to order post-horses; and so, in a common hack chaise, she left her great and splendid home, for the love of a man who did not repay her sufficiently for the sacrifice. Lord — was much distressed; but he was not a person to make himself long miserable about anything; and, after obtaining a divorce, he married again. "Some years ago," said Lady —, "I was at a ball at —; I had been dancing, and sat down beside a lady whom I considered a stranger to me, when suddenly she accosted me. I remembered the sound of her voice instantly, and accosted her by her former name of Lady —, but corrected myself quickly, and said—'O Lady —, I am very happy to meet you again.' We conversed together for some time; and she invited me to go and see her, which I did. At our next interview, she told me how her life had been passed since we last met. 'I have suffered much,' said she; 'but the worst is past now.' And she related to me how she could not resist an impulse she had when one evening passing near —, to look in at the window of the house, and see her children and Lord —, who were assembled there. It was a sad strange pleasure; but it was a pleasure. I gathered from what my poor friend, Lady —, said, that the sacrifice she had made to attain happiness had failed; for the object of her love was not all that she had hoped to find him. I soon left —," continued Lady —, "and I never saw her again, or heard of her, till after her death, when I learnt that she had requested her first husband, Lord —, to go and see her; and she took leave of him for the last time." It must have been a most painful interview, I should suppose, and I almost wonder at any person imposing such a trial upon themselves; but it proved that she returned to her first attachment, and that, though not the most faithful husband in the world, he was a better and a kinder man than the object of her unhappy passion.

The hero and heroine of this melancholy tale do not require to be pointed out.—In the base affair of the Douglasses, in relation to the Princess of Wales, this book insinuates that Sir John Douglas was the false and treacherous party, and his wife merely his tool:—

In speaking of the D —, Lady — said, she believed it was only Sir J — who had ever offered to wrong the Princess of Wales, and that his wife was frightened into doing so; but that she had of herself no evil intentions respecting her royal mistress. Lady — once heard that, many years ago, Lady D — was sent for by the Prince Regent to Carlton House, and when shewn into his presence, and that of several of his favourite attendants, &c., she was commanded, under pain of his Royal Highness's everlasting displeasure, to say if she had indeed made known circumstances about the Princess of Wales, which Sir J. D —, her husband, had repeated to the Duke of —.

Lady —, who does not at all incline to favour the Princess, said she thought the Queen's conduct towards her unwarrantable; for that, until she was publicly disgraced, she had no right to exclude her daughter-in-law from her public drawing-rooms, and she wondered that no friend of the Princess took the matter up at that time, and brought it before public notice, as an unprecedented act of despotic and unjust tyranny on the part of the old Queen.

By way of relief to all this sad stuff, we shall introduce a letter from the authoress of "Marriage" and "The Inheritance," addressed, as we opine, to Lady Charlotte Campbell; not the most cordial or confidential of epistles, perhaps, but still an original letter, from a shrewd and accomplished woman:—

"Your descriptions of your travels do indeed set my feet moving and my heart longing to see all you have seen; and this desire has been increased by reading the 'Corsair,' lately; it is indeed exquisite, the most perfect, I think, of all Byron's performances. What a divine picture of death is that of the description of Gulnare!

"I am now labouring very hard at 'Patronage,' which, I must honestly confess, is the greatest lump of cold lead I ever attempted to swallow. Truth, nature, life, and sense, there is, I dare say, in abundance; but I cannot discover a particle of imagination, taste, wit, or sensibility; and, without these latter qualities, I never could feel much pleasure in any book. In a novel especially, such materials are expected, and, if not found, it is exceedingly disappointing to be made to pick a dry bone, when one thinks one is going to enjoy a piece of honeycomb. It is for this reason that I almost always prefer a romance to a novel. We see quite enough of real life, without sitting down to the perusal of a dull account of the commonplace course and events of existence. The writer who imitates life like a Dutch painter, who chooses for his subject turnips, fraus, and tables, is only the copyist of inferior objects; whereas the mind that can create a sweet and beautiful, though visionary romance, soars above such vulgar topics, and leads the minds of readers to elevated thoughts. Besides, it is so agreeable to live for a little while in the enchanted regions of romance; and since works of fiction are means (at least 'tis their legitimate aim) to amuse, not to instruct, I think those which do not aspire to be useful, fulfil their calling better than those which set forth rules of morality, and pretend to be censors on the public mind and conduct.

"Forgive this long essay, dear ———, on novels and romances.

"You were so kind as to say you would introduce me to Mrs Apreece, [afterwards Lady Davy] and, independent of everything else, I should have had great pleasure in meeting with a person you liked. But, in the first place, I feel 'tis only your extreme goodness that could have made you propose it; in the second, it could only be for your sake that Mrs Apreece would submit to the penance of visiting me; so, I think, I had better remain in my native obscurity, and not attempt to have the advantage of knowing this lady, of whom report speaks so highly. I am a wonderfully stupid person—having very little desire ever to see the most celebrated individuals. Ill health, I suppose, contributes to the apathy of my feelings; and, altogether, I very much resemble a dormouse, in my habits and temperament. So, if you please, dear ———, unless you wish to introduce me to Mrs A. in the character of Mrs M'Clarly, I think I had better forego the honour.

"With regard to my own performances, I must confess, I have heard so much of the ways of booksellers and publishers lately, that I find a nameless author has no chance of making anything of the business, and am quite dispirited from continuing to finish my story, and very much doubt if it will see the light of day. What a loss to the world will be the suppression of this child of genius! Besides the cold water thrown on my estro by these cruel personages, the forefinger of my right hand (that most precious bit of an authoress's body) fell sick, and you may judge of my alarm when the surgeon pronounced it to be poisoned; he, in the ignorance of his mind, supposed by some venomous particle it had imbibed when working in the garden; but, for my part, I have no doubt but it was a plot devised by all the great novelists of the age, who, having heard what great things it was about, had, in the envy of their hearts, laid their plan for its destruction. However, their malice has been defeated, as, after being lanced and flayed alive, it is now put into a black silk bag, and treated with all the tenderness due to its misfortunes. But, joking apart, should my book ever be published, how shall I get a copy sent to you? and, dear ———, will you never, never say to anybody that it is mine, and commit this epistle to the flames, and not leave it lying about? I am become a person of such consequence in my own eyes now, that I imagine the whole world is thinking about me and my books. I turn red like a lobster every time a novel is spoken of; and whenever the word authoress is mentioned, I am obliged to have recourse to my smelling-bottle. I mean to send a narrative of my sufferings to D'Israeli, for the next edition of 'Calamities of Authors.'

"My chief happiness is enjoying the privilege of seeing a good deal of the Great Unknown, Sir Walter Scott. He is so kind and condescending that he deigns to let me and my trash take shelter under the protection of his mighty branches, and I have the gratification of being often in that great and good man's society."

A letter appears from Sir Walter—a good-natured, if a rather too condescending one—soliciting subscriptions for Hogg's poems, to enable that "miserable son of the Muses," as he calls him, to stock a small farm.

No person connected with the household of the unfortunate Princess of Wales rises in the reader's estimation in perusing these volumes; but Sir William Gell sinks into contempt. In his soberer moods, and when under the influence of truth and honour, he did his duty like an honest man to his injured mistress; so that we would hope the tone of the following letter may fairly be presumed to be imagined in accordance with the bad taste of the person to whom he wrote, and did not display his real sentiments. Mrs Thompson is the vulgar nickname which the menials of quality, the courtly flunkies and waiting-maids, gave, in the usual style of their contemporaries of the servant's hall, to their royal mistress. The Regent was called Mr Thompson:—

December 14.—I received the following letter from Sir William Gell:—

"I thank you, my dear ———, for yours of the ———, and scarcely dare attempt to answer so amusing an epistle, since I must fall so short of attaining to the excellence of your style, and am a complete bankrupt in news of every description. The extracts you sent me of 'the Thompson' correspondence are charming. I am happy to see 'we' have lost none of our powers of writing; 'dat' would be a great pity; and trust some day that all those invaluable specimens of her epistolary genius will be gathered together, and printed, and set forth, as models for letter-writing to posterity.

"Have you heard that S——i, [Sismondi,] the great philosopher, has been making a fool of himself, and falling in love with Lady ———? Fancy S—— in love! Pretty Cupid! He wrote verses to her, and was our petit sois all the time she was staying at ———.

"There was a fête champêtre, at the Villa d'Este, a short time ago, of which, I dare say, you have heard all the particulars. Mrs Thompson must have looked divine as a Druidical priestess, which was the character 'we' assumed; and Le Comte Alexander Hector von der Otto figured charmingly as a god, to whom all the priests and priestesses did homage. Willikin was the victim offered to his druidical majesty. The Count Alexander generally wears the insignia of the most holy order of Saint Caroline, which consists of a cross and a heart tied together with a true-lover's knot, and the English royal motto encircling the badge: 'Honi soit qui mal y pense.' How far these words are applicable to the case, I cannot say; far be it from me not to take them in the sense they are intended to convey.

"We go constantly on the lake in 'our' barge, and are serenaded, and are, as 'we' say, very happy; but of that I have my doubts. To be serious, I am truly sorry for Mrs Thompson, whose kingdom is departed from her,' as surely as that I am at this moment agreeably occupied in writing to you. She has never heard once from Prince Leopold since her daughter's death. The manner in which she is treated is shameful; but, alas! they have so much to say against her in excuse for their detestable conduct, that one cannot cry them shame.

"Do you remember, dear —, all the fine promises his Serene Highness made his bride to defend her mother? See how they are performed! There is a certain saying, of 'Put not your trust in princes,' &c., which is but too true in this instance.

"I hear you are all starving with cold at Rome, so that I dare not venture on a pilgrimage thither. I am at present (for me) a comely looking person—no crutches—no velvet dressing-gown or ornamented cap, like Sir Brooke Boothby's; and being anxious to preserve my beauty, to say nothing of the comfort of being free of the gout, I will not expose myself to the danger of going to a less genial atmosphere than that of this blessed city.

"The good King George the Third is really dying in earnest, I hear. A more honest soul never went to heaven than that of his Majesty. 'Tis said, in a whisper, that already his successor has had plans made for the show of his royal coronation, which is to exceed in magnificence all spectacles of the kind ever seen. Perhaps this may be a lie; and do not give me up as your authority, when relating this piece of gossip; but have pity on your poor old friend, who is your faithful

"ADONIS —,

"P.S.—Think you Mrs Thompson will consent to being excluded from her place in the show 'as is to be'? I should say, Certainly not, without a tussle for it at least. 'We' are too fond of gold lace and theatrical amusements to waive 'our' rights; besides, sometimes 'we' remember 'we' are royal, though we often forget it. What part could the Count Alexander Hector von der Otto take in the ceremony?—ay, there's the rub; and I don't think 'we' should like to go without him. 'No more, in mercy, no more,' you exclaim, and I crave pardon; and at once sign myself

"Your obedient

"ANACHARIS."

"I heard from the Princess of Wales a few days since and had the honour of receiving a letter written by her own royal hand; but so written, I could only decipher half of its contents, and was satisfied to guess the rest. Mrs Thompson appears dissatisfied with self and all the world besides, especially with the household; from which, says she, 'Dere is not one to choose better than de oder; dey have all behaved in the most cruelest manner possible to me.' Of course your humble servant is included in this anathema. No mention is made of the present court, by which I judge their reign is drawing to a conclusion. Heaven speed its termination, though mayhap it may be followed by a worse, and that Mrs Thompson will only fall out of the frying-pan into the fire. I heard, by a sidewind report, that the plan fixed upon by Mr Thompson for the maintenance of the peace and quiet of the Thompson kingdom, not to mention his own domestic felicity, was to propose to Mrs Thompson, when the elder Thompson dies, and that he is succeeded by Thompson, junior, to accept a large income, and never to set foot on Thompson ground. I do not think Mrs T. will submit to these conditions. There is a deal of spirit in the latter, which will revolt at such terms, and we shall see grand doings yet, I promise you. 'The Great Mogul' tumbles in his slippers, I know, and is most anxious to retain Liverpool and Co. in office, because they have sworn to fight against Mrs Thompson. They are rascally set, and quite equal to obeying Mr Thompson's most unreasonable commands. I hear Mrs Thompson's health is not so good as it used to be. Willikin revolts frequently, and hates the Count Hector von der Otto, so that there are disturbances in 'Paradise,' as Alcandrina denominates the Villa D'Este. I have sometimes wished I could disguise myself, and obtain an entrance into this Eden, to have the fun of seeing how these primeval personages pass their time.

"Who is the favourite in the harem of the Sultan just now? Is it, as we outlandish folks hear, my Lady of C—— that has had the honour of having the handkerchief thrown to her?

"We have few of our country people here at present, and unless I could pick and choose, so as to have those I prefer, I do not lament the absence of English folks. Lady D—— is one of the few residing with us Neapolitana. She is handsome—more I know not of her, save what rumour has been pleased to invent, viz, that she once had a black child, which being an inconvenient circumstance, the little nigger was changed, by some hocus-pocus, into a fair flaxen-headed infant. Remember I have not coined this anecdote, and am only the speaking-trumpet of report; which it is very imprudent to be, by the way, as the poor machine is frequently accused of being the composer of the news it repeats mechanically.

"At whose shrine doth Mr Ward bend the knee? and does he dress more like a gentleman than in former times? It is said the Duke of G—— torments the Duchess, and makes her live up at the tip-top of the house, and treats her cavalierly. Now, being but an off-sprout of royalty, such manners are not seemly; but I have always remarked that these half-and-half people of blood, noble or royal, are peculiarly grand, and give themselves twice as many airs as the original roots and direct branches of the tree.

"Poor Lewis! are you not sorry for the Monk? Some say he was poisoned by his slaves. No good ever yet came of doing good and generous actions. Rest assured, dear —, it is quite a mistake to be kind and noble. 'Tis always your mean selfish people who fatten and thrive, and come to a good end. To think of the poor dear Monk's being thrown overboard and eaten by the fish! Truly it vexes me, and I am sure so it will you. To whom did he leave all his worldly goods? I suppose to his sister, Lady Lushington."

Next to the husband, and his base and servile creatures, the worst enemies of the unfortunate Princess must have been her own discontented and ungrateful if not treacherous servants. What a life that unfortunate woman must have led!

About the middle of the year 1819, the Diarist, after a long residence abroad, found herself again in London; and, it may be presumed, under the cloud of a not wealthy mesalliance. Accordingly, she did not return to the world in the most charitable temper. The beauty and youth of the women had all faded during her absence, and the men were worse than the ladies. She went to Lady ——'s concert, and—

The company was a great mixture of trumpery and snery, like a lady's maid's rubbish-box. I saw there Lady C——, who looks all sweetness, though the world says it is only look. Lovely she is without doubt; yet her's was a loveliness which never transported the beholder. Why is this so? The defect must lie within.

Poor Mrs G. L——, how she has changed! Her fair freshness gone, and all the ripeness of her youth prematurely withered! Still there is something fine in her full rich lip; and it is some praise to be beaten down with sorrow. I fear she has had her share. . . .

Lord Dudley walked about all night like a troubled ghost. He is so pale, and so mean and miserable-looking, when he comes up, holding out a finger, that you almost expect it is for charity. Yet in that dirty head, and under that appearance, there is more—how much more worth conversing with—than in the handsome gay Lotherio, Lord W——, or many such; and who would be the latter, if they could exchange their lot for the former? No one, save, perhaps, the man himself; for I have observed, that whatever men may say or pretend, they are more anxious to be reckoned handsome and pleasing than to obtain any other suffrage; at least, certain it is, that no other suffrage is completely gratifying to them, without some consciousness of personal charm.

Lady S——, who is in years still a young woman, looks prematurely old. Her dissatisfied temper has made great havoc with her beauty.

Mrs B——k looked as well as any of the people of her age at the ball. She has those outlines, and that fine-shaped head, which time never wholly spoils. Mrs W. L—— is changed indeed in manner and in appearance. W. L——, always fascinating, looking as though he had missed of life, but infinitely in better spirits, and more capable of enjoying what was going on, than when I last saw him. His daughter's beauty is far inferior to her mother's, and will fall like a blossom, and be no more remembered; for there is nothing in it but youth and freshness.

Lady G——r is by far the most distinguished young woman I have seen, and her manners are dignified. She appears to have much good-nature and sweetness. It is to be hoped that her husband will cherish these qualities, and not snuff them all by too great an indulgence in the follies and dissipation of the world. I have heard only one fatal thing against this fair promise of happiness which blooms around them: it is, that he is a sceptic! But report is not truth, and people are apt especially to say evil of those who are favoured by fortune in every way, as Lord G——r is.

June 23.—Dined at Lord Dudley's. A charming house, and some good paintings. We arrived an hour before Lord Dudley made his appearance; but there were plenty of objects to delight and amuse. Lord and Lady A——n, Lord and Lady W——t, Mr M——d, Mr M——, the Archbishop of —'s sons, Colonel G——, Mr —, &c., formed the party. Lord Dudley had on a new and rather extraordinary chocolate-coloured coat, but looked so clean and fresh, that I did not know him for the same person. His dinner was admirable in every department. Mr — is very ill. I think Lord Dudley has a look that way. When I asked him some question in regard to his going abroad, alluding to his own fortune and situation, he said, "When a great trump card turns up at home, one has no right not to play one's hand." This was like a person thinking aloud. He evidently puts all due value on his station and fortune; but I think he is a kind person, with some genuine feelings of friendship and truth about him, which are as uncommon as they are valuable.

We give the readers leave to puzzle out the following Holland Houses, Rogerses, and Moores for themselves, and merely present them with this melancholy picture of the hollow greatness and real miseries of high life:—

July 3d.—I went to — house; a formal fearful piece of amusement. Lady — on her throne as usual: very gracious to me, but still "gracious." I found no subject of conversation, and she was also, for her, unusually dull: so time went on heavily. R—— and M—— were there; but even they did not shine with their usual brilliancy. Mrs R—— and Lady W. R—— were also present. I think marriage has done much good to the latter. She seems much softened, and is, as she ever was, very distinguee, and very agreeable. Her husband appears to be a shy gentlemanly-looking person. I could not judge what else he was, and feared to talk with him. Somehow or other I lost my own identity in that society, and yet it appeared to offer much entertainment. Lady — kept me strictly under her wing, and tied me down, as it were, to her chair. She is now in bad health, and there is an excuse for her being placed above everybody else, and calling all the people by her, as though she had a crown and sceptre in either hand. But I am told she always did so. It must make a gêne in the society. But Lord — is a delightful person, and much is borne to obtain his presence. Lady — told me a curious story. She said the Duke of B—— had formed the greatest attachment for Lady —, and one evening, after she had been cutting a few jokes at Lady —'s expense, the Duke wrote her four sides of paper, to say how much it grieved him to see that any member of his family thought slightly of Lady —, and he requested that she would never do so in future.

July 4th.—Visited Lady H——d, who was much more agreeable, and in a different manner, than I had any idea she could be. How slow we ought to be in forming opinions of the character or agréments of others! for so many people are superior to what they seem on a slight acquaintance, and so many, on the contrary, are inferior to what they at first appear to be, that we should be careful not to judge of them in haste.

Miss K——t came in whilst I was at Lady H——'s. Her presence put me in mind of the poor Princess, and Princess Charlotte. I like Miss K——; that is to say, I honour and esteem her character. The old Queen certainly behaved very ill to her.

The Duke of Y——k has fallen desperately in love with the Duchess of R——d, and a few days since he walked her up and down Kensington Gardens till she was ready to faint from fatigue; so he ran off puffing and blowing as fast as he could, and brought a pony into the gardens, upon which he aired her up and down for two hours longer. When the Regent heard of this, he is said to have chuckled with delight, exclaiming—"Y—— is in for it at last."

July 6th.—Went in the evening to Miss Lydia White's. She is one of those melancholy spectacles, in point of her bodily circumstances, which is at once so painful and so salutary to contemplate. Immovable from droopiness, with a swollen person and an emaciated face, she is placed on an inclined plane raised high upon a sofa, which put me in mind of the corpse of the late Queen of Spain at Rome, in the church of the Santa Maria Novella. But even under this calamity she has many blessings—a comfortable house and the attentions of the world, which are pleasant even when they are mingled with the alloy of knowing that they are paid as a price to obtain selfish amusement and gratification. What more solid advantages she may enjoy I cannot say, because she is a stranger to me.

July 7th.—A delightful dinner party at Miss Lydia White's. A scene of a very different kind to that in which I had spent the two foregoing evenings. Lady D——, Miss F——w, Mr Moore, Sir K. K. P——, Mr Sharpe, Major Denham, and ourselves, constituted the party. Major Denham is a great traveller, who has been further into the interior of Africa than any previous traveller, and his descriptions of deserts, and skies, and camels, were very vivid, and carried me with him in idea on his pilgrimage.

After dinner, Moore sang. Many, many years have passed since I heard him. The notes of the bird are as sweet as ever—perhaps not quite so full—but the fire and the sweetness are not impaired. He stands alone in this accomplishment, or rather sits like some chorister of spring, on a flowery bush, gifted with perpetual youth of feeling and of fancy. His melancholy is never more than tender, let him strive to mourn how he may; and his mirth is never quite exempt from sentiment. When any other hand attempts to strike his lyre, it fails; when any other voice tries to sound his reed, it fails also. It is not singing; there is none of the skill of the mere mechanic in the art: it is poetry; the distinct enunciation, the expression, the nationality of his genius, which will ever remain an inimitable gift—when heard, delighted in, and never to be forgotten.

Why has not Mr Moore effected a happy revolution in singing, being himself so radical in taste? A dinner at Lady Caroline Lamb's—the wife of the Premier of our day—introduces us not merely to the eccentric, though amiable and really generous-minded hostess, but to a new circle of fashionables and lions:—

Tuesday, the 20th of January.—I dined at Lady C. L——'s. She had collected a strange party of artists and litterati, and one or two fine folks, who were very ill assorted with the rest of the company, and appeared neither to give nor receive pleasure from the society among whom they were mingled. Sir T. Lawrence, next whom I sat at dinner, is as courtly as ever. His conversation is agreeable: but I never feel as if he was saying what he really thought. He made some reference to the Princess of Wales, and inquired if I had heard lately from her Royal Highness. I replied that I had not; and, to say the truth, I did not feel much induced to talk to him upon the subject; for I do not think he behaved well to her. After having, at one time of his life, paid her the greatest court, (so much so even as to have given rise to various ill-natured reports at the period of the first secret investigation about the Princess's conduct,) he completely cut her Royal Highness.

Then there was another eccentric little artist, by name Blake; not a regular professional painter, but one of those persons who follow the art for its own sweet sake, and derive their happiness from its pursuit. He appeared to me full of beautiful imaginations and genius; but how far the execution of his designs is equal to the conceptions of his mental vision, I know not, never having seen them. Main d'œuvre is frequently wanting where the mind is most powerful. Mr Blake appears unlearned in all that concerns this world, and, from what he said, I should fear he was one of those whose feelings are far superior to his situation in life. He looks care-worn and subdued; but his countenance radiated as he spoke of his favourite pursuit, and he appeared gratified by talking to a person who comprehended his feelings. I can easily imagine that he seldom meets with any one who enters into his views; for they are peculiar, and exalted above the common level of received opinions. I could not help contrasting this humble artist with the great and powerful Sir Thomas Lawrence, and thinking that the one was fully, if not more, worthy of the distinction and the fame to which the other has attained, but from which he is far removed. . . . Every word he uttered spoke the perfect simplicity of his mind, and his total ignorance of all worldly matters. He told me that Lady C—— L—— had been very kind to him. "Ah!" said he, "there is a deal of kindness in that lady." I agreed with him; and though it was impossible not to laugh at the strange manner in which she had arranged this party, I could not help admiring the goodness of heart and discrimination of talent which had made her patronise this unknown artist. Sir T. Lawrence looked at me several times whilst I was talking with Mr B., and I saw his lips curl with a sneer, as if he despised me for conversing with so insignificant a person. It was very evident Sir Thomas did not like the company he found himself in, though he was too well-bred and too prudent to hazard a remark upon the subject.

The litterati were also of various degrees of eminence, beginning with Lord B——, and ending with ——. The grandees were Lord B——, who appreciates talent, and therefore was not so ill assorted with the party as was Mrs G—— and Lady C——, (who did nothing but yawn the whole evening,) and Mrs A——, who all looked with evident contempt upon the surrounding company. I was much amused by observing this curious assemblage of blues and pinks, and still more so with Lady C—— L——'s remarks, which she whispered every now and then into my ear. Her criticisms were frequently very clever, and many of them very true, but so imprudent, it was difficult to understand how anybody in their senses could hazard such opinions aloud, or relate such stories. Her novel of Glenarvon shewed much genius, but of an erratic kind; and false statements are so mingled with true in its pages, that the next generation will not be able to separate them; otherwise, if it were worth any person's while now to write explanatory notes on that work, it might go down to posterity as hints for memoirs of her times. Some of the poetry scattered throughout the volumes is very mellifluous, and was set to music by more than one composer. This lady's death was very striking. She lamented all her follies and errors, declared that she was glad to die while she was in such a happy frame of mind, and feared, if she recovered, she might again lapse into error. She professed, and with great apparent sincerity, a perfect reliance on the mercy of heaven, and so departed—more to be admired, perhaps, in her last hours than at any previous time of her life.

I dined tête-à-tête with Lady C. L——: she is very amusing, but her mind is in a sad state of bewilderment, and I fear it is likely to grow worse instead of better. She ought to be placed under the care of some kind and judicious person, before she requires more restraint. She clings, poor soul, to any one who is gentle and affectionate towards her; and she has fastened upon me, which is troublesome, as she very frequently forces herself upon me when I have no time to devote to her. She writes poetry with great talent, and she entertained me all the evening we passed together, by reciting many of her compositions. She appears to have a strong affection for her husband; but, as he is careless of her, her disposition, which is naturally aimante, leads her to attach herself to others.

One day the Diarist accidentally met an old fellow-servant of Kensington Palace—Miss Hayman, we presume—who told her that she had heard a report that the Princess was returning to England.

Miss H—— added, that she had heard a report that the Princess had written to Mr Canning, announcing her return to England, and asking his advice on several points. "Now," observed Miss H——, "there was a time when I believe he was inclined to be her Royal Highness's friend; but I suspect he will not now espouse her cause so warmly as he once did." I asked Miss H—— if she believed the story of the Princess having gone, many years ago, to his house, complaining of fatigue; that she remained there, and was confined, and that Mr Canning kept the secret for her. Miss H—— replied, that she did not; that, in the first place, she was convinced the Princess never had been guilty of any of the crimes laid to her charge, and also that Mr C. was too honourable as well as too prudent a man to meddle in such matters. I asked Miss H—— if, in the event of the Princess' return to England, she would again enter her service, and she replied, that if asked by her Royal Highness to do so, perhaps she might be tempted, by the attachment she felt towards her, to consent; but that if she consulted her own feelings, she did not wish to do so, as the fatigue and the anxiety were too much for her health.

At length we parted, both agreeing that nothing could be said that was agreeable upon this melancholy subject, and that it was impossible for any one to conjecture how this strange eventful history might conclude. Miss H——, with unaffected and sincere earnestness, said, "I pray for the Princess constantly."

The greatest match in England next passes under review:—

Thursday, 22d of January.—I went to a ball at D—— House. Most of the Royal Dukes were present, and all the fine world of London; yet I did not think it as gay as it ought to have been, considering the advantages of fine rooms, brilliant lights, and good company. The host himself is as gracious and urbane as ever; but he is much aged in his appearance—prematurely so—and his bland countenance is changed to a dissatisfied expression. It was curious to observe the court that most of the greatest and fairest ladies paid this illustrious bachelor. I wonder they are not all tired of wooing so stern an idol; but I suppose they never will cease this adulation until he selects some fortunate person to share his great fortune and rank.

Then we have Lord Yarmouth's bride.

Mr M—— laughed at Lord Y——'s marriage with Miss F——i, and said, "To be sure, never has there been anybody who had so many fathers—Mr Selwyn, and Lord Queensberry, and the Prince, all anxious to have the honour of being related to her."

It pleases the Diarist to consider her friend, Mr Charles Sharpe, the "modern Walpole," with a style far more natural and agreeable than the original; and in proof she brings forward a sample of his "unique talent," of which the following will be a sufficient specimen. This letter cannot be of very old date.

Letters bring Lady M. W. M. into my head, which I now do not confess in public ever to have read, for they are deemed so naughty by all the world, that one must keep up one's reputation for modesty, and try to blush whenever they are mentioned. Seriously, dear ——, I never was more surprised at any publication in my life. It was, perhaps, no wonder that the editor, my Lord of W——, cheated by the charms of his subject, might lose his head, and in the last volume kick up his heels at Horace Walpole and Dr Cole, and print the letters about Reevecombe, &c. But how the discreet Lady Louisa S——t could sanction this, I cannot guess. These pious grandchildren have proved all to be true that was before doubtful, and certainly my Lady Mary comes out a most accomplished person. Yet, from my relationship to the M—— family, I could add one or two more touches to the picture—but it is needless; however, this may amuse you, that I have been assured, from the best authority, she never was handsome:—a little woman, marked with the small-pox, and so prodigiously daubed over with white and red, that she used to go into the warm bath, and scrape off the paint like lime from a wall. It is admirable how one may obtain a reputation for wit, beauty, worth, or any other good thing, by the magic of a name! And, in truth, never was there a more striking instance of the truth of this assertion than in my Lady Mary W. Montague. All the same she really merited to have accorded her was that of being a shrewd woman of the world, with a quick eye, and a cross tongue, that was perpetually wagging against her neighbour. It would appear to me that she was but a sorry wife to her gudeman, and a very indifferent friend: and as to her talents, to judge by the style of her writings, any well-bred lady of the present day could produce a much better collection, if she were to gather the notes and letters that have passed between herself and her contemporaries.

This, from the same pen, is better:—

The other day, when I had the painful task of numbering all my cousin's books, I chanced to take up Frankenstein, and a thought struck me, which I wish Lady —— would improve upon. I imagine a wife for the monster. Let some man of art, hearing of his crimes, compose a wife to punish him. I think he should travel far and near, collecting the particles of the dust of all the most celebrated beauties of antiquity—to Egypt, for instance, in search of the mummy of Cleopatra. I would have the ghosts of some of those ladies to oppose his efforts: surely a good deal might be made of this part. After he hath collected a sackful of beauty, he mixes up his dust with rose-water, &c., and shapes the doll, leaving out all heart, but filling her head with the brains of two foxes and an ape. Up she starts, as radiant as the morning—beautiful, but without one accomplishment—with no cleverness but cunning. The monster makes a fortune in India, and comes to London for a wife; he falls deeply in love with a doll, who loathes the sight of him, but marries him with a good grace; they reside in London, and there madame begins to reward his merits; she gambles, &c. &c., he still loving her in spite of all her faults. In this place many amusing London scenes might be introduced, without any personalities, which are always detestable. I would throw the monster into jail for her debts; and make her elope to France with a young dragoon officer, sending the monster a lock of her own and her lap-dog's hair, by way of insult, in an ill-spelt letter. Hang the monster in a fit of jealous despair. Then, when the doll is walking with her lover through one of the narrow ruinous streets of Paris, in the dusk of the evening, a low window-shutter suddenly opens, and the fearful head of an old man appears, who blows his breath upon her, and quickly closes the window. She sinks down at her companion's feet, a dry mass of dust and ashes! Pray, my dear ——, ask Lady —— to think on this my contrivance, and let me know your thoughts thereupon.

The trial of the Queen opens a new division of the work, though nothing, either novel or particularly interesting, is brought forward. The poor Princess triumphed; but life was the forfeit; and it mattered not, since peace of mind had gone before and for ever. One impressive and picturesque circumstance is mentioned, which seems authentic. It offers, we think, a fine subject for lyric poetry.

A very short period elapsed between the trial and the Queen's death. Her illness was sudden, and she was for some hours ignorant of her danger. When she became aware of her awful situation, she called to some of the attendants, and said, "I forgive all my enemies; I owe no one any ill-will, although they have killed me at last;" or words to that effect. A curious circumstance occurred whilst she was on her death-bed; the night or rather the morning on which she expired. A boat passed down the river, filled with some of those religious sectarians who had taken peculiar interest in her fate; they were praying for her, and singing hymns as they rowed by Brandenburgh House; and, at the same moment, a mighty rush of wind blew open all the doors and windows of the Queen's apartment, just as the breath was going out of her body. It impressed those who were present with a sense of awe, and added to the solemnity of the scene.

The King's malice followed her to the grave, and the most indecent measures were resorted to in the arrangements of her funeral. The Queen's remains were not permitted to lie in English ground, and objections were even made to her being buried at Hanover. Finally, however, her body was suffered to be placed in the vault of the Royal Family at that city. But the crown and insignias of royalty on the coffin were taken off, and I have been told that nothing but her name "Caroline," stands to record who lies within that narrow house. The candle that is taken into that royal mausoleum to shew the visitors the coffin, has always been placed on hers, so that the velvet is covered with wax, and otherwise soiled. Thus do her remains, even in the grave, meet with the same disrespect she endured throughout life.

Some of the Diarist's correspondents do the Princess far more justice than those of "her own house." The Regent, whose temper on this subject displayed as much meanness as malignity, was, it would seem, offended and displeased that Lady Charlotte Campbell, in her need, accepted the appointment of a lady in waiting to his consort. Lady Charlotte had at one time been proposing to go to Brighton, and is thus indirectly warned by Monk Lewis:—

I should be sorry she went to a place where she would be under his eye, and not noticed as she deserves to be. I must say, I think it is a most illiberal trait in him not to pay that attention due to the rank of the Princess' ladies, without reference to their being in her service. But such is not his idea of propriety; and for this reason I object to Lady —— going to Brighton. I have always considered it a noble contrast in the Princess' character, the liberal manner in which she always forgives her acquaintances and friends for paying court to "the Great Mahomet," as she calls him; and I have particularly admired the total absence of all prejudice which she displays, by frequently being even partial to many of the Regent's cronies. Certainly, she has not the justice done her that is due to her merits. But who has, my dear —, in this world?

When Lewis was about to embark for Jamaica, he again wrote thus to Lady Charlotte:—

My brother-in-law, Sir Henry Lushington, when he passed near Milan, inquired whether Her Royal Highness was at the Lago di Como; and, if she had been there, he would have gone over there purposely to inquire whether she had any commands for England. I hope Her Royal Highness will act prudently; and I also sincerely hope and pray all her enemies may be confounded. The pleasant evenings I have spent at Kensington, Her Royal Highness's hospitality, and the delightful assemblage of persons she had the good taste to congregate around her, will ever form the most agreeable reminiscences in my life.

Immediately after Lady Charlotte entered the service of the Princess, a sensible, if worldly-minded, anonymous Mrs — wrote to her thus:—

Whoever embraces the service of the Princess of Wales, as matters now stand between her and the Prince, place themselves (or at least run a great risk of doing so) for ever out of the pale of his favour. Now, as he is the person in whom all power and authority will be vested, in a worldly point of view, it is his countenance that is alone worth seeking for. Au reste, I believe the Princess to be exceedingly amiable—a true and zealous friend to all those whom she once takes en amitié; and is, moreover, an excessive agreeable companion, full of natural talent, and combines in a surprising manner the dignity of her position with an unaffected and natural ease very rarely seen in a Princess. It is, indeed, only fair to add, that she makes it a point to draw about her all the clever and agreeable persons she can; and that, particularly in a royalty, is no small merit. There are no courtiers or parasites in the society at Kensington; it is chosen with great discrimination and impartiality, from all that is most distinguished in rank and talent, and, above all, agrément is the greatest attraction a person can have for Her Royal Highness. You have hitherto been no politician, but you must become one, for the Princess will call upon you in that way. She is now flaming against the present Ministers, and inviting to the palace all she can collect of the Opposition. You will have a great advantage in this circumstance, as no one can deny that they are, with some few exceptions, a more agreeable body of people en masses than the principal heads of the Tory party.

You ask me to tell you something of the individuals who form the Princess of Wales's household, and if they are persons of amiable and agreeable qualities. I can give you a most satisfactory reply to this inquiry. They are all known to me personally, some more and some less; but, through others of my friends who are intimate with several of them, I am able to say that I feel sure you will find them all particularly honourable and superior persons. Of Lady C— L—y's [Lady C. Lindsay] wit, and proverbial good humour and kindness of heart, you must be well acquainted; her sister also, though less brilliant, is fully as amiable. Miss G—th [Garth] is a very estimable character, simple-minded, and very downright in all she says, and little suited to a Court, except from her high principles and admirable caution, which indeed render her a safe and desirable attendant upon royalty. Miss Hayman is shrewd and sensible; she has strong sense and good judgment; she plays well on the pianoforte, and understands the science of music, and has very agreeable manners, though not polished ones. All these persons are totally different from the commonplace run of character, and the Princess's selection of such persons does her infinite credit, as they are of a very different quality from those who generally occupy places at a Court.

Amongst the visitors at Kensington you will frequently see Messrs Rogers, Luttrell, Ward, and a host of brilliant spirits; so that I think I may with safety predict for you a pleasant life at the palace. I have only one piece of advice to give you; it is, not to receive any confidences. Be firm, and decline being made the repository of any secrets. This course is the only one that can ensure your own safety and comfort.

The Duchess of Brunswick is dead. Doubtless you are aware of the event; but I write to say that I would recommend your sending to inquire after the Princess of Wales, for, poor soul! she is much vexed at the carelessness of all the Royal Family, in never having condoled with her on the occasion; and also many private persons, who ought to have paid her Royal Highness this respect and attention, have neglected to do so; and she has, I know, been much hurt, and complained to Miss H— that the manner in which she was treated was most unkind. I would not have you negligent towards her Royal Highness; and knowing, as you do, that, in fact, this event will not render the Princess long or exceedingly unhappy, I thought you would perhaps not consider it worth while to write on the occasion, whereas I am certain it would pain her Royal Highness if you did not do so. Miss H— told me she was much affected on first hearing of the Duchess's death; which I can believe; for although her mother's habits and tastes did not suit the Princess, and she disliked the dulness of her house and society, the Princess is too good-hearted not to regret the death of so near a relative; and she most touchingly observed to Miss H—, "There is no one alive now who cares for me except my daughter, and her they will not suffer to love me as she ought or is inclined to do."

The Princess also said: "True, my mother behave ill to me several times, and did eat humble pie to the Queen and the Prince; yet she only did so from cowardice; she was grown old, and was soon terrified, but she love me for all that."

This remark was perfectly just, and, in fact, I know, from many conversations I had with the Duchess of Brunswick, that such was the case. I hear that the little property she was able to leave she has bequeathed to the Princess of Wales.

I dined at Kensington about three weeks ago. There were Lord and Lady C—t, and Mr Ward, Mr Luttrell, Lord Byron, and Lady Oxford, and the party was exceedingly agreeable. I never saw any person, not royal or royal, who understood so well how to perform the honours at their own table as the Princess: she does it admirably, and makes more of her guests than any one else ever did.

A drawing-room was held in honour of the Princess Charlotte's marriage. The Court of England was at that period in its most degraded state; the malignant passions of the Regent, slavishly ministered to by the baseness of the courtiers, and as slavishly by the subservience of his mother. The scene is described by an eyewitness, whose wife, as one of the ladies of the Princess of Wales, was pointedly slighted by the Regent.

The said drawing-room was, as you are aware, held in Buckingham House. Princess Charlotte stood apart from the royal circle, in a window, with her back to the light; she was deadly pale, and did not look well. It struck me that the expression of pleasure on her countenance was forced. Prince Leopold was looking about him with a keen glance of inquiry, as if he would like to know in what light people regarded him. The Queen either was, or pretended to be, in the highest possible spirits, and was very gracious to everybody, including Lady —. All the time I was in that courtly scene, and especially as I looked at Princess Charlotte, I could not help thinking of the Princess of Wales, and feeling very sorry and very angry at her cruel fate.

I shall be happy when I hear that some able person brings the subject boldly forward to public notice; at the same time that I fear it will be the means of making a great commotion in the country, and wiser heads than mine predict the possibility of this subject producing a civil war, if not most dexterously managed by the reigning powers. Then, again, I am told that the Princess will inevitably commit some enormous act of folly, that will ruin her cause; and that, besides the heedless recklessness of her own disposition, every possible means will be taken to make her say or do something which will enable the Regent to set her aside, and for ever sink her into insignificance, if not disgrace. I can scarcely believe these reports, yet they are circulated by many sensible and dispassionate persons, who are neither violently for nor against either party. Alas! every one's own experience more than suffices to prove to them that "les plus fort ont tous jours raison" in this world; yet I would fain hope that this oppressed lady (for that she certainly is) may be restored to her rightful position in society.

I dare say Princess Charlotte was thinking of the Princess of Wales when she stood in that gay scene of to-day's drawing-room, and that the remembrance of her mother, excluded from all her rights and privileges in a foreign country, and left almost without any attendants, made her feel very melancholy. I never can understand how Queen Charlotte dared refuse to receive the Princess of Wales at the public drawing-room, any more than she would any other lady, of whom nothing had been publicly proved against her character. Of one thing there can be no doubt—the Queen is the slave of the Regent.

The above are sufficient specimens of this work. On its character we have little to add to what we remarked on the appearance of the first two volumes. 'Tis pity that the fashionable world and its imitators could better spare a better book; yet this one has important uses.

THE EDUCATOR PRIZE ESSAYS.

AN hundred guineas was offered by the Central Society of Education, for an essay of which the subject was "the Expediency and Means of elevating the profession of the educator (alias schoolmaster) in public estimation." We are no great admirers of this mode of forced production. Twenty-four essays were sent in to the Committee, and were placed in the hands of Professor Malden of University College, London, who adjudged the prize to the essay of Mr Lalor, and named the other four essays which, with it, fill this volume, much superior to the remainder. They are respectively written by J. A. Heraud, Esq., James Simpson, Esq., Mrs G. H. Porter, and the Rev. E. Higginson. There is naturally considerable sameness in essays, and the substance of some of them has appeared either in the previous writings of their authors, in the Central Society's publications, or in separate books. Some of them, if not all, are liable to the charge of wordiness, and all travel out of the record; the prize essay, especially, does not stick to the text given out. Wordiness, dare we say verbiage, is becoming as rampant a fault in this class of compositions as in graver sermons; and we do wish some one having authority would first rebuke, and then, if necessary, lash that new-fangled and vicious style, the pompous obscure, which, for want of a better name, may be christened hybridized Bostonian. Apart from these blemishes, which do not attach to all the essays, each contains some valuable, if not very original speculation.

We should have liked to learn the grounds upon which Professor Malden pronounced his judgment—as the best essay upon the given subject ought to be a valuable and authoritative document, applicable to the special case of elevating the profession of the schoolmaster in general estimation; instead of which this goes into the whole business of education, giving only secondary or incidental attention to the condition of the schoolmaster—the proper subject of the essay. Phrenology is recommended in Mr Lalor's educational course of study; but then he is not quite sure about the organs, or "its craniological pretensions." But if not sure of these, upon what else does Mr Lalor imagine the analysis of the intellectual and moral faculties, adopted by the phrenologists, rests? It is certainly not from "The New Science" that the world has learned that the human mind contains faculties and principles which we denominate benevolence, pride, firmness, conscientiousness, vanity, covetousness, fear, hope, &c. &c., but from the philosophers. He would, therefore, strip the phrenologists of all that they have really originated, the indicating organs on the skull, and attribute to them that to which they can make no tenable claim. We are glad to find Mr Lalor recognise what we hold to be a most important principle, and one for which we have always contended—namely, that, with a regular and adequate provision for teachers, there shall be "a regular gradation of places from the humblest village school upwards, through which ability and merit might rise to a seat at the Central Board," if there is to be a State Central Board. The want of this provision, of the career open to talent and merit, was one of the leading objections formerly stated in this Magazine* to Mr Wyse's scheme, and it is a deficit in Lord Brougham's bill. We are, therefore, glad to find Mr Lalor approving the principle there laid down, and even adopting our illustration—the noble example of Napoleon, in organizing his army, and in all departments of the public service. Mr Heraud does not advert to State impulse or interference, nor yet to absolute State control. He wishes that the same degree of encouragement were given to schoolmasters in England as in Scotland, where they are "ultimately capable of succeeding to the pastoral charge of the parish." But Mr Heraud ought to be aware that this capability has nothing whatever to do with their profession of schoolmaster, but depends wholly on their previous or contemporaneous regular course of study for the church; and that a tailor or shoemaker, who had gone through the preliminary training, possesses the very same claims and capabilities. The Rev. Mr Higginson, the author of the third essay in the volume, is afraid John Bull will be rather jealous of State interference, and refuse even a benefit upon compulsion; and we fervently hope that the honest and often-cheated man will be found so. The State has managed his religious instruction for him for a goodly length of time, and also his learned education; and finding he gets restive under its paternal tuition in those departments, it cunningly puts forth its long arm to grasp one far more important to the well-being of his family in all time coming. John ought to be wary, and take no more of either State or Church teaching than will do him good. Fortunately, there will be time to look about him before we are all agreed.

The low rate at which teachers are paid is noticed and condemned by each of the essayists, save the lady, who seems to think that teaching may, like virtue, be its own reward. The miserable remuneration of teachers is, we apprehend, both the cause and effect of their degraded condition to a very great extent. But are the masters of the law-appointed schools better paid, and, consequently, in a more elevated position than the teachers of private schools, or of what are called subscription or proprietary schools? And is it to the State that we must look for an improvement of the pecuniary means so essential to the proper degree of accomplishment, and the moral influence of the mass of educators? A single fact is worth a bushel of speculation. In face of all such eloquent appeals and powerful reasoning, the Educating Whig Government, only the other day, out of their scanty funds for Irish Education, could afford £1000 per annum to a favourite new functionary, who probably has very good interest; while the teachers—the working men—jog on at the old rate of £12 a-year! It has been ever thus, and ever will be, while men in power are liable to abuse their power, or, in other words, are men.

A most angelic or all-perfect and all-accomplished human being is Mr Simpson's beau idéal of an "Educator," physically and morally. Dividing mankind (phrenologically) into three classes, he chooses the educator, provided he have no personal deformity or physical defect, (not connected with the brain,) from the third class—that in which, with enough of the animal propensities for their legitimate ends, there is a decided predominance of the moral and intellectual faculties—such a predominance "as would render it nearly a moral impossibility that the inferior propensities should ever so far master them as to impel them to commit crime." He must have as much Acquisitiveness "as shall confer a prudent economy;" as much Secretiveness as will "give tact and savoir faire;" and a liberal endowment, moreover, of Philoprogenitiveness. He must also have Adhesiveness, and the desire of taking to himself a helpmate—a teacher's properly chosen wife, besides being a comfort to himself, being indispensable to the due management of the school. The educator must also possess Conscientiousness, Veneration, and Benevolence. He must likewise have Self-Esteem, the Love of Approbation, Firmness, Ideality, and Hope, balanced by a proper degree of Cautiousness: in short, he must be the beau idéal of phrenological man. Mr Simpson does not uniformly use all these familiar terms of Phrenology; he sometimes employs their equivalents. How lads of this third or highest class of human natures are to be picked out as pupils for the normal schools, must, we presume, be ultimately left to the most skilful of the manipulators and measurers, or the greatest adepts in discriminating the distinctive marks of the three grand classes of human beings. The first or lowest class may be easily discovered. "They are mere animals, with the slenderest share of the man-distinguishing faculties." They are the criminal population, whose animal appetites are so powerful as to overbalance the restraining force of their moral and intellectual faculties. . . . "Any better endowment of intellect in this class is always perverted to the purposes of crime." So class first is a doomed class—the wrath of God and the curse of man lie upon it—and it is almost, without exception, we fear, to be found among the poor. But how class second, the mixed class, shading gradually off into the lofty original purity and felicitous organization of class third, or sinking into the brutality of class first, is to be always distinguished from them, may prove a puzzle to those who are to choose educators, unless adepts in Phrenology. "In low life they (the second class) often become criminals; in a more favourable condition of education and society they have continued respectable." "They are always selfish and self-indulging, and bad example will make them sensual and profligate." Mr Simpson cannot, in his imaginary schoolmaster, make the standard of excellence too high; and we need not at present indulge further conjecture as to how he is to reach it.

He explicitly recognises State Education, through a Central Board, &c., to the widest extent; but not at all, that we perceive, the grand corrective principle asserted by Mr Lalor, of the poorest village schoolmaster being permitted to strive with generous ambition for the highest honours connected with the National Institutions for education. Mr Simpson "desiderates a legislation," he says, "preambled (?) by declarations of the paramount rank in human affairs of the education of the people, and the necessity of committing it to hands in everyway worthy of it." Now, there is no fear of any want of abundant preambling, and perambuling, too, in any such declaration. But he further requires that the trust may be placed in proper hands, and says "a Centralized Power will be found indispensable—a tribunal of men of the first character and talent which the country can produce, not themselves to exercise the functions of teachers, (and, from aught that appears, never to have exercised them,) but to frame and work a great and uniform system for the whole country." Mr Simpson supports the Centralization Scheme by the arguments already familiar to all the world, who care about the matter; stating that the objectors are often either "unreflecting or interested." How easy were it to retort this accusation, and yet not be one whit nearer the truth. But without making the educator a creature and appurtenance of the State, Mr Simpson believes that his position will never be raised in society: in short, without a Board, or, as Mr Simpson has it, "without a high, superintending, and sustaining authority, we feel assured that the teacher of youth will never be raised in society. . . . The Board, if composed of fit men, could judge at an interview of the merely personal qualifications of the candidate, and by examinations and inspections of his testimonials, of his talents and previous attainments." It seems as if the Board were, after all, to determine very much as persons in similar circumstances do at present! When the candidate approved has been trained in the normal seminary or college, he is to obtain a diploma very much after the fashion of the degree of master of arts, or of a surgeon, or other qualified individual's diploma, and with this obtain an immense advantage over educators who have not been trained in the State colleges, though the public is not to be compelled to choose educators from among the "seminants." No one, we presume, disputes the necessity, or doubts the advantages of teaching teachers; of making the business of a schoolmaster a profession to be carefully acquired by time and practice, and probably best in normal colleges, or proper seminaries, whatever be their name, and however they are constituted. Mr Simpson has what will be considered by some too magnificent ideas of the rate of remuneration to which the educator is entitled. He says—"The educator in a particular seminary"—clearly meaning, in any and every seminary—is entitled to "a gentleman's income, however realized;" that is, "whether paid directly by the State, or raised by the locality." An important whether this in our view, though we subscribe to Mr Simpson's opinion, that the educator "should have such an income as will enable him to maintain a family in respectability." But this, and still more, "a gentleman's income," are vague terms. An enough pay is "a gentleman's income;" a judge's salary is considered no more. Mr Simpson comes nearer the point when he fixes a clergyman's income as the measure of what an educator's ought to be, and not the minimum of clergymen's incomes, but a fair average. Whatever more is due to the sacred office of the divine, he is for paying off in reverence, and not in filthy lucre. On the head of cost, Mr Simpson makes many good and sound remarks. But, in the meanwhile, the functionary of a Board, who never taught a class in his life, gets £1000 a-year, and the teacher £12: thus the thing is working in the sample; thus it will work in the bulk! As another expedient for elevating the profession, Mr Simpson suggests that it be made a fourth faculty, and have its degrees equivalent to B. A., and M. A., and LL.D.'s, or perhaps to the Knighthood of the great Guelphic, or some other learned Order. We have doubts about this. Nothing, at present, forbids that schoolmasters should obtain honorary distinctions. Mr Simpson "would call upon the dispensers of honours and distinctions to confer these on the eminent among the educators of youth, as such." And such calls have been answered again and again before now, to what good purpose we are not able to say. He thinks "badges tell under a monarchy," and, consequently, would tell under a State system. But let us hope that, at least, those of his educators, chosen from the third or highest class of cerebral development, could dispense with such badges, from being able to establish far better claims to the esteem of society. The prize for which we would have the teacher contend would be eminence in his profession; the highest honours of which, a seat at the high Directing Central Board, ought surely to be open to his ambition of excellence—that Board to which no one should be eligible save the schoolmaster rising by merit from the ranks. Lastly, Mr Simpson would not allow the educator to degrade himself by the office of executioner. "It is impossible to be both a flogger and a gentleman; and he must enter on the profession with the determination to make it the sole and the permanent business of his life." Few men spend the best years of their lives in acquiring a profession without an intention of abiding by it; and the determination of abandoning or abiding by it, may, we think, be very safely left to individual discretion, provided it is made worth sticking to.

Mrs Porter indulges some rather enthusiastic opinions, as the worldly-minded will deem them, about elevating the character of "Educators." We have heard of such things as she imagines in the Society of the Jesuits, and some instances of individuals with an aptitude to teach amounting to a passion; but, on the whole, we must, in looking forward to a system working for any length of time, take educators upon the average of mankind, and pretty much, as to permanent motives, as men are found in all professions. By means which she indicates, she considers that a class (of educators) may be raised, over whom worldly emoluments and worldly ambition could have little influence—who would disregard Mr Simpson's degree, or the badge of an honour conferred by the monarch, "and the income of a gentleman;" and who, according to her, "like missionaries, would go forth doing good, and would obtain their reward, even in this world, in the love of the pupils, rendered great and good by their assistance." "It may be deemed almost romantic to believe that such a class of persons, so self-sacrificing and so unworldly," she continues, "could be raised; but even in the humblest walks of life, qualified teachers might be obtained, who would pursue the profession from much higher motives than we could in this country believe possible, had we not facts in corroboration of what has been advanced." It is in Prussia that Mrs Porter finds those paragons of goodness and self-denial, which Mr Simpson does not look for, even among his picked or third-class specimens of skull-men. Religious zeal is the animating principle with those self-devoted teachers, who "cost scarcely anything, and do infinite good." We have little doubt, that an army of educators, willing to live upon next to air, could be recruited at this moment, among zealots of the Established Churches of England and Scotland, and none whatever, that the Catholic body of Ireland could furnish another army of such missionaries. Teachers who must be paid, Mrs Porter would, however, treat liberally. But Mr Simpson's principle of due compensation to the teachers, and due respect for his office, will, we are inclined to think, work much better in this money-loving country, and, on the whole, be as healthful for society. Mrs Porter objects entirely to the Voluntary principle in schools. So, indeed, does Mr Simpson, who deprecates it in every view. Their arguments are precisely the same, against a popular choice of schoolmasters, as those used against a popular choice of clergymen. Their's is Mr Wyse's argument—nor are we surprised that any Roman Catholic or Church-of-England man should object to independent action or voluntarism in schools. Yet, in everything, voluntarism—the right of independent judgment—is the fundamental principle of all that is worth calling Protestantism.

Mrs Porter further suggests, that a law should be passed for appointing means of examining "into the fitness of all who are engaged in the business of education." But she would not compel teachers to appear before such a tribunal. The stigma of presumed incapacity in the recusant dames and dominies would be a sufficient stigma. They would get no certificate, and Mrs Porter has great faith in a certificate. She would have a board of ladies to grant diplomas or certificates to governesses, as better qualified than the gentlemen, who might, perhaps, be brought under glamour influence, in cases of fair faces though haply belonging to very ill-furnished heads.

There is very considerable discrepancy in the opinions of the various essayists: None are so decidedly favourable to a sole State authority, and phrenological principles, as Mr Simpson; none so poetical as Mr Heraud; none so continental in their ideas as Mrs Porter, who seems to admire the most whatever has been considered objectionable in the Prussian system. Among other qualifications of the educator, Mr Simpson would have him able to watch in his pupil, and to teach him to watch in himself, the working of the nervous system as in connexion with the mental faculties. "He," the educator, "should thoroughly understand, up to the latest discoveries, (No. 37, on the plaster cast?) the structure and faculties of the brain as the organ of the mind and the seat of sensation, the condition of health in the brain, and the symptoms of the contrary. . . . The analysis (of the faculties of the mind) is, perhaps, the most important study which the educator will guide." By which is meant the analysis connected with the organs; or the observation and philosophy of Berkeley and Hume, Hartley, Stewart, and Brown, rendered subservient to the system of organology discovered by Gall. On the whole, after perusing the elect of the twenty-four prize essays, we are constrained to pronounce of them, as Mr Simpson does of The Science of Mind, previous to Gall, that "Little progress has been made to any practical end."

LITERARY REGISTER.

Memoirs of Sarah Duchess of Marlborough, and of the Court of Queen Anne. By Mrs A. T. Thomson. 2 vols. royal 8vo. Pp. 1048.

These Memoirs appear in the very nick of time. So much has not been thought or spoken about Queen Anne and her Court, her imperious friend the Duchess of Marlborough, and her complaisant and intriguing favourite, Mrs Masham, since the accession of the House of Hanover, as within these two or three months, when circumstances so similar in character and, probably, in consequences, have again arisen at the Court of a female sovereign. The authoress appears to have bestowed great care in the search and selection of materials for composing the Memoirs; but of a person so prominent in national annals as the Duchess, from her long-continued influence or mastery over Queen Anne, her masculine talents, unbridled temper, and the illustrious name and station of her husband, not very much remained to be discovered. Mrs Thomson has, however, gleaned some fresh facts and traits from the former stores; and to her belongs the merit of having first arranged the existing materials. It is not a little singular, considering the conspicuous part which she so long acted in affairs, and the rank and number of her descendants, that one cannot tell exactly where this remarkable woman was born, or where or when she was married or died. Sarah Jennings was the daughter of a respectable landed gentleman of Hertfordshire. Like her sister, afterwards Duchess of Tyrconnell, (La Belle Jennings of Grammont,) she was early attached to the Court, both the fair Jennings being in the service of the Duchess of York. Her marriage with Colonel Churchill, long delayed by prudence, and kept secret for some time after its celebration, appears to have been one of pure attachment on both sides. The future hero of Blenheim was one of the handsomest and most attractive men of his age, and in his manners a model of elegance and suavity. Mrs Churchill's place in the household of Mary of Modena, the second consort of James II., brought her into close intimacy with the Princess Anne, who, much her inferior in intellect, was also by a few years her junior. Over Anne's mind and affections she acquired, and long held, a predominating influence, which nothing save her own haughtiness and domineering spirit, and the change of feeling which ever attends the accession of a sovereign, could have shaken.

On the marriage of Anne with Prince George of Denmark, Lady Churchill was, at the request of the Princess, made one of her ladies of the bed-chamber. The affection of the Princess led her to sink the distance which rank placed between her and her friend. She would not be called "Your Highness," but insisted on being treated with that freedom from etiquette and perfect equality which alone is compatible with friendship. In their conversations and correspondence they assumed the gossiping names—the Queen, of Mrs Morley, and the Duchess, of Mrs Freeman. In their correspondence the character of Anne appears in an amiable light. While Anne was sustained by the stronger mind of her friend, during many domestic trials, throughout the reign of her father and her sister, and under affliction from the death of her children, this singular attachment increased; and only declined when the greater complaisance and arts of Mrs Masham—a relative, and imagined creature of the Duchess—and the despotic temper of the latter, totally alienated the affections of the Queen from her early favourite. In the prudent and, perhaps, conscientious adherence to Protestantism, which the Princess and her husband displayed at the Revolution, they were supported by Lord Churchill and his wife; who, when all were deserting the unhappy King James, arranged measures for the flight of his daughter, the Princess Anne, and accompanied her to Nottingham, where Anne threw herself among the friends of the Prince of Orange. From this period Lady Churchill became a political character, though it was not until the accession of Anne that she obtained a direct power in public affairs, which was equal, if not really superior, so far as the sovereign was concerned, to that of the Prime Minister. Throughout the reign of William and Mary, the Countess of Marlborough was the object of their jealousy and dislike; and at this season of adversity to herself and her husband, Marlborough and his wife were elung to by the Princess with a tenacity of regard worthy of a more grateful return from her "Dictatress" than the Duchess displayed.

The first symptoms of the declining favour of Lady Marlborough were shewn in that very natural attachment (in all crowned heads) to the Tory and High Church party, which the Queen early evinced; and by her extreme reluctance to shew any favour to the Whigs, with whom Marlborough and his wife were gradually becoming identified. But the female Groom of the Stole, and Keeper of the Privy Purse, who was permitted to all offices and to exercise unbounded patronage, states, that she was unable to withdraw her royal mistress from the party to which her prejudices and inclination led her, long before she came under the influence of Mrs Masham, and of Harley, who moved or managed the puppet which the Duchess despised. Lady Marlborough did not think the "gibberish of the Tories about non-resistance and passive obedience" boded any good to Queen Anne, whose title to the throne, like that of her successors, rested on a very different foundation. But this is the sort of gibberish in which all sovereign princes naturally delight. Mrs Morley still entreated Mrs Freeman to speak to her with the frank confidence of equal friendship; but the Queen, at the same time, held to her own opinions. Lord Marlborough was either more compliant to the secret wishes of the Queen, or else, educated in High-Tory principles, he really participated in her partialities; and the husband and wife were often opposed in opinion or, as probably, in temper. There was henceforward little peace and less affection between Queen Anne and "Queen Sarah," though the military successes of Marlborough for a time maintained his personal ascendancy.

So superior was the high-spirited Lady Marlborough to the ordinary small ambitions of Court ladies, that, thwarted in her political projects and struggle for power, she sincerely viewed the elevation of her husband to a dukedom, by her "poor faithful Morley," more as a humiliation than an honour. Her friend, Godolphin, was half afraid to announce to her the Queen's design, and he endeavoured to prepare and soothe her proud mind under the infliction of the title. The pension which accompanied it might have been some consolation for the lampoons of the wits, and the opposition of the Tories in Parliament, to the grant; for both the Duke and Duchess loved, if not money, yet the more coveted things—great estates and splendid mansions—which money commands. The violent Tory or High Church measure, brought in, in the first Parliament of Queen Anne, for preventing occasional conformity—in other words, for imposing heavy penalties on all Dissenters—was as much a favourite with the Queen as it was politically odious to the Duchess and her party. She justly thought the Church in no immediate danger, with so affectionate “a nursing-mother” as Anne; and believed that the real object of the Tory party was to extinguish their political rivals, under the pretence of zeal for the Church. This bill did not, in the opinion of the Duchess, “aim at excluding the occasional conformists only, but all those constant conformists also who could not relish the High-Church nonsense of promoting religion by persecution.” It was remarkable, but not in the least unaccountable, that the leading members of the House of Commons who supported this tyrannical, invidious, and interested measure, and who were most active against Dissenters, were all descended from Dissenting families. Such, among others, were Harley and St John. Another intended indirect object of this measure was, by putting members to the test, to shew to the nursing-mother who were really the friends of the Church and of her opinions, and to estrange her farther from the Liberal party of that age, if either party deserved the name. The reign of Anne affords many parallels to the present period; and, among others, in that frenzied outcry about the Church which disquiets our day. The warmest panegyrist of the persecuting measure to disqualify Dissenters, and to impose fines on persons in office for attending any meeting of Dissenters, were the clergy and a crowd of clamorous women. The Peers threw out the Bill, favoured by the Court, but to which the press and the commercial part of the nation were unanimously opposed. Whig principles came more into favour. Marlborough himself, though so lately a High Churchman, rose into sudden popularity from his opposition to the Bill; and Godolphin, finding the Whigs so important a party in the nation, began, according to the Duchess, “to pay them as much regard as the times and the Queen’s prejudices would permit.” The hero of Blenheim took the same high, neutral, or see-saw part which some attribute to the hero of Waterloo. When advances were made to him by the Whig party through his son-in-law, Lord Sunderland, his reply, the Duchess reports, was, “That he hoped always to continue in the humour he was then in—that is, to be governed by neither party, but to do what he should think best for England, by which he should disoblige both parties.” The belief entertained in foreign Courts of the all-powerful influence of the Duchess of Marlborough, seems to have continued long after her real power had declined: and this belief she was not averse to foster. The brilliant success of Marlborough’s arms in a cause dear to the Whigs, was now the main foundation of their influence; though the Duchess still held her high offices, and never ceased in her efforts to keep her royal mistress out of the grasp of the Tories. The history of those long-continued jarings and squabbles, and of the triumphant intrigues of Harley, and his tool, Mrs Masham, will be read with augmented interest in the present circumstances of the nation.

The Memoir is somewhat long-drawn-out, and naturally diverges into collateral affairs. It is also chargeable with redundancy, and even with the repetition both of facts and opinions. The authoress entertains a marked partiality for Marlborough, and something like a prejudice against his high-spirited wife; who, whatever were her faults, possessed many noble original qualities, perverted by ambition, and debased by courtier-craft, and probably leaving deeper stains in her moral nature than might have been traced on a feeble character who had passed through the same dangerous ordeal. How deep is the moral to be found in all such memoirs; and how little, when its secret character is revealed, is there to envy, how much to commiserate, in the life of a woman placed in the condition, most perilous to true nobility and goodness of nature, of a courtier and royal favourite! The Duchess of Marlborough was only secured from the degradation of sinking into an intrigante and flatterer, by her remaining natural dignity, and the arrogance, bred of favouritism, of her temper.

A very few sentences of the work will exhibit its value to the political reader.

“Harley was practising upon the Queen’s weak mind, and endeavouring to persuade her Majesty to ‘go alone’; or, as the Duchess expresses it, to instil into the Queen notions of the high prerogative of acting without her Ministers, and (as she expressed it) being a Queen indeed!”

The Duchess, at one time, urged the Queen to permit Lord Cowper, then Lord Keeper, to fill up several vacancies in the Church, which the Queen kept open until she could more conveniently appoint Tory dignitaries. To Mrs Freeman’s remonstrances, her “poor faithful Morley” replied, that though she had a high opinion of the equity and judgment of Lord Cowper, “the Crown could never have too many livings at its own disposal,” and she adds, “though there may be some trouble in it, it is a power I can never think it reasonable to part with, and I hope those who come after me will think the same.” Accordingly, following Harley’s congenial exhortations to “go alone,” her Majesty filled the bench with High-Church Bishops, as fast as, in defiance of her Ministers, she durst. Here is a portrait of the new favourite Masham, and of the situation of the Queen: Mrs Masham’s Christian name was Abigail—from which, probably, is derived the name of the class of artful, intriguing waiting maids, as Judas stands for all traitors.

“Artful and plausible, yet daring and insolent, according to circumstances, shameless in her ingratitude, the mean and despicable tool of others, with few advantages of education, that abject but able woman acquired an ascendancy over the mind of Anne that was truly astonishing. The poor Queen is to be pitied—we dare not say despised—for her subserviency, her little artifices, her manoeuvres in closets and the back stairs, her degrading connivance at duplicity, her thirst for flattery, or what she termed friendship.”

Queen Anne, under the exterior of great mildness, was remarkable for what our authoress calls “tenacity of impressions;” in other words, for dogged obstinacy. She was so long a suffering heiress-expectant, the victim of jealous dislike to those whom she was to succeed, that in her the self-willedness and headstrong temper of princes had assumed a peculiar form. She was one of those women whom the poet describes—

“No ass so meek, no ass so obstinate.”

When Marlborough and Godolphin threatened to resign, if the conduct of Harley in the affair of Gregg, a clerk in Harley's office, who was detected in treasonable correspondence with the Pretender, was not investigated, the Queen, who might have good grounds for knowing that Harley personally was entirely innocent, discovered great reluctance to act in the matter. The rival statesmen in the Cabinet, "when irritated by her determined though meek opposition, told her plainly, it was impossible for them to do her Majesty any service whilst Mr Harley remained in the Council. She was still firm; and to the expressed resolution of Godolphin to leave her, seemed insensible. But when Marlborough proffered his resignation, her royal heart was touched, and she studied by long arguments and compliments to change his determination; but both her Treasurer and her General quitted her presence in disgust. Anne repaired on the same day to the Council, where Harley opened some matters relating to foreign affairs. The whole Board seemed to be infected with sullenness; and upon the Duke of Somerset remarking, that it was impossible to transact any business while the General and the Treasurer were away, a deeper gloom over-spread the faces of those who were present. The Queen then perceived she must yield—a conviction which she received with feminine wrath and perverseness." Surely the Queen alone ought to bear some of the censure which is here bestowed upon the sex. The Queen might yield, but she never forgave being compelled to yield, and to part with Harley. By his temporary defeat, his power was in fact confirmed. Though nominally dismissed, the Queen was as much or more than ever under his influence, until he was again restored. When disgust at the influence of Abigail, or of the back-stairs, was at the height, several Privy Counsellors resolved to address Parliament for the dismissal of the favourite from the Queen's confidence, for reasons of expedience; and, among others, Halifax and Wharton insisted, that, with all duty to the Queen, "Evil counsellors of one sex might be as well dismissed from the Royal councils as those of another, by the advice of Parliament." In concluding her narrative of the last interviews which she had with Queen Anne, the Duchess magnanimously remarks—"The Queen always meant well, however much she may be blinded or misguided." The poor weak Queen, whom feebleness of mind, and the love of sway conjoined, had rendered deceitful, was hurried to her grave by these internal dissensions among her servants. "Never," wrote Dr Arbuthnot to Swift, "was sleep more welcome to a weary traveller, than death to the Queen." It was true, she had got rid of her Dictatress and the Whigs, but the squabbles of Harley and Lady Masham, and of Harley and Bolingbroke, were the torture of her dying hours. At the close of their feverish day, one does not know whether most to pity the Duchess or the Queen, who was, however, happy enough to find peace in the grave many years before her discarded favourite.

The Collected Works of the Rev. Sydney Smith.
3 vols. 8vo.

This reverend and witty gentleman, who appears to have been the real progenitor of the Edinburgh Review—now, we think, rising some thirty-seven years of age—has, during many of these years, contributed some of the best articles to its pages. These, he says, he "has been foolish enough to collect and publish," with some other tracts written by him; and we imagine many persons will be wise and tasteful enough to add them to their libraries. These three volumes probably include his entire writings. They consist of the famous "Plymley Letters," which he "denied till denial was found to be in vain," and so owns them; his pamphlet on the Ballot; his letters to Archdeacon Singleton; a sermon on the duties of the Queen, and a few other sermons; and some occasional pieces of amicable controversy of recent date. Whether the publication will tend to increase, among the rising generation, the general but somewhat vague opinion which has arisen of the unrivalled brilliancy of Mr Smith's wit, the pith of his logic, and the polished keenness of his satire, tickling where it wounds, is somewhat doubtful.

The reverend reviewer has not contributed anything to the journal he projected for the last dozen years. His papers range from the first number, published in 1802 to 1827, when, always a strenuous advocate for Catholic Emancipation, he contributed his last able pleading for that measure. The collection of papers shews that Mr Smith has both obtained credit and incurred censure for articles which he never wrote. A lively, characteristic, and very brief preface, is by no means the least piquant portion of the three volumes.

About the beginning of the century, Mr Sydney Smith, then in orders, was taking care of a pupil attending the Edinburgh University. Their plan had been to go to Welmar, then an attractive place for young Englishmen; but the Jacobins and Napoleon prevented this residence; and Mr Sydney Smith and his pupil came to Edinburgh, and remained for five years. Among his first acquaintances in the north were several choice spirits, then, with the exception of Mr Jeffrey, all very young men.

They were the future Lord Brougham, Lord Jeffrey, and Lord Murray—all of them more or less tainted with Liberalism, but not to the dangerous or imprudent length that was likely for ever to shut the door of preferment in their faces: "A little too liberal for the dynasty of Dundas," is the properly qualified phrase of Mr Smith. According to Mr Lockhart's version of the story, the Quarterly Review originated mainly in a small fit of personal spleen, indulged by Scott. The Edinburgh had a happier birth. "One day," Mr Smith says, "we happened to meet in the eighth or ninth story or flat in Buccleugh Place, the elevated residence of the then Mr Jeffrey. I proposed that we should set up a Review. This was acceded to with acclamation." Mr Sydney Smith was appointed editor, but he edited only the first number. "The motto, I proposed," he continues, "for the Review, was—

'Tenet musam meditatur avena.'
'We cultivate literature upon a little oatmeal.'

But this was too near the truth to be admitted; and so we took our present grave motto from Publius Syrus, of whom none of us, I am sure, ever read a single line; and so began what has since turned out to be a very able and important Journal. When I left Edinburgh, it fell into the stronger hands of Lord Jeffrey and Lord Brougham, and reached the highest point of popularity and success." The political and social evils which this journal has helped to mitigate or eradicate, are enumerated. Among them are the oppression of the Catholics of Ireland, Slavery, the Game Laws, and the Corporation and Test Acts. Mr Smith sees little in his own reviews to alter or repent of; and we suppose that he has altered very little, if anything. He lets us know that times have changed, and much for the better, since he began to suffer for his public labours as a Reformer; and, by implication, that judges, prebendaries, deans, and bishops, can no longer be made over the heads of able and honest men, as the penalty of their political opinions or Liberal feelings towards their Catholic or Protestant dissenting brethren. Without being sure that there is much more than a change of names in the improvement he describes in high places, or that the Radicals, Chartists, Educators, and Anti-Corn-Law men are not to the Whigs exactly what the Jacobins, Levellers, Atheists, Deists, Incendiaries, and Regicides, were to the Tories in the early part of the century, we can, nevertheless, fully agree that, even yet, "it is always considered a piece of impertinence, in England, if a man of less than two or three thousand a-year has any opinions at all upon important subjects." We must also admire Mr Smith's patriotic grounds of consolation, for no mitre having been found to fit his head during the last seven years' rain of those toys. He has achieved a higher dignity. He set on foot, and long contributed to, the Edinburgh Review. His only misfortune, if it be one, was to have been a Whig, when Whiggery did not pay; yet some of his contemporaries have not found the calling so very unprofitable. "Strange and ludicrous," he moralizes, "are the changes in human affairs. The Tories are now on the treadmill, and the well-paid Whigs are riding in chariots, with many faces, however, looking out of the windows (including that of our Prime Minister) which I never remember to have seen in the days of the poverty and depression of Whiggism: Liberalism is now a lucrative business. Whoever has any institution to destroy, may consider himself as a commissioner, and his fortune as made; and, to my utter and never-ending astonishment, I, an old Edinburgh Reviewer, find myself fighting, in the year 1839, against the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, for the existence of the National Church." There is a little pleasant exaggeration in this, no doubt, but the change is curious. We must leave to the reader to discover every specific paper coming from Mr Smith's pen: but, in general, his are all the articles on the Methodists, who seem to have been delivered up into his hands; those on missions; and such subjects for dissection, as the Quacks, the Bishops, Mrs Trimmer, and Hannah More. There are several excellent and humane-spirited papers upon the monstrous game-laws, upon emigration, and even about the poor chimney sweeps, and the Christian institution of man-traps and spring-guns—an enormity now extinct, or, at all events, illegal. It may be more flattering to his witty Reverence as a writer, than encouraging to his publishers, to say, that his papers in The Review are certainly among those best remembered, and about which memory least requires refreshing. They are all about something important, and that something is ever treated in a pertinent, lively, and humorous style.

Shelley's Poems.

This edition is concluded by the issue of a fourth volume, containing the Witch of Atlas, Epipsychidion, Adonais, and all Shelley's Translations, with fragments and short pieces, in the order of their composition, so far as the editor is acquainted with it. This is her proud, if melancholy task fulfilled; not, as it appears, to her own satisfaction, but certainly as no one else could have accomplished it. Had the poems of Shelley not, upon a former occasion, obtained in this Magazine a critical notice—which, however unworthy of the subject, was made in a loving and reverential spirit—it might have been a duty to say more at the close of this edition; which is, beyond doubt, the most complete that the world can now hope to possess. Yet the additional poems are not numerous. A brief and very touching account of the circumstances attending Shelley's death, concludes the notes. Their writer declares that she began with energy, and a burning desire to impart to the world, in worthy language, the sense she has of the virtues and genius of the Beloved and the Lost; but strength failed under the task—her health was shaken, and days of great suffering followed the attempts to write. Nor is this surprising. The narrative becomes too painful even for the indifferent reader. The last months of Shelley's life were spent in a wild, solitary residence in the Bay of Spezia, where he found opportunity of gratifying his passionate fondness for boating. His friend, Williams, who shared his fate, was with him there, and they resolved to build a boat, such as they could manage themselves, and thus to enjoy, at every hour, the pleasure they loved best. We must borrow Mrs Shelley's melancholy and pathetic narrative.

Captain Roberts, R. N., undertook to build the boat at Genoa, where he was also occupied in building the Bolivar for Lord Byron. Ours was to be an open boat, on a model taken from one of the royal dock-yards. I have since heard that there was a defect in this model, and it was never sea-worthy. In the month of February, Shelley and his friend went to Spezia to seek for houses for us. Not one was to be found at all suitable; however, a trifle, such as not finding a house, could not stop Shelley; the one found was to serve for all. It was unfurnished; we sent our furniture by sea, and with a great deal of precipitation, arising from his impatience, made our removal. We left Pisa on the 26th of April. The Bay of Spezia is of considerable extent, and divided by a rocky promontory into a larger and smaller one. The town of Lerici is situated on the eastern point; and in the depth of the smaller bay, which bears the name of this town, is the village of Sant' Arenzo. Our house, Casa Magni, was close to this village; the sea came up to the door; a steep hill sheltered it behind. The proprietor of the estate on which it was situated was insane; he had begun to erect a large house at the summit of the hill behind, but his madness prevented its being finished, and it was falling into ruin. He had—and this, to the Italians, had seemed a glaring symptom of very decided madness—rooted up the olives on the hill-side, and planted forest trees; these were mostly young, but the plantation was more in English taste than I ever elsewhere saw in Italy; some fine walnut and ilex trees intermingled their dark massy foliage, and formed groups which still haunt my memory, as then they satiated the eye with a sense of loveliness. The scene was indeed of unimaginable beauty; the blue extent of waters, the almost land-locked bay, the near castle of Lerici, shutting it in to the east, and distant Port Venere to the west; the varied forms of the precipitous rocks that bound in the beach, over which there was only a winding rugged footpath towards Lerici, and none on the other side: the tideless sea leaving no sands nor shingle—formed a picture, such as one sees in Salvatore Rosa's landscapes only; sometimes the sunshine vanished when the scirocco raged: the pomete, the wind was called on that shore. The gales and the squalls, that hailed our first arrival, surrounded the bay with foam; the howling wind swept round our exposed house, and the sea roared unintermittingly, so that we almost fancied ourselves on board ship. At other times, sunshine and calm invested sea and sky, and the rich tints of the Italian heaven bathed the scene with bright and ever-varying tints. The natives were wilder than the place. Our near neighbours of Sant' Arenzo were more like savages than any people I ever before saw. Many a night they passed on the beach, singing, or rather howling; the women dancing about among the waves that broke at their feet, the men leaning against the rocks, and joining in their loud wild chorus. We could get no provisions nearer than Sarzana, at a distance of three miles and a-half off, with the torrent of the Magra between; and, even there, the supply was very deficient. Had we been wrecked on an island of the South Seas, we could scarcely have fared selves further from civilization and comfort; but where the sun shines the latter becomes an unnecessary luxury, and we had enough society among ourselves. Yet I confess housekeeping became rather a toilsome task, especially as I was suffering in my health, and could not exert myself actively.

The fatal boat arrived about the middle of May, and the whole party often passed their evenings on the water; Shelley and Williams now made long excursions, and engaged one of the English seamen who had brought round the boat from Genoa, to attend them. Much of Shelley's last poem, the unfinished "Triumph of Life," was written as he sailed or weltered on that sea which was soon to engulf him. Leigh Hunt arrived at Leghorn about the middle of June, on his unlucky visit to Byron, and Shelley was eager to see him. It was therefore agreed that Shelley and Williams should go to Leghorn in their boat. "Strange," says the mournful narrator of the fatal catastrophe, "that no fear of danger crossed our minds. Living on the sea-shore, the ocean became a plaything. As a child may sport with a lighted stick, till a spark inflames a forest, and spreads destruction over all; so did we fearlessly and blindly tamper with danger, and make a game of the terrors of the ocean. . . . Once, some months before, Trelawny had raised a warning voice as to the difference of our calm bay and the open sea beyond; but Shelley and his friend, with their one sailor-boy, thought themselves a match for the storms of the Mediterranean, in a boat which they looked upon as equal to all it was put to do." Mrs Shelley continues:—

On the 1st of July they left us. If ever shadow of future ill darkened the present hour, such was over my mind when they went. I did not anticipate danger for them, but a vague expectation of evil shook me to agony, and I could scarcely bring myself to let them go. The day was calm and clear, and a fine breeze rising at twelve, they weighed for Leghorn; they made the run of about fifty miles in seven hours and a half: the Bolivar was in port, and the regulations of the health-office not permitting them to go on shore after sunset, they borrowed cushions from the larger vessel, and slept on board their boat. They spent a week at Pisa and Leghorn. The want of rain was severely felt in the country. The weather continued sultry and fine. I have heard that Shelley all this time was in brilliant spirits. Not long before, talking of presentiments, he had said the only one that he ever found infallible, was the certain advent of some evil fortune when he felt peculiarly joyous. Yet if ever fate whispered of coming disaster, such inaudible, but not unfelt, prognostics hovered around us. The beauty of the place seemed unearthly in its excess: the distance we were at from all signs of civilization, the sea at our feet, its murmurs or its roaring for ever in our ears—all these things led the mind to brood over strange thoughts, and, lifting it from every-day life, caused it to be familiar with the unreal. A sort of spell surrounded us; and each day, as the voyagers did not return, we grew restless and disquieted, and yet, strange to say, we were not fearful of the most apparent danger. The spell snapped; it was all over; an interval of agonizing doubt—of days passed in miserable journeys to gain tidings, of hopes that took firmer root, even as they were more senseless—were changed to the certainty of the death that eclipsed all happiness for the survivors for evermore. There was something in our fate peculiarly harrowing. The remains of those we lost were cast on shore; but by the quarantine laws of the coast, we were not permitted to have possession of them—the laws with respect to everything cast on land by the sea being, that such should be burnt, to prevent the possibility of any relic bringing plague into Italy; and no representation could alter the law. At length, through the kind and unwearied exertions of Mr Dawkins, our Charge d'Affaires at Florence, we gained permission to receive the ashes after the bodies were consumed. Nothing could equal the zeal of Trelawny in carrying our wishes into effect. He was indefatigable in his exertions, and full of forethought and sagacity in his arrangements. It was a fearful task: he stood before us at last, his hands scorched and blistered by the flames of the funeral pyre, and by touching the burnt relics as he placed them in the receptacles prepared for the purpose; and there, in compass of that small case, was gathered all that remained on earth of him whose genius and virtue were a crown of glory to the world—whose love had been the source of happiness, peace, and good—to be buried with him.

The last that was seen of Shelley and his companions, was by Captain Roberts, who, from the top of the light-house at Leghorn, watched the boat on her homeward track. They were off Via Reggio, and at some distance from the shore, when a sudden squall was driven over the sea. When the cloud passed away, every vessel was seen as before, save the little schooner. It had vanished! Captain Roberts could scarcely doubt the fatal truth, yet vague hopes were entertained for a time that they might have been driven to Elba or Corsica.—The poem in which Shelley was last engaged, ends with the emphatic and appropriate broken line—

"Then what is life?" I cried.

The Manor of Glenmore; or the Irish Peasant. By a Member of the Irish Bar.

Save for its deep tincture of sectarianism, or inordinate jealous hatred of the Orange faction, (which party is rather to be either pitied or despised, as its members may be ignorant or virulent,) we could give unqualified praise to this picture of Ireland and its people, and especially of its peasantry. As it is, it deserves great commendation. The author is a genuine Irishman, fitted, by his warm sympathies, as much as by his talents and knowledge, to depict the loves, the joys, the virtues, the follies, and the crimes of his countrymen. This story lies at the period of the great political and religious agitation preceding and accompanying Catholic Emancipation. It details with minuteness the efforts of the Association, the memorable victory in county Clare, and the alternate hopes and fears of the Catholic body and the Liberals of Ireland, until that mighty battle, for which Scotland and England contended, was fairly won. The title "Irish Peasant" is to be understood in a comprehensive sense. We find, in the Barony of Glenmore, every variety of the species:—the venerable and worthy peasant, John Glennon—the village patriarch, a staunch patriot and true Catholic—a Saturday night expounder, at the Wheat Sheaf, of the "Weekly Register"—a humble functionary, in the far extended parish ramifications of the Dublin Central Political Societies, and, above all, an enthusiastic admirer of "our own Daniel," and, in a lesser degree, of Sheil, Wyse, O'Gorman Mahon, and even "Protestant Steele" or "Jack Lawless;"—the guilty and reckless peasant, the man of strong affections and violent passions, whose milk is turned to gall by the oppression of an Orange agent, and to whom the tempter comes in the dark hour, in the shape of a kindred sufferer—though he is, in fact, an Orange spy, thirsting for the blood-money of his victims. And the jovial boon peasant is found here with the patient, thoughtful, and affectionate peasant, and the manly though tender young lover, which makes up the complement; and true Irishmen all: The Barrister has selected many striking every-day events in the life of the Irish people as the subject of his illustrative sketches: We have an ejection of Catholic tenantry, with its attendant miseries and dreadful consequences; the too frequent social meetings at the Sheaf of Wheat, while political and religious excitement were at the highest; and the dark midnight assemblies of the Rockites. The celebration of mass, the confirmation of children, the denunciations, from the altar, of unlawful and secret societies, and their instigators, find a prominent place. Dr Doyle is introduced at a visitation to Glenmore, and that eminent and excellent person is presented to us in glowing but true colours, though in a form somewhat long drawn out. This is indeed the main blemish of this racy, genuine, and characteristic national novel; the author sometimes, like his own social Willy Moore, or Slashing Paddy, unduly protracts the sitting or the speech. This is a national failing.

The adventures of the doomed man, Dunne—the maddened, tempted, and betrayed Rockite—and the village Ophelia attached to his evil destiny, supply some scenes of powerful tragic interest; while in sweet contrast are the happy and innocent loves of manly young Johnny Rourke, and his lovely, faithful, and amiable Kitty Kelly. The mixed characters of Willy Moore, the jovial Irish Squire Pigott, and mine host and hostess of the Wheat Sheaf, Slashing Paddy, and their fellows, are even more true to Irish nature, in its mingled yarn of faults and virtues, and its quick alternations of sunshine and shower, comic humour and wailing pathos. To those who would learn the actual condition, character, and feelings of the Irish peasantry, we warmly recommend this picture from the life.

The Forester. By Mary Louisa Boyle.

The "Forester" is in structure more of a pure romance than we are in the habit of meeting in these utilitarian days. The heroine, the lovely Mary Savile, is the orphan protégée of Mary of Modena, the consort of James II.; and the historical part of the tale opens with the scenes of that Prince's abdication. The loyalty of Lord Fleming, the lover of Mary, is unjustly suspected by James; and the lovers are involved in a long train of trials, disasters, and fatal misunderstandings, in consequence of the accidental death of Sir Philip Dudley, a rejected aspirant for the love of Mary, and of the dark intrigues and vengeful passions of his haughty sister, whose alliance had been declined by Lord Fleming. The "Forester" is a lowly hero, upon whom many of the incidents are made to hinge; and who, though devoted to the house of Fleming, and its gallant young representative, is secretly attached to the cause of the Prince of Orange. Poetical justice is done at last to all parties, and all ends happily, if not prosperously; for the beautiful Lady Fleming devotes herself to the fortunes of her beloved Queen and mistress, and goes with her husband into exile at the Court of St Germain. In the course of the narrative, Marlborough and King William come into play, besides inferior historical personages; but the beauty of the tale is the domestic scenes, the trials, and devoted, patient, and tender affection of the Queen, as a wife, a mother, and a mistress; and the sweetness and high-minded fidelity of her attached attendant, whether as a friend or a lover. The narrative has the merit of never lagging, as the scene, shifting from place to place, and from one kingdom to another, is always occupied, stirring, and life-like. The romance is interspersed with many effective descriptions of forest scenery, and of the peculiar landscape of soft and ever-verdant England.

Gammer Grethel's German Fairy Tales and Popular Stories.

Gammer Grethel is the Mother Bunch, or Mother Goose, or rather, if he will not be violently offended by comparison with an old woman, the Crofton Croker of Germany; more like him than the above-mentioned venerable and endeared ancient dames. Gammer Grethel lived but the other day in the vicinity of Hesse-Cassel, and related many of the stories here translated to M. Ludwig Grimm, who is the true German Crofton Croker. The stories are, no doubt, intended for children; but the lover of old national usages, and the inquirers after literary antiquities and the birth of popular fiction, will find much to interest them in the "Merry Twelve Evenings of Gammer Grethel." The book is very neatly got up; and we rejoice to see, for once, something original and imaginative administered to the little people of the nursery, whom the whole world seems in a combination to make prematurely knowing and wise. We wish we could here tell them, were it but the pretty and elegant tale of "Ashputtel," or the comical history of "The Waits of Bremen;" but we must leave them to explore for themselves; merely indicating a newly opened vein of imaginative nursery fiction, rich, and of a pure ore.

Fardarougha, the Miser; or the Convicts of Lisnamona. By William Carleton. One thick volume.

This story possesses all the beauties of the author's charming "Tales of the Irish Peasantry." It may indeed be regarded as a continuation of that natural and pathetic series; and we should have been disposed to enter more fully into its merits, had it not been already pretty well known in Ireland, from having appeared from time to time in The Dublin University Magazine. Were Mr Carleton an indigenous English writer, our impatient countrymen might probably wish him to study the art of condensation; and the wide distinction between dramatic scenes, and rather prolix level dialogues, which, however characteristic of Irish rustic manners, either occur too frequently, or are too long drawn out. The character of Bartle Flanagan, the cold-blooded revengeful villain, is placed beyond the range of the reader's sympathies, and that of the miser injured by exaggeration; yet the family group of the O'Briens—young Connor and his mother—and the inferior personages of the tale, are true and fine personations of Irish character; and the plot naturally evolves some striking scenes.

Miss Sedgwick's Means and Ends; or Self-Training.

This lady, the authoress of some fictions which, we believe, are much and deservedly admired in her own country, has, in a small treatise, in which a wise if homely philosophy teaches by example, made a valuable present to her young countrywomen, and one which may be of use to English maidens in humble and even in middle life. From the preface to the English edition, Miss Sedgwick appears to be in England, "the beautiful land of her ancestors." Her lessons, and plain judicious counsels, are strictly of the Franklinian class, but with a higher moral feeling. Her style is lively and simple, and her manner no more pedantic than is inevitable in an instructress. The plan of her little book may be gathered from the headings of her chapters—Health, Exercise, Care of the Skin, (not, however, meaning the art cosmetic,) Housewifery, Bad Cookery, Dress, Conversation, Loss of Nature, and such like. Miss Sedgwick is a thorough Democrat, and even a moderate assertor of the Rights of Women; though on every subject she appears a calm and right-minded daughter of the Pilgrim Fathers. We shall like to see her book on England and English Women; for such a work will, in all probability, be the result of her visit. Her strictures will, we are confident, be both judicious and candid; and we trust she will keep her own eyes open, and eschew all sorts of coteries—the literary coterie especially.

NEW WORKS ON BOTANY.

The Little English Flora; or a Botanical and Popular Description of all our Common Wild Flowers. By G. W. Francis. London: Simpkin & Marshall, Harvey & Darton, &c.

Here comes a work which realizes that beau-ideal of a popular pocket botanical system, which we have been longing for. To those to whom flowers give the most delight—children and young ladies—dry and learned treatises, with long rolls of heathen Greek and Latin names and difficult terms, are not much more intelligible or edifying than Latin prayers to English ears, which all good Protestants disclaim. How provoking to meet with the beautiful wildings which in childhood we had first seen and learned to love as the forget-me-not or yellow ladies' bed-straw, as the myosotis palustris, or the galium verum, things to us unknown; or what claim has the Ilex aquifolia upon our affections, compared with the simple green holly, with its glowing scarlet berries, which decorated our village church and our grandmother's parlour regularly at her Christmas feast? But, in ministering to pleasure, Mr Francis is so far from neglecting science, that he has rendered the systematic study of botany really more easy and attractive by popularizing it. Minute but accurate engravings are given of all the plants described, and, that with their English names, their class, order, and Linnæan appellation, and numerous anecdotes and copious and appropriate extracts from the poetesses of the flowers, and from what the poets have charmingly said about these darlings of Nature. An introduction contains useful hints for pursuing the study of botany, methods of gathering and preserving specimens, and a brief grammar, if we may so describe it, of the science of botany. Perhaps a "Botany made Easy" would be the fitter term. The Little Flora then proceeds systematically, beginning with the first class of Linneus. From this section we shall take a short extract, which will explain the plan adopted.

GERMANDER SPEEDWELL, Veronica chamædrys. Plate I. Fig. 4.

Leaves opposite, sessile, cordate, serrated; flowers in lateral spikes.*

"This very beautiful plant is a general favourite, and is found in the spring at the bottom of every hedge-row. Its large corollas are of the most vivid blue, with a pure white centre, but so short-lived that we can scarcely carry home or dry the plant, without losing them all. They close up also at night or before rain comes on, and open again when the shower is past. The leaves are hairy, strongly veined, and without stalks. The stem has two rows of hairs along it, at opposite sides, but the flower stems are hairy all round—capsule shorter than the calyx. Some take this for the "Forget-me-not," a different plant, but not more beautiful than the present.

Not for thy azure tint, though bright,
Nor form so elegantly light,
I single thee, thou lovely flower,
From others of the sylvan bower:
Thy name alone is like a spell,
And whispers love in "Speed-thee-well."

And now we heartily recommend this little work, as a companion, in their rural walks and wild wood or seabeach rambles, to the class to whom it is especially dedicated—"the young ladies of England;" and to all who love the "simple, the elegant, and the sweet little flowers of our native land."

The British Phænogamous Plants and Ferns, arranged on the Linnæan System, and analysed after the Method of Lamarck, &c., &c. By John Rolfs, M.R.C.S.

This treatise is purely scientific, and intended partly to supply deficiencies of former works, and also to simplify the science by applying the method of Lamarck to the British Flora, or, as we take it, to combine the Linnæan systems with Lamarck's analysis. The merits of the analyses we must leave to proficient in the science, but we can bear testimony to the labour and pains bestowed upon this work.

Travels in Southern Asia, and a full Account of the Burman Empire. By the Rev. Howard Malcom.

The author of this very interesting book was sent from Boston, United States, on a missionary tour, by one of the great American Societies for propagating the Gospel and spreading education in India. The work bears a close resemblance, in plan and material, to Medhurst's or Gutzlaff's books on China, with something, in relation to the Burman Empire, of the minuteness, if not the amplitude of detail, of Lane's invaluable account of the manners and customs of the Egyptians. Whether it is a reprint, or appears first in England though an American book, we cannot tell; but if the former, the London publisher's choice is felicitous.

We have adopted this sort of general description of the work by comparison with others, as we wish to convey a clear idea of its contents and mode of execution, which our limits at present preclude in a more detailed form. The text is illustrated by numerous wood-engravings of costumes, antique remains, and objects of domestic life. To many readers, the most interesting part of the work will be the account of the Mission Schools.

Yarrell on the Growth of the Salmon in Fresh Water, Illustrated by Coloured Plates.

A learned controversy has long been maintained about the origin, growth, and habits of the salmon. The matter is set to rest, so far, by the experiments detailed in a few pages of letter-press, prefixed to a set of beautifully coloured engravings of the salmon in its different stages, and of the proportionate size. The result of the experiments, as conducted by Mr Shaw, in the Nith, would appear to be, that the growth of the young of the salmon is not nearly so rapid as has generally been imagined; that the young salmon assumes, at a certain age, the markings and colour of the parr; and that the parr, as a distinct species, does not exist. Mr Yarrell is, however, sceptical on this head; and he reasonably thinks that the fry may have been retarded in growth, from being circumscribed in space and food in the small ponds drawn from the Nith, in which Mr Shaw's experiments were made. He is more inclined to give credence to the fact that the young fish do not go down to the sea till they are more than twelve months old at least, but that the voyage is undertaken some time in their second year. In the first year the young salmon is named a pink, in the second, and until it goes to the sea, a smolt, when it goes to the sea it becomes a grilse or peal, and then an adult salmon. A grilse of seven pounds, at whatever age, has, as we apprehend, attained the honours of majority. These experiments will be especially interesting to gentlemen having ponds or lakes near salmon rivers, from whence their fish preserves can be supplied with pinks, which are ascertained to have grown and thriven in this state of transference. The experiment was made in a small lake called Lillymere, near Kendal, by the proprietor, Thomas Upton, Esq. of Ingemire Hall. Sixteen months after some small pinks, from the Lune, a salmon stream, and weighing about two or three ounces, had been put into this lakelet, two were caught, by fishing with the red Palmer fly, measuring about fourteen inches in length, and weighing fourteen ounces each. The flavour of this fish was good, but the colour not so red as those of the parent river. Eleven months afterwards, another was caught, equal to the first in colour and condition, but only three ounces heavier, and three inches longer; so that the growth had not been so rapid as in the first period. It is, however, difficult to convey a true idea of the experiments without the coloured illustrative engravings. As a mere work of art, these few elegant sheets of drawing paper are interesting.

* There is an explanation of all these terms prefixed.

Supplement to Yarrell's History of British Fishes, Illustrated with Wood-cuts.

In this supplement Mr Yarrell has condensed the facts and information received subsequently to the appearance of his elaborate work. The supplement is divided into two parts, one being applicable to each of the volumes of the history.

Hofland's British Angler's Manual, with some account of the Principal Rivers, Lakes, and Trout Streams in the United Kingdom, &c., &c.

The author of this new manual is Mr Hofland the artist; who, in his rambles of thirty years, as a landscape painter, through the finest scenery of the United Kingdom, has been doubly armed, or had two strings to his bow—namely, the fly-rod as well as his professional apparatus. He is thus enabled to be a Guide to the amateur painter, as well as to the angler. The volume is profusely and delicately embellished with views of angling stations, recommended by their landscape beauty; and fishes, tackle, flies, and all picturesque angling appurtenances, form tail-pieces and vignettes. The Manual commences with salmon-fishing; trout-fishing, throughout the three kingdoms, follows; and next the inferior grades of fishes in the order of their rank. Besides describing their haunts and habits, and the various modes of fishing the several kinds in different places, Mr Hofland has wisely imitated the Father of Anglers, Walton, and taught us how to cook our fish when he is caught. He has drawn freely upon all approved writers on the "gentle craft;" those especially who, like Jesse and Sir Humphrey Davy, mingle poetry and scenic description with the art. The latter half of the volume is more particularly devoted to descriptions, and the business of a guide; supplying all sorts of useful information to rambling anglers. With the stations around the metropolis, including a wide circuit, the author appears intimately acquainted. From thence he passes to the lake country, which affords ample scope. With this particular region of scenic beauty, the author has had nearly a thirty years' personal acquaintance, and he has not neglected other sources of information. The fishing haunts of Yorkshire and Derbyshire, with their beautiful scenery, fall next to be described; the midland and south-eastern counties are more briefly dispatched; and a recent fishing excursion to the Argyshire lochs, and another to Ireland, finish a pleasing and diversified volume; which, however, is chiefly interesting to the mere angler. And so it ought to be. Is not it their Manual? and "Hofland's Fancy" is, moreover, one of the most successful of dressed decoys. Black's Economical Guide through Edinburgh, with a Plan of the City, and a Description of the Environs, and various Embellishments.

This Guide-Book is, we presume, called the Economical Guide; because, while fulfilling all the purposes of such a compilation, it is low-priced. It is intended for the use of tourists and visitors to the city, and to the neighbouring sights; and embraces all those objects of antiquity, tradition, art, and literature, which constitute the merit of such compilations. It is, moreover, a joint-stock concern; and the division of literary labour has produced a more finished work. The description of the city is arranged in Four Walks—some of them rather lengthy—in summer weather; but, then, the tourist is informed at what rates hackney-coaches or cabs may be procured, and the Walks are arranged with a view to economy both of time and toil. Were tourists of our mind, they would like to see a little more of the Cowgate, the Canongate, and the wynds and closes. This might form a Fifth Walk, for which, however, no Guide is required.

The Spaniard, a Tragedy; and The Country Widow, a Comedy. By Simon Gray, Esq.

From an account of himself, prefixed to the Plays, we learn that the studies of the author must have appeared to his friends to lie in a direction widely different from the drama. He has been ostensibly known as a writer on political economy, though neither of the school of Adam Smith, Malthus, nor Ricardo. Who could have suspected that all the while, even until he was well-stricken in years, the Economist had been secretly coquetting with the drama? He is, in fact, deeply in for it, being the veritable author of fifty-four M.S. plays! The "Spaniard" was written fifty-two years since, and most favourably reviewed or judged in M.S. by Dr Blair, about the same period: in short, Mr Gray has kept his drama in his desk for more than five times the length of years prescribed by Horace, and produced it at last. He is a brave old gentleman. Some readers, he imagines, may think there is oldness in it, because it really is of mature age; but he thinks, and justly, that what pleased the critics of 1788 ought to please those of 1839; and the Professor of Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres—the very Blair of the Sermons—wrote three long letters of flattering commentary to the anonymous author of "The Spaniard," who was then a young clerk, it would seem, in a country attorney's office. The Doctor advised him to lay it aside, not for nine, but for three or four years; and it sees the light after a full half century. This, of itself, is enough to excite curiosity. As we have the modesty to believe Dr Blair a much better judge of the merits of "The Spaniard" than we pretend to be, we shall leave our readers to gather his opinion from his epistles. In "The Young Country Widow," written exactly fifty years ago under the original title of "Wap at the Widow, my Ladie," there is a considerable spice of comic humour, though we fear it is scarcely to the taste of these modern prudish times.

The Landgrave, a Play; and Dramatic Illustrations of the Female Character. By Eleanora Louisa Montague.

The plot of The Landgrave is mainly taken from Mr De Quincey's Klosterheim—a splendid fiction, which possesses many highly dramatic capabilities. The authoress has, however, both added characters and modified those created by the Opium-Eater. Her desire was to produce, not a dramatic poem, but an acting play; and, we suppose, we must leave it to the stage-managers, and their tasters and tigers, to decide how far she has succeeded, as we have an idea that a play expressly adapted for the stage appears at disadvantage, when it previously comes before the public in print. The illustrations of female character are taken from striking passages in the early history of France, with the exception of the last, "The Bride of the Alps," which is more purely poetical. Another little drama is founded on the persecution of the Albigenses. It is full of pathos and dramatic beauty.

Sketch of Native Education in India, under the Superintendence of the Church of Scotland. By James Bryce, D.D.

What the Church of Scotland has yet done for the education of the Hindoos, spiritual or secular, would scarcely afford materials for a pamphlet, much less a volume. Dr Bryce's work is, therefore, to be regarded more as a somewhat excursive dissertation upon the moral and religious condition of the tribes of Hindostan, and the prospect of their amelioration, than the detailed history of a mission hopefully commenced, though in the face of formidable obstacles. These have arisen, we apprehend, quite as much from sectarian jealousy, and thirst of domination among the Christians as from the prejudices of the heathen population of India. Among the chief promoters of the mission, if not the sole originator, was Dr Bryce himself, then the first clergyman of the Scottish Church in India, and a doughty champion for the rights and dignities of Presbytery, attempted to be trampled on by Prelacy. By the encouragement of Rammohun Roy, who, though he afterwards lapsed into Unitarianism, at that time attended the ministrations of the Scottish Church, Dr Bryce, in 1824, sent a petition and memorial to the General Assembly, which then first directed its attention to British India, as a field for missionary exertion. The subject was warmly taken up by Dr Inglis, whom Dr Bryce eulogizes as the father of the Scottish Indian missions, and by Dr Brunton, who receives equal praise. We cannot wholly forget, that it was about the same period, or shortly after it, that, week after week, the public of Edinburgh were kept alive by the somewhat bitter, yet far from unjust, animadversions of Mr William Chambers, upon the gross neglect of their parishes, by, among others of our city ruralizing clergy, the same two reverend persons who took so warm an interest in the cause of native education in India, while, it was alleged, they manifested so little pastoral anxiety about the unreclaimed or uninstructed heathendom of the Grassmarket and the Clooses of the High Street, which formed their respective parishes of the Greyfriars and the Tron Kirk. But with this, whatever might be in it, Dr Bryce had no concern. He indulges sanguine hopes of the great good yet to be accomplished by the mission of the Presbyterian Church in India; and is full of confidence in its wise organization and scheme of operation. All that is wanting is funds, and for this he looks to the Government. Dr Bryce, who must have had excellent opportunities of knowing and judging, entertains a higher opinion of the natives of India, morally and intellectually, than is generally held at home. He points out the erroneous opinions of Mill, the historian of British India, on the point of the low intellectual maturity of the Hindoos; and he sturdily denies, in the face of Dugald Stewart, that the Sanscrit owes anything to the Greek language, which, on the contrary, is rather derived from it. He also maintains, that Alexander's conquest of India was no more than an irruption! "Every day," he says, "is demonstrating, more and more, that when we tread the soil of India we approach the birthplace of all that has ever embellished the Western World in science and philosophy; and when the storehouses of the Sanscrit are unlocked by Colebrooke and Wilson, and other distinguished scholars, we discover at once from whence the Greeks stole their fables and their mythology. We learn where the lessons of Pythagoras had been familiar centuries before that philosopher flourished; and where he who taught others, and became the founder of a sect, on which the vanity of his countrymen affixed his name, was himself a scholar, indebted for all he ever knew or gave to Greece. The flights of Plato into the regions of metaphysics, on which the classical world of the West have hitherto looked as unrivalled in boldness, are beginning to be regarded as tame, compared with the eagle soarings of those Hindoo sages, from whose more adventurous wings the Greeks borrowed the plumes which have sustained their comparatively pigmy flight." Such is the high intellectual lineage of the degenerate race, to which the Church of Scotland is sending forth instructors. Is there not a small tincture of enthusiasm in the Doctor's admiration of the ancient Hindoos?—It is probable, that, with not a few readers, the chapters devoted to Hindoo literature and mythology, poetry, fable, fiction, the drama, and the arts and sciences, formerly said to have been cultivated in India, will prove more attractive than those treating of the ostensible object of the sketch.

The Doctor's account of the character of the modern Hindoos, so differently represented by some authors, appears exceedingly reasonable. They are not all the mild, gentle, and most amiable beings, which a few enthusiastic persons have described them; and still farther are they from being the cunning, treacherous, cruel, false, and sensual race which others have depicted. Dr Bryce, we are glad to find, regards the barrier of caste as a much less formidable obstacle in the way of the improvement of the natives than is customary among us at home. Though still powerful, it is fast giving way, the higher ranks setting the example; and from the increase of knowledge, and the power of Christian principle, the happiest results are anticipated. Dr Bryce treads on delicate ground, when he comes to demand from the treasury of the Indian government a grant for the General Assembly's School; at least if he would, which we take for granted, place that Institution on a different footing from other Christian Institutions of older date, and probably of equal utility. He states, that he has been met in the highest quarters with the objection, that it is unjust to tax the Hindoo with the support of an establishment, avowedly set up for the overthrow of his faith. There is casuistry or hair-splitting in the Reverend Doctor's answer to this objection, when he asserts, that "The institution of the General Assembly is not erected to overthrow the religion of the natives, but to purify it from the degrading tenets and demoralizing ceremonies that have crept into it." Then no missionary effort ever yet was made to overthrow any Pagan religion, for there is some semblance of Christian doctrine and morality mingling in the grossest superstition that ever was devised. Though there was at first discord and rivalry between them, the "titled Bishop of Episcopacy, and the more modest Priest of Presbytery, may now march together" to their sacred object; but Dr Bryce is by no means so sure that the Roman Catholics are fit to be intrusted with any part in the Christian education of the Hindoos. Indeed, he is certain of the very reverse. The East is a field in which the Roman Catholic Religion, from its rites and shews, may make great way; and he cannot admire the spurious liberality of the present day, which, in giving Presbytery "The solid footing of an establishment" in India, did not, at the same time, withhold from the Roman Catholic "The ministrations of his own religion at the expense of the State." Dr Bryce's feelings against Catholics seem as lively as on the day he left his native presbytery in Scotland, if they have not waxed hotter. The Government is cautioned to keep in mind that, to sanction the Church of Rome in any way "in taking part in the work of evangelizing India," is infallibly to defeat the great object in view. "The Protestant Churches of England and Scotland"—for we hear nothing of the Baptist, American, or any other Indian mission—"will act in unison in spreading Gospel light; but the genius and policy of the Church of Rome forbids any co-operation on her part." He is doubtful if good fruits are to be expected from even the partial amalgamation of the English Bishop and the Minister of the Church of Scotland at Calcutta with the Vicar Apostolic in the management of a public charity—the Martiniere. This is surely going far enough. Dr Bryce would apparently rather have the Hindoos remain worshippers of Brahma than believers in the creed of the Church of Rome. Any idolatry is better than Popish idolatry; and, in his opinion, there is, under the guise of "spurious liberality," far too much trinketing with Popery among the Protestant clergy in some of the Indian presidencies. The Doctor is tenacious of the most intimate alliance between Church and State; provided always, that the Church, in such holy union, be the Church of England, or the Kirk of Scotland only; and he repudiates the insidious attempts making to separate the religion from the politics of a people, under the pretext that religion is injured by the connexion. With these opinions, he would have what he terms the National Religion propagated in India at the expense of the State, and the instruction of our Indian subjects in the national religion considered one of the first duties of the Government; but as it is impossible to maintain and propagate a national religion without an adequate endowment, to grant this is another and greater duty. Dr Bryce speaks with greater moderation than might be inferred from these opinions, on the impolicy of outraging the feelings or religious prejudices of the Hindoos, by violently attacking their temples, or forcibly putting down their idolatrous worship. As a specimen of the work, we shall select a passage shewing the happy effects of the union between Church and State, or between religion and civil government, as shewn in India:—

"In no part of the world is the principle of a religious and educational establishment by the State more generally recognised and acted upon than in India. The natives do not, indeed, appear able to conceive the existence of a political which does not involve an ecclesiastical condition; and from the earliest ages of their history this union seems to have existed. It may, indeed, be granted that, in purer days, the Church did not lord it over the State in the despotic and degrading manner which more ignorant and corrupt days have witnessed. This process of national humiliation has been the necessary fruit of superstition among the Hindoos, as among the Christians of the Western World themselves, when it was once permitted to mix its poisonous waters with the pure stream of the Gospel; and until the unnatural preponderance of the Church is counteracted by a better policy, and more enlightened education, it is vain to look for either the political, moral, or religious amelioration of the country. The wealth of the Hindoo temples is the measure of the people's poverty, ignorance, and degradation; and, in this point of view, their riches is a subject of deep regret equally to the statesman and the Christian philanthropist. But it were a dangerous error to argue from this abuse against the feeling and principle that lead a nation to support a public and authorized priesthood for the ministrations of the altars; and it is clearly the duty of a Christian Government of India to cherish and encourage these feelings, instead of discouraging them by the neglect of a duty, as regards its own faith, which even the heathen see and acknowledge to be of imperative obligation. When, therefore, the time happily arrives which is to see the priesthood drawn from the ranks of Christianity, the way will, long ago, have been paved for the revolution. The sacred text of Menu inculcates the duty of the King to endow the temple and provide for the priest. The endowments of the religion of Vishnu and Sewa are on a gigantic scale; yet not grater, perhaps, than a period in the history of Christianity itself can parallel. It is calculated that in Rageshan, where Hindooism exists in its purest form, nearly one-fifth of the rents of the land belong to the Brahmins and temples. The deeds of endowment do not bestow the lands themselves upon the priests—for the principle is universally respected, that these belong to the cultivators—but they direct the rents and fees due to the fisc or state to be paid to the Brahmins. In former days, as already hinted, these endowments were upon a much smaller scale than the present; and needy and courageous Rajahs sometimes ventured to resume the grants to the Church, notwithstanding the fearful denunciation of 60,000 years in hell."

Dr Bryce's illustration of the advantages of an union between Church and State, and the ease of procuring endowments in India, does not strike us as happy; nor is there any proof that whatever "the sacred text of Menu," or the priest-made oracles enjoin, the people admire the principle which takes their property from them, on the pain of damnation, to support the temples, and the priests who minister in them.

The Life of Margaret Beaufort, Mother of Henry VII. By Caroline A. Halsted.

This memoir of the famous Countess of Derby obtained the honorary premium awarded by the Directors of the Gresham Commemoration. At the age of nine, Margaret Beaufort, the rich heiress of the great Somerset, was sought in marriage by the Duke of Suffolk for his son and heir, John de Pole; and by King Henry VI. for his half-brother, Edmund Tudor, Earl of Richmond. The "parlous girl," in this strait, being doubtful in her mind, sought counsel of "an old gentlewoman, whom she much loved and trusted"—probably her nurse, and the old gentlewoman advised her to commend herself to St Nicolas, the patron and helper of all true maidens, "and beseech him to put in her mind what she were best to do." The circumstance was communicated by the Countess herself, late in life, to her spiritual director, and appears in her funeral sermon. She followed the counsel given, prayed often to the patron of distressed damsels, and especially the night before her final answer was to be given. In brief, the King's wooing prevailed. "A marvellous thing," said her confessor, "which I have heard her tell many a time as she lay in prayer, calling upon St Nicolas, whether sleeping or waking she could not assure; but, about four o'clock of the morning, she appeared to her, arrayed like a bishop, and, naming unto her Edmund, bade her take him for her husband." She told her mother of the vision, or supernatural direction, and was forthwith solemnly betrothed. She was married when she had attained the age of fifteen, and at sixteen was first a widow. She afterwards became the wife of Sir Henry Stafford, with whom she lived for above twenty years; when, "on the expiration of her mourning," she gave her hand to Thomas Lord Stanley, Lord of the Isle of Man, and steward of the King's household, whom she also survived. It would be superfluous to enter into a subject so familiar to the most ordinary reader of English history, as the life of the illustrious foundress of Christ College, Cambridge, and St John's College; to the which munificent deeds she was persuaded by her confessor, Fisher, afterwards made a bishop by her son, Henry VII. The Countess had always been remarkable for ascetic devotion; and after the death of the King, her son, she gave all her time to what she believed her religious duties; making pilgrimages to shrines and other holy places, distributing alms and food to the poor, and founding alms-houses. Though entitled a life, this volume would be more correctly denominated a eulogy on one of the most remarkable women of her age. It is inscribed to the Earl of Derby, who, we are told, with the ancient dignities and vast possessions of his illustrious house, has "inherited the eminent virtues, steadfast loyalty, and lofty patriotism of his ancestors; with a grace and kindness peculiarly his own." We had fancied this style of dedication obsolete.

Elements of Zoology. By William Rhind, Author of "The Elements of Geology," "Age of the Earth," "Scientific Excursions Round Edinburgh," &c., &c.

A concise though systematic treatise, on a science, the pursuit of which is rapidly spreading in this country. It will form an apt and accurate introduction to the young student, and is also calculated to be the text-book of a more extended system of Zoology.

The Rights of Necessity; and the Treatment of the Necessitous, by Various Nations.

This little work would be valuable for its diligent collection of facts and authorities, although it were not praiseworthy in its spirit and object. The author may not take the most enlightened view of the best means of remedying the bitter evils of poverty under which so large a portion of our fellow-creatures and fellow-subjects are suffering; but anything is better than cold callous indifference.

Channing's Lecture on War.

This discourse has been called forth by the late disorders on the British Canadian frontier, and the rash if not unlawful conduct of the State of Maine. It is every way worthy of the benevolent preacher, and will powerfully reinforce the arguments and efforts of the Peace Society of Great Britain. A more favourable season than the present, when Britain is "bound over to keep peace under penalties of eight hundred millions," besides the dread of spreading Liberalism, could not be found for the promulgation of the civilizing and heavenly doctrines of peace and good will.

The use of the Bible in Sunday Schools. By Edwin Chapman.

This little discourse is judicious, and written in a pious spirit; though the writer is somewhat overstrained in his alarm lest the Bible should not be treated with sufficient reverence, if freely used in schools as a reading-book. Is the Bible less venerated in Scotland than in other countries? or was it less venerated fifty years since than it is now? Yet then, it was not only a common school-book, but nearly the only school-book in the parish schools. The book of Proverbs formed the child's first book as soon as the alphabet was mastered; the New Testament followed, and then the whole Bible. We have no objection to selections—they may often be advisable, from considerations of economy and expediency, in teaching large numbers of the children of the poor—but we would once more protest against the necessity of such selections from the motives of a spurious delicacy, which are sometimes brought forward. The Bible never yet introduced an image of impurity into the mind of an innocent young child. If such has ever seemed the consequence of the indiscriminate use of the Scriptures by children, we may rest assured that previous corruption of the imagination was the true cause.

Lepage's French School, in Three Parts. Fourth Edition.

This instructor takes the method which must gain ground, if the knowledge of French, or any other continental language or languages, is to become universal. He commences with a copious selection of those phrases of daily and hourly occurrence, which a person must hear if living in France, or where French is the spoken language; and which must be heard in all ranks, and in all circumstances. The Second Part consists of exercises in writing in French phrases, upon ordinary topics. They are given in English, and explanatory notes connected with each section are appended. The Third Part, or last step to French, explains the principles of the grammar of the language in a series of easy lessons.

Cousin Elizabeth.

We can cordially commend this little story. It displays profound acquaintance with the characters and tempers of children, and with the temptations and faults which do most easily beset them. It is corrective and suggestive.

Agnes. By Mrs Loudon.

Here is a little story, written with a sensible and definite purpose—to teach the value of money—which is done by a little girl, after many schemes, laying out her half sovereign at last to a good and important end.

The Queen Bee. By M. A. Ward.

This rhyme is of the school of the "Peacock at Home," and its fellows. The shrubs, blossoms, and flowers, are summoned to the fête champêtre given by the Queen of the Hive. The jingle is easy and flowing, and will please the ears of children, and minister to their natural love for flowers.

SERIAL WORKS, TRACTS, AND SCHOOL-BOOKS.

The first volume of the "Pictorial Shakspeare" is concluded by King Henry V., making in all eight plays, illustrated by 161 engravings. This last play is enriched with many valuable emendatory notes.

Wordsworth's Greece, Historical and Descriptive.

We have not had an opportunity of seeing the late numbers of this classic series, but the fifth, which is before us, keeps the promise of the first; nor can we help thinking that the wood engravings, which are crowded into every page, are often superior to those on steel, both in character and effect. The name of the author is a guarantee for the text.

Thomas' Life of Napoleon.

A third Life of Napoleon is publishing in numbers, of which the chief feature is the illustrations. The designs are by Vernet; the text does little more than explain them, so numerous are they, and so meagre the Memoir.

Channing's Letter to Jonathan Philips, Esq.

An edition of this Letter has been published in London and Bristol. It was written in consequence of Mr Clay's attack in Congress on the Abolitionists, although Mr Channing does not altogether approve of their recent conduct. Thus, many a man approves of the principles of the Chartists, even as embodied in their published declaration, who cannot admire their practical wisdom, as evinced in their late demonstrations; or their violent hostility to those who did not refuse to march side by side with them to the grand object, but who declined to keep their step, and tread to their time. The question which Mr Channing argues so eloquently, scarcely requires discussion in Great Britain; but every one interested in the destinies of America, in the destinies of humanity, will be glad of an opportunity of seeing the far-sighted views of one of humanity's most distinguished champions.

The Heresy of a Human Priesthood. By R. M. Beverley.

A copy of another five thousand of this work, which we are surprised that no attempt is made by the clergy to put down, by the strong hand of law, lies on our table. It is flanked by several cheap editions, appearing in different quarters—of Milton's celebrated tract on removing hirelings out of the church; and so active are some publishers in disseminating Milton's pernicious doctrines, that these tracts are sold so low as fourpence and sixpence. Mr Beverley appears to think that though the Wesleyan Conference does not aspire to the place of the haughty spouse of the State, it is ambitious of the rank of that of a wife by the left-hand. This edition gives a good brief account of that new monstrosity, or rather "old friend with a new face," called Puseyism.

Davenport's Historical Class-Book.

Every reading or chapter of this compilation, details some prominent fact in European history. It commences with a general view of Europe at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and is continued to the accession of Victoria. The importance of the events detailed, and the chronological arrangement, gives the Historical Class-Book considerable value as an epitome of history for schools and juvenile students, and index to older persons.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

LOCAL LEGISLATURES.

THE Session of Parliament is now nearly at a close, and, as usual, the great proportion of the business which should have been carried through has been postponed. Of eight or ten Scottish bills which have been read a first or second time, not more than two—the Judges' Salary Bill and the Prison Bill—are likely to pass; for the plunder and coercion of the People always find ready advocates in both houses of Parliament. Legislation for Ireland, for the colonies, and for England itself, is equally in arrear. Nothing will be done towards putting down fictitious votes, or improving the registration of voters—nothing towards the improvement of the law, notwithstanding the numerous bills before Parliament for that object. The great and important question of Banking and Currency, brought forward by Mr Hume, was discussed in a House of 122 Members, and thrown out because the period of the session at which it was introduced was too late; and the penny postage runs a great risk of sharing a similar fate for the same reason. It is plain that Parliament, as at present constituted, is utterly incapable of transacting the business of the nation, and that a change in its constitution is imperiously required. It would be very remarkable, indeed, if the machinery of legislation did not require, from time to time, renewal, or, at least, repair, like all other machinery. At the time of the Union with Scotland, the population of England hardly exceeded five millions; now it is fifteen; the revenue was considerably under six millions; now it exceeds forty; bills for canals, harbours, railroads, or even turnpike roads, &c., were unknown, now applications are made for them in hundreds every session. In the meantime, two legislatures have been abolished: the whole business of Ireland, Scotland, and of innumerable colonies, has been thrown upon one Parliament, which, instead of having the affairs of five millions of people to manage, has that of twenty-six millions in the United Kingdom alone, and of tens of millions more scattered over the whole globe. Some remedy must ere long be attempted for the present lock-fast in legislation. Were we not afraid of shocking the monarchical prejudices of our readers, we would suggest that the example of the United States of North America should be followed—that six or eight legislatures should be formed in Great Britain and Ireland for the dispatch of local and private business, such as roads, canals, private estate bills—and that the Imperial Legislature should confine itself to such matters alone as affect the whole nation. At present the time of the members is engrossed with local and private business, the whole forenoon being generally devoted to it; and that business is conducted, in all cases, at an enormous expense, and in very many instances in the most slovenly and disgraceful manner. Having due fear of the House of Commons, we will not venture to repeat in print what we have often heard in private relative to the mode in which the attendance of Members is procured, and their influence obtained, in the case of local bills. We will only ask how it is possible that sums like £80,000, £100,000, or even £150,000 can be expended fairly and honourably in procuring a railway bill? By what means, we ask, is the opposition of landowners on the line of railway generally removed? We fear it is by paying them much more than their land is worth, lest they use their interest with honourable members to throw out the bill! Another alteration in the constitution of Parliament that is imperiously demanded, is the erection of a tribunal for the trial of controverted elections, not only in order that the time of members may be saved, but that there may be something like a chance of obtaining justice, without submitting to absolute robbery. In the late case of Carlow, the committee sat for sixty-nine days, and the expense exceeded £20,000. As matters at present stand, the electors' choice of representatives is materially curtailed; for many very eligible persons will not run the risk of being ruined by having a petition presented against their return. A permanent tribunal, unconnected with Parliament, ought to be appointed for the trial of controverted elections; and it ought to have power, as it judged expedient, either to proceed to the county or burgh, the election for which was disputed, and examine the witnesses on the spot—to issue a commission for their examination—or to summon the witnesses to appear before it in London. The same tribunal might have intrusted to it the Divorce and Naturalization Bills, and much other business, which, though in reality of a judicial nature, comes at present before Parliament.—We are convinced that, were a number of local legislatures to be established, the business before them would be transacted with an ease, economy, and dispatch, that we can form no idea of from looking at the proceedings of the present Parliament. In a local legislature, the tedious debates which now take place, and which in most instances are a sheer waste of time, would generally be avoided; for the speakers would be aware, that however well reported they might be, they would interest and be read only by a small number of persons. The attendance on such local legislatures would be hardly felt as a burden by the Members; for the place of meeting would generally be in the vicinity of the residence of the Members, and the sittings would not in general endure above a few months in the year. The utility of local courts of law has been long admitted by every one competent to form an opinion on the subject. Such courts abound in every country in Europe, except England and Ireland; and there can be no doubt that local legislatures would be found equally useful, if once fairly tried. In drawing the line of demarcation between the duties of the local legislatures and the Imperial Parliament, we do not imagine that any great difficulty would be experienced. No collision between the State Legislatures and Congress, as far as we know, has ever taken place in the United States of America. Another great evil of the present system is, that it draws an undue proportion of the wealth of the United Kingdom to the metropolis, and thereby impoverishes the provinces. There can be no doubt that Dublin and Edinburgh would be in a much more flourishing condition at present, had they been allowed to retain their native Parliaments. Notwithstanding the great number of our Scottish nobility, there has not been one nobleman, and very few extensive landed proprietors, permanently resident in Edinburgh for many years. That this is an injury to our city in many ways, nobody can deny. The mischief has been increased in a great degree, of late years, by the removal of various public boards from Edinburgh to London; whereby not only has our city lost the expenditure of the officials who are employed in the collection and management of our own revenue, but Scotsmen have been deprived of those appointments under Government, which they are justly entitled to expect. Of late years, the proportion of Englishmen in the Customs, Excise, Stamp, and Post Offices, has been steadily on the increase; and now not only many of the heads of departments, but of the subordinate officials, are Englishmen. There can be no doubt, that many of the recent changes which have been made in our courts of law, and otherwise, though beneficial for the kingdom generally, have been highly prejudicial to Edinburgh; and though it may be unfashionable to talk of such an antiquated matter, that they are in direct violation of the treaty of Union—the abolition of the Court of Admiralty, for example—and we therefore think, that, in the present depressed state of this city, we are entitled to such compensation as can fairly be given. It would undoubtedly be highly beneficial to Edinburgh, as well as to the whole of Scotland, to have a local legislature established in this city; and it would probably be necessary to have another in Glasgow, the one having jurisdiction over the eastern, and the other over the western part of the kingdom. But there is still a stronger reason than any we have mentioned for the establishment of Local Legislatures. For a great many years past, a scheme has been steadfastly followed by all our Administrations, Whig and Tory, to centralise the government of the whole kingdom in London. The Public Boards have been withdrawn, not only from Edinburgh but from Dublin; and, as opportunity has offered, the patronage of every office, however subordinate, has been taken from the former Patrons and vested in the Crown—that is, in the section of the aristocracy which is in possession of the seals of office for the time being. Not content with these measures, a powerful Police force has been organized in the metropolis—an army in blue—which can be kept up without the consent of Parliament, and which does not require an annual mutiny act for its maintenance; and this Central Force can be despatched, by means of the railways, in a few hours, to any part of England. Ministers do not conceal that they are desirous to extend this force throughout England, and to supersede the old and constitutional force for the preservation of the peace—the constabulary. Now, whatever may be the real object of this scheme of centralizing, not only the whole patronage, but, as much as possible, the armed force, and even the public expenditure of the kingdom, in London; there can be no doubt that it is a step towards the establishment of despotism in the country; and, in the meantime, it impoverishes the provinces, to augment the “wen,” as Cobbett called it, which is already too big. It is only by self-government, in popular assemblies, that the spirit of liberty can be maintained. All the best writers on the United States of America agree, that the great protectors of liberty in that country are the Local Legislatures of the different States, and the Councils and Assemblies which every town and even village possesses for the management of its affairs. On the other hand, when Buonaparte resolved to establish a despotism in France, he took care to have the whole affairs of the kingdom centralized in Paris. Thence every order issued to the Prefects of the Departments, in the same manner as orders are issued from a General of an Army to the Colonels of Regiments; and the result was, that a kingdom, in which a few years before nothing was heard of but liberty and equality, was reduced to a state of military despotism, which has hardly ever been equalled in Europe. If a people wish to retain their freedom, they ought, as much as possible, to manage their own affairs, and to delegate their powers as sparingly as possible.—To accomplish the establishment of these Local Legislatures, or rather tribunals—for, after all, they would not possess powers superior, or, indeed, equal, to those of the Court of Session or the higher Courts of Law in England—no repeal of the Union, nor any other step tending to create alarm among the most timid, need be resorted to. The extent of their jurisdiction, their duties and powers, might all be defined by act of Parliament; but, in order to give them their due authority, it is essential that the Members should be freely elected by the People. It is now some years since we first broached this project, and the more we reflect on it, and the more we observe of the proceedings of Parliament, the more we are convinced, not only of its necessity, but feasibility. It is impossible that we can go on much longer, having four-fifths of the business of the country postponed from one Session of Parliament to another, and the other fifth huddled over in the most slovenly manner. A great many of the statutes, which one finds in the Statute-Book at the end of a Session, are carried through Parliament after midnight, when a bare quorum of the House is present; and hence, it often happens that the most assiduous reader of the newspapers finds that laws have been enacted of which he never observed the least notice among the reported proceedings of the House. Notwithstanding the eagerness displayed to obtain a seat in the House of Commons, it is only on rare occasions that more than one-sixth of the Members are present at a debate; and, notwithstanding the apparent value attached to the possession of the right of voting, constituencies rarely call their representatives to account for their neglect of duty.—That the Parliament, as at present constituted, is unfit for its duties, might also be shewn, from the circumstance, that no measure, however beneficial for the People, has any chance of being carried without years of agitation, and the greatest exertions on their part. We need only instance the Penny Post.—To give our readers a notion of the interminable delay in the despatch of business in Parliament, we will take as an instance the Scotch Bankrupt Bill. The present Bankrupt Act was passed in 1814, and, being confessedly only an experimental measure, its endurance was limited to seven years; so that it expired in 1821. For the last eighteen years, an Act has annually been passed to continue for one year longer the Bankrupt Act; it having been always confidently anticipated that, in the course of the next ensuing Session, a new and more perfect Bankrupt Act would be passed. And so, accordingly, for the last twelve or fifteen years, has an abortive attempt been annually made to accomplish the object. A new Bankrupt Bill has been regularly introduced, read a first time, and ordered to be printed; then a day for the second reading has been named, and postponed, from day to day, and from week to week, till at length the Session has come to a close, (which it must always do, as far as any real business is concerned, when grouse shooting begins,) and the bill enters on a new and similar career in the ensuing Session:—

“Rusticus expectat dum defuit annis; at ille
Labitur, et labitur in omne volubilis ævum.”

Another example we may give is the Stamps Consolidation Bill. There are many hundred Stamp Acts in force, extending from the reign of William III. to the present day; and so confused and contradictory are the enactments, that the Scottish Courts, and even the Court of Session, do not attempt to interpret them, but always refer to the Stamp-Office for the solution of any question which may be raised. About sixteen years ago, a Bill, consolidating all the acts into one, was introduced into the House of Commons, and went through the preliminary stages. It was not, however, moved in annually, like the Bankrupt Bill, but was allowed to lie dormant for two or three years at a time. The last time any attempt was made to proceed with it, was, we believe, in 1835 or 1836; but it stuck, of course, at the second reading, and there it remains at this hour. If a bill of this sort, of the greatest importance to the collection of an important branch of the revenue, is managed in such a manner, we may easily conceive how others of less importance to the Ministry of the day are likely to fare. For the evils we have enumerated, the only remedy that has occurred to us—and we have a strong conviction it would be an effectual remedy—is the establishment of numerous local legislatures or tribunals, having the functions we have explained, in Great Britain and Ireland; leaving the Imperial Parliament to dedicate its whole time and energies exclusively to the general and public business of the United Kingdom and her colonies. We hope that our brethren of the periodical press, as well as the People generally, will direct some portion of their attention to this subject, and get up a system of agitation; without which, daily experience teaches us, no measure, however obviously safe and beneficial, and however imperiously required, can be obtained from Parliament as presently constituted.

PARLIAMENT.

Six weeks ago expectations were formed, that the Ballot would make great progress, from its being made an "open" question; and the advocates of the Ministry took much credit for what they called this concession to the Liberal party; but the result has been, that, instead of gaining, the Ballot has rather lost ground by the tactics which have been adopted. Last year the numbers were 200 for, and 317 against; this year they are 217 and 335; shewing an increase of eighteen opponents and only seventeen friends. Four Cabinet Ministers voted against the motion, two staid away, and only one, Mr Poulet Thomson, voted for it. We do not think that there is much probability of the Ballot being carried in Parliament as at present constituted; for even were it, by any chance, to get through the Commons, it is sure to be rejected by the Lords. Ministers, during the month, have had the narrowest majorities in the House; the third reading of the Jamaica Bill was carried only by ten; and the resolutions on the Education Scheme, first by five and then by two; so that it is evident the Ministry are at the mercy of the Tories, whenever the latter take courage to resume office. The gross job of giving two millions and a-half for Irish railways, has been abandoned, much to the disappointment of the Irish Members. It appears that, since 1800, the Irish have received upwards of eight and a-half millions of public money. We suspect that but a very small proportion of this sum has been expended for the general benefit of Ireland, however much it may have improved private estates. The Scottish Judges' Salary Bill was, of course, carried triumphantly through the Commons, and all Mr Wallace's amendments rejected; but most unexpectedly, Sir William Rae moved an amendment, reducing the retired allowance from the full salary to two-thirds, as it is at present. The Ministry opposed the amendment; but as they could not, with any decency, reject an economical proposal coming from a Tory, they did not divide the House against it, and it was carried. The object of Sir William Rae is no doubt to prevent any of the judges retiring at present, lest their places be filled up by Whig lawyers. When the Tories get into power, it will be easy to get an Act allowing the full salary as retired allowance, and then we shall have plenty of retirements and of Tory appointments. Only seventy Members thought it worth while to divide on the third reading of this bill. Mr T. Attwood's motion for a Select Committee to take into consideration the prayer of the "National Petition" for the Charter, was supported by forty-six Members—a greater number than could have been anticipated, and opposed by 235. The Tories have rather unexpectedly opposed the Penny Postage question: but they were defeated in the House of Commons by 213 to 113. Whether it will get through the Lords unscathed, is doubtful. It is, no doubt, a measure which the Tories would like to have the popularity of carrying themselves; and they do not like the prospective deficiency of revenue it may occasion. Whether Ministers are very sincere in the advocacy of the Penny Postage, may well be doubted; for the very unusual course of pledging the House of Commons to make good any deficiency; and even inserting this pledge in the preamble of the Bill, looks, at this period of the Session especially, exceedingly like furnishing the Lords with a handle for its destruction. Besides, it is not easy to understand how the House can bind itself by any such agreement with a Ministry. Is the pledge binding on a new House, or can another Ministry make it available? It seems time enough to ask the House to make up the deficiency, when that deficiency occurs. An opposition has risen up to the Penny Postage from a quarter that could not have been anticipated, viz. the stationers, who fear their business will be injured by the stamped envelopes being furnished by Government or by a single stationer, and by their being used for correspondence. The method of meeting this objection seems obvious, viz. to dispense with envelopes altogether, and to allow any person that chooses to send paper to be stamped, in the same way as paper for newspapers is stamped at present.—Although the Irish have, in the meanwhile, lost the grant for railways, they will succeed in getting £600,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Shannon. What has become of a grant for the Edinburgh Police, which Sir John Campbell, when last here, said he considered as reasonable as the grants for the Police of London and Dublin? Has he made any application for it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer? We suspect not. Let him be reminded of this matter when he comes here again.

EDUCATION SCHEME.—The vote of £70,000 to build additional stables for her Majesty has excited little attention; but that of £30,000 for educating the People has been a constant theme of discussion for some weeks, both by the periodical press and at public meetings. It is plain that the Established clergy, and their supporters, would rather not have the People educated at all, if they are not to be educated under their superintendence, and brought up free from all sorts of sectarian doctrines, however numerous and respectable may be the body by which these doctrines are entertained. It is now obvious that, until education be separated from state or sect religion, no general system can be adopted; and it would be quite unjustifiable to take money from the general revenue of the country—a great part of which is contributed by Catholics and Protestant Dissenters—to propagate the opinions of black prelatry. It appears very remarkable that Presbyterian clergymen and laymen should insist that no schools should be established, in England or Ireland, in which the doctrines of the Episcopalian Church are not to be taught; for nothing can be conceived more oppressive to their Presbyterian brethren resident in England and Ireland. It cannot fail to be observed, that all the zeal for religion has sprung up since the Tories were turned out of office. While their party enjoyed the loaves and fishes they notoriously gave themselves little trouble about the religious instruction of the People, nor whether such instruction was given by Episcopalians or Dissenters; nay, they allowed, without animadversion, thousands to be annually voted for the propagation, at Maynooth, of the doctrines of the Catholic Church. Church-building, the agitation for additional endowments, and the introduction of religious instruction into every school, are none of them ten years old. Before that period, the Bible might be occasionally, but very rarely, read in the more respectable schools; but neither was the Catechism taught, nor was religious instruction of any kind attempted to be given. Considering that at least eight millions must be annually paid to the clergy of all the different denominations in the three kingdoms, we think that the young as well as the old might be adequately instructed in religion; and, indeed, we never were aware before, that it was to the grown up alone that the services of the clergy were intended to be confined. In many English towns—Carlisle, for example—the Episcopal clergy, holding official situations alone, are in the proportion of one to 1000 of the inhabitants of all sects; so that their labours cannot be very severe. In the city of Edinburgh we have upwards of thirty clergymen of the Establishment, and nearly forty Dissenters, including Catholics and Episcopallians, or about seventy in all—a number exceeding that of the whole teachers of English, male and female, in this city. If the Tory scheme of education is to be carried into effect, more care will require to be taken than has hitherto been done, that the schoolmasters not only profess to belong to the Established Church, but that they are thoroughly instructed in, and able to teach, its doctrines. It will be essential that every schoolmaster go through a course of divinity, and be duly examined as to his knowledge, before he be allowed to teach a school. The lax system that has hitherto been followed in Scotland, of permitting Dissenters—and, among others, Episcopallians—to become schoolmasters, and even professors in universities, must no longer be tolerated; and the clergy ought to take much blame to themselves for so long overlooking so pernicious a practice, (as they must think it.) A schoolmaster who has not studied divinity ought no more to be allowed (if the Tory scheme is to be followed) to give religious instruction to children than he who has not studied medicine ought to be allowed to prescribe for them.

ENGLAND.

As has long been generally foreseen, the Chartist Agitation has broken out in open riot. It appears that, for a considerable time past, nightly meetings had been held in the Bull Ring at Birmingham, where the usual seditious harangues and exhortations to resort to violence were addressed to the mob; and the magistrates of the town becoming alarmed at the continuance of these meetings, and desirous to put them down, but not having a sufficient police force for the purpose, sent the Mayor, and another magistrate, to London, who had an interview on the subject with Lord John Russell. After some hesitation, Lord John acceded to the request of the magistrates, to send to Birmingham a body of the London police; and sixty men were accordingly dispatched to that town on the 4th of July. On their arrival, on the evening of that day, there happened, as usual, to be a meeting in the Bull Ring; the police immediately proceeded to disperse it, and capture the leaders; but they were vigorously resisted by the Chartists, and did not succeed in their efforts till the Fourth Royal Irish Dragoons and the Rifle Brigade came to their assistance. Dr John Taylor, Collins, Lovett, and several other Chartists, were taken prisoners, and conveyed to Warwick Jail; where they were treated precisely in the same manner as if they had been convicted felons: their hair was cut off; they were forced to bathe in the same bath, and dry themselves with the same towel, with felons having cutaneous diseases; and confined to the prison allowance, being only permitted to spend threepence per day on other food, and not allowed the means of cooking anything they purchased. We could not have believed that such an atrocity could, at the present day, have taken place in any civilized country, and especially in England, which boasts so much of liberty. In law, as in common sense, every person is held to be innocent till he be convicted; and, whatever may be the crime of which any one is accused, Government, until his conviction, has no right to do anything more than detain his person. They have no right to regulate his food, if he choose to live on his own means, and far less to cut off his hair or expose him to contagious diseases. Bail, which turned out to be perfectly good, was refused; and some of the prisoners were detained in jail, among felons, for ten days, till the Magistrates made up their minds to accept the bail which had been offered when they had been apprehended. A day or two afterwards, forty more of the London Police arrived at Birmingham, and their presence seems to have greatly irritated the Chartists.

Matters, however, continued quiet until the evening of Monday, the 16th of July, when the mob again collected in large numbers; and being unopposed either by the military or the police, and the magistrates being all out of the way, they made an attack on the Public Office, broke all the windows without opposition, although the police were stationed within, then proceeded to break open several shops, strewed their contents about the streets, and having afterwards made a fire of such of them as were combustible, they set fire to two houses, both of which were completely destroyed. The rioters drove off the firemen and fire-engines; and it was not till a strong escort of dragoons and rifles were procured, that the engines were allowed to play on the flames. For one hour and a quarter, the mob had undisputed possession of the town; for, although the magistrates anticipated a disturbance, both from the information they had received, and from the circumstance of Monday being kept as a holiday by a considerable proportion of the working classes, and although they had sat during the greater part of the forenoon at the Public Office, they had all left it by five o'clock. They could hardly fail to be aware, from their former experience, that if there was to be any assemblage or outbreak, it would most probably take place after eight o'clock in the evening. The Tories, in both Houses of Parliament, and especially the Duke of Wellington, made a severe attack on the Government for the appointment of magistrates for Birmingham which they had made, and for the remissness with which the magistrates had discharged their duty. Complaints of the same kind were also sent to the Home-Office from a number of the inhabitants of the town, and an inquiry into the conduct of the magistrates has been instituted by Government. The damage is estimated to amount, at a moderate calculation, to between £30,000 and £40,000; which, it is understood, will fall to be assessed on the town of Birmingham alone, and not on the whole county of Warwick. Since the outbreak on the 16th, the town has been kept quiet; but only by the display of a powerful military force, cannon even having been stationed in the streets. There is great reason to fear similar riots in the other large manufacturing towns; and were a simultaneous outbreak to take place, it is doubtful how far it could be suppressed. Such is the result of eight years of Whig Government!

PRICES AND WAGES.—The working classes must now have had sufficient experience of the Tory fallacy, that wages rise as prices rise. Good wheat is now 80s. a quarter; has any working man double the wages now, which he had little more than three years ago, when wheat was 36s.? Have not many of the working classes—the handloom weavers especially—positively lower wages at this moment than they had then? And is not employment more difficult to be got? It is well known that, for the last six months, many of those employed in the cotton manufacture have not had more than three or four days' wages a-week; and there is little prospect of trade reviving. But, in truth, can anything be more paradoxical than to assert that wages rise as prices rise? that is, that the population have an equal supply of food when prices are high as when they are low; for if this be not the meaning, the assertion is a mere juggle. What is the cause of high prices of grain, but a deficient supply? In this country, in ordinary years, we do not certainly produce more than enough of grain for our consumption, and indeed the population is kept down by starvation to the limit which the estates of our landowners will feed. Suppose the quantity of grain, in ordinary years, to be 52 millions of quarters of all sorts; and that that quantity, or two quarters per head, is entirely consumed within the year, at an average price of 30s. per quarter for wheat, barley, and oats; is it in the nature of things that an equal quantity can be consumed by each of the population when prices have risen to 40s. or 60s. a quarter—a rise which can be occasioned only by a deficiency of the crop, a smaller quantity of grain, say 40 or 45 million quarters, instead of 52 millions, being produced? High prices are the invariable concomitant of scarcity, and there are no instances of dearths or scarcity in any country which have not been accompanied with the misery of the working classes. In his treatise of annuities, Mr Milne has given us, from a Swedish author, the characters of all the crops in Sweden from 1747 to 1803, whether abundant, middling, scanty, poor, or a failure, with the deaths in each year; and the effect of an abundant or scanty crop on human life is abundantly shewn, as the following examples testify. It will be observed that the crop of one year feeds the population for the greater part of the next, and therefore we give two years always in succession.

1750	crop abundant	deaths	58,845
1751	- middling	-	57,377
1762	- failure	-	74,931
1763	- poor	-	85,003
1769	- abundant	-	70,547
1770	- middling	-	69,895
1771	- failure	-	71,577
1772	- scanty	-	90,081
1773	- middling	-	117,509

The effect of the two deficient crops on the mortality of the third is here sufficiently apparent; and did our limits allow, we could quote many other instances to the same effect. It is needless to say, that all the years of extraordinary mortality were years of high prices. At all times, high prices of food have been the precursors of turbulence, sedition, and bloodshed, and we have little doubt that much of the prevailing discontent which exists, would be alleviated by an abundant harvest and the reduction of prices to something nearer to the rate of wages than exists at the present moment.

SCOTLAND.

CORN-LAW LECTURES.—Mr Paulton, the able lecturer on the Corn-Laws, gave two admirable lectures against these laws, in the Waterloo Rooms, on the 15th and 17th July. The large room was completely crowded, the audience consisting chiefly of the working classes. The lecturer was greatly applauded. He demonstrated, in forcible terms, the evils arising from this atrocious monopoly; and proved, from unquestionable evidence, that the manufactures of this country have already suffered severely, and that our foreign trade is threatened with annihilation, unless these laws be immediately repealed. We were glad to observe that he made a copious use of the facts and arguments which have been published in this Magazine, from time to time, on the subject of the Corn-Laws. He declared his determination never to desist from agitation till he carried his point; and as he has an excellent voice, a ready command of language, speaking without notes, and is, above all, enthusiastic in the cause, we have no doubt that his lectures will be attended with the most salutary effects. At the conclusion of the second lecture, an attempt was made by the Chartists to move a resolution for the adoption, by the meeting, of their panacea, although the room had been taken for the exclusive use of the lecturer; but the good sense of the workmen put down this attempt to obtrude the charter into a meeting called for the purpose of hearing a lecture on a different subject. Mr Paulton complained of this tyrannical conduct of the Chartists, who, while bawling out for liberty themselves, seem determined not to allow liberty to others to advocate any opinions except those contained in the charter. It is absurd to wait for a repeal of the Corn-Laws till Universal Suffrage be obtained. Bad as the constitution of Parliament has hitherto been, experience shews that it is not impossible to carry good measures through it, when the People are in earnest. We have, within a few years, obtained a repeal of the House Duty, Beer Duty, of the Test and Corporation Acts; Catholic Emancipation, and the Abolition of Slavery; and we doubt not that the repeal of the Starvation Laws would have been secured ere now, had not the attention of the working classes been almost exclusively directed towards the Charter. The landed interest certainly owe a debt of gratitude to the Chartists they cannot easily repay. It ought to be kept in mind, that the repeal of the Corn-Laws is not a matter which can brook delay. These laws are raising up manufacturing rivals to us throughout the whole world. Already is our export of cotton-cloth to many countries annihilated; soon also will these countries dispense with our twist. All the operatives in the cotton trade—one million and a-half in number—are threatened with the fate of the hand-loom weavers, who are barely able to earn 5s. a-week, and whose wages have been seriously reduced at the very time that the price of food has risen. There is little probability of the charter being the law of the land for some years. In the meantime, the Corn-Laws press severely on those for whose behoof the charter is intended.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

The accounts from the manufacturing districts still continue unfavourable, and, in many places, numbers of workmen are either unemployed, or working only three or four days a-week. Some of the cotton-mills have been stopped altogether, particularly those belonging to the Peels; but they give a small weekly allowance to their people, to save them from utter starvation. The want of work and high price of food, are two of the chief causes of the discontents in the manufacturing districts; and these discontents will go on increasing, from year to year, until more work and cheaper food be obtained. There is no practical mode of effecting these objects but by a repeal of the Corn-Laws. The conflagration of manufactories, shops, and dwelling-houses, will only aggravate the evil; for, as experience teaches, it will drive the master manufacturers to other countries, where they can employ their capital with safety and without fear; leaving the operatives here to enter into a still more fierce struggle than at present exists for employment, whereby a still farther reduction of the rate of wages will be occasioned; while the aristocracy, taking advantage of the disunion between the middle and working classes, will continue to maintain the high price of food. It is in vain for the Chartists to attack the shops of Birmingham, or the cottonmills of Lancashire, with the view of obtaining the charter; such attacks will give little disturbance to the landowners, who have the whole power of the country in their hands, and will only drive the middle classes to co-operate with the higher for the purpose of preserving, at every sacrifice, law, peace, and order. No great change, such as that demanded by the Chartists, ever took place in any country by the efforts of the operatives unaided by the middle and upper classes; and, while the present disunion continues, the aristocracy will, as they have hitherto done, trample on both.

AGRICULTURE.

East Lothian.—Wheat is generally thriving, though, in general light on the ground. Barley may yield a fair return, though, in many situations it is not luxuriant. Oats promise an average produce. Hay is a light crop. Potatoes are everywhere healthy and regular, with hardly any failures. The produce of wool is satisfactory, both in quantity and quality. Berwickshire.—Turnips are reckoned a good crop. Potatoes are almost universally a failure; in many instances the seed has rotted in the ground. Stirlingshire.—Wheat is a strong crop. Barley and oats promise fair. Potatoes sprung up with great vigour, and continue vigorous. Carse of Gowrie.—The fly has appeared in the wheat crop in great numbers, but the extent of the damage cannot yet be ascertained. Ross-shire.—The corn crops are generally good. Wheat everywhere appears in good condition. Oats and barley are very promising. Caitness.—Oats and barley look well. Turnips are also promising. But the hay crop here, as elsewhere, is a complete failure.

At the great Inverness sheep and wool fair, which commenced on the 11th of July, the demand for sheep was brisk; Cheviot wethers sold from 23s. to 31s., being an advance of from 1s. to 2s. 6d. above last year's prices. Cheviot ewes brought from 14s. to 19s.; black-faced wethers, 16s. to 22s.; ewes, 10s. to 12s. Very little wool was disposed of, and at a reduction of from 10s. to 15s. per cent. on last year's prices. Cheviot laid, washed, sold from 18s. to 20s.; unwashed, 14s. to 16s.; black-faced, 8s. to 9s.; white, 10s. to 12s.

POSTSCRIPT POLITICAL.

In our Monthly Political Register, an outline of public affairs, and of measures under discussion, those especially which affect the interests of the People and the prospects of Reform, is regularly traced. To this Register we may now refer for the leading events of a Session, memorable above all that have gone before it for abortions, inconsistencies, and bad faith. It opened under the tremour of the Durham Panic; and, after six months of bungling, abandoning, and jobbing, mingled with vapour and rhodomontade, has ended exactly where it began. Canada, Jamaica, Ireland, National Education, Church Rates, remain, as to permanent settlement, precisely where they were. The County Courts' Bill, and the Summary Justice Bill, both opposed by the Tories, have been withdrawn, with Lord John Russell's usual politeness to that party. Ballot has gained nothing that is perceptible, and, according to Lord Howick, a loss; and the Corn-Law Abolition, whatever progress it is making among the People, has received a blow in Parliament, which, were strength equal to good-will, would prove fatal. The single national measure of the Session, the Penny Postage, is scarcely yet to be reckoned upon as won; though there is hope it must be carried—and little gratitude due to Mr Spring Rice after all. What shall we say of the state of a country claiming to possess a representative constitution, where the communication of the citizens by the post, having most unwisely and unjustly been made a source of public revenue, and the People having at last perceived the necessity of redressing an abuse which ought never to have been tolerated, acquiescing, upon compulsion, is made the cause of extravagant laudation of the Ministry! How gracious and bountiful, not openly to oppose the will of the nation to set its correspondence free, upon whatever other interest the presumed deficit of revenue—which the People must make good—should be shifted! This, however, we consider a measure of such invaluable, such unimaginable advantage, that it might of itself redeem an otherwise abortive Session, had it sprung spontaneously from the Government, instead of having been forced upon it. It will do more for education, for the instruction of the People, the spread of knowledge, and the promotion of good morals, than all the Parliamentary grants that can be placed in the jobbing hands of the Whigs, should they wriggle and see-saw on in office much longer than their friends dare anticipate. And yet the mere Downing Street prospects of the Whigs certainly do not look gloomier than last year. The light of the Queen's countenance shines upon them; and their grasp of place is, in the meanwhile, growing more firm, from causes which may be found in the history of every limited monarch that ever lived. The Cabinet, as reconstructed, resembles a house built upon false levels and a crumbling foundation. If the rickety erection hold together for a time, it gathers a kind of artificial, unsafe solidity, from merely sinking, in all its parts, deeper and deeper in the line of the original bias. It may be far off the true plumb, but its materials are getting knitted and firm; and it may also be patched up and buttressed, from time to time, exactly after the fashion of the Melbourne Cabinet. To this propping and patching both Tories and Chartists have, during the session, indirectly contributed.

Lord Melbourne is not only a fortunate Minister, but a potent person. First came home Lord Durham, breathing fire and fury, and threatening to extinguish every Whig Minister of them. Since the magic whispers of Richard to Lady Anne, no change has been more wonderful than that in the tone of his Lordship. Before facing the treacherous parties, Lord Durham was to do such things for Canada as were to astonish the Old World and the New. His Lordship's patriotism, as, on former occasions, has unhappily been extinguished in its own smoke.

The Tory blunders in tactics have not been few. Sir Robert Peel and Mr Goulburn have, in particular, by their opposition to Cheap Postage, done great injury to their faction. All the commercial part of the nation—and there is too much of it, unnatural as it may seem, Tory at heart—were anxious for the measure; and these Middle-Class Tories are not only offended at an ill-timed and fruitless opposition, but furnished with a pretext for withdrawing their confidence from their leader, preparatory to the abandonment of their party, if the Whigs are likely to continue long in the ascendant. Had the reasonable part of the Tories opposed the Education Grant, not upon the narrow and bigoted principles of Churchmen, but as a regular job, placing twenty or thirty thousand pounds annually in the hands of Ministers, to be expended, if not as secret service money, yet dispensed chiefly to Irish adherents, they would have stood better with the community; who now laugh at the dignified rebuke which the Church has drawn upon its head from the Crown. These, and other errors in tactics, to which Sir Robert is driven from being in reality the slave of the prejudices of those of whom he pretends to be the master or guide, have largely benefited the Ministry. As men, they ought to have their mouths in the dust; but, as placemen, they may be allowed to exult. They have turned the corner. They are on the winning side—that side which ever wins golden opinions. The Chartists have also powerfully contributed to the temporary stability of the Government. Liberal men, of cautious and timid dispositions—disgusted, on the one side, with the high-flying tyrannical doctrines of the old Tories, who really give the law to their ostensible leader—and alarmed, on the other, at the violence of the Chartists, who, professing the purest political creed, are yet chargeable with the grossest folly in their daily language, leading to acts and consequences which it is fearful to contemplate—naturally fall into the middle course—Conservative-Whiggism. Any state of things seems preferable to Reform ushered in by riot, spoliation, and burning. The Birmingham rioters have made more Whig-Conservatives in a week than the ruling faction could otherwise have drawn to their banners in years among good men. They have done worse—they have risked putting back the cause of National improvement for an incalculable period. They have demonstrated their own weakness and folly shamed their high political faith, and furnished their enemies with weapons against themselves, which it will not be easy to parry. Were more fallacious arguments needed for accomplishing the desire of the Whigs, to bring the country under an armed Police to be wielded by Downing Street, Birmingham furnishes them. Is it wished to be proved that the People are unfit for the exercise of the Franchise, who dare deny that the incendiaries and spoliators forming these mobs are most unfit? There is, no doubt, much exaggeration on all sides; and every probability that the real delinquents were a mere handful of unruly boys and women, irritated by the London Police, misled by persons whom it is charity to call only fools, and not checked with sufficient promptitude. But Chartism will not the less bear the blame of all the unhappy or lawless outrages which have taken place; its doctrines will now be judged by their fruits at Birmingham. This may be as unjust as to impute the cruelties of Cortez or Pizarro to the religion under the sanction of which they pretended to commit their atrocities; but it is thus men judge. The original error of the Chartists was their separation from the great body of the Middle Class, advocating Reform to some extent, with the Abolition of the Corn-Laws; and the tone of defiance assumed, when a common interest and common sympathies enjoined the strictest confidence and union. Nor was the Middle Class without their share of blame; and that a large share. The unnatural, unwise, and most deplorable growing alienation of these classes, we have long held to be the very worst symptom of the social progress. What were a Whig or a Tory ruling faction, or both combined, if the People—the People in the wide, majestic, and only true sense—were reasonable, united, and true to themselves? At this dark juncture, there still is a gleam of light. The rational and sober-minded part of the Chartists, which, we believe, to be a very great majority of the whole body, must now be quite aware of the folly, conceit, and, we fear, selfishness or treachery of some of their leaders. They are aware that many of the Middle-Class Reformers, though reproaching the conduct of these leaders, are warmly attached to their professed objects, as embodied in the Charter. They have what in former times would have been reckoned a respectable minority in Parliament; and every one of these advantages is, in the meanwhile, thrown away, or neutralized by the wild speeches at the late public meetings, and the fatal outbreak at Birmingham, while Whigs and Tories stand by exulting. Now, we will venture to affirm, that there is not one man in a thousand who have subscribed the Charter, who does not strongly condemn and abjure speeches and actions which would be perfectly in place in the disciples of Thom, or in those of the violent Tory, Oastler; but which are unworthy of reflecting men, who wish, in sincerity, to work out their political emancipation by the only practicable means—union, order, and perseverance. The Catholic Association of Ireland ought, in its arrangements and deportment, to be the model of every People contending against power for their rights. It is the true normal school for agitators; and, with its example before us, there is little excuse for errors so grievous as those we lament. There the violator of the public peace, the robber of fire-arms, the man guilty of any act or speech which might be construed into lawless or seditious, was denounced as the worst enemy of the body; denounced from the rostrum, anathematized from the altar, branded and expelled from the Association. The same punishment is due to those who have made the principles of the Charter the cloak of their nefarious acts; a punishment justly due to their crimes, and to the character of the National Body which they have injured. They are not Chartists, however they may abuse the name; and, if not knaves, they are headstrong fools—as ignorant as the infant who beats the table on which it has broken its own head—or, as probably, plunderers in disguise. In a community like Birmingham, it is surely possible to separate the sheep from the goats; and it is a bounden duty. Temperate and reflecting men, who seek only their rights, ought at once to separate themselves from those whose conduct and language give but too much countenance to the prevailing outcry, that the object of the Chartists is plunder, or a violent division, the robbers' sharing, of property. None are more thoroughly convinced of the general fallacy of this charge than ourselves; and in the same proportion are we desirous that it should be instantly met and rebutted. In this course of exculpation—which the Chartists owe to themselves, and in the middle and lower class, feeling the urgent necessity of forgetting, forgiving, and uniting,—is our hope.

Upon the vexed question of the conduct of the Birmingham Magistracy, veiled as it is in obscurity and point-blank contradiction on matters-of-fact, no one can pronounce; but we may safely aver, that with the local Force, the Military at hand, and the unlimited power of swearing in Special Constables, the need of a foreign force could not be all at once urgent; while the consequences of the irritating incursion of the London Police turned out precisely as might have been foreseen. Wherever, in large towns, the Police Force shall be employed against a mob consisting of the same kind of materials, men inflamed and desperate, the same or worse consequences may be anticipated. The People are subdued to the regular soldiery, but the armed Police will long be found as hateful to them as the yeomanry; which is the most detested and exasperating kind of force that has ever been employed in quelling riots, and that which, in harshly putting down a popular outbreak, sows deeply the seeds of discontent. Twenty years have elapsed since the Manchester Massacre: but are its consequences obliterated? Happily in the tumults at Birmingham no lives have been lost. Though both the police and the mob acted with great brutality, and it may take a long while to allay the irritation that has arisen, the stains of blood are not left. One thing is obvious from these disorderly assemblies:—the People of every large town ought to have some fixed place, say their public resort for recreation, where they may undisturbed, and unwatched by the police, hold their meetings for discussion; and having this, their leaders, or those who call them together, ought to hold themselves responsible for their good conduct, and for their not straggling about the streets in disorderly bands, under cover of which, thieves, and all manner of vagrants, may find license to break the peace, in order to commit depredations on property. The riots of Bristol were not incited by political agitators, but by prize-fighters, pilferers, and other bad characters, who carried off whatever spoil they could find. In Birmingham it is a more alarming symptom that we hear of no thefts, and that the infuriated People actually used the articles of silver which they took from one shop as missiles in their fierce onset on the police. The gratification of their revengeful passions was dearer at that moment than silver or gold; but such men are not, on this account, less dangerous members of society, nor is it less necessary that the Birmingham Chartists should openly denounce them and all their works.

CAPTAIN MARRYAT'S AMERICA.

THERE is to be no end to works upon America. It is the one serious subject which never becomes stale, and of which we can never hear enough. The reason for this is painfully obvious. We are a little jealous, and perhaps a very little envious, of our vigorous, hearty, and thriving Republican neighbour; and, though too proud to acknowledge the fact, not a little anxious to ascertain the secret of her astonishing prosperity, or ability "to go a-head" at so tremendous a rate. In relation to the United States, Britain is somewhat in the condition of an impoverished and decaying aristocratic family, excessively proud of its Norman descent; yet, while it affects contempt, sore, and envious of the upstart parvenu, whom great wealth, acquired by industry, enables to eclipse it in the external signs of rank, as well as in substantial command over the comforts and luxuries of life. We look upon America, in short, much as some poor outworn French noble of the old regime may upon the Rothschilds, when their respective vanities happen to come into collision; allowing that, how rich soever those new-gilt brass barons may be, yet they are not the less plebeian, vulgar, and unbaptized Jews. In like manner, the people of America may be universally the best-educated and fattest-fed, the best-clothed, and the best-lodged nation, as a nation, in the world; but then they have no Court, no Church, no titles, and no nobility; and, moreover, they don't, like refined Europeans, swallow theirs alive. The working people eat molasses with bacon, and maid-servants sometimes go without caps, and, in some instances, either for use or ornament, wear spectacles, and take a good deal of their own way, just like their mistresses. Now, it is obvious that a people without a Church can have no religion; and without a Court, and an aristocratic order, no good-breeding among the higher, nor reverence among the lower orders. Bating these social vices and essential wants, the American people are found wonderfully like the middle and lower classes of the commercial and manufacturing districts of Great Britain. As for a lady or a gentleman, it is notorious, that such a phenomenon is not to be met with throughout the Union, save in the Southern States, where great refinement of manners is to be found, as the natural consequence and accompaniment of one set of men and women being the instruments of degrading another into brutes. Captain Marryat, we are glad to find, is much less finical as to merely conventional usages, and silver-fork questions, than some of his gentlemanly precursors; and, bating a few prejudices, much less addicted to dogmatize and lay down the law and Gospel, than his philosophical ones. If liberality enlarges his candour, it also impairs the consistency of his judgments on men and manners. Allowing for certain modes of thinking, which in him can hardly be called prejudice, he is as impartial a writer as he is a quick and penetrating observer. It is going far to assert this much, yet we rather think the Americans themselves will, on the whole, be satisfied with his report of them, which is saying a great deal.

He sets out by telling them that he owes them no gratitude; they shewed him but scanty hospitality, and often insulted and annoyed him. But this he attributes in a great measure to the unhandsome conduct of former travellers; and he disclaims the meanness of retaliation. It is true, that the very latest travellers have been more favourable; but the Americans are not yet appeased for the strictures of the Trollopes and Kembles, and Halls and Hamiltons; and, while they actually insulted Captain Marryat, they boast of having crammed and mystified Miss Martineau, and exult in the successful hoax. This bad faith, or breach of morality, put Captain Marryat on his guard; and he has been cautious of asserting anything for which he had not sufficient evidence. A breach of morals may be too serious a name for the humorous offence, especially as we remember Miss Edgeworth makes her Irish Lady Geraldine delight in cramming and hoaxing a pedantic Englishman about to publish his travels in Ireland; yet it is an offence hardly extenuated by the apology, that hoaxing and hyperbole constitute the major part of American humour.

If they have the slightest suspicion that a foreigner is about to write a book, nothing appears to give them so much pleasure as to try to mislead him: this has constantly been practised upon me, and, for all I know, they may in some instances have been successful; if they have, all I can say of the story is, that "se non e vero, e si ben trovato," that it might have happened.

Paragraph from a New York Paper.

"That old deaf English maiden lady, Miss Martineau, who travelled through some of the States, a few years since, gives a full account of Mr Pointdexters' death; unfortunately for her veracity, the gentleman still lives; but this is about as near the truth as the majority of her statements. The Loafing English men and women who visit America, as penny-a-liners, are perfectly understood here, and Jonathan amuses himself whenever he meets them, by imposing upon their credulity the most absurd stories which he can invent; which they swallow whole, go home with their eyes sticking out of their heads with wonder, and print all they have heard, for the benefit of John Bull's calves."

Added to this humorous fancy, the different States misrepresent each other, or misdescribe each other, much, we presume, as the people of London paint all Yorkshiremen as cheats, and Lincolnshiremen as heavy and stupid:—

Boston turns up her erudite nose at New York, Philadelphia, in her pride, looks down upon both New York and Boston; while New York, chinking her dollars, swears the Bostonians are a parcel of puritanical prigs, and the Philadelphians a would-be aristocracy. A western man from Kentucky, when at Tremont House, in Boston, begged me particularly not to pay attention to what they said of his State in that quarter. Both a Virginian and Tennessean, when I was at New York, did the same.

At Boston, I was drinking champagne at a supper. "Are you drinking champagne?" said a young Bostonian. "That's New York—take claret; or, if you will drink champagne, pour it into a green glass, and they will think it hock; champagne's not right." How are we to distinguish between right and wrong in this queer world? At New York, they do drink a great deal of champagne; it is the small beer of the dinner-table. Champagne becomes associated with New York, and therefore is not right. I will do the New Yorkers the justice to say, that, as far as drinks are concerned, they are above prejudice; all's right with them, provided there is enough of it.

This paragraph is an apt specimen of Captain Marryat's manner of getting on; a fair though a shrewd statement, often closing with a sharp sly hit. At an early period of his residence, he made up his mind to refuse all invitations; and his work has not suffered from his subsequent independence of the social influences. Captain Marryat gets rid at the outset of a systematic account of America as a nation, by boldly denying that it is a nation at all. It is "a chaotic mass," that, in time, may take form as a nation or nations. But its present chaotic state is well worth consideration. America has, he acknowledges, begun its career under singularly favourable auspices, albeit the great wants we have specified. It had, when it started, neither church, king, nor nobility; neither a law of primogeniture, nor a privileged order; but in lieu of these, "industry, activity, and courage"—we will add, and religious principle, with a decided bias among its people to free civil institutions. According to Captain Marryat, Washington left his emancipated country a Republic, but it has changed itself into a pure Democracy. This nice classic distinction between a Republic and a pure Democracy will not readily be understood in America, where, we apprehend, a Republic is valued only as it approximates to a Democracy. Captain Marryat's definition of a Democracy is, that the representative, even after the election, must vote as his constituents direct him. In this view, the Tory constituency of Ipswich is, at present, purely democratical; and Kilkenny would have been another democratic section of the empire, had Mr Hume submitted to the dictation of a part of his constituents. It is of less consequence to trace the distinction, as Captain Marryat is decidedly of opinion that a Democracy with all its imperfections, is the form of government, best suited to the present condition of America, because under it the country has made, and will continue to "make, the most rapid advances." When it is found necessary for society to pause, or to make a dead halt, oligarchical institutions will no doubt be found more efficacious: but our author does not fix the period when this may take place; and he even regards it as presumptuous to calculate the time. We can venture to guess at it. The Americans being a thoroughly commonsensical and utilitarian people, will certainly abandon their Democratic institutions, and adopt those of older communities, the moment they perceive that the latter tend more to the happiness and prosperity of the people living under them.

The first and lighter part of the work consists of extracts from the traveller's diary. In it his random observations on national and individual character, and on manners, are embodied, together with descriptions of a country of which he has seen, if not exactly everything, yet nearly all that is really worth seeing; the great cities, the new cities, and the institutions of all kinds, which are peculiar to the United States. He dashes at once, seaman-like, into the heart of his narrative, with the men heaving the anchor of the good ship Quebec, in which he sailed, to the Yankee salt-water lyric of Sally Brown.

Sally Brown, Oh my dear Sally! (Single voice.)

Oh Sally Brown! (Chorus.)

Sally Brown of Bubble Al-ly. (Single voice.)

Oh Sal-ly Brown! (Chorus.)

I went to town, to get some toddy,

Oh Sally Brown!

'Twasn't fit for any body,

Oh Sally Brown!

Sally is a bright mulattar; (Single voice.)

Oh Sally Brown! (Chorus.)

Pretty girl, but can't get at her,

Oh Sally Brown! (Chorus.) &c., &c.

But we mar the effect of this dramatic opening, by suppressing the recitative or dialogue. Captain Marryat landed at New York in May, 1837, just when half the merchants of the city had been declared bankrupt. Universal dismay and apprehension then prevailed, succeeding excessive panic.

Not a smile on one countenance among the crowd who pass and re-pass; hurried steps, care-worn faces, rapid exchanges of salutation, or hasty communication of anticipated ruin before the sun goes down. Here two or three are gathered on one side, whispering and watching that they are not overheard; there a solitary individual with his arms folded and his hat slouched, brooding over departed affluence. Mechanics, thrown out of employment, are, pacing up and down with the air of famished wretches. The violent shock has been communicated, like that of electricity, through the country to a distance of hundreds of miles. Canals, railroads, and all public works have been discontinued; and the Irish emigrant Jesus against his shanty, with his spade idle in his hand, and staring as his thoughts wander back to his own Emerald Isle.

All the banks have stopped payment in specie, and there is not a dollar to be had. I walked down Wall Street, and had a convincing proof of the great demand for money, for somebody picked my pocket.

The militia are under arms, as riots are expected. The banks in the country and other towns have followed the example of New York, and thus has General Jackson's currency bill been repealed without the aid of Congress. Affairs are now at their worst, and now that such is the case, the New Yorkers appear to recover their spirits. One of the newspapers humorously observes — "All Broadway is like unto a new-made widow, and don't know whether to laugh or cry." There certainly is a very remarkable energy in the American disposition; if they fall, they bound up again. Somebody has observed that the New York merchants are of that elastic nature, that, when fit for nothing else, they might be converted into cocksprings, and such really appears to be their character.

Nobody refuses to take the paper of the New York banks, although they virtually have stopped payment—they never refuse anything at New York;—but nobody will give specie in change, and great distress is occasioned by this want of a circulating medium.

At Philadelphia the ultra-democrats have held a large public meeting, at which one of the first resolutions brought forward and agreed to was—"That they did not owe one farthing to the English people."

"They may say the times are bad," said a young American to me, "but I think that they are excellent. A twenty dollar note used to last me but a week, but now it is as good as Fortunatus's purse, which was never empty. I eat my dinner at the hotel, and shew them my twenty dollar note. The landlord turns away from it, as if it were the head of Medusa, and begs that I will pay another time. I buy everything that I want, and I have only to offer my twenty dollar note in payment, and my credit is unbounded."

Miss Martineau's work is before me. How dangerous it is to prophesy. Speaking of the merchants of New York, and their recovering after the heavy losses they sustained by the calamitous fire of 1835, she says, that although eighteen millions of property were destroyed, not one merchant failed; and she continues, "It seems now as if the commercial credit of New York could stand any shock short of an earthquake like that of Lisbon." That was the prophesy of 1836. Where is the commercial credit of New York now in 1837? ! ! !

The distress for change has produced a curious remedy. Every man is now his own banker. Go to the theatres and places of public amusement, and, instead of change, you receive an I. O. U. from the treasury. At the hotels and oyster-cellars it is the same thing.

There is a little jocularly here, no doubt, yet the crisis was singular, and the rebound was not less remarkable than the shock.

Every body in the Union seemed by instinct to know Captain Marryat. It was impossible to preserve the incognito, and he wisely gave the matter up. His first excursion was by the Hudson, and he will gain the good-will of the Americans by placing the scenery of that noble river above even the Rhine scenery. He went up the river in the usual manner; stopped at West Point, and at Albany, and went thence to Boston. Of the society of that attic city, he judges much more favourably than Miss Martineau, but probably they viewed it from very different points.

Massachusetts is certainly very English in its scenery, and Boston essentially English as a city. The Bostonians assert that they are more English than we are, that is, that they have strictly adhered to the old English customs and manners, as handed down to them previous to the Revolution. That of sitting a very long while at their wine after dinner, is one which they strictly adhere to, and which, I think, would be more honoured in the breach than the observance; but their hospitality is unbounded, and you do, as an Englishman, feel at home with them. I agree with the Bostonians so far, that they certainly appear to have made no change in their manners and customs for these last hundred years. You meet here with frequent specimens of the Old English Gentleman, descendants of the best old English families who settled here long before the Revolution, and are now living on their incomes, with a town house, and a country seat to retire to during the summer season. The society of Boston is very delightful; it wins upon you every day, and that is the greatest compliment that can be paid to it.

Perhaps of all the Americans the Bostonians are the most sensitive to any illiberal remarks made upon the country, for they consider themselves, and pride themselves, as being peculiarly English; while, on the contrary, the majority of the Americans deny that they are English. There certainly is less intermixture of foreign blood in this city than in any other in America.

After all that has been said about those moral absurdities, the Shakers, Captain Marryat contrives to impart novelty and freshness to his description of their externals; for it is only of the externals that he is qualified to report. There is hot rivalry between Troy and Albany in several ways, but particularly in the respective excellence of the large female colleges, rather than boarding schools, in which both rejoice. The Captain was invited to attend an examination of one of them at Albany. He says—

Here, and indeed in many other establishments, the young ladies, upon quitting it, have diplomas given to them, if they pass their examinations satisfactorily. They are educated upon a system which would satisfy even Miss Martineau, and prepared to exercise the rights of which she complains that women have been so unjustly deprived. Conceive three hundred modern Portias, who regularly take their degrees, and emerge from the portico of the seminary full of algebra, equality, and the theory of the constitution! The quantity and variety crammed into them is beyond all calculation. The examination takes place yearly, to prove to the parents that the preceptors have done their duty, and is in itself very innocent, as it only causes the young ladies to blush a little.

This afternoon they were examined in algebra, and their performance was very creditable. Under a certain age girls are certainly much quicker than boys, and I presume would retain what they learned if it were not for their subsequent duties in making puddings and nursing babies. Yet these are affairs which must be performed by one sex or the other; and of what use can algebra and other abstruse matters be to a woman in her present state of domestic thralldom?

The theory of the American constitution was the next subject on which they were examined; by their replies, this appeared to be to them more abstruse than algebra; but the fact is, women are born Tories, and admit no other than petticoat government as legitimate.

The next day we again repaired to the hall, and French was the language in which they were to be examined, and the examination afforded us much amusement.

The young ladies sat down in rows on one side of the room. In the centre, towards the end, was an easel, on which was placed a large black board on which they worked with chalk the questions in algebra, &c.—a towel hanging to it, that they might wipe out and correct. The French preceptor, an old Emigré Count, sat down with the examiners before the board, the visitors (chiefly composed of anxious papas and mammas) being seated on benches behind them. As it happened, I had taken my seat close to the examining board, and at some little distance from the other persons who were deputed or invited to attend. I don't know how I came there. I believe I had come in too late; but there I was, within three feet of every young lady who came up to the board.

"Now, messieurs, have the kindness to ask any question you please," said the old Count, "Mademoiselle, you will have the goodness to step forward." A question was proposed in English, which the young lady had to write down in French. The very first went wrong: I perceived it; and, without looking at her, pronounced the right word, so that she could hear it. She caught it, rubbed out the wrong word with the towel, and rectified it. This was carried on through the whole sentence, and then she retreated from the board that her work might be examined. "Very well, very well, indeed, Mais, c'est parfaitement bien;" and the young lady sat down blushing. Thus were they all called up, and one after another prompted by me; and the old Count was delighted at the success of his pupils.

Now, what amused me in this way was the little bit of human nature—the tact displayed by the sex, which appears to be innate, and which never deserts them. Had I prompted a boy, he would most likely have turned his head round towards me, and thus have revealed what I was about; but not one of the whole class was guilty of such indiscretion. They heard me, rubbed out, corrected, waited for the word when they did not know it, but never, by any look or sign, made it appear that there was any understanding between us. Their eyes were constantly fixed on the board, and they appeared not to know that I was in the room. It was really beautiful. When the examination was over, I received a look from them all, half comic, half serious, which amply repaid me for my assistance.

As young ladies are assembled here from every State of the Union, it was a fair criterion of American beauty, and it must be acknowledged that the American women are the prettiest in the whole world.

We are sceptical about the doctrine of innate tact in female nature; if not altogether a fallacy—and it is obviously one in many instances—then we must look to education and social position for the origin of tact, not to sex. Slaves and maniacs under coercion, are proverbially cunning; and a chamber-maid, when she lies, where truth would equally serve her purpose, is said to follow her natural instinct; but it is the instinct of her degraded calling, not of her sex. If Captain Marryat's account of the tact of the Albanian pupils be au pié de la lettre, then is there something still to be desired in the educational systems of the great female seminaries. He remarked a very youthful matron, who had been married "the month after she graduated." On leaving Saratoga Springs—where he ran the gauntlet of introductions, Mr A., first introducing himself, and all the other gentlemen of the alphabet introducing each other, from B on to Z—he hoped to throw the whole citizens of the Republic off his trail. He put no name on his luggage, gave none to the Utica rail-road people, yet at Schenectady he was again hailed as Captain Marryat!

At introduction it is invariably the custom to shake hands; and thus you go on, shaking hands here, there, and everywhere, and with everybody; for it is impossible to know who is who in this land of equality.

But one shake of the hand will not do; if twenty times during the same day you meet a person to whom you have been introduced, the hand is everywhere extended, with—"Well, captain, how do you find yourself by this time?"

"At last," said I to myself, "I am incog." I had walked out of the engine-house, looked round the compass, and resolved in which direction I would bend my steps, when a young man came up to me; and, very politely taking off his hat, said—"I believe I have the pleasure of speaking to Captain M——." Had he known my indignation when he mentioned my name, poor fellow! But there was no help for it, and I replied in the affirmative. After apologizing, he introduced himself; and then requested the liberty of introducing his friend. "Well, if ever," thought I; and, "no never," followed afterwards, as a matter of course; and, as a matter of course, his friend was introduced. It reminded me of old times, when midshipmen, at balls, we used to introduce each other to ladies we had none of us seen before in our lives. Well, there I was, between two overpowering civilities; but they meant it kindly, and I could not be angry.

I had not been recognised in the rail-car, and I again flattered myself that I was unknown. I proceeded, on my arrival at Utica, to the hotel, and, asking at the bar for a bed, the book was handed to me, and I was requested to write my name. Wherever you stop in America, they generally produce a book, and demand your name—not on account of any police regulations, but merely because they will not allow secrecy in America, and because they choose to know who you may be. Of course, you may frustrate this espionage by putting down any name you please; and I had the pen in my hand, and was just thinking whether I should be Mr Snooks or Mr Smith, when I received a slap on the shoulder, accompanied with—"Well, captain, how are you by this time?" In despair, I let the pen drop out of my hand; and, instead of my name, I left on the book a large blot. It was an old acquaintance from Albany; and, before I had been ten minutes in the hotel, I was recognised by at least ten more.

These free-and-easy gentlemen wished to shew the traveller Professor Nott, who governed the students of Schenectady College "by moral influence and paternal sway," and who had written profoundly on stones and anthracite coal.

Captain Marryat, in his discussions on religion, is decidedly adverse to what is termed the Voluntary system, under which he avers that neither religion, morals, nor education can prosper. Yet, with inconsistency not limited to this particular case, he states:—

Seriously speaking, Professor Nott is a very clever man; and, I suspect, this college will turn out more clever men than any other in the Union. It differs from the other colleges in another point. It upholds no peculiar sect of religion, which almost all the rest do.

In travelling by coach from Kentucky to Baltimore, a tedious and fatiguing journey, our traveller had some singular adventures with curious and hospitable Americans. When the coach reached any town on the fatiguing journey, he was glad to throw off his coat and take a rest in bed till it started again, and at one place was following this good practice; but behold!

I had been reposing more than two hours when my door was opened—but this was too common a circumstance for me to think anything of it; the people would come into my room whether I was in bed or out of bed, dressed or not dressed, and if I expostulated, they would reply, "Never mind, we don't care, captain." On this occasion I called out, "Well, what do you want?"

"Are you Captain M——?" said the person, walking up to the bed where I was lying.

"Yes, I am," replied I.

"Well, I reckon I wouldn't allow you to go through our town without seeing you any how. Of all the humans, you're the one I most wish to see."

I told him I was highly flattered.

"Well now," said he, giving a jump, and coming down right upon the bed in his greatcoat, "I'll just tell you; I said to the chap at the bar, 'Aint the captain in your house?' 'Yes,' says he. 'Then where is he?' says I. 'Oh,' says he, 'he's gone into his own room, and locked himself up; he's a d——d aristocrat, and won't drink at the bar with other gentlemen.' So thought I, I've read M——'s works, and I'll be swamped if he is an aristocrat, and by the 'tarnal I'll go up and see; so here I am, and you're no aristocrat."

"I should think not," replied I, moving my feet away, which he was half sitting on.

"Oh, don't move; never mind me, captain, I'm quite comfortable. And how do you find yourself by this time?"

"Very tired indeed," replied I.

"I suspicion as much. Now, d'ye see, I left four or five good fellows down below who wish to see you; I said I'd go up first, and come down to them. The fact is, captain, we don't like you should pass through our town without shewing you a little American hospitality."

So saying he slid off the bed, and went out of the room. In a minute he returned, bringing with him four or five others, all of whom he introduced by name, and seated himself on my bed, while the others took chairs.

"Now, gentlemen," said he, "as I was telling the captain, we wish to shew him a little American hospitality; what shall it be, gentlemen; what d'ye say—a bottle of Madeira?"

An immediate answer not being returned, he continued,

"Yes, gentlemen, a bottle of Madeira; at my expense, gentlemen, recollect that; now ring the bell."

"I shall be most happy to take a glass of wine with you," observed I, but in my own room the wine must be at my expense."

"At your expense, captain; well, if it must be, I don't care; at your expense then, captain, if you say so; only you see, we must shew you a little American hospitality, as I said to them all down below; didn't I, gentlemen?"

The wine was ordered, and it ended in my hospitable friends drinking three bottles; and then they all shook hands with me, declaring how happy they should be if I came to the town again, and allowed them to shew me a little more American hospitality. There was something so very ridiculous in this event that I cannot help narrating it; but let it not be supposed, for a moment, that I intend it as a sarcasm upon American hospitality in general.

Captain Marryat justly detests the vile taste which has led the Americans to dub so many of their towns and villages with classic and scriptural names, and indeed with resounding names, borrowed from all parts of the earth. Two hospitable gentlemen requested to see him on his route to Upper Canada, one of whom lived at Batavia, and the other at Pekin. Mount Olympus overlooks Troy on one hand, and Mount Ida on the other; and on the stand at Brooklyn, of two coaches seen one day, the one set out for Babylon, and the other for Jericho. The proper names are as absurd as the names of places. Byron, a man-slave, is sent to summon Ada, a young female slave. But this, after all, is only equivalent to the Cæsars and Pompeys, Hannibals and Hebes of the West Indies. The absurd or burlesque concatenation of these grand names is often diverting, as when "Telemachus is desired to leave off teasing Calypso, on pain of tasting the cow-hide," or when one passes through the towns of Sempronius and Cato, on the way to Butternuts. Some of the Christian names are, to modern English ears, abundantly ludicrous. Such are Preserved Fish, Populorum Hightower, or Asa Peasebody. There are two lawyers, partners, in New York, with the happy appellatives of Catchem and Cheatem; and, the one being Isaac and the other Uriah, gives this felicitous combination on a door-plate of

"I. CATCHEM & U. CHEATEM."

Captain Marryat imagines that the Americans drawl their words, as they whittle, from their cautious, calculating habits. Is it the same cause, or what other, that gives the universal nasal twang, to which drawingl and twanging they are insensible? He once said to a lady,

"Why do you drawl out your words that way?"

"Well," replied she, "I'd drawl all the way from Maine to Georgia, rather than clip my words as you English people do."

The remarks on language do not offer much that is new. Sam Slick, in this respect, beats all travellers put together. Some of the phrases are significant of national customs. The term used for baggage in the south and west is still plunder. A man was asked—

"Well, Abel, what d'ye think of our native genus, Mister Forrest?"

"Well, I don't go much to theatricals, that's a fact; but I do think he piled the agony up a little too high in that last scene."

The gamblers on the Mississippi use a very refined phrase for "cheating"—"playing the advantages over him."

But, as may be supposed, the principal terms used are those which are borrowed from trade and commerce.

The rest, or remainder, is usually termed 'the balance.

"Put some of those apples into a dish, and the balance into the store-room."

When a person has made a mistake, or is out in his calculation, they say, "You missed a figure that time."

Even the thieves must be commercial in their ideas. One rogue meeting another, asked him what he had done that morning; "Not much," was the reply, "I've only realized this umbrella." There is sometimes in the American metaphors an energy which is very remarkable.

"Well, I reckon, that from his teeth to his toe-nail, there's not a human of a more conquering nature than General Jackson."

One gentleman said to me, "I wish I had all hell boiled down to a pint, just to pour down your throat."

Where we employ the dainty phrase perquisites, the Americans say stealings; or, they get so much in salary, and so much cheatage. The excessive delicacy, or, at the reader's pleasure, the prudish indelicacy of the American women, has been duly celebrated by Mrs Trollope, and, we should hope, to good purpose; but it is clear that her useful strictures have not yet taken full effect. All the world knows that a Queen of Spain has no legs, but neither are such indelicate appendages allowed to refined American ladies. Captain Marryat had one day the indiscretion or indelicacy to ask a young lady, who had fallen from a piece of rock, on which she stood to view the Falls of Niagara, if she had hurt her leg?

She turned from me, evidently much shocked, or much offended; and not being aware that I had committed any very heinous offence, I begged to know what was the reason of her displeasure. After some hesitation, she said that as she knew me well, she would tell me that the word leg was never mentioned before ladies. I apologized for my want of refinement, which was attributable to my having been accustomed only to English society, and added, that as such articles must occasionally be referred to, even in the most polite circles of America, perhaps she would inform me by what name I might mention them without shocking the company. Her reply was, that the word limb was used; "nay," continued she, "I am not so particular as some people are, for I know those who always say limb of a table, or limb of a pianoforte."

In a fashionable ladies' boarding-school, to which Captain Marryat afterwards escorted a lady, he discovered that the damsel, whose legs were only limbs, had told him truly that "she was not so particular as some people;" for he there saw a square piano-forte, with its four limbs delicately concealed in modest little trousers, with frills at the bottom of them! We should imagine this was more likely to be meant as a defence against flies, destroying French polish, than as a protection to female delicacy; but there is no calculating.

Captain Marryat does not admire the system of prison discipline in America nearly so much as a few of those who have witnessed its effects, and as many others, who merely judge by hearsay, appear to do. He prefers a little more hanging, with less severe secondary punishments. He was allowed to visit the prisoners alone, as Mrs Martineau and others have done; and, after an interval of six months, he went back to have his first impressions corrected. His first acquaintance in the Penitentiary was a butcher, who had murdered his wife. This man's sentence was twelve years' imprisonment. More than half the period had elapsed, and he was, as is common in the last period, become most impatient for its termination. He persisted in denying his crime, though there was no doubt of his guilt; so there was so much punishment thrown away, save that the man could not, in the meanwhile, contaminate society by his presence. The second case was that of a schoolmaster, imprisoned for four years for forgery, for which crime he had formerly been imprisoned for a shorter period. His opinion of the moral effects of the penitentiary of Philadelphia was rather favourable. A third was of opinion that, however it might be in the Penitentiary, the severe discipline of Sing Sing was positively injurious to the prisoners. A man was sent there for doing wrong to others, and had his passions excited by the greater wrong done to himself. Captain Marryat's penitentiary catalogue is curious. One young woman, found guilty of larceny, was fond of her solitude; she declared herself quite peaceful and happy, and content to remain. An ugly mulatto girl was rather proud of her crime. "Please, sir, I poisoned a whole family," was her reply to the traveller's interrogatory; and she was not sure if another seven years' imprisonment would keep her, if ill-treated, from doing it over again. She was, indeed, pretty sure she would, but yet she did not like being "shut up." On the whole, the traveller finds the Philadelphia Penitentiary system the best yet discovered for reclaiming the guilty, and putting them in the way to sin no more. One great merit is, that, while in prison every man acquires a trade, by which he may afterwards earn honest bread if he is so inclined.

While Captain Marryat was in the United States, a very remarkable discourse on punishments and prison discipline appeared, which, among the many small American "utterances" seized upon here, we rather wonder none of our re-publishers have caught. It is the production of an American gentleman, once in the best society, but who forfeited his place by intemperance, which had reduced him to beggary and wretchedness. By his own request, he was shut up in the House of Correction, at South Boston, and, while there, wrote his "Rat-trap" or "The Cogitations of a Convert in the House of Correction." His observations on the condition and character of the prisoners and the prison discipline are shrewd, sagacious, witty, and satirical.

On his way to Upper Canada and the Western Lakes, Captain Marryat visited Buffalo. His account of the rapid rise of that town presents features which could be found only in the United States, where commercial speculation becomes perfect gambling, with all the frauds and hazards of that vice. The conception, the enterprise, the pious fraud with a selfish object, the modest demeanour and charity of the speculator, are all quite American. The fraudulent person who was the main cause of the rapid increase of Buffalo, and of its sudden change from wooden huts to brick and stone houses, was a Mr Rathbun, who, when Captain Marryat was in the place, lay incarcerated in a jail of his own building.

It was he who built all the hotels, churches, and other public edifices; in fact, every structure worthy of observation in the whole town was projected, contracted for, and executed by Mr Rathbun. His history is singular. Of quiet unassuming manners, Quaker in his dress, moderate in all his expenses, (except in charity, wherein, assisted by an amiable wife, he was very liberal,) he concealed under his apparent simplicity and goodness a mind capable of the vastest conceptions, united with the greatest powers of execution. He undertook contracts, and embarked in building speculations, to an amount almost incredible. Rathbun undertook everything, and everything undertaken by Rathbun was well done. Not only at Buffalo, but at Niagara and other places, he was engaged in raising vast buildings, when the great crash occurred, and Rathbun, with others, was unable to meet his liabilities. Then, for the first time, it was discovered that for more than five years he had been conniving at a system of forgery, to the amount of two millions of dollars: the forgery consisted in putting to his bills the names of responsible parties as indorsers, that they might be more current. It does not appear that he ever intended to defraud, for he took up all his notes as fast as they became due; and it was this extreme regularity on his part which prevented the discovery of his fraud for so unusually long a period. It is surmised, that had not the general failure taken place, he would have eventually withdrawn all these forged bills from the market, and have paid all his creditors, reserving for himself a handsome fortune. It is a singular event in the annals of forgery, that this should have been carried on undiscovered for so unprecedented a time. Mr Rathbun is to be tried as an accessory, as it was his brother who forged the name. As soon as it was discovered, the latter made his escape, and he is said to have died miserably in a hotel on the confines of Texas.

It is worthy of note, as indicative of the alert and speculating spirit of the people of the United States, and, we fear, the want of markets for British wares, that at such places as Buffalo and Cleveland, every luxury of food, dress, or accommodation may be obtained that is to be found in New York or Boston.

In these two towns on Lake Erie are stores better furnished and handsomer than any shops at Norwich, in England; and you will find, in either of them, articles for which, at Norwich, you would be obliged to send to London. It is the same thing at almost every town in America with which communication is easy. Would you furnish a house in one of them, you will find every article of furniture—carpets, stoves, grates, marble chimney-pieces, pier-glasses, pianos, lamps, candelabra, glass, china, &c., in twice the quantity, and in greater variety, than at any provincial town in England.

This arises from the system of credit extended through every vein and artery of the country, and by which English goods are forced, as if with a force-pump, into every available depot in the Union; and thus, in a town so newly raised, that the stumps of the forest-trees are not only still surrounding the houses, but remain standing in the cellars, you will find every luxury that can be required.

Our traveller went up the lakes by the steamers, and luxuriated for a time among hunters and Indians. At Sault Ste. Marie, the Ultima Thule of America, on this point, there was found a clean comfortable inn, where the fare was well cooked, and the guests waited on by two pretty, modest, and well-informed girls, the host's daughters. There were only about fifty log-houses in this remote village, and in two of them, which Captain Marryat visited, he found complete editions of Byron's works. This was so far well; yet one could wish the denizens of Sault Ste. Marie a better foundation for their English libraries. From his picture, it would appear that neither Mrs Jameson nor Miss Martineau have over-rated the fairy beauty of Mackinaw and of the isle-studded lakes.

Other travellers have shewn us that the spirit of barter is as strong among the boys as the men of America, or that as the old cock crows the young cock learns; but Captain Marryat found that the commercial spirit had seized the ladies also. He was one day travelling, by the stage-coach, in the State of Vermont, when his only companion chanced to be two girls, both young and good-looking, the one in a pink silk bonnet, too fine for travelling, and the other in a shabby plush one.

The young lady in the plush, eyed the pink bonnet for some time: at last Plush observed in a drawling half-indifferent way:

"That's rather a pretty bonnet of your's, miss."

"Why, yes, I calculate it's rather smart," replied Pink.

After a pause and closer survey—"You wouldn't have any objection to part with it, miss?" "Well now, I don't know but I might; I have worn it but three days, I reckon." "Oh, my! I should have reckoned that you have carried it longer—perhaps it rained on them three days." "I've a notion it didn't rain, not one. It's not the only bonnet I have, miss." "Well now, I should not mind an exchange, and paying you the balance." "That's an awful thing that you have on, miss." "I rather think not, but that's as may be. Come I miss, what will you take?" "Why I don't know, what will you give?" "I reckon you'll know best when you answer my question." "Well then, I shouldn't like less than five dollars." "Five dollars and my bonnet! I reckon two would be nearer the mark—but it's of no consequence." "None in the least, miss, only I know the value of my bonnet.—We'll say no more about it." "Just so, miss."

A pause and silence for half a minute, when Miss Plush, looks out of the window, and says, as if talking to herself, "I shouldn't mind giving four dollars, but no more." She then fell back in her seat, when Miss Pink put her head out of the window and said: "I shouldn't refuse four dollars after all, if it was offered," and then she fell back to her former position.

"Did you think of taking four dollars, miss?"

"Well! I don't care, I've plenty of bonnets at home."

"Well," replied Plush, taking out her purse, and offering her the money. "What bank is this, miss?"

"Oh, all's right there, Safety Fund, I calculate."

The two ladies exchange bonnets, and Pink pockets the balance.

Whittling is a practice which Captain Marryat seems to consider peculiar to America; but the raw, emigrating Scot, of former generations, was a notorious whittler. It used to be a joke against our countrymen, that when they entered an English inn, the landlord gave them a piece of stick, that, employing the whittle upon it, the furniture might be spared. All schoolboys are notorious whittlers—witness school-desks and benches; but, in America, even ladies whittle. We would for them prefer the more feminine rocking-chair. But the Yankees use the whittle, in bargaining, as an instrument of diplomacy. Captain Marryat describes a scene to which he says he was a witness, and which Matthews might have imagined.

Whittling prevents any examination of the countenance—for, in bargaining, like in the game of brag, the countenance is carefully watched, as an index to the wishes. I was once witness to a bargain made between two respectable Yankees, who wished to agree about a farm, and in which whittling was resorted to.

They sat down on a log of wood, about three or four feet apart from each other, with their faces turned opposite ways—that is, one had his legs on one side of the log with his face to the east, and the other his legs on the other side with his face to the west. One had a piece of soft wood, and was sawing it with his penknife; the other had an unbarked hickory stick, which he was peeling for a walking-stick. The reader will perceive a strong analogy between this bargain and that in the stage between the two ladies.

"Well, good morning—and about this farm?" "I don't know; what will you take?" "What will you give?" Silence, and whittle away. "Well, I should think two thousand dollars, a heap of money for this farm." "I've a notion it will never go for three thousand, any how." "There's a fine farm, and cheaper, on the North side." "But where's the sun to ripen the corn?" "Sun shines on all alike." "Not exactly through a Vermont hill, I reckon. The driver offered me as much as I say, if I recollect right." "Money not always to be depended upon. Money not always forthcoming." "I reckon I shall make an elegant 'backy stopper of this piece of sycamore." Silence for a few moments. Knives hard at work. "I've a notion this is as pretty a hickory stick as ever came out of wood." "I shouldn't mind two thousand five hundred dollars, and time given." "It couldn't be more than six months then, if it goes at that price." Pause. "Well, that might suit me." "What do you say, then?" "Suppose it must be so." "It's a bargain then, (rising up;) come let's liquor on it."

Among the old cities, Captain Marryat prefers Philadelphia, though he can amuse himself with the exclusiveness and other absurdities of manners found there. The line of demarcation in this refined city, is minute and intricate.

In no city is there so much fuss made about lineage and descent; in no city are there so many cliques and sets in society, who keep apart from each other; and it is very often difficult to ascertain the grounds of their distinctions. One family will live at No. 1, and another at No. 2 in the same street, both have similar establishments, both keep their carriages, both be well educated, and both may talk of their grandfathers and grandmothers; and yet No. 1 will tell you that No. 2 is nobody and you must not visit there; and when you inquire—Why? there is no other answer, but that they are not of the right sort. As long as a portion are rich and a portion are poor, there is a line of demarcation easy to be drawn, even in a Democracy; but in Philadelphia, where there are so many in affluent circumstances, that line has been effaced, and they now seek an imaginary one, like the equinoctial, which none can be permitted to pass without going through the ceremonies of perfect ablution. This social contest, as may be supposed, is carried on among those who have no real pretensions.

At the White Sulphur Springs, there is a master of the ceremonies, who exercises the powers of all the patronesses of Almack's rolled into one. No one is allowed to burrow in the huts around the Springs who does not, at least, keep a carriage: but old blood is also indispensable.—Captain Marryat repeatedly condemns the Abolitionists as fanatics and fools, who will endanger the Union by their violence. He imagines that slavery must cease some time, not because it is unjust, but because, in the progress of society, it will be profitably superseded by free labour; but, if not an Abolitionist, he can nevertheless perceive the intolerant feelings of the whites; and, notwithstanding his own prejudices of race, he places faith in the possible intellectual amelioration of the blacks.

It was not (he observes) until I had been some time in Philadelphia that I became convinced how very superior the free coloured people were in intelligence and education, to what, from my knowledge of them in our West India islands, I had ever imagined them capable of. Not that I mean to imply that they will ever attain to the same powers of intellect as the white man; for I really believe the race are not formed for it by the Almighty. I do not mean to say that there never will be great men among the African race, but that such instances will always be very rare, compared to the numbers produced among the white. But this is certain, that, in Philadelphia, the free coloured people are a very respectable class, and, in my opinion, quite as intelligent as the more humble of the free whites. I have been quite surprised to see them take out their pencils, write down and calculate with quickness and precision, and in every other point shew great intelligence and keenness. In this city they are both numerous and wealthy. The most extravagant funeral I saw in Philadelphia was that of a black; the coaches were very numerous, as well as the pedestrians, who were all well dressed, and behaving with the utmost decorum. They were preceded by a black clergyman, dressed in his full black silk canonicals. He did look very odd, I must confess. Singular is the degree of contempt and dislike in which the free blacks are held in all the free States of America.

There is injustice to the blacks of the most glaring kind. While Captain Marryat was in Philadelphia, a mulatto, named James Fortin, who, as a sailmaker, had acquired property to the amount of 150,000 dollars, was considered not white enough to be allowed to vote at elections; a right which in that State the Irish pauper, landed but yesterday, may, we believe, exercise. He was, however, white enough to be made to pay his share of the local taxation. He appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming his right as a citizen, and the judge and jury found against him. A curious fact is noticed here. When the constitution of the United States was originally drawn up, the freedom of the blacks and their rights as men and citizens were recognised. But we must cite the most important new fact which this traveller has communicated.

In the course of one of my sojourns in Philadelphia, Mr Vaughan, of the Athenæum of that city, stated to me that he had found the original draft of the Declaration of Independence, in the handwriting of Mr Jefferson, and that it was curious to remark the alterations which had been made previous to the adoption of the manifesto which was afterwards promulgated. It was to Jefferson, Adams, and Franklin, that was intrusted the primary drawing up of this important document, which was then submitted to others, and ultimately to the Convention, for approval; and it appears that the question of slavery had not been overlooked when the document was first framed, as the following clause, inserted in the original draft by Mr Jefferson, (but expunged when it was laid before the Convention,) will sufficiently prove. After enumerating the grounds upon which they threw off their allegiance to the King of England, the Declaration continued, in Jefferson's nervous style:—

"He [the King] has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty, in the person of a distant people who never offended him; captivating and carrying them into slavery, in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel powers, is the warfare of the Christian King of Great Britain, determined to keep open a market where men should be bought and sold; he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or to restrain this execrable commerce; and that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished dye, he is now exciting these very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them, by murdering the people upon whom he also obtruded them; thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another."

Such was the paragraph which had been inserted by Jefferson, in the virulence of his Democracy, and his desire to hold up to detestation the King of Great Britain. Such was at that time, unfortunately, the truth; and had the paragraph remained, and at the same time emancipation been given to the slaves, it would have been a lasting stigma upon George the Third. But the paragraph was expunged; and why? because they could not hold up to public indignation the sovereign whom they had abjured, without reminding the world that slavery still existed in a community which had declared that "all men were equal;" and that if, in a monarch, they had stigmatized it as "violating the most sacred rights of life and liberty," and "waging cruel war against human nature," they could not have afterwards been so barefaced and unblushing as to continue a system which was at variance with every principle which they professed.

It does, however, satisfactorily prove that the question of slavery was not overlooked.

Captain Marryat has published, at full length, an elaborate paper upon which the judgment of the Supreme Court rested in a similar case to Fortin's, where it was found, that a negro had no right to vote under the present Constitution of the States. One curious passage from this paper we shall cite for the edification of our abolitionist readers.

But in addition to interpretation from usage, this antecedent legislation furnishes other proofs that no coloured race was party to our social compact. As was justly remarked by President Fox, in the matter of the late contested election, our ancestors settled the province as a community of white men, and the blacks were introduced into it as a race of slaves; whence an unconquerable prejudice of caste, which has come down to our day, inasmuch that a suspicion of taint still has the unjust effect of sinking the subject of it below the common level. Consistently with this prejudice, is it to be credited that parity of rank would be allowed to such a race? Let the question be answered by the statute of 1726, which denominated it an idle and a slothful people; which directed the magistrates to bind out free negroes for laziness or vagrancy; which forbade them to harbour Indian or mulatto slaves, on pain of punishment by fine, or to deal with negro slaves, on pain of stripes; which annexed to the interdict of marriage with a white, the penalty of reduction to slavery; which punished them, for tippling, with stripes, and even a white person with servitude for intermarriage with a negro. If freemen, in a political sense, were subjects of these cruel and degrading oppressions, what must have been the lot of their brethren in bondage? It is also true that degrading conditions were sometimes assigned to white men, but never as members of a caste.

It was foreseen that there would be inhabitants, neither planters nor taxable, who, though free as the winds, might be unsafe depositories of popular power; and the design was, to admit no man to the freedom of the province who had not a stake in it. That the clause which relates to freedom by service, was not intended for manumitted slaves is evident, from the fact that there were none; and it regarded not slavery, but limited servitude expired by efflux of time. At that time, certainly, the case of a manumitted slave, or of his free-born progeny, was not contemplated as one to be provided for in the founder's scheme of policy.

The feeling of race or colour breaks out in the most violent manner and among all classes of society. Captain Marryat tells of the persecution which a member of the House of Representatives underwent; who was put without the pale, for educating and acknowledging the coloured daughters whom he received into his family. But another question independently of of colour, arises here—that of illegitimacy and pure morals.

The citizens of America are no longer permitted to shew themselves, sans ceremonie, at the President's levees; the Democrat, Van Buren, having put an end to this right of equality. Upon the whole, the privileged order manage some things in the American capital pretty much as they do in Europe;—they make laws and regulations to bind every one save themselves. Oysters, spirits, and tobacco, are, we are informed, in constant requisition at Washington, as everywhere else throughout the Union; but spirituous liquors are not permitted to be sold in the capital; the consequence is, that Members of Congress, unlawfully athirst for gin, need not abstain, but they must ask for it as pale sherry; while Madeira means whisky, and brown sherry, brandy.

And thus do these potent, grave, and reverend signors evade their own laws, beneath the very hall wherein they were passed in solemn conclave. It appears that tobacco is considered very properly as an article of fashion. At a store, close to the hotel, the board outside informs you that among the fashionable requisites to be found there, are gentlemen's shirts, collars, gloves, silk handkerchiefs, and the best chewing tobacco. But not only at Washington, but at other large towns, I have seen at silk-mercers and hosiery this notice stuck up in the window—"Dulcissimus chewing tobacco."—So prevalent is the habit of chewing, and so little, from long custom, do the ladies care about it, that I have been told that many young ladies, in the South, carry, in their work-boxes, &c., pig-tail, nicely ornamented with gold and coloured papers; and when their swains are at fault administrator to their wants, thus meriting their affections by such endearing solicitude.

The wild Indians and half-breeds with whom he voyaged or sojourned about the remote stations on the lakes, gained greatly on our traveller's affections, when contrasted with the citizens he had left behind. In their deportment he considers the Indians "the most perfect gentlemen in America." Bring them on 'Change, and we apprehend the same native gentility would, in England, hold of those stoics of the woods. Few of our late travellers have visited St Louis, a town rising every year in importance, and having already a population of upwards of 20,000; and Captain Marryat does not tempt any one by his description.

In point of heat, St Louis certainly approaches the nearest to the Black Hole of Calcutta of any city that I have sojourned in. The lower part of the town is badly drained, and very filthy. The flies, on a moderate calculation, are in many parts fifty to the square inch. I wonder that they have not a contagious disease here during the whole summer; it is, however, indebted to heavy rains for its occasional purification. They have not the yellow fever here; but, during the autumn, they have one which, under another name, is almost as fatal—the bilious congestive fever. I found sleep almost impossible from the sultriness of the air, and used to remain at the open window for the greater part of the night. I did not expect that the muddy Mississippi would be able to reflect the silver light of the moon; yet it did, and the effect was very beautiful. Truly it may be said of this river, as it is of many ladies, that it is a candle-light beauty. There is another serious evil to which strangers who sojourn here are subject—the violent effects of the waters of the Mississippi upon those who are not used to them. The suburbs of the town are very pretty; and a few miles behind it, you are again in a charming prairie country, full of game, large and small. Large and small are only so by comparison. An American was asked what game they had in his district? and his reply was, "Why, we've plenty of baar (bear) and deer, but no large game to count on."

There is one great luxury in America, which is the quantity of clear pure ice which is to be obtained wherever you are, even in the hottest seasons; and ice-creams are universal and very cheap. I went into an establishment where they vended this and other articles of refreshment, when about a dozen black swarthy fellows, employed at the iron-foundry close at hand, with their dirty shirt-sleeves tucked up, and without their coats and waistcoats, came in, and sitting down, called for ice-creams. . . . I thought at the time what would the ladies who stop in their carriages at Gunter's have said, had they beheld these Cyclops with their bare sinewy arms, blackened with heat and smoke, refreshing themselves with such luxuries; but it must be remembered that porter is much the dearer article. Still the working classes all over America can command, not only all necessary comforts, but many luxuries; for labour is dear and they are very well paid.

Thank Heaven I have escaped from St Louis; during the time that I remained in that city, I was, day and night, so melting away, that I expected, like some of the immortal half-breeds of Jupiter, to become a tributary stream to the Mississippi.

The traveller is eloquent in admiration of Cincinnati,—the "pork shop of the Union"—where pigs are killed wholesale, in Waterloo numbers, and in the most scientific way imaginable. He is certainly not under the bondage of silver-fork or china-trencher prejudices. If he finds "pork and 'lashes" palatable, he praises the Republican mess, un-English though it may be, because,

In the first place, the American pork is far superior to any that we ever have salted down; and, in the next, it eats uncommonly well with molasses. I have tasted it, and "it is a fact." After all, why should we eat currant jelly with venison, and not allow the Americans the humble imitation of pork and molasses.

Mrs Trollope's bazaar raises its head in a very imposing manner: it is composed of many varieties of architecture; but I think the order under which it must be classed is the preposterous. They call it Trollope's Folly; and it is remarkable how a shrewd woman like Mrs Trollope should have committed such an error. A bazaar like an English bazaar is only to be supported in a city which has arrived at the acmé of luxury; where there are hundreds of people willing to be employed for a trifle; hundreds who will work at trifles, for want of better employment; and thousands who will spend money on trifles, merely to pass away their time. Now, in America, in the first place, there is no one who makes trifles; no one who will devote their time as sellers of the articles, unless well compensated; and no one who will be induced, either by fashion or idleness, to give a halfpenny more for a thing than it is worth. In consequence, nothing was sent to Mrs Trollope's bazaar. She had to furnish it from the shops, and had to pay very high salaries to the young women who attended; and the people of Cincinnati, aware that the same articles were to be purchased at the stores for less money, preferred going to the stores. No wonder, then, that it was a failure: it is now used as a dancing academy, and occasionally as an assembly room.

Whatever the society of Cincinnati may have been at the time that Mrs Trollope resided there, I cannot pretend to say; probably some change may have taken place in it; but at present it is as good as any in the Union, and infinitely more agreeable than in some other cities, as in it there is a mixture of the southern frankness of character. A lady, who had long resided at Cincinnati, told me that they were not angry with Mrs Trollope for having described the society which she saw, but for having asserted that that was the best society; and she further remarked—"It is fair to us that it should be understood that when Mrs Trollope came here, she was quite unknown, except inasmuch that she was a married woman, travelling without her husband. In a small society, as ours was, it was not surprising, therefore, that we should be cautious about receiving a lady who, in our opinion, was offending against les bienséances. Observe, we do not accuse Mrs Trollope of any impropriety; but you must be aware how necessary it is, in this country, to be regardful of appearances, and how afraid every one is of their neighbour. Mrs Trollope then took a cottage on the hill, and used to come down to the city to market, and attend to the erection of her bazaar. I have now told you all that we know about her, and the reason why she did not receive those attentions, the omission of which caused her indignation." I think it but fair that the lady's explanation should be given, as Mrs Trollope is considered to have been very severe and very unjust by the inhabitants of Cincinnati.

But the Cincinnatians have forgiven Mrs Trollope, and probably have improved in their manners since her visit in 1836.—Everywhere throughout the United States, where any demand is made on the purse in the nature of a tax, such demand is termed monarchical, and the tradespeople patronize no usages that are contrary to "the spirit of Republicanism." A tailor at Cincinnati refused to wait upon Captain Marryat to take his measure, upon this principle. The fairer inference is, that there is not yet much competition among the fashionable clothiers of the capital of Pork.

Captain Marryat's strictures on the American army and navy, are more worthy of attention than his dogmatizing upon the state of religion, education, and government; upon which topics, as we have hinted, his opinions are not altogether made up, or consistent with themselves. His doings in Canada have already been the subject of newspaper reports, so we need not advert to them. One Canadian patriot he met with, who prudently deferred turning out in arms, "though he had a great mind, until he could get a Julius Cæsar, a Bonaparte, or a Washington to follow—then I'll go!" A phrase everywhere thrown in the traveller's teeth, when he craved explanation of certain things which he thought odd, was—"Captain Marryat, we are a very moral people." He makes some severe, and far from unjust, remarks, on the tendency of some peculiar new societies and associations of this "very moral people;" and thus concludes, after an account of a New York society of females for the reform of brothels, or the prevention of prostitution, which has already 361 auxiliaries: "I cannot here help inquiring, how it is, if the Americans are as they assert, both orally and in their printed public documents, a very moral nation, they find it necessary to resort to all those societies for the improvement of their brother citizens, and how it is that their reports are full of such unexampled atrocities, as are printed and circulated in evidence of the necessity of stemming the current of vice." This society published a paper, once a fortnight, "devoted to the text of the seventh commandment, and to the facts and results growing out of its violation."

Captain Marryat makes the extraordinary assertion, that those who live under a Democracy, (where the highest stations and honours are open to all,) have but one pursuit, but one object to gain, which is wealth; and, because this is the case, they cannot be religious.

Under a Democracy, therefore, you must look for religion among the women, not among the men; and such is found to be the case in the United States. As Sam Slick very truly says, "It's only women who attend meetings; the men folks have their politics and trade to talk over, and haven't time." Even an established church would not make people as religious under a democratic form of government as it would under any other.

These crude opinions are not worthy of serious refutation; but we may ask Captain Marryat which sex constitutes the great majority of the congregations in English churches?—and invite him some day, when he enters a church, to count heads and bonnets. But if religion, or, as it would seem, religious observances—for he makes no distinction—fall away under a Democracy, "slander and defamation flourish under a Democracy;" and the few men who do go to church, do so not from zeal to God, but dread of their neighbours' tongues.

Captain Marryat's descriptions and anecdotes are always better than his reasoning. He was seized with a severe cold and fever in Canada, and laid up for some days at an inn at Windsor, a place opposite Detroit:—

I had been in bed three days, when my landlady came into the room. "Well, captain, how do you find yourself by this time?" "Oh, I am a little better, thank you," replied I.—"Well, I am glad of it, because I want to whitewash your room; for if the coloured man stops to do it to-morrow, he'll be for charging us another quarter of a dollar."—"But I am not able to leave my room."—"Well, then, I'll speak to him; I dare say he won't mind your being in bed while he whitewashes."

He tells of a drunken old Dutch innkeeper at Hoboken, who one night, when drunk, took the vows of the Temperance Society upon him, and believed he must keep them. He became ill from the violent change of a confirmed habit, and took to bed; when the medical adviser prescribed one ounce of French brandy every day. The Dutchman knew measures of brandy very well, but not weights, and he applied to the learned school-master:—

The schoolmaster, occupied with his pupils, and not liking the interruption, hastily, and without further inquiries of the messenger, turned over his Bonnycastle, and arriving at the table of avoirdupois weight, replied, "Tell your father that sixteen drams make an ounce."

The boy took back the message correctly, and when the old Dutchman heard it, his countenance brightened up—"A goot physician, a clever man—I only have drink twelve drams a-day, and he tells me to take sixteen."

Captain Marryat quotes a fresh-water ode recited at a cold-water celebration in Boston; but it does not nearly equal Hood's famous lyric—

"Push around the pitcher, and give it no quarter."

The Americans are as dexterous in eluding new laws which they do not like, as O'Connell in driving a coach-and-six through an act of Parliament. An order was issued that all dogs should be muzzled, and a citizen put the muzzle on his dog's tail. The game of nine-pins was foolishly prohibited, and the game of ten-pins was forthwith resorted to. But such insolent mockery of the spirit of the law cannot surely be tolerated. The average of atrocious and fraudulent crime is very high in some parts of the Union. It is asserted here, that in the town of Augusta, in Georgia, containing only a population of 3,000 persons, fifty-nine assassinations, committed in open day, took place in one year, and without any notice being taken of them by the authorities! To the case of the coloured man burnt alive at St Louis, under Lynch law, of which Miss Martineau has made so much, we could be almost reconciled by Captain Marryat's account of the malignant nature and foul crimes of the victim, save for the diabolical mode of his death. Captain Marryat considers that, in a new community, made up of a large proportion of the off-scourings of society, Lynch law, judiciously administered, may for a time be beneficial. In their own vindication, the inhabitants of Vicksburg put forth a sort of manifesto, after their execution by Lynch law of five gamblers of a gang who infested them, in which they assert that though "Order is the first law of society, there are times and situations in which its elements can only be purified by a storm;" and in this opinion Captain Marryat is rather disposed to join.

The want of reverence, or the insubordination and actual disobedience of the spoilt children of America, are animadverted upon. They are the self-willed babes of a "self-willed nation." Democracy is accused by Captain Hall as the cause of this household rebellion; but Captain Marryat is inclined to attribute it to the busy papas not having leisure or inclination to support the authority of the over-indulgent mammas. The boys wont remain at college longer than they please, nor learn except what they like; and no flogging is permitted; which want of discipline Captain Marryat considers one main cause of the evil complained of. The boys, though they must not be touched, may, however, lick the master at certain seasons. It is scarcely fair in Captain Marryat to mingle jokes and sober facts so very freely, but we take this in the order given:—

The following "Rules" are posted up in New Jersey school-house:—

"No kissing girls in school time; no licking the master during holidays."

At fifteen or sixteen, if not at college, the boy assumes the man; he enters into business, as a clerk to some merchant, or in some store. His father's home is abandoned, except when it may suit his convenience, his salary being sufficient for most of his wants. He frequents the bar, calls for gin cocktails, chews tobacco, and talks politics. His theoretical education, whether he has profited much by it or not, is now superseded by a more practical one, in which he obtains a most rapid proficiency.

The precocity and the practical genius of the Americans prevent the formation of strong family attachments. It is, however, more than any casual traveller is warranted to affirm of any people under the sun that—

Beyond the period of infancy there is no endearment between parents and children; none of that sweet spirit of affection between brothers and sisters; none of those links which unite one family; of that mutual confidence, that rejoicing in each other's success; that refuge, when we are depressed or afflicted, in the bosoms of those who love us—the sweetest portion of human existence, which supports us under, and encourages us firmly to brave, the ills of life—nothing of this exists: in short, there is hardly such a thing in America as "Home, sweet home." That there are exceptions to this, I grant; but I speak of the great majority of cases, and the results upon the character of the nation.

Captain Marryat notices, but in the slightest way, the insults offered to him in different parts of America; and, as we think, makes fully more use of Miss Martineau as a scapegoat than is quite gallant. "The mischief which Miss Martineau has entailed upon all those English who may happen to visit America" cannot be very serious. Mr Clay might, in the case cited, have been induced to imagine that his English guest was of his own way of thinking; while politeness, and deference to her host might have led her to suppress, but not to renounce her honest opinions.

Miss Martineau's error was accepting hospitalities which, right or wrong, act as gags on the traveller's freedom of speech; for her reports from the slave States go far to prove themselves. Captain Marryat wisely declined such invitations from foreseeing the necessity of a traveller submitting to the ordinary conditions of hospitality; delicacy or silence.

In concluding his work, Captain Marryat, soliciting indulgence for himself, requests that his readers will not, in justice to the Americans, decide till they have heard all he has to say upon the Society and Government of the United States, or seen his complete working out of the problem. He need not be in the least apprehensive; and, although he professes to have written every line with great deliberation, we should not be surprised at him modifying some of his opinions before the work is finished; especially as, while condemning the Democratic principle, he sees so much virtue in its practical operation. He has, however, already proved, to his own satisfaction, that Great Britain has the advantage of America in the greater security of life and property, in State religion, in education, and classic learning; the more dignified administration of justice; warmer domestic attachments; in climate; in the physical strength of the population; and the stability of political institutions;—and that America, equalling us in few things, surpasses us in none, save the better pay of her navy officers and seamen. In this unusual liberality to seamen, the Government cannot help itself. It is a matter of necessity; for “there never was, and never will be, anything like liberality” [any candle-ends and cheese-parings?] “under a democratic form of government.” Now, this very “illiberality” or economy, the Americans hold to be one of the best consequences of their Democratic institutions.

SCENES ABROAD, AND THOUGHTS AT HOME.

Nothing can exceed the beauty of a Swiss autumn. It was my good fortune to enjoy one of the finest they have had for some years past. The “travelling English,” who swarm over the Continent from May to October, had either winged their homeward flight, or housed themselves in their winter bivouacs at Interlaken or Geneva. You seldom met a tourist, and actually realized Moore's aspiration, for some “Earthly place

Where one could rest in dream Elysian,
Without some cursed round English face
Popping up to break the vision.”

The inns (the only disagreeable things in Switzerland) had resumed something like their ordinary charges: beds were to be had without bribery; and guides for something less than the salary of an under Secretary of State.

The scorching heat of the summer sun had been succeeded by a moderate, and (for a mountainous country,) an equable temperature. The foliage was tinted without the loss of its beautiful verdure. The grandeur of the Alps, and the jewellery* of Geneva, attract the great bulk of English tourists; but I confess that I prefer the softer beauties of the northern cantons, animated by the living scenery of a peasantry unique for the simplicity of their habits and the virtues of their social system. These cannot be viewed in the same perfection in the south of Switzerland.

It will be my object to attempt the description of some of the various scenes illustrative of the different phases of society in this attractive district, which it fell to my lot to encounter.

I do not think there exists a population in Europe—perhaps in the world—so happy as that of German or northern Switzerland. Almost every element seems to exist there which can secure the physical as well as the mental prosperity of a people.

The heroism of the times of Tell, tempered and sobered by the stern but peaceful religion of Calvin, have implanted courage and virtue, with their train of ramified influences, deeply into the character of the succeeding and existing people. The mountainous and physically isolated position of Switzerland, has less tended to the unchanged idiosyncrasy of this peculiar people, than the early and rigid ordeals to which their independence was subjected; and which, filling the world with the fame of its victory, has intensely endeared its spirit even to the latest generation. Their hatred to their oppressors, though long since softened by the religion of later times and the lapse of ages, has merged into a marked and permanent dissent from the opinions, habits, and economy of their neighbours: a dissent periodically strengthened by the petty tyrannies of France, and the ill-repressed contempt of the German Autocracies. That Switzerland has been suffered to exist at all—presenting the singular phenomenon of a minute Republic, encircled by belligerent and intolerant despotisms—is to be attributed (since the roads have given access to artillery) solely to the usefulness of a neutral country, as a cat's paw to commerce in times of war. During the end of the last, and for many of the earlier years of the present century, Switzerland acted as the go-between, among trading nations at war with each other; receiving goods in transit, for and from nearly every one of the allied powers and their enemies; smuggling French wines into Prussia, and English muslins, in despite of the Milan decree, into the very presence of Napoleon. But though Switzerland maintains a commercial relation with her neighbours, she is as far removed from social intercourse or natural sympathy with them as nations separated by thousands of miles. Hence the unalloyed integrity of Swiss principles, and the almost primitive purity of their habits and institutions, uncontaminated through ages by the versatile vices of France, or the servility of Austria.

In education they have been long in the van of Europe. What nature has withheld from the soil, she has lavishly repaid to the minds of its inhabitants. No murky prejudices obscure the perception; no vile servility defeats the removal of the abuses, wherewith other communities impoverish their resources and fetter their energies. In Switzerland, principle inspires and intelligence directs industry; whilst Government consists in the removal of impediments rather than in the creation of laws. Legislation is one of the chief curses of England—a trade maximized for the sake of those who govern : there, it is a protection, proportioned to the necessities of the governed, and in which the governors are divested of any pecuniary corruptions. The general content prevailing in Northern Switzerland, arises from the fact also, that the people choose their representatives for themselves ; and even, in some places, legislate for themselves in the market-places. Each canton has a separate government of its own ; and as, when an abuse is perceived it is immediately remedied, it follows that individual grievances are felt to be, if unredressed at any rate not chargeable on the Government. This feeling ensures a political calmness and quietude, which cannot be easily appreciated in a country so fevered as ours with the incubus of the few over the many. On the other hand, neither can the Swiss comprehend our position. I had a long chat, one evening, with a friend in the Canton of Appenzel, whose life had been spent in effecting social improvements ; and I explained to him the most approved plan of National Education in this country, and the provisions whereby the fullest culture of the mind, and the most complete religious training, might easily be imparted, without, in the least degree, implicating the vexata questio of creeds, or prejudicing the ascendancy of an Established Church. “Why that,” said he, “is precisely the plan we adopt here, where we have both Protestants and Catholics ; and is it not clearly and demonstrably to the advantage of all that so good a system should have the auxiliary of a government centralization ?” I agreed. “But if so, why is it not done ?” This was a question which I found it impossible to answer to my friend’s satisfaction. He could not bring himself, in the first place, to believe that mere party spirit could actuate so foul an opposition, under the mask of so much hypocrisy, as to debar the country effectually from what everybody saw plainly was so immense a benefit ; and he could still less believe that, if there were so perverse a country, England was it—England, which had so long held the highest rank in his estimation, above all other nations (save his own) for intelligence, liberality, and freedom. Living, as he did, in a country where no other rule determines legislation than what is best, he was wholly unable to conceive a state of society where everything affecting the community is referred to the interest of minute fractions of the whole, and determined, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, adversely to the interest of the population.

* The proportion of travellers who candidly admit that the watches and trinkets, of which Geneva is the grand dépôt, are their chief motives for visiting it, would almost appear incredible. Independently even of its lake, Geneva derives scenic attractions from the proximity of the Alps, which are not to be underrated.

The serenity of the Swiss arises also, in great measure, from their industry ; which may be again traced to three main causes :—First, to their religious principles ; secondly, to the comparative unfruitfulness of the soil ; and, lastly, to that perfect freedom of trade from restrictions or protecting duties, which enables them, whilst the limited fertility of the land compels them, to cultivate those arts of production alone which they can render most productive, and which are necessarily those in which they have the greatest natural capacity to excel. Thus, even the very exigencies of the soil may be said to contribute, not only to the industry, but to the peacefulness of the people ; for it will scarcely be denied, that capacity and inclination go hand in hand, where no extraneous motives or fictitious interests interpose. Thus, at least, it is in Switzerland ; and I found the instances rare in which either the pure artisan of the south-eastern or watch-making district, or the pure herdsman of Vaud, or the artisan-agriculturist of St Gall or Argorria, were desirous of quitting their avocations, or were otherwise than contented with their general condition. It was, however, chiefly in the districts in which handicraft and agricultural employments are blended, that my experiences were derived, and to which my sketches will mostly pertain.

One of the most salient features presented by the social condition of Switzerland, is the sympathy which pervades and blends classes ; and yet this in no degree infringes on the deference with which property and station are regarded. I attribute this, in some measure, to the absence of hereditary rank. Though one man may be infinitely wealthier and more powerful than his neighbours, still, as there are no primogenital channels in which property can descend through generations, increasing the distinction of caste and prestige with its age, and, as all accumulations are subdivided at death, and flow back into the fund of the community, none of the feelings engendered to what we call “family” exist in Switzerland. I am not disposed to acquiesce in the extreme opinion which condemns an aristocracy as an unqualified evil ; neither is Switzerland without one ; though the law of inheritance contributes so much less than personal desert and industry in creating it, that those arriving at, rather than born to, this distinction in Switzerland, engender sympathies towards them on the part of the poor, of which our aristocracy per se is wholly bereft. Be this as it may, the kindest feelings subsist between each class. The employer of labourers shakes hands, as a matter of course, with the cottager he visits ; the charities of life abound in a sincerity which, I confess, I had hitherto regarded as a millennial vision rather than a practice imparted, in any part of the world, to the usages of everyday life. The schools invariably contain (in the German cantons at least) a complete mixture of the children of the poor and the rich. They are brought up from infancy in constant intercourse, and the closest sympathy with each other. Thus, in after life, the poor derive continual mental benefit, and the aid of the superior information of those in higher circumstances, through the far more intimate intercourse which continues between them through life. Many scenes I witnessed evidenced the effects of these influences.

It was on a very beautiful evening, that, equipped merely with a small knapsack, and leaving everything behind me which might impede my peregrinations, wherever incited, I went on board the little iron steamer which puffs and paddles daily up and down the lake of Zürich. "Up and down," however, by no means describes the career of this indefatigable "damp-schiff." Each bank of this charming lake is studded with villages and little burghs; and as the chief source of income is derived from the villagers who come to Zürich in a morning to bring their produce to market, and return in the evening, and as the lake varied from one to five miles in width, our course resembled that of a vessel working to windward, rather than the straightforward procedure of an orthodox steamer; and by the time we arrived at our destination at Rapperschwyl, at the other end of the lake, we had zigzagged over a distance of at least treble its length. To a gentleman who left one end for the purpose of transacting business at the other, this arrangement might not have been wholly satisfactory; for my own part I enjoyed it infinitely more, for it afforded a capital opportunity of observing both the scenery and the natives. On the right, the range of the Albis mountains closed in the view with the picturesque villages which skirt the lake at its foot. Before us, the lofty mountains of the Tookenburg lay at the distance of from twenty to thirty miles, with the Hoh Sentis and Schaf Berg skirting their southern extremity. A very peculiar effect was produced by the moonlight. It had been for some time quite dark; the mountains having, for above an hour, become wholly invisible, during which time we had been constantly approaching them. Suddenly, a very brilliant streak of vivid light, presenting the outline of the mountains, appeared, high above where the horizon was when we last saw it. Gradually the entire summits of the various snowy peaks of the range became radiantly illuminated, assuming the appearance of molten silver, and deriving additional brilliancy from the intenseness of the darkness around; for the moon had not yet risen; neither did it show itself, nor lighten up the scenery around us for nearly half-an-hour after the commencement of this beautiful phenomenon. The poetry of the scene would have been perfect but for the presence of the wheezing, puffing, snorting, little steamer, which would spoil the romance of anything human.

The boat was filled, as I have already said, chiefly by the villagers returning to their homes on either side of the Lake. The left bank was in the cantons of Zürich and St Gall, and the right chiefly in that of Zug. Every one knows of the variety of Swiss costume; the peculiarities of each canton being hereditary and immutable. The term "metely crew" might, therefore, with great propriety, be applied to the cargo of our little vessel. We had the plain coiffure of Zürich, with the peacock's-tail head-dress of St Gall, and the pancake hat of Zug, relieving the common blouse of the male peasant, and interspersed with occasional specimens of the three-cornered hat, the long red waistcoat, and the deep-laced frill of the patriarchal costume. I got into conversation with one of these ancient men: he pointed out his great-grandchild among the urchins in the bow of the vessel. After some chat on the weather and the scenery, I asked him some questions about education, and questioned him as to the diffusion of education among the peasantry. He at first thought I meant the higher branches of education, and said that they generally considered it more important to perfect their children in such knowledge as more immediately fitted them for the performance of their Christian duties, and for aptitude in the arts of production; that, nevertheless, drawing, and the higher branches of arithmetic, were becoming very generally taught in the village schools. As to mere reading and writing, he maintained that it would be very difficult to find any child of twelve years of age who could not read and write with ease. In the canton of Zürich, to which he belonged, this was doubtless the case, though in some—for instance, Uri—I am disposed to think the means of education very capable of improvement. The old man persisted, however, that nothing could be more erroneous than to measure the education of a canton by the number of its schools. He believed that, frequently, the absence of schools proved the greater anxiety of the parents, as well as their proficiency, in instructing their children themselves. In summer, and before the snow sets in, said he, you will find very little home instruction, perhaps; but, if you were with us through the winter, you would find it constantly going on; not learning out of books constantly, but the elder members of a family either telling the young ones facts in our history or in that of other countries—and which please the young ones more than story-books; or answering their questions, as well as setting them sums; and letting them read the Bible or other books loud out, and explaining all difficulties that arise: this, said he, is the sort of education, accompanied by set lessons, that goes on all the winter through. I asked him whether religious instruction was invariably intermixed with secular instruction? He said it was. I expressed great surprise that the Catholic priests should allow of religious instruction where they were not themselves the teachers; as, for instance, when Catholic children are instructed, as will often happen, by Protestant masters in the schools. The general religious instruction, he said, did not involve doctrinal points; and that this was attended without interference by the respective pastors and the parents of the children. Not wishing to degrade my country in the eyes of this sensible peasant, I forbore to tell him that here the State was not allowed to emancipate education from the rigorous ascendancy of sectarianism. I did not tell him that the Established clergy of our Protestant Church refused to tolerate the equal participation of other Christians in the work of education, and prevented the State from increasing the means of this national blessing without the pale of their own priestly jurisdiction. Apropos to this subject, I cannot help taking a jump from the Lake of Zürich to Cleobury Mortimer, in Shropshire. It so happens, that a very well endowed school exists in that parish, frequented alike by Protestants and by Catholics, of whom there are several in the neighbourhood. The secular and religious instruction goes on uninterruptedly and in perfect harmony; the children, on the Sunday, attending their respective places of worship, and receiving doctrinal religious instruction from the ministers of their respective faiths. This is in the heart of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and forms a practical example of the precise plan repudiated by the Church of England as destructive of the Establishment, and impregnated with the seeds of infidelity; and yet the Church of England parishioners unite in praising this school, and admit it to work admirably. In the opposition school at Liverpool, established by the Church party, the children are compelled to attend the Established Churches on the Sabbath day, and consequently Dissenters are excluded. In the corporation schools, where the authorized version of the Bible has been in daily use among the Protestant children, and the Douay edition among the Catholic children, from the first hour of their establishment to the present, the children attend the places of worship they choose on the Sundays. This is the obvious plan to be adopted by all who sincerely desire education impregnated with religion to be diffused among the people. They who, under any pretext, would confine education, or, what is equally as bad in principle, who would confine the most effective means of education and religious instruction to the adherents of a sect, and therefore a portion of the community, excluding the rest, necessarily oppose one of the highest Christian duties incumbent on a nation.

I particularly questioned my old friend, on board the Zürich steamer, whether the Catholic priests evinced any hostility to so liberal a scheme of education. He declared quite the reverse—that they were generally amongst its warmest supporters; and, on another occasion, whilst visiting a factory, I inquired whether they had factory inspectors to enforce the half days for the education of the children; and I was informed, that there was little need for that, for the Catholic priests took good care that these regulations were put into effect, and were vigilant inspectors themselves. My old friend seemed slightly piqued at the incredulity he fancied my questions betrayed, and modestly begged to know where I was likely to be the next day, as he should have great pleasure, if I came to the village where he was going, to shew me a school, and give me an opportunity of judging of the universality of instruction. As this did not comport with the route I had chalked out, I was obliged to decline the offer. The old man, however, was ill-satisfied that I should escape without ocular proof of my supposed prejudices; and, having informed himself of my intended destination, recollected a friend living within a mile of the road I must travel, and whom he earnestly begged me to call on, as a person who was not only well acquainted with the social economy of the Swiss peasantry, but well disposed to give the benefit of his intelligence and information to those who desired it. No formal introductions are required in Switzerland—a knowledge of their language, and the fact of being an Englishman, are generally sufficient passports to their hospitality; so that I readily promised the old man to call on his friend; and, as the little steamer had by this time completed its serpentine journey, I shook hands with the patriarch, and, shouldering my knapsack, marched off to the Paon, which has the repute of being the best hotel, and where I was soon seated before an excellent supper.

Switzerland is almost the only country where one can walk with one's worldly goods on one's back into the best hotels, and receive the same civility as if one came in a carriage. The Duke of Devonshire is reputed to have been for some days expected at the Hergue at Geneva, and a suite of rooms, stables, &c., duly prepared for his reception. Two days prior to his expected arrival, a pedestrian, covered with dust, and armed with a remarkably sturdy oaken stick, walked into the hotel, and took up his quarters: two days afterwards, the servants and carriages of his Grace arrived, and not till then did the landlord discover that his pedestrian guest was none other than "Milord son Altesse" himself. A guide is, however, a much greater aid than a nuisance, much less the latter than that detestable gang of petty thieves 'yclept commissionnaires at the hotels of all the Anglo-French and Anglo-Belgian towns. The guide augments all your bills by twenty per cent., and your comforts by twenty-five: there is a clear gain in having him. He carries your knapsack, which becomes a galling burden in hot weather; he knows the shortest cuts, and the best points de vue; he translates the often unintelligible patois of the peasantry; and to those to whom you have not letters of introduction, he secures the value of them, by invariably making known those to whom you had introductions, and the attentions they commanded. I had three or four letters from the best quarters, to leading men at Zürich, and on the strength of them I might have enjoyed the hospitality of half Switzerland. My guide was already at Rapperschwyl, and the next morning I dispatched him before me to secure a dry bed at Lichtenstein, intending to follow him at my leisure, diving into every way-side nook which invited inspection—a practice which no guide tolerates with any approach to patience, unless the said places happen to be established and authorized lions. Rapperschwyl is becoming a manufacturing town; the Bromlings (among the largest of the Swiss cotton-spinners) have factories here both for dyeing and spinning. The Turkey red dyed here is peculiarly brilliant; and both the air and water are said to be extremely favourable to the clearness and the durability of the tint. My road lay alongside the Lake of Zürich, which, though sufficiently shallow, to be crossed by a long bridge of 4,500 French feet in length at Rapperschwyl, extends some miles farther eastward. The scenery was not unlike that of our Westmoreland lakes; that is to say, tame, rather than otherwise, for Switzerland. The roadside trees, especially the apple, were loaded with fruit. As they are wholly unprotected, save by the morality of the people, one cannot walk along the road without evidence of the startling and astonishing fact, that religion, and even practical virtues, can actually flourish in communities unblessed by a dominant sect which monopolises orthodox education! I passed several churches, to most of which an outdoor pulpit was attached, under a projecting roof. This blending of nature's loveliest scenery with the adoration of its Author is surely in harmony with the purest agencies of Christian truth. There is something chilling to the perception of religion, in the cold, damp, mouldy walls by which divine service is so frequently penned in, and its attendants chilled and deadened. The eminent piety of the Swiss, is not unconnected with the manifestations of God, which nature so continually presents before them. The tempest, the avalanche, the flood, and the cataract, are so many mementos of the Creator. The omnipresence of the Almighty is more palpable in Switzerland than in most other quarters of the globe, whether in revelations of power or providence, as exhibited in the convulsions or the beauties of nature. These influences have tended to vivify the faith of the people.

I shortly afterwards passed a very large new cotton-mill, erected, I believe, by the Brœmlings; it stood immediately at the foot of a perpendicular mountain, which towers up behind it, at the spot where a mountain-torrent descends; a simple wooden trough conveyed the water over the wheel; there must have been a fall of at least sixty feet; and, had the mill required it, the power might just as easily be doubled. I had seen many mills in Switzerland, and had many more to see; so that I did not think it worth while to stop here, though I afterwards repented not having done so, as it is considered one of the very first establishments of the kind in Switzerland; but, passing on to Uznacht, I took my second breakfast—an excellent plan for pedestrians—and, in referring to a letter of introduction to a proprietor not far distant, I found, with extreme pleasure, that it was addressed to the same person my old friend in the steamer had begged me to call on. On leaving Uznacht, and mounting the steep long hill which bounds the valley, or rather plain of Uznacht, on the eastern side, and while gazing on the charming view which a slight elevation commands, I was overtaken by a good-humoured looking middle-aged man, who saluted me with the usual Guten morgen, and stopped to take breath close by where I was standing; we got into conversation forthwith about the scenery, and then about Louis Napoleon, whose case just then absorbed the entire interest of the whole nation; and, after having made the usual inquiries as to the probable part that England would take, finding me to be a native of the very country which had not sided against them, and imbued with the very natural feelings of disgust which animated his own countrymen at the dictatorial conduct of France, we grew very friendly; and, ere we reached the summit of the hill he asked me my place of destination; on learning the name of the gentleman on whom I was about to call, he informed me that he was just now from home on business; but, added he, as your object is that of learning the habits of our peasantry, I think, if you will accompany me where I am now going to visit a friend who has recently married his only daughter, to a relation of mine, I shall have the greatest pleasure to introduce you, and I will promise you a hearty welcome. I readily assented to his kind proposal; and, on our way there, he confided to me the history of the bridal which had taken place. Ere his story was finished, we entered a vale of singular beauty; and he pointed out a large farm or country house on the opposite hill to that down which we had descended as the place of our destination. It was evidently the chief house of the village, though in all its features resembling the cottage architecture of Switzerland. The host met us at the door, and warmly welcomed me, on the strength of my friend's testimony to my political sympathies. He led us into a large room, where an ample dinner was in the act of being placed on the table: it was only twelve o'clock—the usual Swiss dinner-hour. We were presented to the wife and newly married daughter of our host, and shortly afterwards to the bridegroom. It is impossible to give an idea of the cordiality with which the Swiss receive and welcome you in their houses. There is a total absence, not only of the set formalities of life, but there is an absence of that constraint, and evident acting of hospitality which hampers the social intercourse of all but the highest classes in England. You cannot be for ten minutes in a Swiss family without feeling that they have no part to act; their natural feeling is precisely what it seems, and they not only appear but are glad to see you; and the English fear that you will compare the scale of your entertainment unfavourably with what you received at other houses, with all the train of petty jealousies, never so much as enter into their heads. The bride was not handsome; but I have never seen a more interesting countenance, or one more imprinted with the evidences of depth of feeling. The history of her marriage exhibits so many of the best features of Swiss habits and morals, that I cannot forbear offering a sketch of the story of this affaire de cœur.

RECOLLECTIONS OF GRASMERE.

I now resume my memoirs, from the moment of my leaving Wordsworth's cottage, after one week of delightful intercourse with him and his sister, about the 12th of November, 1807.

Soon after my return to Oxford, I received a letter from Miss Wordsworth asking for any subscriptions I might succeed in obtaining, amongst my college friends, in aid of the funds then raising in behalf of an orphan family, who had become such by an affecting tragedy that had occurred within a few weeks from my visit to Grasmere.

This calamitous incident, interesting for itself as well as for having drawn forth some beautiful stanzas from Wordsworth, had a separate and peculiar importance in reference to my own life—having been the remote occasion of another misfortune that brought to myself the first deep draught from the cup of sorrow which it was destined that I should drink. Miss Wordsworth drew up a brief memoir of the whole affair. This, I believe, went into the hands of the royal family; at any rate, the august ladies of that house (all or some of them) were amongst the many subscribers to the orphan children; and it must be satisfactory to all who shared, and happen to recollect their own share in that seasonable work of charity, that the money then collected, under the auspices of the Wordsworths, proved sufficient, with judicious administration and superintendence from a committee of the neighbouring ladies in Ambleside, to educate and settle respectably, in useful callings, the whole of a very large family, not one of whom, to my knowledge, has fared otherwise than prosperously, or, to speak of the very lowest case, decently in their subsequent lives, as men and women, long since surrounded by children of their own. Miss Wordsworth's simple but fervid memoir not being within my reach at this moment, I must trust to my own recollections and my own less personal impressions to retrace the story; which, after all, is not much of a story to excite or to impress, unless for those who can find a sufficient interest in the trials and unhappy fate of hard-working peasants, and can reverence the fortitude which, being lodged in so frail a tenement as the person of a little girl, not much, if anything, above nine years old, could face an occasion of sudden mysterious abandonment—of uncertain peril—and could tower up, during one night, into the perfect energies of womanhood—energies unsuspected even by herself—under the mere pressure of difficulty, and the sense of new-born responsibilities awfully bequeathed to her, and in the most lonely, perhaps, of all English habitations.

The little valley of Easedale, which, and the neighbourhood of which, were the scenes of these interesting events, is, on its own account, one of the most impressive solitudes amongst the mountains of the lake district; and I must pause to describe it. Easedale is impressive, first, as a solitude; for the depth of the seclusion is brought out and forced more pointedly upon the feelings by the thin scattering of houses over its sides and the surface of what may be called its floor. These are not above five or six at the most; and one, the remotest of the whole, was untenanted for all the thirty years of my acquaintance with the place. Secondly, It is impressive from the excessive loveliness which adorns its little area. This is broken up into small fields and miniature meadows, separated not—as too often happens, with sad injury to the beauty of the lake country—by stone-walls, but sometimes by little hedge-rows, sometimes by a little, sparkling, pebbly “beck,” lustrous to the very bottom, and not too broad for a child's flying leap; and sometimes by wild self-sown woodlands of birch, alder, holly, mountain ash, and hazel, that meander through the valley, intervening the different estates with natural sylvan marches, and giving cheerfulness in winter by the bright scarlet of their barrier. It is the character of all the northern English valleys, as I have already remarked—and it is a character first noticed by Wordsworth—that they assume, in their bottom areas, the level floor-like shape, making everywhere a direct angle with the surrounding hills, and definitely marking out the margin of their outlines; whereas the Welch valleys have too often the glaring imperfection of the basin shape, which allows no sense of any absolute valley surface: the hills are already commencing at the very centre of what is called the level area. The little valley of Easedale is, in this respect, as highly finished as in every other; and in the Westmoreland spring, which may be considered May and the earlier half of June, whilst the grass in the meadows is yet short from the habit of keeping the sheep on it until a much later period than elsewhere, (viz. until the mountains are so far cleared of snow, and the probability of storms, as to make it safe to send them out on their summer migration,) the little fields in Easedale have the most lawnly appearance, and, from the humidity of the Westmoreland* climate, the most verdant that it is possible to imagine, and on a gentle vernal day—when very, it a

* It is pretty generally known, perhaps, that Shaped moreland and Devonshire are the two rainiest of a great England. At Kirkby Lonsdale, lying just margin of the Lake district, one-fifth more effect, as it puted to fall than in the adjacent country faces of the side of England. But it is also noted: insult offered to ern side of the island universally hiding reliance upon east. Collins calls it the Showery and upon their re-by the name of "Far Easedale:" from which point, if you could drive a tunnel below the everlasting hills, perhaps six or seven miles might bring you to the nearest habitation of man, in Borrowdale; but, crossing the mountains, the road cannot be less than twelve or fourteen, and, in point of fatigue, at the least twenty. This long valley, which is really terrific at noon-day, from its utter loneliness and desolation, completes the defences of little sylvan Easedale. There is one door into it from the Grasmere side; but that door is hidden; and on every other quarter there is no door at all, nor any, the roughest, access, but what would demand a day's walking.

Such is the solitude—so deep, so seventimes guarded, and so rich in miniature beauty—of Easedale; and in this solitude it was that George and Sarah Green, two poor and hard-working peasants, dwelt, with a numerous family of small children. Poor as they were, they had won the general respect of the neighbourhood, from the uncomplaining firmness with which they bore the hardships of their lot, and from the decent attire in which the good mother of the family contrived to send out her children to the Grasmere school. It is a custom, and a very ancient one, in Westmoreland—and I have seen the same usage prevailing in southern Scotland—that any sale by auction, whether of cattle, of farming produce, farming stock, wood, or household furniture—and seldom a fortnight passes without something of the sort—forms an excuse for the good women, throughout the whole circumference of perhaps a dozen valleys, to assemble at the place of sale with the nominal purpose of aiding the sale, or of buying something they may happen to want. No doubt, the real business of the sale attracts numbers; although of late years—that is, for the last twenty-five years, through which so many sales of furniture the most expensive, (hastily made by casual settlers, on the wing for some fresher novelty,)—have made this particular article almost a drug in the country; and the interest in such sales has greatly declined. But, in 1807, this fever of founding villas or cottages ornées, was yet only beginning; and a sale, except it were of the sort exclusively interesting to farming men, was a kind of general intimation to the country, from the owner of the property, that he would, on that afternoon, be "at home" for all comers, and hoped to see as large an attendance as possible. Accordingly, it was the almost invariable custom—and often, too, when the parties were far too poor for such an effort of hospitality—to make ample provision, not of estables, but of liquor, for all who came. Even a gentleman, who should happen to present himself on such a festal occasion, by way of seeing the "humours" of the scene, was certain of meeting the most cordial welcome. The good woman of the house more particularly testified her sense of the honour done to her house, and was sure to seek out some cherished and solitary article of china—a wreck from a century back—in order that he, being a porcelain man amongst so many delf men and women, might have a porcelain cup to drink from. The main secret of attraction at these sales—many a score of which I have attended—was the social rendezvous thus effected between parties so remote from each other, (either by real distance or by the virtual distance which results from a separation by difficult tracts of hilly country,) that, in fact, without some such common object, and oftentimes something like a bisection of the interval between them, they would not be likely to hear of each other for months, or actually to meet for years. This principal charm of the "gathering," seasoned, doubtless, to many by the certain anticipation that the whole budget of rural scandal would then and there be opened, was not assuredly diminished to the men by the anticipation of excellent ale, (usually brewed six or seven weeks before, in preparation for the event,) and possibly of still more excellent posset, (a combination of ale, spirits, and spices;) nor to the women by some prospect, not so inevitably fulfilled, but pretty certain in a liberal house, of communicating their news over excellent tea. Even the auctioneer was always "part and parcel" of the mirth: he was always a rustic old humorist, a "character," and a jovial drunkard, privileged in certain good-humoured liberties and jokes with all bidders, gentle or simple, and furnished with an ancient inheritance of jests appropriate to the articles offered for sale—jest that had, doubtless, done their office from Elizabeth's golden days; but no more, on that account, failed of their expected effect, with either man or woman of this nineteenth century, than the sun fails to gladden the heart because it is that same old obsolete sun that has gladdened it for thousands of years. One thing, however, in mere justice to the poor indigenous dalesmen of Westmoreland and Cumberland, I am bound, in this place, to record, that, often as I have been at these sales, and through many a year before even a scattering of gentry began to attend, yet so true to the natural standard of politeness was the decorum uniformly maintained, even the old buffoon (as sometimes he was) of an auctioneer never forgot himself so far as to found upon any article of furniture a jest that could have called up a painful blush in any woman's face. He might, perhaps, go so far as to awaken a little rosy confusion upon some young bride's countenance, when pressing a cradle upon her attention; but never did I hear him utter, nor would he have been tolerated in uttering, a scurrilous or disgusting jest, such as might easily have been suggested by something offered at a household sale. Such jests as these I heard, for the first time, at a sale in Grasmere in 1814; and, I am ashamed to say it, from some "gentlemen" of a great city. And it grieved me to see the effect, as it expressed itself upon the manly faces of the grave Dalesmen—a sense of insult offered to their women, who met in confiding reliance upon the forbearance of the men, and upon their regard for the dignity of the female sex, this feeling struggling with the habitual respect they are inclined to shew towards what they suppose gentle blood and superior education. Taken generally, however, these were the most picturesque and festal meetings which the manners of the country produced. There you saw all ages and both sexes assembled: there you saw old men whose heads would have been studies for Guido: there you saw the most colossal and stately figures amongst the young men that England has to shew; there the most beautiful young women. There it was that sometimes I saw a lovelier face than ever I shall see again: there it was that local peculiarities of usage or of language were best to be studied; there—at least in the earlier years of my residence in that district—that the social benevolence, the grave wisdom, the innocent mirth, and the neighbourly kindness of the people, most delightfully expanded and expressed themselves with the least reserve.

To such a scene it was, to a sale of domestic furniture at the house of some proprietor on the point of giving up housekeeping, perhaps in order to live with a married son or daughter, that George and Sarah Green set forward in the forenoon of a day fated to be their last on earth. The sale was to take place in Langdalehead; to which, from their own cottage in Easedale, it was possible in daylight, and supposing no mist upon the hills, to find out a short cut of not more than eight miles. By this route they went; and, notwithstanding the snow lay on the ground, they reached their destination in safety. The attendance at the sale must have been diminished by the rigorous state of the weather; but still the scene was a gay one as usual. Sarah Green, though a good and worthy woman in her maturer years, had been imprudent and—as the tender consideration of the country is apt to express it—"unfortunate" in her youth. She had an elder daughter, who was illegitimate; and I believe the father of this girl was dead. The girl herself was grown up; and the peculiar solicitude of poor Sarah's maternal heart was at this time called forth on her behalf: she wished to see her placed in a very respectable house, where the mistress was distinguished for her notable qualities and her success in forming good servants. This object, so important to Sarah Green in the narrow range of her cares, as, in a more exalted family it might be to obtain a ship for a lieutenant that had passed as master and commander, or to get him "posted"—occupied her almost throughout the sale. A doubtful answer had been given to her application; and Sarah was going about the crowd, and weaving her person in and out in order to lay hold of this or that intercessor who might have, or might seem to have, some weight with the principal person concerned.

This was the last occupation which is known to have stirred the pulses of her heart. An illegitimate child is everywhere, even in the indulgent society of Westmoreland dalesmen, under some shade of discountenance; so that Sarah Green might consider her duty to be the stronger towards the child of her "misfortune." And she probably had another reason for her anxiety—as some words dropped by her on this evening led people to presume—in her conscientious desire to introduce her daughter into a situation less perilous than that which had compassed her own youthful steps with snares. If so, it is painful to know that the virtuous wish, whose

"——— vital warmth

Gave the last human motion to her heart,"

should not have been fulfilled. She was a woman of ardent and affectionate spirit, of which Miss Wordsworth's memoir, or else her subsequent memorials in conversation, (I forget which,) gave some circumstantial and affecting instances, which I cannot now recall with accuracy. This ardour it was, and her impassioned manner, that drew attention to what she did; for, otherwise, she was too poor a person to be important in the estimation of strangers, and, of all possible situations, to be important at a sale, where the public attention was naturally fixed upon the chief purchasers, and the attention of the purchasers upon the chief competitors. Hence it happened, that, after she ceased to challenge notice by the emphasis of her solicitations for her daughter, she ceased to be noticed at all; and nothing was recollected of her subsequent behaviour until the time arrived for general separation. This time was considerably after sunset; and the final recollections of the crowd with respect to George and Sarah Green, were, that, upon their intention being understood to retrace their morning path, and to attempt the perilous task of dropping down into Easedale from the mountains above Langdale Head, a sound of remonstrance arose from many quarters. However, at a moment when everybody was in the hurry of departure—and, to persons of their mature age, the opposition could not be very obstinate—party after party rode off; the meeting melted away, or, as the northern phrase is, scaled;* and, at length, nobody was left of any weight that could pretend to influence the decision of elderly people. They quitted the scene, professing to obey some advice or other upon the choice of roads; but, at as early a point as they could do so unobserved, began to ascend the hills, everywhere open from the rude carriage way. After this, they were seen no more. They had disappeared into the cloud of death. Voices were heard, some hours afterwards, from the mountains—voices, as some thought, of alarm; others said, no—that it was only the voices of jovial people, carried by the wind into uncertain regions. The result was, that no attention was paid to the sounds.

* Scaled—scale is a verb both active and neuter. I use it here as a neuter verb, in the sense (a Cumberland sense) of separating to all the thirty-two points of the compass. But by Shakespeare it is used in an active or transitive sense. Speaking of some secret news, he says—"We'll scale it a little more," i.e., spread it in all directions.

That night, in little peaceful Easedale, six children sat by a peat fire, expecting the return of their parents, upon whom they depended for their daily bread. Let a day pass, and they were starved. Every sound was heard with anxiety; for all this was reported many a hundred times to Miss Wordsworth, and those who, like myself, were never wearied of hearing the details. Every sound, every echo amongst the hills was listened to for five hours—from seven to twelve. At length, the eldest girl of the family—about nine years old—told her little brothers and sisters to go to bed. They had been taught obedience; and all of them, at the voice of their eldest sister, went off fearfully to their beds. What could be their fears, it is difficult to say; they had no knowledge to instruct them in the dangers of the hills; but the eldest sister always averred that they had a deep solicitude, as she herself had, about their parents. Doubtless she had communicated her fears to them. Some time, in the course of the evening—but it was late and after midnight—the moon arose and shed a torrent of light upon the Langdale Fells, which had already, long hours before, witnessed in darkness the death of their parents. It may be well here to cite Mr Wordsworth's stanzas:—

Who weeps for strangers? Many wept
For George and Sarah Green;
Wept for that pair's unhappy fate,
Whose graves may here be seen.
By night, upon these stormy fells,
Did wife and husband roam;
Six little ones at home had left,
And could not find that home.
For any dwellingplace of man
As vainly did they seek.
He perished; and a voice was heard—
The widow's lonely shriek.
Not many steps, and she was left
A body without life—
A few short steps were the chain that bound
The husband to the wife.
Now do those sternly-featured hills
Look gently on this grave;
And quiet now are the depths of air,
As a sea without a wave.
But deeper lies the heart of peace
In quiet more profound;
The heart of quietness is here
Within this churchyard bound.
And from all agony of mind
It keeps them safe, and far
From fear and grief, and from all need
Of sun or guiding star.
O darkness of the grave! how deep,
After that living night—
That last and dreary living one
Of sorrow and affright!
O sacred marriage-bed of death,
That keeps them side by side
In bond of peace, in bond of love,
That may not be untied!

That night, and the following morning, came a further and a heavier fall of snow; in consequence of which the poor children were completely imprisoned, and cut off from all possibility of communicating with their next neighbours. The brook was too much for them to leap; and the little, crazy, wooden bridge could not be crossed or even approached with safety, from the drifting of the snow having made it impossible to ascertain the exact situation of some treacherous hole in its timbers, which, if trod upon, would have let a small child drop through into the rapid waters. Their parents did not return. For some hours of the morning, the children clung to the hope that the extreme severity of the night had tempted them to sleep in Langdale; but this hope forsook them as the day wore away. Their father, George Green, had served as a soldier, and was an active man, of ready resources, who would not, under any circumstances, have failed to force a road back to his family, had he been still living; and this reflection, or rather semi-conscious feeling, which the awfulness of their situation forced upon the minds of all but the mere infants, taught them to feel the extremity of their danger. Wonderful it is to see the effect of sudden misery, sudden grief, or sudden fear, (where they do not utterly upset the faculties,) in sharpening the intellectual perceptions. Instances must have fallen in the way of most of us. And I have noticed frequently that even sudden and intense bodily pain is part of the machinery employed by nature for quickening the developement of the mind. The perceptions of infants are not, in fact, excited gradatim and continuously, but per saltum, and by unequals starts. At least, in the case of my own children, one and all, I have remarked, that, after any very severe fit of those peculiar pains to which the delicate digestive organs of most infants are liable, there always become apparent on the following day a very considerable increase of vital energy and of vivacious attention to the objects around them. The poor desolate children of Blentarn Ghyll,* hourly becoming more ruefully convinced that they were orphans, gave many evidences of this awaking power, as lodged, by a providential arrangement, in situations of trial that most require it. They huddled together, in the evening, round their hearth-fire of peats, and held their little councils upon what was to be done towards any chance—if chance remained—of yet giving aid to their parents; for a slender hope had sprung up that some hovel or sheep-fold might have furnished them a screen (or, in Westmoreland phrase, a biekl) against the weather quarter of the storm, in which hovel they might be lying disabled or snowed up; and, secondly, as regarded themselves, in what way they were to make known their situation, in case the snow should continue or increase; for starvation stared them in the face, if they should be confined for many days to their house. Meantime, the eldest sister, little Agnes, though sadly alarmed, and feeling the sensation of earnestness as twilight came on, and she looked out from the cottage door to the dreadful falls, on which, too probably, her parents were lying corpses, (and possibly not many hundred yards from their own threshold)—yet exerted herself to take all the measures which their own prospects made prudent. And she told Miss Wordsworth, that, in the midst of the oppression on her little spirit, from vague ghostly terrors, she did not fail, however, to draw some comfort from the consideration, that the very same causes which produced their danger in one direction, sheltered them from danger of another kind—such dangers as she knew, from books that she had read, would have threatened a little desolate flock of children in other parts of England; that, if they could not get out into Grassmere, on the other hand, bad men, and wild seafaring foreigners, who sometimes passed along the high road in that vale, could not get to them; and that, as to their neighbours, so far from having anything to fear in that quarter, their greatest apprehension was lest they might not be able to acquaint them with their situation; but that, if that could be accomplished, the very sternest amongst them were kind-hearted people, that would contend with each other for the privilege of assisting them. Somewhat cheered with these thoughts, and having caused all her brothers and sisters—except the two little things, not yet of a fit age—to kneel down and say the prayers which they had been taught, this admirable little maiden turned herself to every household task that could have proved useful to them in a long captivity. First of all, upon some recollection that the clock was nearly going down, she wound it up. Next, she took all the milk which remained from what her mother had provided for the children's consumption during her absence, and for the breakfast of the following morning—this luckily was still in sufficient plenty for two days' consumption, (skimmed or "blue" milk being only one half-penny a quart, and the quart a most redundant one, in Grassmere)—this she took and scalded, so as to save it from turning sour. That done, she next examined the meal chest; made the common oatmeal porridge of the country, (the burgoo of the royal navy;) but put all of the children, except the two youngest, on short allowance; and, by way of reconciling them in some measure to this stinted meal, she found out a little hoard of flour, part of which she baked for them upon the hearth into little cakes; and this unusual delicacy persuaded them to think that they had been celebrating a feast. Next, before night coming on should make it too trying to her own feelings, or before fresh snow coming on might make it impossible, she issued out of doors. There her first task was, with the assistance of two younger brothers, to carry in from the peatstack as many peats as might serve them for a week's consumption. That done, in the second place, she examined the potatoes buried in "brackens," (that is, withered fern;) these were not many; and she thought it better to leave them where they were, excepting as many as would make a single meal, under a fear that the heat of their cottage would spoil them if removed. Having thus made all the provision in her power for supporting their own lives, she turned her attention to the cow. Her she milked; but, unfortunately, the milk she gave, either from being badly fed, or from some other cause, was too trifling to be of much consideration towards the wants of a large family. Here, however, her chief anxiety was to get down the hay for the cow's food from a loft above the outhouse; and in this she succeeded but imperfectly, from want of strength and size to cope with the difficulties of the case; besides that the increasing darkness by this time, together with the gloom of the place, made it a matter of great self-conquest for her to work at all; and, as respected one night at any rate, she placed the cow in a situation of luxurious warmth and comfort. Then retreating into the warm house, and "barring" the door, she sat down to address the two youngest of the children: them she laid carefully and cosily in their little nests up stairs, and sang them to sleep. The rest she kept up to bear her company until the clock should tell them it was midnight; up to which time she had still a lingering hope that some welcome shout from the hills above, which they were all to strain their ears to catch, might yet assure them that they were not wholly orphans, even though one parent should have perished. No shout, it may be supposed, was ever heard; nor could a shout, in any case, have been heard, for the night was one of tumultuous wind. And though, amidst its ravings, sometimes they fancied a sound of voices, still, in the dead lulls that now and then succeeded, they heard nothing to confirm their hopes. As last services to what she might now have called her own little family, Agnes took precautions against the drifting of the snow within the door and the imperfect window, which had caused them some discomfort on the preceding day; and, finally, she adopted the most systematic and elaborate plans for preventing the possibility of their fire being extinguished, which, in the event of their being thrown upon the ultimate resource of their potatoes, would be absolutely (and in any event nearly) indispensable to their existence.

* Wordsworth's conjecture as to the origin of the name is probably the true one. There is, at a little elevation above the place, a small concave tract of ground, shaped like the bed of a tarn. Some causes having diverted the supplies of water, at some remote period, from the little reservoir, the tarn has consequently disappeared; but the bed, and other indications of a tarn, (particularly a little ghyll, or steep rocky cleft for discharging the water,) having remained as memorials that it once existed, the country people have called it the Blind Tarn.

The night slipped away, and another morning came, bringing with it no better hopes of any kind. Change there had been none, but for the worse. The snow had greatly increased in quantity; and the drifts seemed far more formidable. A second day passed like the first; little Agnes still keeping all her flock quiet, and tolerably comfortable; and still calling on all the elders in succession to say their prayers, morning and night.

A third day came; and whether it was on that or on the fourth, I do not now recollect; but on one or other there came a welcome gleam of hope. The arrangement of the snow drifts had shifted during the night; and though the wooden bridge was still impracticable, a low wall had been exposed, over which, by a very considerable circuit, and crossing the low shoulder of a hill, it seemed possible that a road might be found into Grasmere. In some walls it was necessary to force gaps; but this was effected without much difficulty, even by children; for the Westmoreland walls are always "open," that is, uncemented with mortar; and the push of a stick will readily detach so much from the upper part of an old crazy field wall, as to lower it sufficiently for female or for childish steps to pass. The little boys accompanied their sister until she came to the other side of the hill, which, lying more sheltered from the weather, and to windward, offered a path onwards comparatively easy. Here they parted; and little Agnes pursued her solitary mission to the nearest house she could find accessible in Grasmere.

No house could have proved a wrong one in such a case. Miss Wordsworth and I often heard the description renewed, of the horror which, in an instant, displaced the smile of hospitable greeting, when little weeping Agnes told her sad tale. No tongue can express the fervid sympathy which travelled through the vale, like the fire in an American forest, when it was learned that neither George nor Sarah Green had been seen by their children since the day of the Langdale sale. Within half an hour, or little more, from the remotest parts of the valley—some of them distant nearly two miles from the point of rendezvous—all the men of Grasmere had assembled at the little cluster of cottages called "Kirktown," from their adjacency to the venerable parish church of St Oswald. There were at the time I settled in Grasmere, (viz. in the Spring of 1809,) and, therefore, I suppose at this time, fifteen months previously, about sixty-three households in the vale; and the total number of souls was about 265; so that the number of fighting men would be about sixty or sixty-six, according to the common way of computing the proportion; and the majority were so athletic and powerfully built, that, at the village games of wrestling and leaping, Professor Wilson, and some visitors of his and mine, scarcely one of whom was under five feet eleven in height, with proportionable breadth, seemed but middle sized men amongst the towering forms of the Dalesmen. Sixty at least, after a short consultation as to the plan of operations, and for arranging the kind of signals by which they were to communicate from great distances, and in the perilous event of mists or snow storms, set off, with the speed of Alpine hunters, to the hills. The dangers of the undertaking were considerable, under the uneasy and agitated state of the weather; and all the women of the vale were in the greatest anxiety, until night brought them back, in a body, unsuccessful. Three days at the least, and I rather think five, the search was ineffectual: which arose partly from the great extent of ground to be examined, and partly from the natural mistake made of ranging almost exclusively on the earlier days on that part of the hills over which the path to Basedale might be presumed to have been selected under any reasonable latitude of circuitousness. But the fact is, when the fatal accident (for such it has often proved) of a permanent mist surprises a man on the hills, if he turns and loses his direction, he is a lost man; and without doing this so as to lose the power of s'orienter in one instant, it is well known how difficult it is to avoid losing it insensibly and by degrees. Baffling snow showers are the worst kind of mists. And the poor Greens had, under that kind of confusion, wandered many a mile out of their proper track. The seal of the people, meantime, was not in the least abated, but rather quickened, by the wearisome disappointments; every hour of day-light was turned to account; no man of the valley ever came home to dinner; and the reply of a young shoemaker, on the fourth night's return, speaks sufficiently for the unabated spirit of the vale. Miss Wordsworth asked what he would do on the next morning. "Go up again, of course," was his answer. But what if to-morrow also should turn out like all the rest? "Why go up in stronger force on the next day." Yet this man was sacrificing his own daily earnings without a chance of recompense. At length, sagacious dogs were taken up; and, about noonday, a shout from an aerial height, amongst thick volumes of cloudy vapour, propagated through repeating bands of men from a distance of many miles, conveyed as by telegraph the news that the bodies were found. George Green was found lying at the bottom of a precipice, from which he had fallen. Sarah Green was found on the summit of the precipice; and, by laying together all the indications of what had passed, the sad hieroglyphics of their last agonies, it was conjectured that the husband had desired his wife to pause for a few minutes, wrapping her, meantime, in his own greatcoat, whilst he should go forward and reconnoitre the ground, in order to catch a sight of some object (rocky peak, or tarn, or peat-field) which might ascertain their real situation. Either the snow above, already lying in drifts, or the blinding snow storms driving into his eyes, must have misled him as to the nature of the circumjacent ground; for the precipice over which he had fallen was but a few yards from the spot in which he had quitted his wife. The depth of the descent, and the fury of the wind, (almost always violent on these cloudy altitudes,) would prevent any distinct communication between the dying husband below and his despairing wife above; but it was believed by the shepherds, best acquainted with the ground and the range of sound as regarded the capacities of the human ear under the probable circumstances of the storm, that Sarah might have caught, at intervals, the groans of her unhappy partner, supposing that his death were at all a lingering one. Others, on the contrary, supposed her to have gathered this catastrophe rather from the want of any sounds, and from his continued absence, than from any one distinct or positive expression of it; both because the smooth and unrudded surface of the snow where he lay seemed to argue that he had died without a struggle, perhaps without a groan, and because that tremendous sound of "hurting" in the upper chambers of the air, which often accompanies a snow storm, when combined with heavy gales of wind, would utterly oppress and stifle (as they conceived) any sounds so feeble as those from a dying man. In any case, and by whatever sad language of sounds or signs, positive or negative, she might have learned or guessed her loss, it was generally agreed that the wild shrieks hard towards midnight in Langdale* Head announced the agonizing moment which brought to her now widowed heart the conviction of utter desolation and of final abandonment to her own fast-fleeting energies. It seemed probable that the sudden disappearance of her husband from her pursuing eyes would teach her to understand his fate; and that the consequent indefinite apprehension of instant death lying all around the point on which she sat, had kept her stationary to the very attitude in which her husband left her, until her failing powers and the increasing bitterness of the cold, to one no longer in motion, would soon make those changes of place impossible, which, at any rate, had appeared too dangerous. The footsteps in some places, wherever drifting had not obliterated them, yet traceable as to the outline, though partially filled up with later falls of snow, satisfactorily shewed that however much they might have rambled, after crossing and doubling upon their own paths, and many a mile astray from their right track, still they must have kept together to the very plateau or shelf of rock at which their wanderings had terminated; for there were evidently no steps from this plateau in the retrograde order. By the time they had reached this final stage of their erroneous course, all possibility of escape must have been long over for both alike; because their exhaustion must have been excessive before they could have reached a point so remote and high; and, unfortunately, the direct result of all this exhaustion had been to throw them farther off their home, or from "any dwellingplace of man," than they were at starting. Here, therefore, at this rocky pinnacle, hope was extinct for either party. But it was the impression of the vale, that, perhaps, within half an hour before reaching this fatal point, George Green might, had his conscience or his heart allowed him in so base a desertion, have saved himself singly, without any very great difficulty. It is to be hoped, however—and, for my part, I think too well of human nature to hesitate in believing—that not many even amongst the meaner-minded and the least generous of men could have reconciled themselves to the abandonment of a poor fainting female companion in such circumstances. Still, though not more than a most imperative duty, it was one (I repeat) which most of his associates believed to have cost him (perhaps consciously) his life. For his wife not only must have disabled him greatly by clinging to his arm for support; but it was known, from her peculiar character and manner, that she would be likely to rob him of his coolness and presence of mind by too painfully fixing his thoughts, where her own would be busiest, upon their helpless little family. "Stung with the thoughts of home"—to borrow the fine expression of Thomson in describing a similar case—alternately thinking of the blessedness of that warm fire-side at Blentarn Ghyll, which was not again to spread its genial glow through her freezing limbs, and of those darling little faces which, in this world, she was to see no more; unintentionally, and without being aware even of that result, she would rob the brave man (for such he was) of his fortitude, and the strong man of his animal resources. And yet—(such, in the very opposite direction, was equally the impression universally through Grasmere)—had Sarah Green foreseen, could her affectionate heart have guessed even the tenth part of that love and neighbourly respect for herself, which soon afterwards expressed themselves in showers of bounty to her children; could she have looked behind the curtain of destiny sufficiently to learn that the very desolation of these poor children which wrung her maternal heart, and doubtless constituted to her the sting of death, would prove the signal and the pledge of such anxious guardianship as not many rich men's children receive, and that this overflowing offering to her own memory would not be a hasty or decaying tribute of the first sorrowing sensibilities, but would pursue her children steadily until their hopeful settlement in life—or anything approaching this, to have known or have guessed, would have caused her (as all said who knew her) to welcome the bitter end by which such privileges were to be purchased.

The funeral of the ill-fated Greens was, it may be supposed, attended by all the vale: it took place about eight days after they were found; and the day happened to be in the most perfect contrast to the sort of weather which prevailed at the time of their misfortune; some snow still remained here and there upon the ground; but the azure of the sky was unstained by a cloud; and a golden sunlight seemed to sleep, so balmy and tranquil was the season, upon the very hills where they had wandered—then a howling wilderness, but now a green pastoral lawn, in its lower ranges, and a glittering expanse, smooth, apparently, and not difficult to the footing, of virgin snow, in its higher. George Green had, I believe, an elder family by a former wife; and it was for some of these children, who lived at a distance, and who wished to give their attendance at the grave, that the funeral was delayed. After this solemn ceremony was over—at which, by the way, I then heard Miss Wordsworth say that the grief of Sarah's illegitimate daughter was the most overwhelming she had ever witnessed—a regular distribution of the children was made amongst the wealthier families of the vale. There had already, and before the funeral, been a perfect struggle to obtain one of the children, amongst all who had any facilities for discharging the duties of such a trust; and even the poorest had put in their claim to bear some part in the expenses of the case. But it was judiciously decided, that none of the children should be entrusted to any persons who seemed likely, either from old age, or from slender means, or from nearer and more personal responsibilities, to be under the necessity of devolving the trust, sooner or later, upon strangers, who might have none of that interest in the children which attached, in their minds, the Grasmere people to the circumstances that made them orphans. Two twins, who had naturally played together and slept together from their birth, passed into the same family: the others were dispersed; but into such kind-hearted and intelligent families, with continual opportunities of meeting each other on errands, or at church, or at sales, that it was hard to say which had the happier fate. And thus, in so brief a period as one fortnight, a household that, by health and strength, by the humility of poverty, and by innocence of life, seemed sheltered from all attacks but those of time, came to be utterly broken up. George and Sarah Green slept in Grasmere churchyard, never more to know the want of "sun or guiding star." Their children were scattered over wealthier houses than those of their poor parents, through the vales of Grasmere or Rydal; and Blentarn Ghyll, after being shut up for a season, and ceasing for months to send up its little slender column of smoke at morning and evening, finally passed into the hands of a stranger.

* I once heard, also, in talking with a Langdale family upon this tragic tale, that the sounds had penetrated into the Valley of Little Langdale; which is possible enough. For although this interesting recess of the entire Langdale basin (which bears somewhat of the same relation to Great Langdale that Easedale bears to Grasmere) does, in fact, lie beyond Langdale Head by the entire breadth of that dale, yet, from the singular accident of having its area raised far above the level of the adjacent vales, one most solitary section of Little Langdale (in which lies a tiny lake, and on the banks of that lake dwells one solitary family) being exactly at right angles both to Langdale Head and to the other complementary section of the Lesser Langdale, is brought into a position and an elevation virtually much nearer to objects (especially to audible objects) on the Langdale Fells.

The Wordsworths, meantime, were so much interested in the future fortunes and the suitable education of the children—feeling, no doubt, that, when both parents, in any little sequestered community, such as that of Grasmere, are suddenly cut off by a tragical death, the children, in such a case, become, in all reason and natural humanity, a bequest to the other members of that community—that they energetically applied themselves to the task of raising funds by subscription; most of which, it is true, might not be wanted until future years should carry one after another of the children successively into different trades or occupations; but they well understood, that more, by tenfold, would be raised under an immediate appeal to the sympathies of men, whilst yet burning fervently towards the sufferers in this calamity, than if the application were delayed until the money should be needed. I have mentioned that the Royal Family were made acquainted with the details of the case; that they were powerfully affected by the story, especially by the account of little Agnes, and her premature assumption of the maternal character; and that they contributed most munificently. For my part I could have obtained a good deal from the careless liberality of Oxonian friends towards such a fund. But finding, or rather knowing previously how little, in such an application, it would aid me to plead the name of Wordsworth as the mover of the subscription, (a name that now would stand good for some thousands of pounds in that same Oxford—so passes the injustice as well as the glory of this world!)—knowing this, I did not choose to trouble anybody; and the more so as Miss Wordsworth, upon my proposal to write to various ladies, upon whom I knew that I could rely for their several contributions, wrote back to me, desiring that I would not; and upon this satisfactory reason—that the fund had already swelled under the Royal patronage, and the interest excited by so much of the circumstances as could be reported in hurried letters, to an amount beyond what was likely to be wanted for persons whom there was no good reason for pushing out of the sphere to which their birth had called them. The parish even was liable to give aid; and, in the midst of Royal bounty, this was not declined. Finally, the Wordsworths took into their own family one of the children; a girl; Sarah by name; the least amiable, I believe, of the whole; so, at least, I imagined; for this girl it was, and her criminal negligence, that in years to come inflicted the first heavy wound that I sustained in my affections, and first caused me to drink deeply from the cup of grief.

In taking leave of this subject, I may mention, by the way, that accidents of this nature are not by any means so uncommon, in the mountainous districts of Cumberland and Westmoreland, as the reader might infer from the intensity of the excitement which waited on the catastrophe of the Greens. In that instance, it was not the simple death by cold upon the hills, but the surrounding circumstances, which invested the case with its agitating power: the fellowship in death of a wife and husband; the general impression that the husband had perished in his generous devotion to his wife, (a duty certainly, and no more than a duty, but still, under the instincts of self-preservation, a generous duty;) sympathy with their long agony, as expressed by their long ramblings, and the earnestness of their efforts to recover their home; awe for the long concealment which rested upon their fate; and pity for the helpless condition of the children, so young, and so instantaneously made desolate, and so nearly perishing through the loneliness of their situation, co-operating with stress of weather, had they not been saved by the prudence and timely exertions of a little girl, not much above eight years old;—these were the circumstances and accessory adjuncts of the story which pointed and sharpened the public feelings on that occasion. Else the mere general case of perishing upon the mountains is not, unfortunately, so rare, in any season of the year, as, for itself alone, to command a powerful tribute of sorrow from the public mind. Natives as well as strangers, shepherds as well as tourists, have fallen victims, even in summer, to the misleading and confounding effects of deep mists. Sometimes they have continued for days to wander unconsciously in a small circle of two or three miles, never coming within hail of a human dwelling, until exhaustion has forced them into a sleep which has proved their last. Sometimes a sprain or injury, that disabled a foot or a leg, has destined them to die by the shocking death of hunger.* Sometimes a fall from the summit of awful precipices has dismissed them from the anguish of perplexity in the extreme, from the conflicts of hope and fear, and in the same moment perhaps from life. Sometimes, also, the mountainous solitudes have been made the scenes of remarkable suicides: in particular, there was a case, a little before I came into the country, of a studious and meditative young boy, who found no pleasure but in books, and the search after knowledge. He languished, with a sort of despairing nympholepsy, after intellectual pleasures—for which he felt too well assured that his term of allotted time, the short period of years through which his relatives had been willing to support him at St Bees, was rapidly drawing to an end. It fact, it was just at hand; and he was sternly required to take a long farewell of the poets and geometricians for whose sublime contemplations he hungered and thirsted. One week was to have transferred him to some huxtering concern, which not in any spirit of pride he ever affected to despise, but which in utter alienation of heart he loathed—as one whom nature, and his own diligent cultivation of the opportunities recently open to him for a brief season, had dedicated to another yoke. He mused—revolved his situation in his own mind

* The case of Mr Gough, who perished in the bosom of Helvellyn, and was supposed by some to have been disabled by a sprain of the ankle, whilst others believed him to have received that injury and his death simultaneously, in a fall from the lower shelf of a precipice, became well known to the public, in all its details, from the accident of having been recorded in verse by two writers nearly at the same time—by Sir Walter Scott, and by Wordsworth. But here, again, as in the case of the Greens, it was not the naked fact of his death amongst the solitudes of the mountains that would have won the public attention, or have obtained the honour of a metrical commemoration—indeed, to say the truth, the general sympathy with this tragic event was not derived chiefly from the unhappy tourist's melancholy end, for that was too shocking to be even hinted at by either of the two writers, (in fact, there was too much reason to fear that it had been the lingering death of famine)—not the personal sufferings of the principal figure in the little drama—but the sublime and mysterious fidelity of the secondary figure, his dog; this it was which won the imperishable remembrance of the vales, and which accounted for the profound interest that immediately gathered round the incidents—an interest that still continues to hallow the memory of the dog. Not the dog of Athens, nor the dog of Pompeii, so well deserve the immortality of history or verse. Mr Gough was a young man, belonging to the Society of "Friends," who took an interest in the mountain scenery of the lake district, both as a lover of the picturesque, and as a man of science. It was in this latter character, I believe, that he had ascended Helvellyn at the time when he met his melancholy end. From his local familiarity with the ground—for he had been an annual visitant to the lakes—he slighted the usual precaution of taking a guide; and, probably, under any clear state of the atmosphere, he might have found the attendance of such a person a superfluous restraint upon the freedom of his motions, and of his solitary thoughts. Mist, unfortunately—impenetrable volumes of mist—came floating over (as so often they do) from the gloomy falls that compose a common centre for Keadale, Langdale, Eekdale, Borrowdale, Wastdale, Gatesgarthdale, (pronounced Keskadale,) and Binesdale. Ten or fifteen minutes afford ample time for this aerial navigation: within that short interval, sunlight, moonlight, starlight, alike disappear; all paths are lost; vast precipices are concealed, or filled up by treacherous draperies of vapour; the points of the compass are irrecoverably confounded; and one vast cloud, too often the cloud of death even to the experienced shepherd, sits like a vast pavilion upon the summits and the gloomy coaves of Helvellyn. Mr Gough ought to have allowed for this not unfrequent accident, and for its bewildering effects, under which all local knowledge (even that of shepherds) becomes in an instant unavailing. What was the course and succession of his dismal adventures, after he became hidden from the world by the vapoury screen, could not be deciphered even by the most sagacious of mountaineers, although, in most cases, they manifest an Indian truth of eye, together with an Indian felicity of weaving all the signs that the eye can gather into a significant tale, by connecting links of judgment and natural inference, especially where the whole case ranges within certain known limits of time and of space; but in this case two accidents forbade the application of their customary skill to the circumstances. One was, the want of snow at the time, to receive the impression of his feet; the other, the unusual length of time through which his remains lay undiscovered. He had made the ascent at the latter end of October—a season when the final garment of snow, which clothes Helvellyn from the setting-in of winter to the sunny days of June, has frequently not made its appearance. He was not discovered until the following spring, when a shepherd, traversing the coaves of Helvellyn or of Fairfield in quest of a stray sheep, was struck by the unusual sound (and its echo from the neighbouring rocks) of a short, quick bark, or cry of distress, as if from a dog or young fox. Mr Gough had not been missed: for those who saw or knew of his ascent from the Wyburn side of the mountain, took it for granted that he had fulfilled his intention of descending in the opposite direction into the valley of Patterdale, or into the Duke of Norfolk's deer-park on Ulleswater, or possibly into Matterdale; and that he had finally quitted the country by way of Penrith. Having no reason, therefore, to expect a domestic animal in a region so far from human habitations, the shepherd was the more surprised at the sound, and its continued iteration. He followed its guiding, and came to a deep hollow, near that awful curtain of rock called Striding-Edge. There, at the foot of a tremendous precipice, lay the body of the unfortunate tourist; and, watching by his side, a meagre shadow, literally reduced to a skin and to bones that could be counted, (for it is a matter of absolute demonstration that he never could have obtained either food or shelter through his long winter's imprisonment,) sat this most faithful of servants—mounting guard upon his master's honoured body, and protecting it (as he had done effectually) from all violation by the birds of prey which haunt the central solitudes of Helvellyn:—

"How nourish'd through that length of time
He knows—who gave that love sublime,
And sense of loyal duty—great Beyond all human estimate."

—computed his power to liberate himself from the bondage of dependancy—calculated the chances of his ever obtaining this liberation, from change in the position of his family, or revolution in his fortunes—and, finally, attempted conjecturally to determine the amount of effect which his new and illiberal employments might have upon his own mind in weaning him from his present elevated tasks, and unfitting him for their enjoyment in distant years, when circumstances might again place it in his power to indulge them. These meditations were, in part, communicated to a friend; and in part, also, the result to which they brought him. That this result was gloomy, his friend knew; but not, as in the end it appeared, that it was despairing. Such, however, it was: and, accordingly, having satisfied himself that the chances of a happier destiny were for him slight or none—and having, by a last fruitless effort, ascertained that there was no hope whatever of mollifying his relatives, or of obtaining a year's delay of his sentence—he walked quietly up to the cloudy wildernesses within Blencathara; read his Æschylus, (perhaps in those appropriate scenes of the Prometheus, that pass amidst the wild valleys of the Caucasus, and below the awful summits, untrod by man, of the ancient Elborus;) read him for the last time; for the last time fathomed the abyss-like subtleties of his favourite geometrician, the mighty Apollonius; for the last time retraced some parts of the narrative, so simple in its natural grandeur, composed by that imperial captain, the most majestic man of ancient history—

“The foremost man of all this world,” in the confession of his enemies—the first of the Cæsars. These three authors—Æschylus, Apollonius, and Cæsar—he studied until the daylight waned, and the stars began to appear. Then he made a little pile of the three volumes that served him for a pillow; took a dose, such as he had heard would be sufficient, of laudanum; laid his head upon the records of the three mighty spirits of elder times; and, with his face upturned to the heavens and the stars, slipped quietly away into a sleep upon which no morning ever dawned. The laudanum—whether it were from the effect of the open air, or from some peculiarity of temperament—had not produced sickness in the first stage of its action, nor convulsions in the last. But from the serenity of his countenance, and from the tranquil maintenance of his original supine position—for his head was still pillowed upon the three intellectual Titans, Greek and Roman, and his eyes were still directed towards the stars—it would appear that he had died placidly, and without a struggle. In this way, the imprudent boy, who, like Chatterton, would not wait for the change that a day might bring, obtained the liberty he sought; and whatsoever, in his last scene of life, was not explained by the objects and the arrangement of the objects, about him, found a sufficient solution in previous conversations with various acquaintances, and in his confidential explanations of his purposes, which he had communicated, so far as he felt it safe, to his only friend.

Reverting, however, from this little episode to the more ordinary case of shepherds, whose duties, in searching after missing sheep, or after sheep surprised by sudden snow-drifts, are too likely, in all seasons of severity, to bring them within reach of dangers which, in relation to their natural causes, must probably for ever remain the same; and it seems the more surprising, and the more to be deplored, that no effort has been made, or at least none commensurate to the evil—none upon a scale that can be called national—to apply the resources of art and human contrivance, in any one of many possible modes, to the relief of a case which, in some years, has gone near to the depopulation of a whole pastoral hamlet, as respects the most vigorous and hopeful part of its male population; and which annually causes, by its mere contemplation, the heartach to many a young wife, and many an anxious mother. In reality, amongst all pastoral districts, where the field of their labour lies in mountainous tracts, an allowance is as regularly made for the loss of human life, in severe autumns or springs—by accidents, owing to mists or storms suddenly enveloping the hills, and surprising the shepherds—as for the loss of sheep: some proportion out of each class is considered as a kind of tithe-offering to the stern goddess of calamity, and in the light of a ransom for those who escape. Grahame, the excellent author of “The Sabbath,” says that (confining himself to Scotland) he has known winters in which a single parish lost as many as ten shepherds. And this mention of Grahame reminds me of a most most useful and feasible plan proposed by him for obviating the main pressure of such situations, amidst snow, and solitude, and night. I call it feasible with good reason; for Grahame, who doubtless had made the calculations, declares that, for so trifling a sum as a few hundred pounds, every square mile in the southern counties of Scotland, (that is, I presume, throughout the Lowlands,) might be fitted up with his apparatus; and, when that sum is compared with the lavish expenditure upon lifeboats, it will appear trivial indeed. He prefaces his plan by one general remark, to which I believe that every mountaineer will assent, viz. that the vast majority of deaths in such cases is owing to the waste of animal power in trying to recover the right direction; and, probably, it would be recovered in a far greater number of instances, were the advance persisted in according to any unity of plan: but partly the distraction of mind, and irresolution, under such circumstances, cause the wanderer frequently to change his direction voluntarily, according to any new fancy that starts up to beguile him; and partly, he changes it often insensibly and unconsciously, from the same cause which originally led him astray. Obviously, therefore, the primary object should be, to compensate the loss of distinct vision—which, for the present, is irreparable in that form—by substituting an appeal to another sense. That error which has been caused by the obstruction of the eye, may be corrected by the sounder information of the ear. Let crosses, such as are raised for other purposes in Catholic lands, be planted at intervals, suppose of one mile, in every direction. "Snow storms," says Grahame, "are almost always accompanied with wind. Suppose, then, a pole, fifteen feet high, well fixed in the ground, with two cross spars placed near the bottom, to denote the airts, (or points of the compass;) a bell, hung at the top of this pole, with a piece of flat wood (attached to it) projecting upwards, would ring with the slightest breeze. As they would be purposely made to have different tones, the shepherd would soon be able to distinguish one from another. He could never be more than a mile from one or other of them. On coming to the spot, he would at once know the points of the compass, and, of course, the direction in which his home lay." This is part of the note attached to the "Winter Sabbath Walk," and particularly referring to the following picturesque passages:—

"Now is the time
To visit Nature in her grand attire;
Though perilous the mountainous ascent,
A noble recompense the danger brings.
How beautiful the plain stretch'd far below!
Unvaried though it be, save by yon stream
With azure windings, or the leafless wood.
But what the beauty of the plain compar'd
To that sublimity which reigns enthron'd,
Holding joint rule with solitude divine,
Among yon rocky fells that bid defiance
To steps the most adventurously bold?
There silence dwells profound; or, if the cry
Of high-pois'd eagle break at times the calm,
The mantled echoes no response return.

But let me now explore the deep-sunk dell.
No foot-print, save the covey's or the flock's,
Is seen along the rill, where marshy springs
Still rear the grassy blade of vivid green.
Beware, ye shepherds, of these treacherous haunts;
Nor linger there too long: the wintry day
Soon closes; and full oft a heavier fall
Heaped by the blast, fills up the shelter'd glen,
While, gurgling deep below, the buried rill Mines for itself a snow-cov'ed way. O then
Your helpless charge drive from the tempting spot;
And keep them on the bleak hill's stormy side,
Where night-winds sweep the gathering drift away."

A more useful suggestion was never made. Many thousands of lives would be saved in each century by the general adoption of Mr Grahame's plan; and two or three further hints may be added. 1. Before these crosses can be sown as plentifully as he proposes, it will, in a large majority of cases, answer the same end, to make such an approximation to his plan as would not cost, perhaps, more than one quarter of the first expense, viz.—by placing the crosses at such distances that the bell might make itself heard: suppose the intervals to be four miles, then the greatest possible distance from the sound would be two miles; and so far a bell might send its sound upon the breeze, for there will be always some of these crosses to windward. 2. They might be made of cast-iron—as one means of ensuring their preservation. 3. There might be a box, or little cell attached, capable of receiving one person; this should be suspended at a height, suppose of eight feet, from the ground; and the entrance should be by a little ladder leading into the box through an orifice from below; which orifice should be covered by a little door or lid—one that should open inwards when pressed by the head of the ascending person. Finally, in a country where mile-stones and guide-posts are often wantonly mutilated or destroyed, it may be thought that these crosses would not long be in a condition to do their office; in particular, that the bells would be detached and carried off. But it should be remembered, that even mile-stones on the most public roads have ceased to be injured since they have been made of iron; that these crosses never would be in a populous region, but exactly in the most solitary places of the island; and that in any case where they ceased to be solitary, there the crosses would cease to be necessary. Another protecting circumstance would rise out of the simplicity of manners, which is pretty sure to prevail in a mountainous region, and the pious tenderness universally felt towards those situations of peril, which are incident to all alike—men and women, parents and children, the strong and the weak. The crosses, I would answer for it, whenever they are erected, will be protected by a superstition, such as that which in Holland consecrates the loss of a stork, and in most countries of some animal or other. But it would be right to strengthen this feeling, by instilling it as a principle of duty, in the catechisms of mountainous regions: and, perhaps, also, to invest this duty with a religious sanctity, at the approach of every winter, there might be read from the altar a solemn commination, such as that which the English Church appoints for Ash-Wednesday—"Cursed is he that removeth his neighbour's landmark," &c. &c., to which might now be added—"Cursed is he that causeth the steps of the wayfarer to go astray, and layeth snares for the belated traveller in the wilderness; cursed is he that removeth the bell from the snow-cross." And every child might learn to fear a judgment of retribution upon its own steps in case of any such wicked action, by reading the tale of him, who, in order "To plague the Abbot of Aberbrothock," removed the bell from the Inchcape rock; which same rock, in after days, and for want of this very warning bell, inflicted miserable ruin upon himself, his ship, and his unoffending crew. Warning sentences should also be inscribed upon all the four faces of the little cell, that nobody might offend in a spirit of jest or forgetfulness; and as the century advanced, a memorial list, (like the Roman votive tablets, suspended on the walls of temples,) should be firmly attached to the cross, of all who had benefited by its shelter. The mere fact of having ascended the ladder being taken as sufficient evidence that a sanctuary had been found necessary. The sanctity of the place might, in one generation, be so far improved as to protect a small supply of brandy and biscuit, to be lodged there on the coming on of winter. If a few rockets, and some apparatus for lighting a match were also left accessible in some of the remoter solitudes, the storm-bound and exhausted wanderer, would, besides recruiting his strength, find it possible to telegraph his situation to some one of the neighbouring valleys. Once made sacred from violation, these crosses might afterwards be made subjects of suitable ornament; that is to say, they might be made as picturesque in form, and colour, and material, as the crosses of Alpine countries, or the guide-posts of England often are. The associated circumstances of storm and solitude, of winter, of night, and wayfaring, would give dignity to almost any form which had become familiar to the eye as the one appropriated to this purpose; and the particular form of a cross or crucifix, besides its own beauty, would suggest to the mind a pensive allegoric memorial of that spiritual asylum, offered by the same emblem to the poor erring roamer in our human pilgrimage, whose steps are beset with other snares, and whose heart is made anxious by another darkness, and another storm—the darkness of guilt, or the storm of affliction. If iron was found too costly, it might be used only for the little cell; and the rest of the structure might be composed with no expense at all, except the labour, (and that would generally be given by public contribution of the neighbourhood,) from the rude undressed stones which are always found lying about in such situations, and which are so sufficient for all purposes of strength, that the field-walls, and by far the greater number of the dwelling-houses in Westmoreland, are built of such materials, and, until late years, without mortar.* But, whatever were the materials, the name of these rural guides and asylums—"storm-crosses"—would continually remind both the natives and strangers of their purpose and functions—functions that, in the process of time, would make them as interesting to the imagination and to the memory, as they would, in fact, be useful and hope-sustaining to the shepherd surprised by snow, and the traveller surprised by night.

* This recent change in the art of rustic masonry by the adoption of mortar, does not mark any advance in that art, but, on the contrary, a decay of skill and care. Twenty years ago, when "dry" walls were in general use except for a superior class of houses, it was necessary to supply the want of mortar by a much nicer adaptation of the stones to each other. But now this care is regarded as quite superfluous; for the largest gaps and cavities amongst the stones are filled up with mortar; meantime, the walls built in this way are not so impervious either to rain or wind as those upon the old patent construction of the past generation.

FEAST OF THE POETS FOR SEPTEMBER, 1839.

THE most bland and conciliatory of Lords Marshal, or Masters of the Ceremonies, are liable, we understand, to occasional perplexity in arranging the order of grand processions, and the high places at feasts, even where rank is absolute, and usage and etiquette fixed. We confess to something of the same difficulty in arranging the order of our usual Autumnal Festival.

The epic, the dramatic, the didactic, the descriptive, the purely lyric, the sonnet, and the ballad, press for precedence, and overwhelm us with the embarrassment of riches. There is, however, one kind of verse which conciliates every diversity of taste by uniting all sympathies. The poetry of the affections never loses the power to please. In this captivating species of verse, our principal contributors this year are ladies—another claim to precedence.

POETRY OF THE AFFECTIONS.

TIME'S CHANGES.

"Elle était de ce monde, ou les plus belles choses ont le pire destin."

I saw her once, in other days,
A fair and girlish thing,
With the flush of hope upon her cheek,
And the bloom of early spring.

I never heard a voice so sweet—
Its very slightest tone
Woke deep sad memories in my heart,
Of times and voices gone.

NO. LXIX.—VOL. VI.

Yet there was something mournful too,
In the softness of her eyes;
They had that bright, that shadowy look
In which deep feeling lies.

It made me always sorrowful
To gaze upon that brow,
So pure, so soft, so shadowless:
Where is its beauty now?

It sadly came across my soul,
The thought that one so fair
Should ever know those bitter ills
To which our race is heir.

And after long, long years had pass'd,
In other scenes we met;
But the change which those sad years had wrought—
It haunts my memory yet:

The bloom of early youth had gone,
And the dimness of her eye
Told a sad and fearful tale of woe,
And of human misery.

From her cheek the summer rose had gone,
And the smile was seen no more
Which had lighted every heart with joy
And with gladness, long before.

The flush of pain was mantling there,
And the tint of coming death.
Ah! all ye fairest things of earth,
Ye fade as the rose's breath.

She faded with the summer flowers,
Those bright and glorious things
Which flit, like all that's fair on earth,
"On rapid, rapid wings."

ESTRANGEMENT.

'Twas said that he had refuge sought
In love, from his unquiet thought,
In distant lands, and been deceived
By some strange show; for there were found
Blotted by tears, as those relieved
By their own words are wont to do,
These mournful verses on the ground :—

" This fond heart—my only treasure—
Blindly
Gave I to thee; why then coldly
With those altered looks behold me,
While the light of former pleasure,
Beaming kindly,
Lingers yet; tho' faint and fearful,
As shine the rainbow's hues thro' clouds all dark and tearful.

" Know you not that friendship slighted
Withers;
While love to grief or anger turneth,
And the fire which inly burneth,
(All its dying embers lighted,)
Wildly gathers
New strength and vigour from the cold winds blowing,
As zephyrs fan the flame in gentlest bosoms glowing.

" Ah! wherefore should it be that genius giveth
feeling,
To wound the conscious heart with tenfold anguish,
While torpid wretches 'midst life's blessings languish;
Nor taste the bitter pangs which mind receiveth,
As stealing
Adown the sluggish stream of life, they go
Unwarned, unawaked by love, but, oh! unpierced by wo.

" Soon the cypress bough will garland]
Mourning,
And the bright-robed flowrets cover
All that once was friend or lover,
From that dim, mysterious, far land;
No returning
From that last dread home of mortals,
Whose shadowy goal we reach thro' pain and sorrow's portals."

" THE WISH OF THE WEARY."

O that I were on a mountain's side,
Where the breezes so purely blow;
Beneath me, the rolling, gushing tide,
And above me the realms of snow—
To commune with God and nature there,
And feel within the spirit of pray'r!

O that I were in a deep, deep glen!
With heaven's blue dome above me,
Far, far removed from the haunts of men,
With the few that truly love me—
To hold sweet converse in Nature's halls,
And gaze on beauty that never palls.

O that I were, by a sheelin low,
With its garden roof of heather,
The bairns and colliers sporting below,
Defying the wind and weather—
To learn of the shepherd mountain lore,
And feel a content unknown before.

O that I were, on a Sabbath morn,
By village Kirk on Tay's green side,
Where towering trees the paths adorn,
Through which blue bonnets slowly glide—
To join in echoing praises there,
And list to the pastor's deep low prayer!

O that I were, on a winter's eve,
Sitting close to the thrice-heap'd fire,
With those kindred souls I wept to leave,
And whose presence could never tire—

To mourn for the *One whose transient day
Of bright, bright promise soon past away!

O would I were out of the city's din,
Of mind and body grievous ban,
All glitt'ring without, all dark within,
Full of great works of little man—
Where the poor man's cry is no man's care,
And the house of God no house of prayer!

O would I were out of the city's glare,
Where human kindness yields no milk,
And the creeping tribe are ev'rywhere—
Not silk-worms that spin, but worms in silk—
Where the million cry for bread alone,
And the pampered few that cry disown.

AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

THE MOORLAND CHILD.

BY MISS M. A. BROWNE.

I knew a little happy child,
Some twenty years ago,
Who loved amidst the heather wild
And the golden furze to go:
She sought there the red strawberry,
And the bonny blue harebell,
And the thyme, beloved of the bee,
And the snail's so curious shell!

She loved her little garden—small
And overcultured spot!
She loved the peach-tree on the wall,
And the pebble-built grot;
She loved, beneath the tall elm trees,
To feel the soft winds glide;
She loved her home, its flowers, its bees,
But most that common wide.

It was her chosen playing ground,
Amidst its yellow furze;
She loved the small bird's song—each sound
That joined its voice to her's—
To her's that rose in simple song,
Or burst in merry shout,
When, the thick rustling fern among,
The leveret bounded out.

She was a little merry child;
And yet, for her young years,
Sometimes too tenderly she smiled,
Or shed too bitter tears;
Yet who, when heaven is sunny bright,
With but one fleecy cloud,
Thinks, 'midst the calm and golden light,
What thunder it may shroud?

There was one evening when the west
Was all a flood of gold,
And to the east, in lazy rest,
The floating clouds were rolled;
And the young crescent moon began
To shed her silver ray,
And one pale star shone, white and wan,
Beside the dying day;

The child went bounding o'er the heath,
Then suddenly she stayed;
It seemed as if her very breath
Its even throb delayed;
She held her hand above her brow,
And ceased her childish song;
Her cheek grew deeper in its glow,
And her heart beat high and strong.

* The late highly gifted and exemplary Mr James Wilson, student of medicine in Edinburgh, who (distinguished by the professors of his college, and beloved and respected by his fellow-students) was cut off, in the midst of a successful and honourable career, by typhus fever, caught during the discharge of his duties.

Slowly her dark eyes filled with tears,
And so she stood and gazed ;
And yet that sunset west for years
Had just as brightly blazed ;
Yet never till that evening hour
The careless laughing one
Had felt the magic and the power
Of the declining sun.

Oh ! who may tell what thronging dreams
And thoughts unknown till then,
Crowded, like freshly-opened streams,
Upon her breast and brain !
How did her very spirit yearn
Beneath their sudden life !
How did her inmost bosom burn
Amidst their stirring strife !

And tenderness, and solemn thought,
Unnamed, unknown, were there ;
And so within her bosom wrought
A home for future care.
The passion of that hour went by—
Its thrilling magic past ;
But oh ! its bright strange memory
Will haunt her to the last !

Again the little child was gay—
Again the lonely moor
Became her scene of childish play,
But never as before !
She felt as one to whom a power
Unearthly is revealed ;
She felt as if that sunset hour
Her doom of life had sealed.

Day after day, year after year,
She visited the wild,
Till fell upon her heart the fear
She was no more a child.
They would not let her wander so—
They bade her wiser be ;
And said she was a woman now—
And checked her childish glee.

Alas ! she knew the truth too well—
She felt it in her soul—
She knew how strong though cold the spell
That must her words control !
She knew her dreams were disallowed,
That she must act a part ;
Yet, 'midst the false and hollow crowd,
She took her moorland heart.

She took it, and it suffered wrong,
And, crushed, and soiled, and torn,
She bears it, singing still its song,
Whilst leaning on a thorn ;*
But when she hears of sunset hours,
Spent on some heathery plain,
And fragrant gorse, and sweet wild-flowers,
Oh ! how it leaps again !

The three subjoined pieces have lain long in our repositories. While the most melancholy event to which two of them owe existence was fresh in memory, it was impossible to publish them. There is now a mournful pleasure in letting the world know how deeply that loss was felt, which must have come home to thousands and tens of thousands of young hearts. All the three poems were written before the public mind had been disturbed by the dark and painful surmises which so speedily followed the death of the lamented poetess. The verses on reading that prophetic novel which shadows forth the morbid state of her over-wrought mind, were, we think, in our possession before her death. The poem first in order is, with a few omissions and slight alterations, from the pen of a young London mechanic, and was written, as will be seen, on the impulse of the moment, and before those mysterious surmises, which have never been cleared up, had reached England.

LINES ON THE DEATH OF L. E. L.

" A star hath left the kindling sky—
A lovely northern light :
How many planets are on high,
But that has left the night !"—L. E. L.

A gentle lady, newly wed,
Far from her native shore,
Went with the partner of her bed,
Like her who loved the Moor.

With heartfelt blessings from old friends,
The friends of earlier times,
She climbs the ship, and pensive wends
Her way to torrid climes.

Fixed on the cliffs of England's shore,
That lov'd one's eyes were kept ;
And when they could be seen no more,
She droop'd her head and wept.

And fondly turn'd and gaz'd upon
" The lovely northern light,"
And wondered if its rays fell lone ;
On friends at home that night.

Yet full of hope, and joy, and life,
The future dream'd and plann'd,
She went, a lov'd and loving wife,
To her adopted land.

And safely o'er a thousand waves,
That noble ship hath gone,
Unto the land of sable slaves,
Within the torrid zone.

Sickness, and deeper mental pain,
That " Lost One" suffer'd long ;
Nor hope, nor health, return'd again,
To bless the Child of song.

O life thou'rt but a dream of dreams !—
A basilisk disguis'd—
A catalogue of blight'd schemes,
And hopes ne'er realiz'd.

LINES TO THE MEMORY OF L. E. LONDON.

Hush'd is the music of thy lyre, sweet Poetess ! and thou,
In Afric's distant sunny clime, art calmly sleeping now—Far from that land whose children lov'd to hear thy witching strains,
When soft, and sweet, and fairy-like, they floated o'er her plains ;
And, ah ! the children of that land will mourn and weep
for thee,
And ever brightly wilt thou dwell upon their memory.
Ah ! never more from lordly hall to the dwelling of the poor
Will those fairy strains of L. E. L. be heard upon our shore.
Fled is that spirit which could dream, and, in her fancy, see Things which belongeth not to earth—the bright, the pure, the free ;
And mould those dreams so beautiful, as if with magic skill,
Till, in sweet strains of loveliness, they bent unto her will,

Sweet Poetess ! those dreams of bliss, which hover'd o'er thy way,
Cast haloes round thy path of life, as bright as endless day ;
And we have seen how thou couldst make (though we shall see no more)
A theme all lovely in itself, more lovely than before.
Is there no spirit that can raise, now that thy own hath flown,
A lay so plaintive, yet so sweet, with beauty all thine own ?
No ! one that breathes such strains of bliss as thine we may not see ;
For all that's bright and beautiful we've lost in losing thee.

COMPOSED AFTER READING MISS LONDON'S NOVEL—
" ETHEL CHURCHILL."

The first part of this dream is intended to illustrate the misery genius often entails upon itself, by pondering the inscrutable mysteries of futurity. A contrast is drawn to this noble temerity by a lady, oppressed with grief, revisiting the haunts of childhood, and gathering from past happiness present relief.

Life is dark history—its saddest tale
Is love misplaced ;
Its music would be one unbroken wail
For charms defaced,
If the past sent not oft a pleasant gale
On Time's bleak waste.

So thought I while this plaintive story reading,
Till, wrapt in sleep,
Dreams came, in truth, reality exceeding,
How great men leap
Into the mystic future, nothing heeding
The endless steep.

A large flat island, the eternal sea
That girds it round,
Dashes on one coast low and gloomily
With doubtful sound,
Save when its billows rise tempestuously
To lash the ground.

Voices are mingled with its leaping waters,
Uncarthy sweet,
Which fascinate the island sons and daughters
In bands to meet,
And listen, careless of the wrecks and slaughters
It ever doth repeat.

Some walk there gifted with impetuous wings
Strong to dare ;
The burning mist its heavy rolling flings,
With forehead bare
And flashing eye ; resistless genius springs
Undaunted thro' the air.

A noble youth came bounding to the shore,
Shouting out loud ;
But when he heard the interminable roar,
His spirit bowed
One moment, and the next he strove to soar
Unchecked and proud.

Upon his feet and shoulders, wings are waving
Widely and fast ;
Over the quiet country he was leaving
One look he cast
Of beautiful contempt and godlike craving.
The music past :

Its wild mysterious notes are loudly ringing ;
He knows the tone ;
Over the deep the mighty child is winging ;
Oh, not alone,
Conceal'd Sirens pour their softest singing,
While golden spray is thrown.

Why, great Apollo, must it ever be
The thorny crown,
The mocking robe of splendid misery,
The storm-wrapt throne ;
Only the meed and heritage of poetry,
Why must thy children moan ?

The youth came rushing back with drooping plume,
His brow on fire,
With stern resolve to search the future's gloom,
Which did respire
Those maddening melodies which shall consume
His nature with desire.

His frenzied eye read the eternal ocean—
His pale lips gave
Echoes to its inscrutable commotion—
His speech did rave
In unknown sounds—with slow and stately motion
He passed beneath the wave.

Sleep bears me swift to the opposing coast :—
A sea of light,
Shining all over, but irradiant most
Farthest from sight,
Murmurs tranquillity before a host,
Who view it with delight.

Numbers are met ; I see a lovely maiden
Watching the tide,
As tho' its rippling flow did greatly sadden,
For she does hide
Her gentle countenance, with sorrow laden,
For promises denied.

A pearly barque floats like a crescent moon
Thro' the clear sky
Of downy shadows of a night in June,
So gracefully,
And with such quivering liquidness of tune,
The Gondola draws nigh.

All garlanded with buds, and hanging flowers,
And silken leaves,
So green, they must have flourished in the bowers
Whence young life weaves
Wreathes frail as fair, to clasp the laughing hours,
The heart so well believes.

'Tis conveyed sweetly on by wild young fawns,
Whose shining hair
Tells a bright tale of dew-besprinkled lawns
And shaded lair,
Of warm soft vales, where morning ever dawns
Uncloudedly and fair.

Their meek eyes look on her invitingly ;
And she will go.
O Love ! how glad I am to see this lady
Forget her wo,
And look beyond the sea so ardently,
Where verdant islands glow.

Swiftly and peacefully the boat is sailing
In distance long,
And down its wake rich fragrantcy is trailing :—
Now steals a song
Of mournful soothing, beautiful bewailing,
Waving the waves along.

The maiden, crowned with violets, has returned
For pity's sake,
To sisters not so gifted, who have yearned
To see her take
Her harp, and tell the glory she has learned
Where music is awake.

What melancholy sounds are round me breaking,
To memory sweet,
Soft as the chant of seraphim forsaking,
With loitering feet,
Her genial home, that misery sadly shaking,
Some happiness may greet.

One dream succeeds another, and so fast
 Visions arise,
 I wake ! the impassioned priestess of the past,
 In mortal guise,
 Pours a strong song, that evermore shall last,
 Of youthful harmonies. E. J. P.

The following monologue is not without great faults of execution, but it is recommended to us by a vigour and boldness of conception which may be looked for in vain in more carefully finished juvenile performances.

THE DEATH OF CHATTERTON.

" Pressed hard by indigence and its companions, gloom and despondency, the mind of Chatterton became disordered. and, on the night of the 24th of August, 1770, he swallowed a large dose of opium, which caused his death. He was found the next morning a horrid spectacle, with his limbs and features distorted, and several pieces of opium sticking to his teeth. The floor of his room was covered with little pieces of written paper, which he had torn before he took the poison."—Lift of Chatterton. John Davis.

SCENE.—A Garret in Brook Street, London.—CHATTERTON discovered seated at a table, his face white and hollow, and his whole person emaciated.

CHAT. How cruel is the world which crushes worth,
 And calls the guilt blind destiny ! O lie !
 Ill-fated world, which makes the fate it mourns !
 Ah ! (writing) "Hurl thee back thy scorn ;" let me live yet
 To speak the bursting passions of my soul. [Writing.]
 "Ere death shall close his ken," God ! that I could
 But spread before mankind's besotted eyes
 The half that springs up in my bosom now !
 'Twould set so black a stain upon their hearts,
 As weeping Charity could never wash away.

[Pause—writing again.]

"While ye would watch and pity me in death,"
 "My wrongs be on ye !" O pour out thy grief,
 My soul, or send that haggard spirit forth,
 Which once Ambition was, but whose proud throbs,
 And soarings weariless, an icy world
 Unpitied restrained, that back the spirit shrank
 A blasted thing, and mourned, in broken sighs,
 Its beggar'd state to stark and hollow solitude.
 O for the fire of heaven ! that I might burn
 Each fearful word into men's shrinking hearts !

[After a pause, writing hurriedly.]

"That yet shall tell you how a poet died !
 Why should I cater to ye, wolves !"
 [Writes again, and then abstractedly reads aloud what he has written.]

"O world of icy-hearted men,
 Tardy to aid, but speedy to destroy.
 Wrung with unmerited neglect, his pen,
 Dipped in his proudest blood, that boy—
 Who to thy love or justice whispered when Proud soaring honours were his dearest joy—
 Has roared to tell thee he has changed since then,
 And hurl thee back thy scorn ere death shall close his ken.

"Ignoble souls ! ye fancied I could stoop,
 In miserable indigence, and feed
 Upon the vapid praises of your breath ;
 Telling my heart that it might swiftly bleed,
 While ye would watch and pity me in death.
 My wrongs be on ye ! I can swoop
 'E'en as the full-plumed eagle soars on high,
 And watch where such as you amid earth's deserts lie.
 Light up my heart, O God ! that it may never droop ;
 My soul still tell's me I'm above the clay ;—
 It seeks its upward home while here compelled to stay.

"Ye miserable babblers, know, I dare to die,
 And scorn ye, though ye value me so low ;
 Where feeble nature binds ye grovelling lie ;
 The sordid earth 's to you the strongest tie ;
 For me, wherever soared my soul, I go !
 I leave you that which ye may know me by ;
 It is your own—the mem'ry of my woe !

"I could crush down my ever-rising pride,
 And with a throbbing bosom own
 That which my breath has erst denied ;
 But, ah, ye'll find the secret in the groan,
 Which yet shall tell you how a poet died !
 Why should I cater to ye, wolves, full-supped
 With blood more precious than the crystal drops
 From pitying angel's eyes ?"—

[Casting down the paper and starting to his feet.]

No ! be still unyielding, heart ! Why should I crouch
 And kiss low-humbled the contemning foot ?
 They tell me I am proud, and walk on earth
 Like one whose proper home were heaven, or one Whose way led over nations' necks ; my God !
 Thou'st made my heart so, and I thank thee for't !
 It is the noblest attribute of man,
 That while he walks on earth he looks on heaven,
 Scorning to bend his eyes upon the sod.
 Down earth ! thus could I spurn thee. O thou, Pride,
 Who fly'st midway between the earth and sky,
 Thy look still upward turned, while with thy feet
 Thou strik'st the ground to raise thee in thy flight ;
 Thy vest of glowing red ;—thy heart seen through
 Thy crystal breast to throb with blood of fire ;
 Thy streaming locks unto the sunshine bare,
 And to the howling tempest ; and thy hands
 All weaponless, still clutching at the sky ;
 O God ! thus figured to my burning sight,
 Be still my guide, as thou hast ever been,
 And let me shoot along thy rapid way,
 Thy second self ! My soul is with thee,
 Though a clogging world still warps around
 With heavy suffering my shrunken form,
 And drags my feeble limbs to earth.

[Throws himself again into his seat, and buries his face in his hands.]

(After a pause.) O God ! to starve—to starve—like any worthless wretch,
 Whom God and men have left to die unknown !
 Ah, why did I not drop into the grave,
 My blood parched up by ceaseless fever,
 Till there ran no drop within my withering veins
 To let my spirit live ! or why not die
 Slain by the northern wind ! or like a floweret
 Blasted by the sun ! or sink a hollow victim
 To some unknown ill past all men's cure !
 Or never lived—or died a whim'ring infant ?
 O God ! anything but starve—to starve like a hunted dog !

How happy was I when I lived and dreamed
 How sweet a thing it was to be a man
 And earn men's praises ! How I loved
 To look with forward eye upon the world,
 When, flushed and heated with the burning things
 My soul would tell me I could give to life,
 They'd rush to heap those honours on my brow
 A country's heroes only wear. Miserable hope !
 Destroying vanity ! which, blasted, back
 Comes creeping to the wounded heart to seek
 That happy home which now my breast is not.
 Why should I have respect unto the world
 Or to its customs, since it is not just,
 And still denied that which I've bravely won ?
 Why should I falter to destroy that life

[Tears the paper he has written.]

Its heartlessness makes miserable ? Thou earth,
 I'll give my flesh to thee ; my spirit goes elsewhere.

[He takes the opium from the table, but pauses as he is about to swallow it.]

O—h ! This is horrible ! I can remember
 When first I knew what blighted yearnings were ;
 When first unkindness cooled that feverish glow
 Which erst was wont to light the glittering path
 I thought my own—but which, indeed, was nought
 But the reflected beaming of the light
 My own soul shed. In deep despondency,
 Stung by a present wrong, and spiritless
 To look to future years for my reward,
 I penned that last sad testament of man,

My Will, and bade my heart prepare to beat no more.
 How much more sunken am I now! when food,
 Which soulless creatures have unsought for, gives
 No renovating impulse to my limbs;—when wild
 And furious my spirit grows, while sinks,
 In sickliest decay, each unstrung sinew,
 And my pining flesh!—and yet, 'tis horrible to die!
 O God! is there no other way? nothing but death—
 Nothing but a grave? My mother—ah, good God!
 What of my mother; and my sister? they
 Now fancy I'm triumphant in the good Men shower upon the worthy. I shall kill them too.
 Where are my boastings now? Oh, I had hoped
 To heap up hills of riches at their feet,
 And count all valueless, except for them.
 Oh, how I sink into a worm to think I live
 And am a debtor to the kindest pair
 That ever gave to earth a touch of heaven!
 I—I—that very I, who was to change
 Earth's dust to gold, and bring the wond'ring world
 To look upon my face! Thank God! they know not all;
 Thank God! for now I seem as I should shrink
 A withered corpse before their eyes, did they
 But know the half of what I hoped to do,
 And see me now!—Why should I seek to live?
 I've lived already long enough to know
 I cannot live for that I love the best.
 Curses—curses—curses! what is the world
 But a huge sluggish lake, where all that's light
 And frivolous floats jauntily above,
 While priceless worth sinks darkly, swiftly down?
 I'll be its slave no more;—I will not lie
 And rot, and sink into the clay unknown
 Through weary rolling years; or let the heel
 Of courtly worthlessness crush me to dust.
 Pardon me, God! 'tis heaven and thee I seek!

[He swallows the opium—a pause.]

'Tis done, my soul thou art avenged! I pine no more.
 Ah, what a world of sorrow now is past,
 And what an easy thing it is to meet with death!
 Why did I waver? 'twill be over soon.
 Now it is done—I value life no more;
 It was the having it that made it precious.
 Now 'tis gone—for I am as a thing of death
 Still ling'ring on the verge—it is a dream,
 Which, like a waking man, I shake to air.
 How heavy are my eyelids—they are weighed
 By Death's hand down! and every limb
 Seems loaded with the clouds that cover graves.
 Thank God, I shall not see life go!
 I shall die sleeping; die—die—ah! for what?
 To live again?—ah, let me cling to that,
 For thee, weak flesh, wither to dust!—die—earth!
 How quiet is the world! Death—death—death!
 God help my mother! Oh, how throbs my heart!
 My brain seems swelling in its scanty cell
 As though 'twould burst away;—my mother,
 O death!—death!

[He falls back in a stupor.]

CECIL.

DESCRIPTIVE AND REFLECTIVE POETRY.

LAMENT FOR ROBIN HOOD.

Oh, never more, ye willowy gentle streams,
 Shall ye run mocking by as Robin drinks;
 Long gone is he, though oft, in pleasant dreams,
 He and his outlawed men still wander on your brinks.
 O mourn ye then in solemn strains subdued!
 And glide with tuneful wail for Robin Hood.
 Oh, never more, ye yew trees, pall'd in night,
 Shall merry archers nourish you again.
 No need have they of trusty bows for fight;
 No need—now Robin's treacherously slain!
 O mourn ye then, with heavy grief imbued!
 And bow your mournful heads for Robin Hood.
 Oh, never more, ye green enamel'd dells,
 Shall whizzing shafts pass up amid your boughs;
 Nor start the fallow deer that drink your shady wells:
 Bold Robin's gone! he has no merry men to rouse.

O mourn ye then though mossy trees so rude!
 For never more shall ye see gentle Robin Hood.

Oh, never more, ye trysting trees so green,
 Beneath your verdant boughs shall ye see merriment.
 Oh, never more brave foresters shall lean
 Around your rugged trunks all careless of intent.
 O mourn ye then, in Autumn's leafless mood!
 That ye bereaved are of merry Robin Hood!

Ye bonny swaths, that smile with pied flowers;
 Ye joy-wreaths, o'ertrailing Bainesdale;
 Ye shady nooks and smiling bosky bowers,
 Hide up your beauties for this heavy bale;
 And murky be your paths with winter's flood,
 For visit ye no more shall gallant Robin Hood.

And you, pale Echo, that of old did sit
 In hollow caves, and mimic his glad sounds,
 Retire, thou mournful, till the bat does flit;
 And when a lonely voice o'er all the vale resounds,
 Catch up the dying fall that murmurs through the wood,
 And thrill an evening hymn for long-lost Robin Hood!

THE WOODLAND.

By the late Robert Nicoll.

The Woodland wild!—wilt thou go with me
 Where the squirrel is perched on his oaken tree—
 Where the yellow fern doth wave its head—
 Where the hand of night the dew hath laid—
 And the winds, that wander to and fro,
 Kiss the brown leaflets as they go—
 Where the morning sun peeps in so mild
 To the dark green nooks of the woodland wild?

The woodland wild!—where the dun deer roam,
 And the song-birds build them a happy home—
 Where the grass is green, and the turf, so sweet,
 Seems shorn by the tread of fairy feet—
 Where the daylight comes, so richly dim,
 And the cushat's coo seems a hermit's hymn,
 The care-worn heart might be self-beguiled
 To forget its woes in the woodland wild!

The woodland wild!—where the hazels grow,
 Where the ladye-broom doth its branches throw—
 Where the god-built sky is in patches seen Through the roof of leaves. There aye hath been
 The home of those wild and fairy flowers
 That gladden all Nature's life and our's,
 As they bloom by the stream—that prattling child—
 That wanders along through the woodland wild!

The woodland wild!—if thy heart be pure,
 If thy faith in the right be firm and sure,
 Go wander the woodland paths within,
 And the love of Nature woo and win:
 Drink of the cup of beauty there,
 Where the breath of Omnipotence scents the air;
 For the Father of beauty in love hath smiled
 On the sweet green bowers of the woodland wild!

The woodland wild!—long, long ago
 I have buried myself its leaves below,
 And dreamed of its beauteous tenants all—
 'Tis the linnet's home and the fairies' hall!—
 'Tis the spot where the wondrous monk of old
 His hermitage reared in the pleasant wold;
 By its door a crystal springlet boiled
 For the pilgrim to drink in the woodland wild!

The woodland wild!—what pleasant stories
 Make sunlight over its olden glories—
 Of Robin Hood, and his bowmen bold—
 The raids they made, and the tales they told.
 In winter, in spring, and in summer time,
 The glorious forests are aye in prime;
 For glad thoughts for ever are round them piled,
 Those grassy glades in the woodland wild!

The woodland wild!—make haste—make haste!
 Away with me and its gladness taste:
 We will wander beside each gushing stream,
 Where flowers in the water reflected gleam;

We will follow its paths, and pluck its flowers,
And lie on its grass in the evening hours,
Till the dying sunlight, soft and mild,
Warns us away from the woodland wild !

THE DEPARTURE OF THE PILLAR OF FIRE.

They have pitched by Jordan in the plain,
For the forty years are o'er,
And but two of that mighty host remain
Which trode the Red Sea shore.

The pillar of cloud in their progress,
Hath marshalled them hitherto,
And amid the howling wilderness
Guarded their armies through.

But never again on its resting place
Will they see the signal set,
Though over the Ark of the Lord of Hosts
That pillar lingers yet.

The Syrian sun on all the coasts
Of the Promised Land went down,
But over the Ark of the Lord of Hosts
That pillar lingers on.

It changes, as fades the light away,
E'en as it hath done of yore,
But that pillar of cloud which led by day
Shall forward move no more.

Slowly it taketh its upward flight
To Him who first it had given;
That pillar of fire, on through the night,
Burns in the depths of Heaven.

It hath passed away—there is no sound—
For all on its warning dwell,
And deeper the gloom of the night spreads round
The tents of Israel.

Their angel guide, it is true, is gone
In the pillar of cloud and flame,
But that watch of which it the symbol shone,
Forever shall be the same. F. H. E.

THE PREFERENCE OF THOUGHT.*

There's a starry heaven and a glowing earth,
Which Power and Beauty have bless'd with the birth,
And the life, and the presence of wondrous love,
And glory beneath us, around, and above.

But Thought may wander, untamed and free,
And, fleetier than glance of an angel, flee
Where our sunshine and starlight have never been seen,
And where Time with its cycles may never have been.

Remote in the Infinite, Thought may decree
The clime of passionless natures high—
Where spirit is free from the wondrous strife,
The mysterious union of death and life.

It may pierce to where seasons have never begun,
To the centreless age unevolved by the sun—
May review the dim past of the measureless day,
And the times of new worlds that are doomed to decay.

But beneath the cold moon, and beneath the bright sun,
It returns to its home when its wanderings are done;
And better it loves the warm heart as its guide,
Than embrace the Unknown in its lonely pride.

It wanders, with Love, by the brake and the bower,
To catch the first blush of the delicate flower:
In the forest it mournfully gazes, with Grief,
On the death-beauty spread o'er the Autumn leaf.

It wanders, with Hope, when the woodlands are rife
With freshness and music, and stirring with life :

* There is some obscurity in this title, but it is the poet's, and we have found it impossible to render it more lucid. When the verses are once read, its meaning is emphatically revealed.

"Thy Mind, Horatio,
Best witness heaven and earth," &c.

In the shade of the yew tree 'twill oftentimes borrow
An hour's deep communion with Silence and Borrow.

All Nature communes with its mystic power,
In the storm and the sunshine, the fall and the flower :
It talks with the storm in its wild domain,
And gains the deep secrets of cloud and of rain.

It talks with Old Ocean, and bids him reveal
The wonders which fathomless waters conceal;
Reveal the deep spell that o'ermasters the billow,
When the tall mast is bending like wind-shaken willow.

It communes with the stream like the tiniest star,
Seen gleaming alone on the mountain afar;
And, when clothed with the might of proud navies at rest,
With all the bright firmament mantling its breast.

It talks with the winds in their hurricane sweep;
And, when woodlands in balm and in music they steep,
It subdues the far flash of the thunderbolt's blaze,
That the keen eye of science undazzled may gaze.

It talks with the choirs of the echoing Spring—
With the bright feathered tribes of the wandering wing—
With the eagle, when soaring and screaming above—
With the robin, the bird of the poor man's love.

It stoops to the flowers from its loftiest height—
To the snow-drop, sweet firstling of beauty and light—
To the full-bosomed pride of the summer-clad tree :
But its converse is sweeter, the humbler they be.

And, from all its communings, it brings to the breast
A might and a calm as of ocean at rest—
A philosophy pure as the radiance above—
A religion of joy, and of ardour, and love. G. P.

MY EXPERIENCES.

Since when I was a little boy
What changes I have seen !
Nature hath turned so very coy,
She's not what she hath been.

Time's finger, both on cloud and sun,
Hath writ what I would blot
From the blue sky—the Ancient One !—
I liked him when he first began;
And read with joy, and marked him run
O'er bright lines, unforget,
Of beamingness, and joy, and youth—
Of glory, rapture, love, and truth.

His iron pen, how fast it flew !
Till o'er the silent heaven
The mystic lines had dimmed the hue
Of sunbeam and of star ; and through
The depth of sky and ocean blue
The queen of night was driven,
Less gloriously than when at first
Upon my soul her vision burst.

And the green earth—that finger there
Hath written sterner change :
The joyous flowers have looks of care ;
Trees stand so stiff and silent where
They laughed and kissed the wanton air ;
The old blue hills look strange.
Still sing the streams as on they flow,
But not the songs of long ago.

And is it thus ? Sun, moon, and star,
And stream, and tree exclaim ;
Heaven's brightness owns no mystic bar—
No spell earth's loveliness can mar—
Still wave and forest fling afar
Their light and song the same
As when the dreamy boy began
To long for care, and envy man.

Ah me ! 'tis on the heart, and eye,
The pulse, and bounding limb,
That time hath written change ; the sky
Undimmed may burn—earth's age may vie
With its bright youth—
They gave is not for him

Whose eye communes with spectred glooms,
 Who stumbles 'mid the gathering tombs,
 Time's iron-pen ! its point is cold—
 'Tis made of hopes o'ercastr—
 Of youthful eyes grown dark and old—
 Of friends entombed beneath the mould—
 Of glorious visions darkly rolled
 Before Misfortune's blast—
 Of ashes from the silent urn—
 Of passions that have ceased to burn.

ON HUMAN LIFE.

Swift as the arrow's flight
 Through the summer air,
 Mocking the eager sight,
 In its quick path there—
 Like the vapours at early dawn,
 Owning a transient stay,
 Sweeping over the sunny lawn,
 One moment, then away.
 Marked as the vessel's track,
 O'er the Ocean's breezy plain,
 From the billows glancing back,
 Then swiftly lost again.
 As a flower that the proud sun calls
 Into birth, with its first bright ray,
 Yet an hour, and its beauty falls
 Into quick decay.

Such art thou life—at best
 But a waking dream—
 A sleep in which none find rest,
 Tho' sweet it seem.
 For life is a troubled sea,
 And man is a fragile barque,
 Wantonly tossing in misery
 O'er its waste of waters dark.

Afar as a beacon burning,
 It beams o'er the clouded tide ;
 And yet the frail barque is spurning
 That friendly light for its guide.
 Oh, that is religion's ray—
 It shines o'er the foaming wave,
 To lighten the mariner's dreary way—
 From danger his barque to save.

PROMETHEUS.

Titan, thy sufferings, prolonged, everlasting,
 What for mankind or thyself did they gain ?
 Torments endured—but to know thou wert wasting Numberless ages of anguish in vain.
 Yes, thou could'st suffer ; but more than compassion
 Was needed, O Titan ! for us as for thee :
 Could the silence of grief melt the heart of oppression ?
 Could unpitied we make a universe free ?
 One, diviner than thou, hast wept over our anguish—
 Has endured wo much keener than e'er was thy lot—
 Has suffered the pangs He descended to vanquish—
 Has come to his own, who received him—not.
 Titan, though torture eternal defying,
 Scorning the vulture, the rock, and the chain—
 Ages of torment enduring, undying,
 Hope was thy sorrow, and fortitude vain !
 And were these as useless, O Thou Most Immortal !
 In pity and love toward perishing man ?
 Thy blood, tears, and agony, opened the portal
 Of life ; and say, shall it be opened in vain ?

THE OLD MAN'S DREAM.

Sleep softly stole upon the old man's eyes,
 Suspending consciousness of things around ;
 And then the soul, escaping from the ties
 With which, in dreamless hours, it had been bound,
 Was quickly 'mong the shadows of the past,
 Renewing fond companionship with all
 That love had known, ere life was overcast
 By age's darkness and affliction's pall !

A smile was on his features, for the soul
 Was wand'ring now amid the haunts of youth,
 With playmates gay, defying care's control.
 Once more he walked glad childhood's path of truth :
 He felt the sunny ringlets, gently stirred
 By zephyrs, play about his forehead fair—
 And voices he had loved again he heard—
 Again he lisped with them his earliest prayer !

He smiled !—he was upon his father's knee—
 His mother, bending o'er, gazed on his face ;
 From her fond kiss he rushed, in boyish glee,
 And soon upon the meadow in the chase
 To catch the sportive glitt'ring butterfly,
 Outran his sisters, till the glowing hour
 Fatigued them, when they sought the streamlet nigh,
 Lay on its banks and press'd the fragrant flower.

Yet happier still the thought that warm'd his breast,
 When in his dream there rose the form of one
 To whom he had his youthful vows address'd,
 Before the heart's first purity was gone :
 Life's sun had kiss'd away the morning dew,
 And young love's sparkling brilliancy was o'er,
 When one bright moment's ecstasy it knew,
 Its glory vanish'd and it shone no more.

A flush came o'er the old man's features !—for
 The first dread agony of love's despair,
 Within his breast rekindling passion's war,
 Returned as in that hour of darkest care,
 When dearest hopes were crush'd, and all that gave
 To earth enchantment, seem'd at once to fade,
 And every feeling sigh'd to share the grave,
 For wither'd hope by disappointment made.

The old man, even as he calmly slept—
 And his was noiseless as an infant's sleep—
 By tears, which from his moist lids slowly crept,
 Betray'd that memory—which makes men weep
 When they know not they are observed—had brought
 The cup of grief for him once more to drain—
 The draught with the old bitters freshly fraught,
 That made remembrance feel like present pain.

He wept, as o'er his soul a gathering gloom
 Came, when each light he loved he saw depart—
 He wept, as kneeling at his mother's tomb,
 The mem'ry of her fondness fill'd his heart.
 His sisters, one by one, the grave had grasp'd ;
 His bosom-friends had vanish'd from his view ;
 And she was lost whom oft his arms had clasp'd,
 Whom still he loved tho' she had been untrue.

The dream again was changed. His heart grew young,
 And felt the freshness of its youthful joy ;
 His bosom glowed—"The harp was newly strung"—
 He bounded o'er the meads a fearless boy ;
 His brow was cloudless as it was of yore,
 Ere yet, 'mid selfish crowds, his spirit broke—
 But now the old man's transient bliss was o'er—
 The bright delusion ceased, and he awoke !

Awoke, to find himself unloved and lone !
 Companionless !—for he had long outlived
 All whom in earlier moments he had known,
 The few who might with him have smiled or grieved.
 His heart was worn—no new affection there
 Could ever find a space wherein to grow ;
 Alike of pleasure and of sorrow bare,
 A future tie it could not form below !

One moment thinking of that fleeting dream
 And things with which it had been thronged, he sigh'd ;
 Still was he carried buoyant on the stream
 Which had o'erwhelm'd the loved ones ; and a pride
 That he was chosen to outlast so long,
 Lit up brief sunshine in that dreary heart ;
 And clinging on to life, he walked among
 A crowd ;—he loathed, and yet feared to part.

O Life ! we weary of thee in our prime,
 Yet trust thee as if ne'er thou might'st decay ;
 And when the gathering hands of silent time
 Have stolen all we prized on earth away,

And left us desolate, we wildly grieve,
As if nought could remain that we might love;
And sigh to be at rest, yet dread to leave
A world we know—thro' stranger realms to rove!

THE OLD HACKNEY COACH.

I strike no silver-sounding lyre—
Burn with no old poetic fire—
Nor lofty themes approach.
Reader, a moment be thy mind
To lowly communings resign'd;
So searching thought may wisdom find,
In yon old Hackney Coach.

Forget their vulgar fallacies,
Who point to mould'ring palaces,
And old dismantled towers;
As if grim ruin dwelt on high,
Feeding on ancient majesty,
Nor turned her dull malignant eye,
To lowly themes like our's.

Grandeur hath reverence in decay,
And full-blown glory still doth pay
Honour to glories past:
Yet darker, heavier fate doth lie
On many a meaner vanity,
Whose little splendour hath pass'd by,
Leaving but scorn at last.

Desolate vehicle! in thee
A "faded splendour," wan we see,
A time-dishonoured glory;
Thy battered sides, thy drooping steeds,
Whose ribs betray no plenteous feeds,
Thy ruffian Jehu's squalid weeds,
Whisper a moving story.

Where are thy liveried lackeys tall,
Thy boxes gay and graceful pall,
And portly coachman gone?
And where those steeds so fair and free,
High stepping as in spite of thee,
Flashing in burnished bravery,
That roll'd thee proudly on?

Some are who'd weep long hours away,
'Midst cloisters dim and turrets gray,
Yet smile at this thy fall;
But sure thy shattered pannel, set
With shield and lordly coronet,
As natural tears might well beget
As broken arch or wall.

What find we in high places old,
Save thoughts of all they once did hold,
Visions of long ago:
And hath this little cushioned cell,
No stories of old times to tell,
Of bright traditionary belle,
Or brisk departed beau?

Tell us of days of bygone date,
When thou didst bear a joyous freight,
To Opera, Park, or Ball:
Tell of high matrons, blooming girls,
Soft waving plumes, and gems, and pearls,
And brighter eyes, and softer curls,
For thou hast held them all.

Perchance on some fair wedding morn,
Proudly and swiftly hast thou borne
A happy pair away.
Without—blithe bells, and voices singing;
Within—two hearts together clinging,
Joy-crowned hope and passion flinging
Round each a golden ray.

And, haply, 'midst the funeral train,
When noble dust to dust again,
Was pompously returning.
Thou mov'dst conspicuous and slow,
In proud solemnity of woe,
Whilst some for grief, and some for show,
The sable-clad, went mourning.

But ne'er again to courtly ball,
Pageant or solemn festival,
Thy fate shall summon thee:—
Crest-fallen and discarded, thou
From lofty pride of place must bow,
To bear most vulgar burdens now,
And folks of low degree.

Yet some that once within thee sate,
In pride of youth and high estate,
Fulfil a darker doom:
Fair faces once with beauty glowing,
Young hearts with happy thoughts o'erflowing,
Lie all unknown, and all unknowing,
Low in the silent tomb.

And many a sad survivor wan
Dreams of old days and faces gone,
'Midst scenes of mirth and gladness.
And grief hath furrow'd foreheads fair,
Robb'd eyes of light and lustre rare,
And touched with gray the sunny hair,
The silvery voice with sadness.

So ever weeps humanity,
O'er dear departed vanity,
As treacherous years encroach:
They come, bedeck'd with visions gay,
Yet steal each cherish'd joy away,
Leaving us lone in life's decay,
Like this old way-worn coach.

SUNSET MUSINGS IN MILAN.

Proud are thy walls, Milano,
Thy towers rise gorgeously:
One thought hath dimm'd their splendour—
They look not on the free.

A richly-mellow'd beauty
Lives in thy clear blue sky;
Sad stain to its deep purity
There alien banners fly.

The pandour through thy palaces
Hath stalk'd in savage pride,
And on thy floors of marble
Hath Freedom's God defied.

Kind are thy sons, Milano!
Then shall they not be free?
Earth-grasping masters, sternly,
Have bid them bow the knee.

With eyes of fascination,
Half-hid by raven hair;
Oh, lovely are thy daughters!
Must they thy ruin share?

Their port, their step, how graceful!
Where green the linden waves;
Alas, that these thy daughters
Should mothers be to slaves!

Sweet on the twilight stealing,
Like hope to hearts that grieve,
Thy many-toned minstrelsy
Floats on the summer eve.

Far o'er the giant mountains,
The day-beam smiling dies;
The peace of Heaven is resting
Amid those happy skies.

What speaks yon martial claron?
The spoiler, Man, is near.
The haughty tread of warriors
Bursts harshly on the ear.

These soulless tools of tyranny—
'Tis thus in every crime—
Bind fast the chain they first have worn,
Hired guards of royal crime.

Thy fair fruit-laden meadows,
Thy olive and thy vine,
Are food to foreign revellers
Who laugh at thee and thine.

Many the works of beauty
Thy master-minds have wrought ;
Was it to sooth the robber
They gave their lives to thought.
Sweet are thy songs, Italia,
Melodious as thy streams ;
They tell thy bygone glories
Like pleasures known in dreams.
To lift the hopes of Freedom
They sound in other skies,
O for thy Dante's spirit !
To bid thy fallen rise.

THE DEATH OF THE SPRING.

Away with the hues of her rainbow wing—
She hath fled away—the glad young Spring:
The brightest ripple on Old Time's stream,
And brief as a maiden's first-love dream.
She came to us we know not how ;
But the leaves burst forth from each bare bough ;
And the joyous birds were on the stir,
'Mid blossoming trees to welcome her.
And wheresoever her unseen footsteps stray'd,
Or her bright glance pierced, or her sweet breath play'd,
Over the land as she wander'd through,
All sweet flowers and feelings grew.
But soon the blossoms fell, too soon ;
And spring wax'd faint in the sunny noon ;
Drooping her wings, as loth to stay,
When her loveliest had fled away.
And thus she died—one twinkling eye,
When dews for the waning day did grieve,
In a silent nook, o'er-shaded with green,
Sate the pining Spring-tide all unseen ;
And a faded lily, with chalice bare,
Shone bright as a drop of silver air ;
And a violet closed its dim blue eye,
As it greeted the Spring with a deep sweet sigh.
And they heeded not the kisses of night,
Or her cold tears mourning their early blight ;
But when the morn and the moonlight blent
Together, to one young grave they went.
And the fairy Spring hath left no flower
To live as a type of her natal hour ;
And the dreams of eve, and the dews of morn,
With her sweet presence—all are gone !

SUMMER'S ADDRESS TO THE LOVER OF NATURE.

Haste, come away
Unto the green fields. I have spread
An odorous pavilion, wreathed with flowers
Of curious intertexture, tangled like the spray
Of ocean ; around and overhead,
Music is panting in her leafy bowers ;
Green earth has felt the fresh'ning of the showers
In all her pores. The prattling brooks
Have hid themselves in grassy nooks.
The hills, like milch-kine, longing for the gloam,
Are waiting for high minds to come and roam
Over their many coloured slopes—they've made
Of shrubs and mossy rocks a cooling shade
For contemplation. The dim glassy lake
Is slumbering in the shadows of the brake
And craggy mountains ; in its depths they lie
Trembling in the embraces of the sky.
Launch the light skiff, and as the ripples rise
Beneath the prow, so will bright phantasies
Breathe rapture on thy brain the live-long day.
Lulled by the wild bird's thrilling melody,
And gazing on the heavens, thou wilt feel
A wild enchantment o'er thy spirit steal.
Oh ! 'tis the sympathy of Nature with the soul,
Both springing from the universal whole,
And soaring, on the wings of Fancy, far
Above the troubled waves and worldly jar.

Be sure the spirit, when it shall return
To all mankind, with boundless love, shall burn.
The violet, long,
Is peering bashful for you 'neath the stone.
The cushat in the woods is overpowered
By all the odours, and the beauty poured Upon his solitude. The waterfall
Is made the messenger ; the rocks and all
The hills have echoed back the call ;
The clustering tendrils fainting with the dew,
Like children hang around him. Unto you
They send a welcome. The sun hath bent his bow
In misty radiance round his hoary brow :
If in your joyless path you chance to meet
His waters, they'll cast flowrets at your feet.
Ah me ! thought fades at what it would express,
Like Shelley at his own mind's loveliness,
I've chosen the humblest post of my throng
Of young and flickering fire. O listen to his song,
And come away ! Great Mammon fails !—Let me
Breathe on your souls the sense of their eternity.

ODE TO A BROOK.

How pleasantly doth roll along
The curling eddies on thy breast,
How pleasant 'tis to hear thy song
When pebbles fret thee from thy rest.
They say you are a murmurer, and tell
Your trouble to the listening weeds,
And whisper to the blue harebell,
And preach it to the level meads.
But care not what they say of you—
Whirl on, and tell thy summer tale
To those who love thy gush of dew,
Thy bubbling sound, and musing wail :
Whirl on, for those who see thee run,
And glance and glitter in the sun,
Know well the hide-and-seek you play
With dark green shade and sunny day :
Whirl on full soft, for as you flow
I see the blue-eyed heaven below,
I hear sweet Nature breath her prayer,
And worship at her altar there. A. W.

SCOTTISH AND BALLAD POETRY.

We have some misgivings about the following division of our Olio, now that the very language of our "auld respectit mither" is nearly banished from the land. More indulgence may, however, be shewn to the Scottish muse by the Southron and the Irish than by our own fastidious countrymen. The poetry of the land of Burns, Ramsay, Hogg, Fergusson, and Tannahill, is now forced to hide its diminished head in the most obscure corner of the provincial newspapers. But we feeling bound in honour and nationality to uphold the dignity of the Scottish muse, and in humble dependance upon the aid of "Jameson's Dictionary," to those of our readers who may have had the misfortune to forget their vernacular speech, once again venture forth a few purely Doric rhymes.

The first three pieces in this section are the composition of three brothers, members of one of those rural or pastoral families of which Scotland is so justly proud. The first was a shepherd lad when the poem which bears his name was written. The second is a scholar ; and the third, the author of the "Fragment of a True Tale," is perhaps a shepherd also, and ambitious to become a scholar : we cannot tell, but in either case he is not likely to shame the brotherhood.

A WINTER NIGHT IN THE COUNTRY.

By John Murray.

New gloamin has the lift encircled round,
And frae the field the warkman wends his way;
The kitchen ingle has a rantin sound,
And ilka corner shines as clear as day:—
As blythe a scene as ever bloomed in May.
Then round and round ilk youngster plants a stool,
And speedily the harmless chat ensues;
E'en o' their tricks, when bairnies at the school,
They'll raise a crack when they rin scarce o' news—
Or Scotland's ballads greedily peruse.
The lasses get some other wark in hand—
Some cardin' woo, some spinnin' at the wheel;
The ploughmen talk o' cultivatin' land;
How they can draw a hintin fur or drill,
While some maintain that braidcast grows as well.
Belye the supper 's on the table spread,
Syne ilk ane claims his horn wi' tenty e'e;
The little wee things by the nurse are fed,
And first the spoonfu' she maun always pree;
As some stand round, and ane sits on her knee.

The readin' past,* the auld guidwife comes ben,
It's like she'll say, "O bairns, its wearin' late!"
Away to bed slip a' the boys and men,
And leave abint them Betty, Jean, and Kate;
Fain Rab wad stay—but 'lake the lad's but blate!

Now Jean draws in her little creepie-stool,
And frae the papers lets her curls flee,
The other twa misca' her for a fool—
They little wat whar Jeanie means to be—
She soon gets up and slips away the key.

They hadna spiered the question, "Whar ye gaun?"
Until a tirl struck the window peen;
But ere they gat the least conjecture drawn
The third was tint—and wha was this but Jean?—
The tryste was set just eight nights past yestreen.

Around the corner Jamie stands hard by;
A sweet reception, mixed wi' other charms,
Tells him that pleasure's streams will ne'er rin dry,—
He kisses Jean, and locks her in his arms;
When lovers meet they seldom dread alarms.

Straight to the barn with eager step they draw,
And to their comfort meet a weel filled mou;†
The farmer had some doubts o't being snaw,
And Tam had thrushen there the hale week through;
Sae there was fother for baith horse and cow.

Now Jamie rows his Jeanie in his plaid;
She whispering says, "It smells as gif't were new."
Quo he, "It is a hansel frae my dad,
The neist I get it maun be spun by you."
Syne steals a kiss frae Jeanie's glowin mou.

Now Jeanie blushes at the tale he tells;
Her cheek grows warm wi' modesty and love,
Through pride o' conscious worth her bosom swells,
Yet nought she asks, and nought she disapproves,—
She kens to speak, it Jamie best behoves.

At length auld honest Chanty‡ claps his wings,
Wha's ever faithfu' to his trust at Three.
"Oh, time is vanished!" is the sang he sings,
Whilk makes the tear to start in Jeanie's e'e,
While Jamie heaves a sigh he scarce can dree.

They lowse the door and keek up to the lift
In hopes that chanty had a traitor been;
But 'lake! the seven sterns had made a shift,
And Charlie's wain was scarcely to be seen—
The door stood north, and they by east had gane.

Now Jamie takes a shake o' Jeanie's hand,—
The wisest man could ne'er express his flame;
Their innocence the envious cou'dna brand,
They set the night when they should taste the same:
The lovers part, yet bear the lovers' name.

OUR AIN AULD TOUN.

By James Murray.

Oh, weels me on the bright, and the warm sunny glens,
And the bonny heathy hills, and the fragrant flowery dens,
And the little burnies gurgling with music in their soun',
A' glenting sae sweetly roun' our ain auld toun.

Let foreign birkies crack o' their groves among themselves,
I wad rather hae a glisk o' the purple heather-bells,
And the bonny ewe-gowans that shed their sweets aroun',
When the sun blinks blythe aboon our ain auld toun.

There's something ay sae kind in a couthis little hame
That ilka ane has felt, though he mayna gi'et a name;
And weel I wat were I to search the wide warld roun',
I should ne'er find aught like our ain auld toun.

Wi' its sonsie lads and lasses as a sunbeam ever kint,
And its gash auld carles in their Sunday claithing drest,
And its gaucie little wives a' toddlin' up and doon;
Troth there's nae place to me like our ain auld toun.

In the lang summer days, when the neebours meet at e'en,
And the bare-legged laddies stoutly scamper ower the green, Ye'll hear auld warld stories as the joke and tale gae roun'—

We've right queer chaps about our ain auld toun.

Then the langheaded wabster meets the roset-fingered
snab,

And the spunky little tailor sae trig and glib o' gab,
And the braid-shouthered smith wha sets richt the state affairs,

And to a' the foes to Scotland's weal a deadly hatred bears.

And they ken about the Mexicans! and warrings o' the Turks!

And can pose you wi' the saws o' the Chathams and the Burkes!

And they're awfu' on the Autocrat, the ill-designing loon!
O wha's like the statesmen o' our ain auld toun?

And the auld lame pensioners they yowf about the wars;
In the heat o' their story they lay bare their "cuts and scars,"

And brag o' the days when they mawed the Frenchmen doon—

Ha! we've brave auld fallows yet in our ain wee toun.

But at kirk my heart grows grit when I gaze frae pew to pew,

For a' the weel-kent faces that wont to meet my view;
The young thrapple up, and the strangest hae their day,
And the auld siller pows are elyin' away.

I'm young and yauld enoo, and should Fate ca' me away,
To warble wi' the warld till my locks be thinned and gray;

Should the time at length arrive that my straits I win
aboon,

Then Heaven send me back to our ain auld toun!

For I fain wad look on hame, and wander there a while,
And forget the weary warld, its bustle and its toil, [doon,
Wi' some auld and faithfu' cronies ere the sun o' life gang
And be laid at last by them I lo'e in our auld toun.

A FRAGMENT OF A TRUE TALE.

By ——— Murray.

The moonbeam waned, and the drowning flood
Fell fast on the dismal plain,
When a wanderer knocked at a rich man's gate;
Alas! he knocked in vain.

Amid the blaze of lordly pomp
The man of wealth reclined,
But heeded not the wanderer's cry
That blent with the angry wind.

But aye as on the deepening gust
Was told his mournful tale,
The rich man turned his head away,
Nor listened to his wail.

The wanderer slowly turned aside
And sighed a heavenward prayer,
And big tears coursed his furrowed cheek,
For he knew of pity there.

The morn rose bright o'er land and sea,
And waked the world to smile;
The peasant left his lowly cot,
To seek the field of toil.

And far aloft the smiling sun
Dispersed his cheering rays,
While wild birds sang till the forest rang
With a thousand joyous lays.

Around the rich man's stately towers
Two children gathered flowers,
In childish mirth and pleasantries
Wasting the summer hours.

And aye as from the daisy meek
They scared the butterfly,
Their little hearts leapt joyously
As it flitted gaily by.

And aye they roamed and better roamed,
Through copse and forest dell;
For, Oh! 'tis fair in the wild greenwood,
And the young heart loves it well.

When underneath a gnarled oak,
Which marred their onward way,
A poor old man lay stiff and cold,
His locks were silver gray;

And the merlin hawk and raven dark
Sung hoarsely o'er the prey.

Beside his fevered infant's couch
An anxious father prayed,
And morning sent his early beams
Ere the mournful watch was staid.

"O what can ail my little boys?"
The man of wealth would say;
"O what can ail my merry boys?"
They left me well to-day!"

And every time the evening breeze
Sighed through the woody vale,
The little sufferers wildly gazed,
But could not tell their tale.

"O what can ail? O what can ail?"
The mother sad would say.
The fevered infants only moaned,
"His locks were silver gray."

TO BE WHISPERED.—A BALLAD.

Two walked beneath the greenwood tree,
Their shadows side by side;
What mattereth if most warily
A knife the one did hide.

One fell beneath the greenwood tree,
One shadow fled along;
What mattereth what was done to thee,
The bonny leaves among.

One dived beneath the greenwood tree,
One shadow up and down;
What mattereth then what listeth he,
Or what he putteth down.

One walked from out the greenwood tree,
One shadow and no more;
What mattereth it to you or me
Why two not as before.

Underneath the greenwood tree,
Two orphans sit at play;
They little think what it may be
That nourisheth the weeds so gay.

REMAINING SUPERSTITIONS.—THE DEATH OF THE WITCH.

Noo Catlaw, late aae smilin' fair,
Is looking dreary, cauld, and bare;
Half seen out thro' the murky air,
Whase drizzly rains
The earth, unable to haud mair,
Spreads owre the plains.

Nae flowrie wild noo sweetly blaws;
Nae birdie warbles i' the shaws;
Nae crystal burnie saftly fa's,
But, muddy-deep,
It onward rushes, like the fa's
On Scylla's steep.

How eerie now the Isla's roar,
As—madly tearing frae its shore
Trees, banks, and rocks—it rushes o'er
The reeky linn,
Where water-kelpies neigh encore!
And gallop in.

Noo witches broom-stick naigs bestride;
Noo water-wraiths shriek owre the tide;
Noo coffins unsupported glide
To human view,
And deils the very lightning ride,
If tales be true.

Sae stories ran, if I mind right,
Upon ae dark December night,
When I had wandered o'er the height
To yon wee cot,
To see if a' was keeping tight
Wi' Widow Scott.

There Pedler Peter sat fu' vauntie;
And John o' Gill, no fou, but cantie;
And here my douce-like thrifty auntie,
Wi' cards an' woo,
Aye drivin' at her eenin' stentie,
To ca' it thro'.

"I dinna ken," quoth John o' Gill;
"But, gie me plenty brown-stout yill,
I think I'd meet Auld Nick himsel',
E'en in yon glack
Whar bogies fell on you pell-mell,
And steal your pack."

"Gude safe's!" said auntie, as she raise
To gar the fire mair cheerfu' blaze;
Synne edgin' in her stool side-ways,
To steer the light—
"You shoudna say sic daft-like says
On sic a night.

"Ye ne'er should say a word uncivil,
Either o' dead fouk or the Deevil;
Ye dinna ken what awfu' evil—
The thought should daunt's—
Sair ance they tried auld Elder Greville,
The pick o' saunta.

"Ye see, when Sappie Epp was deein'—
Wha lang was kenned for aiths and lecin',
And mair than ance accused o' bein'
A witch and mair—
The elder gaed out-owre to see an'
Gie her a prayer.

"It was an awfu' winter's night—
The Linn was roarin' till a high—
I maist, beside the fire, took fright
To hear the wind,
Noo rattlin loud, and then icht-icht,
Like some brute kind.

"It hailed, and snawed, and rained thro' ither,
I'm sure I never saw sic weather;
And aae too said my guid auld mither,
Dead an' awa;
And mony a time, when neighbours gather,
There's hardly twa

"But what declare the dreadfu' blast
Came south, and north, and east, and wast;

While voices hissed, and spunkies cast
 Their flare about;
 You'd thought the world was at its last,
 Or thereabout.

"But yet, for a', the elder wandered—
 And aye on holy texts he pondered—
 Yet thought and thought, and often wondered
 To find that he,
 Wha kenned the road sae weel, had daundered
 Sae aft agee.

"At length he came where Iala hurled,
 And lap, and dash'd, and faem'd, and swirl'd;
 When something close beside him skirled
 Right in his lug,
 Sae loud the very stanes a' tirl'd
 That built the brig.

"Then shapeless things came flickering by,
 Between him and the murky sky;
 And then a lang, low, fearfu' cry
 Came on the wind,
 And put him in an eerie way,
 Sad state o' mind.

"Then frae the crags around the pool,
 Whare Steenie drowned himsel' last Yule,
 Loud nickerings came; syne sounds o' dool
 Were faintly heard;
 And they wha'd lang lain i' the mool
 Dim-like appeared.

"Before, the ne'er a thing could fear him,
 But noo his legs wad hardly bear him;
 And tho' naught durstna touch a hair o'm,
 Yet, frae that night,
 His looks were aye some harum-scarum,
 Wi' sic a fright.

"Then aye was heard a souf, souf, soufin',
 Just like the yird aboon the coffin;
 Then some unearthly sort o' laughin'
 Came through the trees.
 (Troth, John, it's true, for a' your daffin',
 I tell nae lees.

"'Tis true I wasna there mysel',
 An' sawna, therefore, what I tell;
 But Tibbie Doeg, and Rachel Bell,
 And Widow Watt,
 And mair, hae heard Greville himsel'
 Say mair than that.)

"Aweel, at length he turned the knowe,
 And gae a ca' on Jacob Low;
 And sae they baith gaed thro' the howe
 Unto the heugh,
 Whar Eppie's house—it's lang since noo—
 Stood lane enough.

"Some folks sat round the ingle nook,
 But nane had ventured yet to look
 On her wha, howling curses, brook
 The tempest's pause;
 And then, when wind the cupples shook,
 Lang breathings drawa.

"The lids the elder drew aside,
 But sic a sight his een did bide!—
 The like o't ne'er may ane betide,
 No e'en my face—
 For there he saw a bloody tide
 Among the claes.

"Her een rowed awful in her head,
 Syne fixed and glassey, like the dead;
 And then her teeth sic grindin' made!
 And sic a yowl!
 And then sic cursin' as she said!
 And bann'd her soul!

"O sirs! O sirs!—it's wae to see
 A fellow-creature's agony;
 But hear her, when she's gaun to dee,
 Swear and blasphemae,
 Has aye a something in't to me
 I canna name.

"The elder knelt beside his chair,
 And tried to gie a suitin' prayer;
 But scarcely got begun, or mair,
 When he'd be scur'd—
 She'd swear such dreadfu' aiths as ne'er
 On earth were heard.

"She raved—there was no hideous guilt
 But she had haen some hand intil't;
 Fause aiths she'd sworn, and blood she'd spilt,
 And bound hersel',
 Wi them wha wi' the Devil dealt,
 To gang to hell!

"Syne whittret brutes would scour the floor,
 An' strange like rape came to the door,
 An' noises, like an earthquake's roar,
 Came through the gavel.
 Syne floss, floss, floss, came aye before
 Ilk word o' Greville.

"And often when they thought her gane,
 She'd wake again wi' eldritch grane,
 And aye her hollow een wad strain
 To see some sight;
 And then she'd pluck the claes, and then
 Lie straight outright.

"At length the rattle in her throat,
 Told plainly death was noo her lot;
 And sae it was—few minutes brought
 Rest to her clay.
 Her spirit fled—what road it sought
 I canna say.

"But a' were happy when the spade
 Had clapped the grave where she was laid;
 And mony ane mair earnest said
 Their evenin' prayers,
 And better sons and parents made
 In after years."

SONG.

By John Nevay.

When o'er the hill the golden moon
 Lights the tired reapers to repose,
 Oh, I'll be near your father's ha',
 Where the sweet-singing burnie rowa.
 O'er moor and dale I'll hie to thee,
 Even as a bird unto its nest;
 For the love that liveth in my heart
 Maun find its home in thy downy breast.

My Peggy dear! 'neath the bright-red rowan,
 O let us twa be blest ance mair!
 An' I will breathe my soul to thee,
 Like morning's sun to the lily fair;
 Or where the bonny young guigne-tree grows
 On the thymy brae aboon the stream;
 But its murmur scarcely will we hear
 For the sweeter music o' love's sweet theme.

Our hearts will meet, and gladly sweet,
 Like sounds melting into harmonie;
 For the chords o' love are smiles an' joys,
 An' the joy o' heaven is in thy ee.
 Our souls will meet, like the odours sweet,
 Of summer's roses wet wi' dew;
 An' the vow unspoken shall ne'er be broken—
 What 'vails the vow when love is true!

The moon has clomb o'er the eastern hill,
 The vale is flooded wi' silver light;
 An' it seems a land o' peace an' joy,
 Sae sheen, the night is not like night!
 O'er moor an' dale I hie to thee,
 Even like a bird unto its nest;
 For the love that fluttereth in my heart
 Maun find its home in thy balmy breast.

PRINCE CHARLES EDWARD'S LAST VIEW OF SCOTLAND.

By David Vedder.

Farewell to thee, Scotland, thy verdure is blighted,
 Thy daisies are steep'd in the blood of the brave;

And I, who thy wrongs with the sword would have righted,

Am toss'd like a fugitive serf on the wave !
Impell'd to the pursuit by gold and by vengeance,
My foemen are swift as the storm-driven rack ;
From the fierce brutal tribes they've selected their engines,

The beagles and blood-hounds are scenting my track.
Farewell to thee, Scotland, thy hills are receding,
So beagles and blood-hounds can track as they may ;
But my heart to its centre is wounded and bleeding,
For thousands who fell on Culloden's dark day.

The hill-fox's howl, and the lorn widow's wailings,
Commingle at midnight, 'midst tempest and rain ;
And the red mountain-streamlets by smouldering shields,

Brawl hoarsely and fiercely the dirge of the slain.
The chieftains and heroes who followed my banner,
Are pining in dungeons, and bleaching on walls ;
Or, stripp'd of their all, saving conscience and honour,
The grass growing rank on their hearths and their halls.

Farewell to thee, Scotland, thy loftiest mountain
Is fading and blending with ocean and sky,
I groan—for my tears are dried up at the fountain,
A wanderer I've lived, and an exile I'll die.

The next song we publish under protest.
" Mary Williamson " is no doubt a very pretty Scottish ballad, but unfortunately it is " Jeanie Morison " diluted. There is, however, merit, and great merit, in feeling, admiring, and successfully imitating Motherwell's exquisite ballad ; and as the author of " Mary Williamson " is a young working man, we commend this one specimen of his first attempts at song writing to the good-liking of our readers, without wishing him to believe that he is yet a lyrical poet ; a delusion very easily created, as we have reason to believe, and which sometimes proves of mischievous tendency.

MARY WILLIAMSON.

Ye pass by, Mary Williamson,
As me ye'd never seen—
And can ye hae forgotten, then,
The happy time that's been ?
When bairns baith we played oursel
The lee-lang summer day,
Till gloamin' clos'd the violet's e'e
And hush'd the linnets' lay.

Ye mind, dear Mary Williamson,
We wandered by yon stream,
And culled the fairest flowrets there
To be a diadem.
While, fondly hanging on my neck,
I'd place it on your brow,
And kiss your cheek, and hear you say,
" Oh, how I love you now."

Ye mind too, Mary Williamson,
How a't we sought the brae,
To read for hours the simple tales
That made our hearts sae wae.
I yet could tell the thymy bank
We made our seat at e'en,
But maybe ye've forgotten, now,
The happy time that's been.

I mind yet, Mary Williamson,
The hour ye left the glen,
When baith our hearts were like to break,
That scarce before knew pain.
I think I see your gushing een,
And hear you sabbing sair—
Ah ! Mary, a' my troubles since,
Hae been far less to bear.

I've wandered, Mary Williamson,
Thro' mony a laud sinsyne,
But never yet hae met a heart
Wha's strings could thrill to mine.
And aft I've wonder'd, when I roam'd
Alang yon distant sea,
If I were still as dear to you
As ye were then to me,
I've seen you, Mary Williamson,
But, oh, how chang'd ye seem,
Frae that same little happy child,
The seraph o' my dream.
The bloom o' womanhood has plac'd
Its beauty on your brow—
But, oh, I fear, ye cannot say,
" Oh, how I love you now."
But joy, sweet Mary Williamson,
Within your bosom be,
Altho' a cup o' wretchedness,
Be a' that's left to me.
I'll love you aye—I'll bless you aye,
That joy may still be mine ;
And in my dreams embrace the child,
Who loved me lang, lang syne.

W. K.

This section we close with a spirited lyric,
which, if not purely Scottish, is of a kindred race.

SONG OF THE NORSEMEN.

The ocean shakes his angry brow,
He rages for his prey,
But shall we heed the tempest now ?
Ye thousand barques away !
Away ! each gallant mast
Shall bend beneath the gale,
As the reed bows to the blast,
In the tempest-beaten vale.
Before we reach the sea-girt land,
Where the blue-eyed Saxons dwell,
Where the blood lies red on the thirny sand,
To mark where our fathers fell.
Ye sons of the mountain, rejoice in your might,
'Tis the sword of revenge waves us on to the fight.
On high the seaman soars
To chant his dismal tale—
How the storm will strew the shores,
Ere the eastern sky turns pale.
We listen to the crashing noise,
As the angry waters roll ;
We love to hear the tempest's voice—
'Tis music to the soul—
We laugh at the rage of the foaming wave,
We laugh at the north wind's wrath ;
What, what can daunt the breathless brave,
Who tread in glory's path ? [now,
Howl on resistless blast, that dwell'st 'mid the northern
We love to hear your voice, for you hear us to the foe.
As the flood foams down the rock,
We rush into the fray,
For we love the battle shock,
As the eagle loves his prey:
Our eyelids scorn repose,
Till our swords are drunk with gore—
The cursed name of our fathers' foes
Shall perish evermore ;
For we have girded on their blades,
To tread their glorious path ;
Weep on ! weep on ! ye blue-eyed maids,
The whirlwind of our wrath
Shall leave not a lover, a brother, a sire,
For the vengeance of Norsemen can never expire.
And when the Saxon foe
Has sunk beneath our blades,
'Tis then to feast we go,
Beneath the forest shades ;
With generous cups of the blood-red wine
We rouse the fainting soul,
Till the warrior glows with joys divine,
Deep drawn from the foaming bowl,

Our spirits roam thro' Odin's bowers,
 Beyond the deep-green sea,
 Where the chilling (smapet never lowers,
 Where the bowl is ever free;
 'Tis thus that the ocean-borne sons of the north
 To the fight, and the feast, and the wassail go forth.
 Thou vast unfathom'd deep,
 Whose waters never rest,
 Thy warrior sovereigns sweep
 O'er thy many-furrowed breast;
 Then let thy billows bear us fast,
 To the white-haired Saxons' home;
 Let the hoarse winds bend each quivering mast;
 Till it kiss thy churning foam!
 Now o'er the mountain surge we go,
 The northern blast our guide;
 We mount their threatening crests of snow,
 As the sea-bird mounts the tide.
 Hurrah! hurrah! ere the morrow's sun has kissed the burning wave,
 The sons of Odin shall have won a kingdom or a grave.

THE LAST PLAGUE OF EGYPT.

"And it came to pass, that, at midnight, the Lord smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt, from the first-born of Pharaoh that sat on his throne, unto the first-born of the captive that was in the dungeon; and all the first-born of cattle.

"And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he and all his servants, and all the Egyptians; and there was a great cry in Egypt; for there was not a house where there was not one dead."—Exod., xiv., 30, 30.

I look'd, and, lo! a city fair, amid the twilight gray,
 Encased in rich magnificence and glittering array;
 Whose mighty towers and battlements, ascending far on high,
 Methought they vainly tried to reach the mansions of the sky.

The gilded domes and palaces which in the sun-ray shone,
 Could boast the glories of the sky to rival them alone;
 And giant warriors, fierce and grim, reclined in soft repose,
 Ne'er dreaming of the great I AM, whose might excell'd their foes.

Despite the wonders he had done so lately in their land,
 They trusted in their idols dumb, who little aid could lend.

I look'd, and, lo! a river great, whose waters, deep and broad,
 Were rushing, with o'erwhelming force and fury, on their road;
 And, when I saw its mighty swell, and heard its deafening
 crash,
 Methought I heard the thunder's roll, and saw red lightnings flash,

As if the caverns of the earth with fear had shook awhile.
 When Nature's stern command broke forth,* so rush'd
 the fruitful Nile.

I look'd beyond the city walls, and saw, with pity great,
 A tribe forlorn and destitute, of low and mean estate:
 'Twas Israel's seed, in bondage held, by Pharaoh's cruel hand;

And deep and awful were the wrongs of this oppressed band;

For, in their labour, hard and great, their masters grieved them sore;

Their cries for pity pass'd unheard—in vain did they implore;

For harden'd were the hearts of those who made them
 baw and build,

In crowded lanes, in forests dense, or in the open field.

And, as I look'd, a man of GOD amid this tribe arose—
 "Fear not," said he, with accents mild, "though girded
 by your foes;

The Lord of Armies is your God, and who can conquer him?

Though now in life your state be low, before his sight you seem

* At the Deluge.

Of more importance than the hosts on Egypt's haughty
 shore;
 And soon the power which mocks you now shall ne'er oppress you more.

But let each heart and hand to Him who reigns on high above

Be lifted up in prayer divine, and trust his gracious love.
 A ray of hope now burst anew, and cheer'd each drooping mind—

They bow'd their heads to JACOB'S GOD with gratitude unfeign'd.

Now, hidden in the gloom of night, the earth enshrouded lay;

And now the city's busy hum had died far, far away;
 And nothing broke the silence mild which reigned far around,

Except the rushing of the Nile, whose fearful rolling sound

Portended to each guilty one, who started from his rest,
 A dire revenge for wrongs which sprang within his hidden breast.

* * *
 But now the mournful scene is chang'd from gloomy silence deep,

And through those haughty palaces the moaning winds now creep.

Now fierce and fiercer still they blow; afar is heard the crash

Of angry Thunder's hoary bolts; and now in fury dash
 And bound from side to side—then pause—then onward,
 on they swing,

The foaming waters of the Nile, till earth's foundations ring.

See, lo, it comes!—with hasty strides it marches swift along!

Now, o'er the city's golden head, ten thousand lightnings throng;

And pealing thunders, fierce and loud, are rushing to and fro,

And all is dark, save when illum'd by the red lightning's glow.

Behold yon tow'ring battlements, how beautiful they seem,
 While, gleaming like a meteor bright, amid the lurid beam.

They quake—they totter—down they fall—those mighty turrets high!

Affrighted at the dreadful shock, their wretched inmates fly.

They fly—but into Nilus' surge, who swiftly onward bore;

They struggle in his raging waves—then sink, to rise no more.

Heard ye that shrill and piercing cry ascending through the gloom?

'Tis some sad mother o'er her child lamenting at its doom.
 For what can hush a mother's love?—Hark! there it peals again!

Another, and another still!—why all this mournful strain?

Why all those doleful cries and groans that fearfully arise,
 And, spreading far asunder, burst beneath the frowning skies?

Say, can it be the citizens who raise that fearful wail,
 Who lately revell'd in the thought that none could them
 assail,

And who had mock'd Jehovah's power, enslav'd his chosen race,

For which his vengeance surely falls on this devoted place?
 Hark! these tremendous bursts again, ascending far on high,

Which seem to drown the thunderbolts that ev'rywhere do fly.

Now Nature quakes, and quakes again. In Egypt ne'er was heard,

And never shall be heard again, such cries as now were rear'd

Unto the host of Heav'n above. From Pharaoh's mighty throne

E'en to the captive's lowly cell, just Heav'n's revenge was thrown.

And now those haughty palaces earthquakes have rent in twain—
Now Israel's cause avenged is, and Egypt's first-born slain.

Christmas, 1835.

Janus approaches; eight days and he's here,
And I no gift to offer the new year!
Is then the fountain of my wit quite dry,
And will no drop distil from Castaly?
And must the year's old tollman—"twere absurd—
See me pass by without a single word?
Rather let me in a new track explore
Some theme no minstrel ever woke before.

These things, my Muse, revolving in her mind,
Nothing (nor think that nought) hath chanced to find;
Nothing excels the ruby's purple glow,
Nothing the golden wealth of Mexico!
Look here, my friends, lend me each man his ear,
A thing ne'er heard before prepare to hear!
All other themes have claim'd the poet's fire,
Nothing hath fail'd as yet the bard 't inspire!
As far as earth or ocean's arms extend
Nothing exists without or birth or end;

Nothing immortal is by all confest;
Nothing, in every point of view, is blest!
Yet such the attributes of power divine,
Is aught then God, to aught shall altars shine;
Nothing more jocund than Apollo's rays
When on the gardens of the East he plays!
Than flowery meadows Nothing is more fair;
Nothing more gentle than a breath of air;
Nothing in war is sacred and secure;
Nothing in peace is just, in treaties sure!
"Happy who Nothing has," a bard doth sing;
No wiles he dreads, no thieves, nor fires, nor Swing!
No lengthen'd suits in chancery's Chancery,
Nor aught hath he to do with lawyer's fee!

The atole, who resigns all things to fate,
Nothing admires, with Nothing is elate!
"Nothing I know," said he who knew the most,
A wisdom now, † the universal boast!
Nothing the young man studies hard at school—
Such knowledge hath advanced full many a fool.
Know Nothing, and you'll know at last, I ween,
The secret of the Sage-forbidden bean.
Th' alchemist, (trusting the false god of theft,) Whom his own toil and trouble have bereft
Of all his gold and patrimonial ground,
Shuts out the light of day and busy sound,
And Nothing seeks though he hath Nothing found.

Nothing—unmeted by geodætic chain—
Nothing can measure o'er the boundless main,
Or mark the roods the desert may contain.
To sage Apollo Nothing is unknown,
Nothing is loftier than the starry throne!
Nothing the strength of the sun's light may shame,
Nothing more pure than spark of heavenly flame!
And Brougham!—wide, wide, 'tis true thy range of thought;
Who throughout Nature hast thy wisdom sought—
Nothing to deck thy mind is yet unbought!

Withouten substance Nothing yet hath been
By finger touch'd, and without colour seen,
Nothing deaf hears, without a voice can beg,
Flies without wings, or walks without a leg!
Nothing on Nothing moving, Nothing buoy'd,
Wanders throughout the vast and pathless void!

† It was the translation, not the original, that was indited in this "Age of Intellect."

Nothing 's more useful than the leech's art.
Thou, then, that art transfix'd with Cupid's dart,
No longer trust Thessalian witches's skill,
Nor think with Cretan herbs to cure thine ill;
Nothing will cure the wound that dart has made;
Nothing has power to call the dreary shade
Across the waters of the Styx convey'd.
Nothing old Pluto's stony heart will turn,
Arrest Fate's scissors and the circling urn!
When o'er the Titan youth Jove's thunder broke,
Nothing surpass'd in power that lightning-stroke;
Nothing extends beyond the world's wide walls;
Nothing th' immortal deities appals!
But why attempt its endless might to prove,
Nothing excelleth Hope, and Faith, and Love,
Nothing outshines the attributes of Jove!
'Tis time laborious trifling have an end,
Lest, if I farther this fine web extend,
You deem those lines to which my Muse gives birth,
As spun from Nothing, so as Nothing worth.

SONNETS.

By Major Calder Campbell.

When foredoomed lovers first behold each other,
Portents of good or ill the scene attend
Unnoted and unknown! When I, my friend,
First met thee, (thee, now dearer than a brother!)
It was the omen season, Hallows'en—
And the first look the one gave to the other
Bound each to each! Yet trivial was the scene,
And unaccompanied by nature's charms,
That link true lovers to encircling arms
By sights and sounds of beauty. Forest green,
Half-hid in snow, nor welly-wood was there,
Nor flowery field, nor mountain bare and bold,
But the bright faggot to fend off the cold,
And laughter loud, that pierced the frosty air!

SONNETS ON THE MONTHS.

The following complete the Rural Calendar of the months, of which we gave the Summer and Autumn months upon a former occasion.

NOVEMBER.

The trees are near undraped, and every gale
Thins the sere brotherhood of leaves that cling—
Last of their race—to the gray twigs, and sing
Their latest songs with melancholy wail.
Cold rain and sleet, and the round patt'ring hail
Drive through the gorges of the hills, and sweep
Across the plains; while blinded cattle creep
'Neath the tall hedge or mossy thicket-pale.
The dank, drenched earth is comfortless; the woods—
'Reft of their parent trees by mighty winds—
Look sad; torn ocean lifts his roaring floods
Up to the sky, and strewn the beach with wrecks.
Howl, storm! my spirit loves your violence; and finds
A joy, ecstatic deep, in your terrific freaks.

DECEMBER.

The fields are emptied of the sweet-breath'd kine;
The woods are shelterless; the mountain-brook,
That scarce in Summer's face had dared to look,
Now foams along, and scorns a narrow line.
Rivers spill o'er their banks, and madly tinge,
Thundering with waste of waters to the sea.
Clouds drop their snowy burthens silently;
And leafless trees in fleecy vestments shine.
Last of the Months and merriest!—for with thee—
Like old Silenus and his company—
Comes ancient Christmas, with a jocund train—
With dance, and frolic, and the wasail-bowl!
Thy festive charm long, long may'st thou retain,
Joiner of friends, and soft'ner of the soul!

JANUARY.

The depth of Winter!—Stilly, but blindly,
Deep-burying all of earth, in one wide grave,
Fast falls the flaky snow.—What now can save

* Time—to rage.—Spenser.

The traveller sinking on the moor to die ?
What cheers the shepherd's heart, while, lonesomely,
He buffets with the storm, and winds that rave
Loud on th' eternal hills, and fears to have
A lifeless burial, and no mourner nigh ?
Now the frozen soil is hardened into rock ;
Broad waters are bridged o'er with ice, and bear
The heavy waggon, and a sportive throng
That, to and fro, glide rapidly along.
Home, now, has charms untold ; and numbers flock
Round the big fire that blazes everywhere.*

FEBRUARY.

The river strayeth at its own sweet will—†
Swoll'n by the melting snows and deluge rains—
Spilling its waters o'er the grassy plains ;
And a hoarse brook is Summer's tinkling rill.
A few faint snow-spots linger on the hill,
High on its unsunn'd side ; the woods and lanes,
Dank, bedded leaves, torn branches—the remains
Of greedy storms—the blusterer's relics—fill.
But blue-eyed Spring is struggling into life,
And feebly laughs, and lisps her earliest words.
The snow-drop peeps ; the voice of singing birds
Is heard again ;—the blackbird's warble brief—
And the sweet song that tumbles from the sky.
The woodlark's, throstle's, wren's soft minstrelsy—

* I should have said everywhere but in "the huts where poor men lie"—the hovels of the destitute. Have pity upon them, ye rich ! Have pity upon the wretched poor !

† The river glideth at its own sweet will.—Wordsworth.

MARCH.

March has a greener verdure for the mead,
And for o'erarching heaven a livelier blue ;
Her clouds more fleecy are, more lightsome too,
And morn and even burn with paly red ;
In pranksome mood they troop it overhead,
Or side by side in stilly clusters lie,
Leaning their cheeks together lovingly.
March, of the gusty breath ! a snow-white bed
Of wood-anemonies is strewn for thee ;
Pansies, and violets, and crocuses
Attend thee with their loving companies,
And wait upon thy steps devotedly.
With starry pilewort-flowers thy chaplet's made,
And all thy wind-blown tresses garlanded.

APRIL.

Lo ! the full march of Spring !—And now 'tis sweet
In woods, beneath the budding trees, to rest,
And hear the young rook clamour in his nest ;
Or, 'mid the blooms, upon the orchard-seat,
With vernal songs around, and the lamb's bleat
Coming from fields between the blossoms seen,
With knots of cowslips spotting o'er their green.
And sweet it is to stroll, with lingering feet,
Along the primrose-sprinkled banks of brooks
That seem to bring glad tidings from the hills—
Brooks big with vernal showers—and frequent fright,
The oft-heard cuckoo from his hiding nooks.
Sweet is the sheen of clustering daffodils !
And daisies lavish of their red and white !

BLANCHE DELAMERE.

BY MRS JOHNSTONE.

CHAPTER XII.

The Denouement.

It will scarcely be remembered how we left Blanche Delamere, after having solemnly, if silently, given her troth-plight, and just as she and her lover joined their waiting friends, under the magnificent guardian beeches in front of Holy Cross, on the day of her coming of age, and on the eve of Frederick Leighton's departure from England for a period of years.

It was Blanche who first courageously spoke,
"Dr Leighton leaves to-morrow, Dr Hayley.
Having advised or approved my strong measure about the poor negroes, he goes to ensure its success by his personal superintendence."

"So soon ?" replied the good Doctor.

"Ay, make much of me to-night, ladies," said Leighton with gaiety somewhat forced ; "You may not see me for three years again :—I wish much to visit the United States ; from thence I can easily procure a vessel for the Mediterranean, and realize a boy's classic dreams, by visiting Greece. I may, perhaps, be tempted to carry your united loves to our old friend Hassan, under his tent."

"We gentlemen who live at home at ease, may be tempted to envy you the power of doing good and acquiring liberal knowledge," replied the Doctor. "The system of a gentleman's education is greatly expanded since I was a young man, and placed my highest pride in being appended to a noble lady's girdle."

NO. LXIX.—VOL. VI.

"The ladies do not seem to covet so awkward an appendage as myself, or I also might be but too proud. The Countess, however my vanity may be mortified by the preference, has, I fear, the good taste to choose you."

"Indeed you must never leave us again," said Blanche ; "and I shall never be quite sure of you, till you fairly give up the living. You flatteringly tell me how happy I make you : Now, that I am emancipated, your protection is more necessary to me than ever, were it but to put the proper face of decorum upon my maiden court."

"You are but too good to me—too kind, dearest lady," replied the old man, melted to tears. "Need I say that my home of forty years is become dearer to me than ever."

"Then we never part !" said Blanche, extending her hand to shake hands. The old man raised the fair hand to his lips with affectionate and graceful courtesy. His former petulant pupil also seemed deeply touched.

"And that I may deserve your countenance," she said, when she had recovered composure,
"I promise to be the most decorous, dignified, and pretty-behaved peeress of my years, in this well-ordered realm—that is, in my public capacity.
At home, among ourselves, with the children, and such worthy and intelligent people as will be social with us, I may be as foolish as I list ; and we shall be a happy, and, I am sure, an attached, though the world should call us a humdrum family. Nor shall we be so very humdrum. Many of life's best pleasures lie around us for the gathering, and we will taste them with relish and cheerfulness. The world may not quite understand us, but it shall be compelled to reverence, perhaps, in time, to love us. By the time I have reached the mature age of twenty-five, it will perhaps admit that so sober-minded and well-conducted a personage has a right to judge for herself in what mainly concerns her own happiness; it may not, in short, be longer able to withhold its consent"—and she hesitated—"to my marriage with Frederick. Give us yours now, Doctor, with your blessing!" The good Doctor was taken by surprise, and fairly overcome. The consent he had no right to give or to withhold, and the fervent blessing, was the spontaneous impulse of his warmest feelings, as he clasped the united hands presented to him.

"And now," said Blanche, smiling and drying her eyes, "all is as it should be—there are no secrets, no mysteries in our little household, and we shall be all the happier for that ourselves:—strangers have no business with our affairs or projects." The ladies withdrew to the house, and Leighton soon followed them, leaving the Doctor to recover himself.

A thousand last words were still to be spoken—and a thousand reminders of arrangements for constant correspondence—and ten thousand fond entreaties and counsels to be given to a medical man about the care of his own health:—and that scheme was to be absolutely negated which precluded an intermediate visit to England before Leighton went to Greece. Even his sage aunt remarked, that he was bound first to return and give an account of his stewardship.

"Return only to be banished again? I am not equal to this continually renewed torture."

"Nay, remember," said Blanche, "that this lies in your own choice. If I have sometimes spit in the world's face, to express my scorn of some of its base ways, I am surely equal to setting myself above its tyrannical opinion, in so solemn a matter as this. It would punish me for being a woman! Were I a young independent nobleman, falling in love and marrying a physician's pretty daughter, I would in time be forgiven by the ladies, and the gentlemen would at once applaud me—if she were very pretty. . . . How idly I talk! Good night, then, Good night!"

"Nay, aunt—my own Blanche—stay but a moment! You shall not take her from me yet," and, while the old lady, smiling gently, retired, he led back the Lady Blanche, softly repeating—

"Good night! Ah, no, the night is ill
That severs those it should unite;
Let us but be together still,
Then will it be—GOOD NIGHT!"

For how many solitary days and nights, in my exile, will those words, which your Good night has recalled, ring in my ears? But now it must be Good night, indeed."

"Our God be ever with you to bless you, dear Leighton! . . . Oh, remember all that you are to me—that I have in this world, of supreme, but you alone!"

Though Leighton, it had been agreed, was to go off without further leave-taking, the young Countess felt deep chagrin, and something like momentary displeasure, to find next morning that he had been able to obey her own command.

"He might have let us see him for one moment," she said; "I could be superstitious about it. Do you remember Clara's feeling about St Preux's dream of Julia and the veil?—and you can smile, my friend. Well, fortunately, I must go down to those business people—and then receive those visitors. Well, well, the longest day comes to an end."

On this long day Sir Jervis Yates had the honour of attending the ladies of Fanfaronade Park, on their congratulatory visit to Holy Cross, and to arrange about the ball he meditated in honour of its mistress coming of age. She was found looking remarkably well, in high spirits, and dressed with more splendour and care than was her wont; and also exceedingly obliging and gracious. She accepted a verbal invitation to a quiet dinner, in the next week, for herself and Dr Hayley. The invitation had, from policy, been extended to "the ci-devant laundress," her "Maintenon," as her friend was sarcastically called by this family, but declined by that judicious person, who quietly put an end to a mutual embarrassment, by simply stating that she never visited save among her own friends.

"And may we not hope to be included in that favoured number?" said Lady Blanche, in her most insinuating voice, though with the gentlest sneer.

The rebuke of the Quakeress was, quietly going on with her muslin-hemming, as if nothing had been said. It was a sensible arrangement of the old woman, they agreed, since the Countess was so very absurd as to place her so nearly on a level with her own society, though, indeed, she was rarely met in the reception rooms.

Nor was this all the good luck of the morning. Dr Leighton, it was understood, had departed, and was immediately to sail for the West Indies.

"It must, therefore, have been all nonsense, that has been whispered on that score," Sir Jervis said; "or else Blanche had come to her senses, and retreated in time, and it was of little consequence which;" while Lady Blanche whispered a request to see "her little niece," and "that mamma, also, might see Devereux's child."

"Pardon me," returned her hostess, reddening; "I cannot expose Eleanor to such a trial. She remembers her mother; she is a child of great natural sensibility—another time she may be prepared to see you:" and no more was said. They joined Dr Hayley at luncheon, and heard him enlightening Sir Jervis upon the Countess's plans.

"Her ladyship sets off for Ireland in a month, and tempts me to accompany her; she will, if we find the residence as agreeable and quiet as she anticipates, remain there till late in October. We are to be great schoolmasters and agriculturists. After spending Christmas at Holy Cross, the Countess proposes to make her first season in London."

"I am delighted!" cried three or four female voices, in chorus.

"I admire your good taste, my dear Countess, in refurnishing Delamere House, antique as it is, in the good old square: And that charming villa—the ambassador's lease of it is expired, I believe?"

"It is my own now," said Blanche, "and I must, I fancy, be so extravagant as to keep it. It will be, if not impossible—since toiling thousands do it continually—yet dire punishment to my friends and myself to live in London, in the sweet spring, and sweeter early summer; but I hope we shall contrive somehow not altogether to misuse our privileges and indulgences."

It was not until after Easter, that the young Countess and her venerable establishment went to London. The widow of a late Governor-General of India—a distant cousin of the Delameres, a woman of high connexions, and universally respected, though far from being rich—condescended to patronise the heiress, and to live with her in town. Dr Hayley also formed part of the town establishment, while the Quakeress lived wholly at the villa, where the Doctor also had an apartment. The Fanfaronades disliked the new arrangement, and endeavoured to impress the heiress with the apprehension, that, in her haughty chaperone, she would take a bore and a selfish tyrant into her family; but Blanche, always a decided person, had not become less so since she had reflected upon her changed position and felt her own consequence. She therefore took her own way; mingled moderately in fashionable society; went twice to Court, and sometimes to Church, and sometimes to Meeting;—rejected, or, more properly, delicately distanced admirers and proposals; and made the duty of her chaperone almost a sinecure, by plainly stating that she would not marry until she was twenty-five, and that her affections were engaged. Save that she acted upon all occasions with the independence and decision of a married woman, or of one far beyond her in years, little fault could be found with her conduct; and if not popular in her first season, neither was she condemned. It was found impossible to fasten a ridicule, whether in dress, style, or behaviour upon a person whose natural dignity and courtesy, and perfect simplicity of manner, baffled the most dexterous of the fashionable wits, gossips, and quizzers.

Even the nice, cheerful-looking, silver-haired matron often seen in the carriage with her, was now dressed with simple elegance, in rich, though mild-coloured silken garments, not of the stiffest Quaker cut. She was, to be sure, rather a Hannah-Moreish looking person, but not objectionable as an old governess. And the aristocratic dowager who, if poor in purse, was a person of high spirit, if she began the connexion—to which her poverty and not her will consented—with an inward feeling of mortification, prolonged her residence under the roof of the orphan heiress from genuine attachment. The mystery of season after season, passing away and the Countess remaining single was none to her. The secret had been frankly intrusted to her honour. She did not approve, but she would not betray; and, as their intimacy ripened into sincere friendship, Blanche would playfully say—

"You must see Frederick ere you condemn me for falling in love at ten years of age and deliberately confirming my choice at twenty."

The dowager had learned the history of their connexion, and sometimes she heard part of the contents of those letters read which formed so much of the happiness of her young friend; on which, indeed, her soul seemed to hang, and to sink when they failed to appear.

The maiden condition of Blanche was accounted for in various ways. There was, according to some excellent authorities, disappointment in consequence of the romantic attachment in girlhood, of a very romantic girl, to one in inferior station. Others, whispered of a compromise with the next heir, who had agreed, on obtaining an immense annuity, not to disturb the actual holder of the honours and estates about flaws in her titles, provided she remained unmarried. The Fanfaronade family did not discourage such reports. True, she continued inexorable towards Mr Devereux, but she was indifferent to any other admirer; and thus hope was not shut out.

"We must wait till she get alarmed at being an old maid," said the politic Lady Blande.

That she lived in comparative retirement, and in a style below her imagined circumstances, was imputed to various causes. She was known to have devoted a considerable share of her income to the improvement of her Irish colony, and to objects of public utility and benevolence; and when tempted to what seemed very trifling and not wholly unnecessary expenses, she would thus laughingly parry the attack.

"Can't afford another white bonnet of the 'exquisite' shape this summer; this is quite clean. Think what a pretty chest of drawers the cabinet-maker in my village of Ballyperi could give me for this sum, (so trifling to Madame,) for one of my tidy Judys. It would purchase such a quantity of prize-books for my school; why, four complete cuckoo clocks—heir-looks among my tenants—could be got for this. No, I can't afford it. Thank you, dear friend, for having so early instructed my tastes and feelings in the true value of money to myself and others. How much of the science of happiness may lie in the knowledge which teaches the proper application of the first rules of arithmetic! To that homely science, together with the perception of the truly beautiful as distinguished from the expensive and conventionally beautiful, how much of the daily enjoyment of my life has been owing, with nearly the whole power which I possess even from my ample fortune of doing some little good to my fellow-creatures!"

She sat with her matronly friend and her noble chaperone, Lady Vesey, and one or two ladies, over their small but elegant dessert, when the new bonnet had been started, apropos to a public breakfast which was about to be given by a noble bachelor, no longer young, where the unmarried ladies were to appear in a kind of uniform, and which led to the conversation on toilet economics.

"Is it not the duty of persons of fortune and condition to encourage elegant manufactures and ingenious industry, especially ladies, with deserving persons of their own sex—a sort of charity to purchase and use lace and embroidery?" said Lady Vesey.

"Perhaps—a sort it may;—many amiable women, at least, consider it so; and it is charity, even to palliate the distress of the poor lace-makers and embroideresses until their distress is done away by society learning to do justice to all its members. These are deep, difficult subjects. But I am so far from thinking myself charitable for purchasing lace and embroidery, that I have trembled to think of the price in health, and in the absence of leisure, pleasure, seasons of mental improvement to some young sister woman or her babes, that my veil, or the trimming of my pocket handkerchief, may have cost; luxuries which, idle as I am, while those pale emaciated creatures fabricate—labouring fifteen hours a-day, and stealing time from necessary sleep to perform their domestic duties—I shall be pronounced charitable for bringing to me with a wish. I strive to put such thoughts from me; and, fortunately, in the meanwhile, there are enow of persons in the great—I mean in the rich world—to foster the pretty arts of millinery and jewellery, though my taste in luxury takes another direction. To say truth, so far as concerns my personal tastes, I have little to give up. I feel little difference between my ornaments and those of the simple maiden, who has the better taste to decorate herself and shed an atmosphere of perfume around her with fresh flowers. The whole to me seems resolvable into what pamphleteers call "The Bullion Question"—hoarded wealth—fixed capital—which men exhibit on the persons of their wives and daughters, or principal slaves, as it may be. The custom of loading the person with ornaments is so essentially barbarous, that I wonder, Lady Vesey, what my jewels would bring? The money could be turned to so much better account. Yes, yes! depend on it, our trinkets will speedily follow the gold-lace and bag-wigs of our lords. I speculate upon all the jewels of civilized Europe (that are left unstolen) being speedily absorbed by the Americans and Russians, to be made over in time to the Esquimaux, provided that nation be ingenious enough to find any trifling exchangeable commodity. There is some real value in trinkets:—like the desire for guns and pistols, they may stimulate the industry of savages, and so help to civilize them."

The Lady Blanche spoke rapidly, as if embarrassed, and, meanwhile, fixed a steady gaze on her chaperone.

"I have been denying stoutly everywhere that you mean to sell your jewels, Countess."

"Thank you; but it won't deny. I have told it myself, hoping to raise my market. I require all the money the ornaments will bring from the very best bidders."

Lady Vesey looked disturbed. She hemmed.

"So many commercial people, and even Jewesses, now wear diamonds, that no doubt their value to persons of condition is greatly depreciated; yet valuable family jewels have always been one distinction of persons of rank." She added emphatically. "Probably their age and history greatly enhance their value to their hereditary possessors. I have a clumsy, little, antique seal-ring, which belonged to our common ancestor, Hubert, seventh Baron of Delamere, which I certainly value at twenty times its intrinsic worth."

"Oh, no! depend upon it, your value is no more to you than its intrinsic worth. Though, somehow, I disregard the mere ornament, don't imagine I undervalue the token, the symbol, the heirloom, if you will. Yet I sadly fear this religion of sentiment is very apt, in our own sex, at any rate, to degenerate into superstition; that the mere symbol becomes the worshipped idol. I love the sentiment, the memorial, the token, but yet dread and despise the vanity and avarice generated by the passion for these pretty toys."

"Remember the turquoise ring and the silver shrine," said the Quakeress, looking up from paring her pippin, with the quiet archness of manner which often gave point and drollery to her simplest laconisms.

"I do; and am charitable!" returned Blanche, blushing and smiling, while her eyes glowed with pleasurable recollections. "The turquoise—I believe it is a bit of blue glass, after all—but Frederick Leighton, when a boy, brought it to me at the laundry from Stock Delamere Fair; the 'silver shrine'—it is the covering I procured with about my first pocket-money, for that old oak-bound Bible, derived to me through my Puritan grandsires. It has, as I find by my grandfather's papers, such a history that poor homely tome! To me, it is hallowed by so many tender, so many lofty, and solemn associations—deep as the first heavings of the Protestant Reformation—elevating as every the poorest emblem must be, of the unconquerable martyr-spirit, the unquenchable love of truth and freedom which burned in the magnanimous breast of its first possessor—that Cheshire yeoman, of whom I feel more proud than if he had been descended of the flower of Norman chivalry."

Blanche felt that she had said far too much, and spoken out of season; and she suffered a chill and recoil of spirit. Excellent, or rather respectable person as Lady Vesey was, it was not from her she could expect sympathy in such enthusiastic feelings. She rose from table, saying, in a lighter if not gay tone—

"I find how difficult it is, in this affair of gems and shrines, to retain the Protestantism of the spirit—should I say the Quakerism? How one's best feelings imperceptibly blend with one's most pitiable weaknesses! I had no sooner gotten an idol than I must have a shrine for it, as my friend says ; and, lest the pure sentiment which the heart attaches to family memorials and tokens of affection, should degenerate in me into woman's paltry love of personal ornaments, and for other good reasons, I am determined to get rid of mine. Besides, I need the money."

"To maintain your orphan family, your modern St Cyr, as your satirical friend, Lady Blande, terms the establishment at the villa."

"I am obliged to Lady Blande for giving my little household so fine a name. Do not you, Lady Vesey, think, that if I am able to provide the means of educating those twelve orphan girls aright, my trinkets—the loss of which is really no personal sacrifice—which, on the contrary, are a plague and anxiety to me—will not be worth considering? My friend, at an age which requires indulgence, gives up her time, devotes her whole energies to our pupils."

"I trust the results may be as satisfactory as the motives for the undertaking are pure," returned the Lady, evasively, and rather drily. "But family jewels—there are questions of transmission involved. Should your Ladyship marry, and have a son, for which, as a true Delamere, I am bound to pray heaven, the jewels—at your pleasure no doubt—might naturally be regarded as part of the fitting paraphernalia of his bride; or be divided, in part, among your daughters."

"'Tis a far cry to Lochawe,' as our cousins, the Campbells say, Lady Vesey," returned Blanche, laughing; "and I hope my sons and daughters may have some of their mamma's tastes in matters of mere luxury and decoration. But, though not convinced that I have not a perfect right to use my own discretion, I shall certainly not purloin the property of my heirs and successors. Much good may it do them, to peruse the inventory of their necklaces, rings, bracelets, spoons, buckles and dishes, 'with a cover.' Save the spoons which I and my friends eat with, I am sure I have had no other good from those heaps of useless things, accumulated at our different supernumerary mansions. I have experienced a swell of pride in looking on my woods and streams, but I am immovable towards my plate chests."

"Gold plate is not to be laughed at," said Lady Vesey. "Old family plate," more emphatically.

"Certainly not—nor for that matter silver-gilt;—and I am so much of the silver-fork school myself, that I wish every body in the world had silver in place of iron and horn to eat their food with—'tis so much cleaner and nicer."

"You love luxury after all, Countess?"

"Warmly—I love it, where it ministers to the cleanliness, the refinement, nay, to the real grace and ornament of life—so warmly, that I wish all mankind to share in what I love. But my homely Quaker arithmetic taught me to prize, first, things necessary; and my Bible bids me love my neighbour as myself, and do to others as I would have them do unto me. Now, were I in the place of one of the pretty young wives of my poor Irish tenants, I am certain I could never think it right, that an idle young woman, like myself, should be squandering those fruits of Judy's husband's labour, which he gives in rack-rent, upon useless, cumbrous ornaments, while the cabin was without beds, chairs, spoons, and platters. But, as I have told you, I follow and gratify my own tastes, by what is fancied an unusual mode of expenditure, although I did not consider it, in my peculiar circumstances, a duty. No, Lady Vesey, the regalia of Great Britain, did it adorn my person, would but humble me the more were those, whom a vicious social state have made my impoverished dependants, left in poverty, while I lavish what is theirs. I prescribe to no one: but, with my Bible lights, I am bound to a certain distribution of my income, and to a certain present and prospective management of my property. My St Cyr, as it seems my friends call it, will not be allowed to interfere with these first duties; but it will absorb all my personal savings. I deny myself no pleasure, meanwhile, that I really feel to be such; and I only fear our family at the villa is becoming too attractive to fashionable people, though I am not afraid of many imitating our plan."

The beautiful villa on the banks of the Thames, which the eccentric young lady had given up—some said for a Nunnery, others for a Magdalen Penitentiary—did become an object of curiosity to a set of persons ever excited by any novelty that promises amusement; and many applications were made to the foundress, both for the admission of pupils and examination of premises. The greater part, and far the happiest, of her own hours were actively spent there, in forwarding the objects of an establishment, from which it required some firmness in the superintendent Quakeress, to keep off the inroads of the idle and impertinent.

"We shall burst upon you, Countess, when you hold your Fancy Fair to dispose of the pretty things made by your ingenious protégées," said one of the Ladies Fanfaronade. "Devereux means to be an immense purchaser."

"My young friends make no pretty things for sale; they are busy in educating and being educated, and in being happy."

"Oh, then it is a drama they are to perform on your birth-day—something Gentis-like. We are quite resolved to be invited. Mamma says she will take no refusal; she takes immense interest in such exhibitions."

"I have seen the girls on the lawn of an evening, perform Thread my Grandmother's Needle," replied Blanche, laughing, "the most brilliant, hitherto, of their histrionic or pantomimic efforts, I fancy."

"Are you not training them for vocalists? so enthusiastic and accomplished a vocalist as you are yourself, or actresses?"

"To act their part as useful independent members of society, to be amiable women, energetic moral beings; no more than that, of acting, Lady Fanny."

"And they wear the Quaker garb, and take vows of celibacy, poor things." Blanche laughed. "Only strong resolutions against foolish, loveless or mercenary marriages, Lady Fanny, which their education sets them above, if they follow it up."

"Your Friend is qualifying the young women for superior domestics, I understand," said Lady Fanfaronade; "and of these there is indeed a grievous want in high life."

"Not exactly for domestics; though every mistress of a family, as I hope some or many of my young friends will become, must first know how to serve. There is really nothing wonderful in the system on which we are endeavouring to train these friendless young women. Their range of study is much more limited than that one sees in the conglomerated ologies of the advertising cards of ordinary boarding-schools. We wish them to learn nothing that is not worth acquiring and retaining; and we strive not to force natural genius. I shall be disappointed if, in after life, these young girls may not be heard to say, that the days in which they were qualifying themselves for the serious duties of life, and to earn independent bread, if need be, were as happy as any they have known."

"But what do they learn, pray? Do they embroider, or do millinery, or make artificial flowers? or ——"

Blanche shook her head, as if dissenting. "We prefer, for their acquirement, skilled labour in things likely to remain useful, and, consequently, in demand, to mere manual dexterity in any art, however temporarily profitable. Of a thousand girls, one four hundred and fifty will make dresses and bonnets about as well as the larger half. We wish our pupils to turn their attention (where Nature has not denied the powers) to pursuits requiring long study and diligent application. No trade can, to man or woman, be the certain means of comfortable subsistence in our society which is too easily acquired; and I hope these young persons will, by their own labour, be rendered comfortable as well as independent in their circumstances."

"Trades! I fancied they were respectable young women, the daughters of professional men and of decayed gentlemen."

"And so they are—all of them, the unprovided daughters of educated if reduced families. But call their future vocations, professions, if you please, for the term will be rightly applied. We have three young ladies who will, by-and-by, be well qualified to supply the place of mothers—to be instructresses—governesses if you will; but that is the one hackneyed resource of all well-born young women in reduced circumstances—one that is both over-done and under-done. We have already two very promising wood-engravers, and one exquisite miniature-painter, particularly of children: that girl will make a fortune if she choose. We have a map-engraver, and a painter of decorations and armorial bearings for us nobility. I have no doubt that some among them might be very clever at jewellery and watch-making. But these are not considered very high arts. One mathematical genius among my Friend's pupils, her master has formed the ambition of having apprenticed to his brother, who is an eminent optical instrument-maker. I hope the plan may succeed. Women, without renouncing the gentle virtues of their sex, might be helpful to themselves in a thousand ways, and society all the happier for it, had they only fair play."

"Oh, true; see the women in Paris in all the shops—Madame directing, managing everything, so keen and active and alert in business—and really harder to deal with than men," said Lady Fanfaronade.

"I confess," returned Blanche, "that I participate in the English prejudice against female traffickers, shopkeepers, and clerks. How very sharp, and sharp-witted, selfish, hard, worldly, and, in one word, unwomanized, clever girls do become, in chaffering situations, as book-keepers, bar-maids, and whatever exposes them to the public gaze and the contact of strange multitudes, with gain, or the hope of it, for the object, or personal vanity the continual stimulus.—Morally, these female dealers are in a worse condition than the poor actresses and figurantes. They only simulate, and often, what is the most soft, refined, and feminine in the sex; while the women of business, where the most gentle in their nature, at best only learn to conceal their grasping dispositions under flattering and cajolery."

"Just like a fashionable physician striving, by mean arts, to obtain practice: the modiste palms off her wares, the doctor his nostrums upon silly women," said the Quakeress, "and often by the same arts of cozening and white-lying. I would not, therefore, have thee rest blame exclusively upon the poor professional women, dear lady."

"Nor do I—they are very like their brethren; and perhaps the brazen impudence or hardness of the lower class of trading women—those whom one sees at the counters of gin-palaces and in pawnbrokers' shops—is not a whit worse than the polished or lackered metal worn as the visors of their superiors. If our young friends cannot acquire and exercise some branch of skilled industry without becoming public traders, plunged into the keen competition of selfish interests, and jostling and elbowing their way in the market, I shall at once abandon my plan. Let us English, whatever the French may do, keep at least one sex sacred from the selfishness and contamination of traffic, as far as is possible. I suppose that few merchants, and indeed few professional men, physicians, lawyers, and still less statesmen, would wish their high-principled and pure and single-minded wives and daughters to know about the compromises, and trimmings, and subterfuges, and tricks in trade, that enter into their affairs. Such imprudent confidences would inevitably diminish esteem on both sides. When a man is blamed for not acquainting his wife with his affairs, one must believe that the true reason often is, that he respects her probity, her purity of principle, too much to take her into his confidence about his commercial enterprises, speculations, watchings of the turn of the market, and all those fine things into which, for the sake of both men and women, I should be very sorry to see women initiated, although they should be condemned 'to chronicle small beer' for a century longer. My young sisterhood shall be taught no 'art nor science which they may not exercise in woman's true place, the bosom and sanctuary of home; and either as single women, wives, or widows, as circumstances may dictate; though it is for the independence, and consequently the happiness, of single women I am mainly concerned."

"And you would neither have them milliners, dressmakers, nor in business at all?" said Lady Vesey.

"There will always, I fear, be too many milliners and dressmakers; and I have said that I do not, at present, like trafficking for women. In the name of all that is holy and happy in domestic life, let us shield at least one-half of the species from, I fear, the too frequently corrupting processes by which bread must be striven for in our imperfect and uneasy society."

"Not bread," said the Quakeress, quietly; "that is generally honestly and hardly earned by the sweat of the brow; but certainly bread, if with butter to it, by those who profess to believe all the while that, for the three score and ten years, food and raiment will suffice; and to depend, from day to day, for that same on God's Providence."

"Oh, just so. It is plum-cake then, the was-sail bread, which so many among us are striving for, and rarely obtain, without sustaining some moral injury—some stain to the virgin purity of conscience in the worldly strife. The softer and more flexible nature of women, at least, could hardly escape contamination."

"Persons in business are, I am aware, often very low-minded, if not sordid, creatures," said Lady Vesey, looking annoyed by the discussion, "and such cheats!"

"Pardon me, Lady Vesey—my homely illustration comprehended many more than tradespeople—all the professions—all those who wish for more money or money's worth than they can honestly and honourably acquire; and that, I am afraid, includes nearly the whole aristocratic world—we landlords especially."

"You are a Whig, Countess, and always were," returned the lady, bowing and smiling. "Now as I am a Tory, and, besides, know nothing whatever about politics beyond an election perhaps, ladies having, I am sure, no business with them, I may as well yield to you."

"If by politics you understand, as indeed every body seems to do, party rivalry, struggles for place, factious opposition, intrigue, and even gross falsehood, neither do I desire to understand politics farther than to renounce and repudiate them. But the knowledge of what I have been taught to consider politics—and I heartily wish we had another name for the science instead of the abused one—is among the noblest of human attainments. Poetry, we are told by one who was a great prose poet, as well as the greatest of philosophers, "has something divine in it, because it accommodates the shews of things to the desires of the mind;" but politics—what I understand by politics—is of a nature still more divine, for it accommodates the realities of things to the dictates of the judgment and conscience—to truth, love, humanity; to all those glorious ends for which Our Father, who is in Heaven, created this beautiful world, and gave it to his children to enjoy, while undergoing that discipline of love which best prepares them for the fullness of joy, in the future perfected exercise of all the faculties of their nature. Politics, in a word, is the science which teaches men to live together in society, according to God's will. But for what is generally understood by politics and politicians—My soul come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly mine honour be not thou united!"

Lady Vesey heard this flight with preoccupied attention. Her mind was fixed upon one point—the unnatural aversion which the young Countess seemed to entertain to the dearest end of all womankind—marriage.

"You don't wish the girls to marry, Countess?"

"Not quite that," replied the Quakeress, in answer to an observation which escaped the rapt Blanche, who was plunged in a momentary bright reverie of human progression and happiness. "But we think we exalt the one sex, and contribute to the happiness of both, when we strive to place young women above the temptation of marrying merely for a maintenance."

"Can any one doubt about the degrading and miserable consequences of such necessity?" said Blanche, recalled to the conversation. "Can any one who feels the full value, the inexpressible tenderness and sanctity of the union of true hearts, tolerate the counterfeit, with all its attendant teeming evils, incurred that a young woman may, on certain conditions, obtain food and clothes; be provided for, as my Irish friends honestly, if bluntly, phrase it? The world is bursting with misery, to which ill-assorted marriages contribute not a little. And there will still be too many unhappy alliances, when the prudence of parents is satisfied that their daughters need no longer marry, to be provided for."

"Apropos," said the courtly lady, whom it was impossible to startle from her propriety, "apropos to your subscription for the Bishop's Charity School—I must take leave to remind you."

"I am sure you are very kind, and very considerate, Lady Vesey, to take such pains to make me stand well with the religious-fashionable world; my five guineas, or whatever you think right, shall, from respect to you, not be wanting. There—mulct the heretic," and she laughingly handed over her purse. "Nay, take more—shall I write a check for you? The children in the Bishop's school will, no doubt, be duly taught to read and repeat the Lord's prayer. Would that the world, or any considerable portion of it, could only understand and act upon its spirit, as embodied in one-half dozen words! How can I consistently aid in teaching the children of the poor to repeat that prayer, while I tacitly consent in a hundred ways to retard the divine will from being 'done on earth as it is in heaven?' What mockery in us, the English nobility, to contribute our pittance to teach the poor to pray, 'Give us this day our daily bread!' while we profit by selfish cruel laws of our own making, to tax their bread; to rob their basket and their store, to enrich ourselves. Oh! it is often all darkness and distraction to me: I am lost in a chaos of tumultuous thoughts: but the conviction ever remains, that I participate in the guilt of this centuries-old scheme of spoiling, of oppressing, and brutalizing our fellow-creatures; and that dearly shall we rue it."

The Countess was more excited than her watchful maternal friend approved. She looked anxiously towards her, and Blanche, by a sudden strong control, checked and subdued the outward signs of her emotion. But the vehement current of her thoughts, if staid, was not changed, and she sank into a troubled reverie.

"Give thy thoughts vent, if conscience say that thou oughtest not to suppress them," said her Friend.

"Do you not fancy it a very awful parable, that of the Saviour, about Dives and Lazarus?" replied Blanche, in a low voice, with an abstracted air, and a slight shudder. "Lady Vesey, after the sudden and painful death of my poor grandmother, and the shock which my nerves—nay, my whole sentient and spiritual being sustained, I do imagine that though I was not sensible of it at the time, there might be some colour for the derangement or excitement imputed to me. How gladly would I have sought consolation then, in the superstitions, as we deem them, of the Romish religion, had not reason and conscience revolted! Yes! never once wavering in my own faith—never disturbed by one doubt that might be called religious—I was yet accused of a religious craze—while the overwhelming evil against which my unshaken faith, and the wisdom and sympathy of the warmest friends with which a woman of my condition was ever blessed, were taxed to the utmost to sustain me against what it were far nearer the truth to describe as a moral mania, a social or political madness, into which my agonized mind fell, under the distempered feeling that I was the last of a race of oppressors,—of doomed Diveses, upon whom the vials of the Almighty's wrath were to be poured forth.—The wrongs done upon the face of the earth, and especially the cruelty of the rich and their instruments to the poor, of which I had witnessed so much, even in my own narrow experience; bold, shameless, triumphant villany; the wrongs inflicted by man on woman; and the misery in which, in those dark days, the whole earth seemed steeped; though they could not shake my faith in the power and goodness of the Almighty, presented the fearful temptation that I and mine were of those, most miserable! whose portion is of this world; that we were of the number of the illustrious reprobates, who 'have here our good things, while Lazarus has his evil.' It was in vain, for a season, that my Friend told me, in accents of love and compassionate sympathy, that I was not more powerless to change the destiny of my progenitors, than unblamable for the station and position in life which I filled;—that I had but one concern—duty—present duty;—one unfailing trust—the goodness of Providence. Frederick Leighton came, and reason borrowed the language of love in persuading me; and though I was in time consoled and cheered, yet I can deeply pity any one who may suffer as I suffered then:—I can still pity, and not very much condemn, in myself, the spiritual conflict into which I was thrown. . . . Sometimes a grueing of that dark period creeps over my spirit still. I am still tempted to feel that this is—'A wild and miserable world,

Thorny and full of care,
Where every fiend can make his prey at will;'
and, with tears and cries to demand, as in those days,

'Is there no hope in store?
Will not the universal spirit e'er
Revivify this withered limb of Heaven?'
"I am quoting much at random those deep, agitating words which haunted me then."

The Quakeress, evidently uneasy at the agitating nature of the conversation, endeavoured to relieve or divert it. She accordingly took up the quotation, and, smiling serenely, replied—

"O rest Thee tranquil; chase those fearful doubts,
That ne'er should rack an everlasting soul.

Joy to the spirit came!
Through the wide rent in Time's eternal veil
Hope was seen beaming through the mists of fear;

Earth was no longer hell;
Love, freedom, health had given
Their ripeness to the manhood of its prime,
And all its pulses beat

Symphonious to the planetary spheres:
The dulcet music swelled

Concordant with the life-strings of the soul;
It throbbed in sweet and languid beatings there,
Catching new life from transitory death,
Like the vague sighing of a wind at even,
That wakes the wavelets of the slumbering sea,
And dies on the creation of its breath,
And sinks and rises, fails and swells by fits:—"

"O thank you! thank you, best friend, for remembering so much of my 'bane and antidote,' as once you called that above-earth composition."

"I do, without approving all, remember very much of that wonderful poem. How could any one, at all able to sound its depths, ever shake off its high solemn import? How could I forget such passages as that in which thou foundest the antidote:

"Yet, Human Spirit! bravely hold thy course.
Let virtue teach thee firmly to pursue
The gradual paths of an aspiring change;
For birth, and life, and death, and that strange state
Before the naked soul has found its home,
All tend to perfect happiness, and urge
The restless wheels of being on their way,
Whose flashing spokes, instinct with infinite life,
Bicker and burn to gain their destined goal.
Life is its state of action—
Death is a gate of dreariness and gloom,

That leads to azure isles and beaming skies—
The happy regions of eternal hope.
Therefore, O Spirit ! fearlessly bear on !
Are there not hopes within thee, which this scene
Of linked and gradual being has confirmed ?
Whose stings bade thy heart look further still,
When to the moonlight walk, by friendship led,
Sweetly and sadly thou didst talk of death ?

Bravely bearing on, thy will
Is destined an eternal war to wage
With tyranny and falsehood, and uproot
The germs of misery from the human heart.
Thine is the hand whose piety would sooth
The thorny pillow of unhappy crime,
Whose impotence an easy pardon gains,
Watching its wanderings as a friend's disease.
Thine is the brow whose mildness would defy
Its fiercest rage, and brave its sternest will,
When fenced by power and master of the world.
Thou art sincere and good ; of resolute mind ;
Free from heart-withering custom's cold control ;
Of passion lofty, pure, and unsubdued.
Earth's pride and meanness could not vanquish thee ;
And therefore art thou worthy of the boon
Which thou hast full received. Virtue shall keep Thy footsteps in the path that thou hast trod ;
And many days of beaming hope shall bless
Thy spotless life of sweet and sacred love.
Go, happy one ! and give that bosom joy
Whose sleepless spirit waits to catch Life, light, and rapture from thy smile."

"I seem as if I were vain enough to appropriate something of this beautiful encouragement and exhortation to myself," said Blanche, as she turned her suffused eyes from her friend, and as, with the childish pretty motion which had become with her a natural trick, she rapidly winked her eyes, as if shaking away the gems from her long delicate lashes ; "yes I am thus vain—I own it honestly. You quote to elucidate the beauties of the denounced poet, whose fervid natural religion I have heard you so warmly and candidly extol ; and I apply the text to my own circumstances."

"And so do I. But, to come back to sub-lunary, or anti-millennial matters, shall I order coffee, Lady Vesey ? I volunteered young Shaw's duty, that he might be present at his sister's wedding, and am getting very like other official deputies."

The Quakeress went away.

"How curiously your friend chants, rather than recites poetry," said Lady Vesey ; "and such a memory !—Admirable Wordsworth ! But he is equal to everything !"

Blanche either did not hear, or did not think it necessary to correct the mistake.

"Shall we go to the drawing-room ? Anything save dreams of Elysium, or the music which begets them, is intolerable, after this high colloquy."

She led the way, seated herself at the piano-forte, and, without another word, poured forth the vivid feelings of the moment in the extempore, impassioned music with which she preluded and accompanied what Lady Vesey remarked to be a song quite out of the common way certainly, neither Moore's nor Haynes Bayley's ; perhaps from something like Comus, or one of the old Masques.

"He came like a dream in the morn of life,
He fled like a shadow before its noon ;
He is gone, and my peace is turned to strife,
And I wander and wane, like the weary moon.
O, sweet Echo, wake !
And, for my sake,

Make answer the while my heart shall break !

"But my heart has a music which Echo's lips,
Though tender and true, yet can answer not ;
And the shadow that moves in the soul's eclipse
Can return not the kiss by his now forgot :

Sweet lips !—he who hath

On my desolate path

Cast the darkness of absence, worse than death !"

"What an eccentric, flighty creature she is, after all," was Lady Vesey's thought, as she busily suited shades of worsted. "Yet how resolute and even obstinate she can be on some points. I have no doubt but she will sell her jewels—how strange and disreputable !"

"How I wish Frederick were returned, that the misery of suspense to so excitable a being were terminated," was the rumination of the Quakeress, who cast a furtive, anxious look, from her perpetual hemming, at the enthusiastic musician, fervently wishing her some more sedative amusement, and almost resolved to remonstrate against the intemperate indulgence of the bewitching art. Blanche caught her eyes' meaning—rose, locked the instrument, and brought her the key as Lady Vesey left the room.

"There—place it in thy work-bag, and keep it for me till the right time. I am very fidgetty to-day. That packet announced at Falmouth in the morning papers, and still no delivery—perhaps no letters to be delivered."

"I can sympathize with thy impatience, without forgetting that thine is, alas ! an idle if natural anxiety. There is one question I must put to thy conscience, dearest one, in the spirit of tenderness and fidelity which has ever marked our intercourse, since thy heart first developed thy understanding, and led thee to place confidence in one so unequal to thyself in fortune and station." Blanche—her clasped hands rested on her knee, her concentrated spirit sitting in the eyes riveted on the face of her friend—bowed in the pause, as if she wished the discourse to proceed. "Art thou not, dearest lady, seeking false strength in pride, while it is in affectionate tenderness and obedience to the dictates of reason, instead of cowardly submission to the factitious tyranny of opinion, that thou canst alone find strength and happiness in one ?"

"Cowardly submission !—am I then the world's slave—the slave of opinion ?"

"For a limited period ; a bondage of four years covenanted for, to propitiate its favour ; but they are well nigh past, and save for this restless impatience—the sinking of hope deferred—that agony of suspense under which I so often see thee suffer, alternating with the flush of feverish expectation—I should be content to see thy self-imposed sacrifice to pride—thy penance—consummated ; but as it is"

"Pride again !" returned Blanche, almost in the accents of pride, and with a flushing cheek,

"I may have been over-proud of my choice ; over-proud of the heart and intellect which I have gained and possess ; weak and over-fond, in the hope that I should compel the world to do my motives and feelings justice, and to acknowledge that, in the unusual path I pursue, I am a reasonable being, living up to the full character, and for the blessed purposes, for which God has given me existence ; not a silly, vain, fond, and self-willed girl, bent upon the indulgence of her inclinations at all hazards."

"Spare thyself," interrupted her friend, calmly ; "in every daring experiment, even the most prudent and cautious applaud success after it comes. This much I can promise on the world's part in thy meditated unequal alliance"—

"Unequal alliance ! How can I listen to such words from your lips—that union in which I place all my pride—my true pride, as well as every hope, dear to a loving woman's heart ; and you have told me there is fervour and depth in mine." This was said in a tone of tender reproach.

"I used the world's language, dearest lady. Had our Frederick not been the manly counterpart of thine own generous and fervid spirit, he must have been warmed and moulded to it ere now. I speak from ardently desiring your mutual happiness, and thine especially, now sacrificed—pardon the plain phrase—to mistaken pride. And Frederick ? but he does not complain. Like the youthful patriarch—the seven years of bondage may to him seem but as a day."

"I certainly have no right to trifle with his happiness, nor perhaps to throw from us both, so much of the dear blessing of a united life. And this feverish restlessness I do plead guilty to. I suppose every day becomes as long as a month in certain states of feeling. Nay, I am often almost ill, and, if not unfit for duty, yet feeling nothing like the old cheerfulness and elasticity of spirits in its proper business. Yet how can I bid Dr Leighton return immediately, that we be married forthwith, as nothing goes well without him," she continued, with a touch of her natural gay humour, "how tell 'That I gang like a ghaist, and carena to spin ?' Thank God, however—oh, how fervently for that !—that it is no sin, but my best happiness, my pride, my crowning joy to think of him, and to cherish his image—to dream of our perfected bliss. Am not I the happiest of women ?"

"In thy very caprices the most charming of women, might thy lover say," returned her friend, smiling. "But the sober certainty of waking bliss—that pure and serene atmosphere in which the soul finds vigour and enjoys repose, thy native element—is wanting to thee still ; and thou art self-exiled from it by mistaken feeling ; and another innocently suffers with thee. While Frederick had a duty to humanity to perform, I was patient for thee."

"Wert thou a powerful magician, as thou surely art the benevolent little fairy-lady who presided at my birth, I know what you would do for me to-night," said Blanche, trying to smile.

"Summon Frederick home ? or merely send to the Colonial Office, to learn if there be no packet, ostensibly at least, for his poor old aunt ?"

"Perhaps both."

"Nay, then thou art exacting :—but the first I cannot do. Shall the intriguing old gouvernante hasten matters, lest the Countess of Delamere rue her folly ere it be too late ?"

"Who indulges false pride—who is the world's slave—opinion's slave now ?" cried Blanche, with vivacity, "if even you, dear friend, dare not act with simplicity and Godly sincerity, for fear your pure and benevolent motives should be misconstrued ?"

"I confess it, but without purpose of amendment. Were I so unhappy as to perceive any want of mutual faith between you—the shadow of misunderstanding—I might see it a duty to interfere, so far as to place things in a right light ; but, at present, the Quakeress may cherish her pride and delicate scruples, as tenderly as if she were one of the world's ladies."

Blanche was smiling at this candour, when the loud simultaneous noises of the door-bell and knocker pierced the recesses of the distant chamber where they sat. She became very pale.

"O that postman—what power he has in accelerating poor women's pulses ! how my spirits require the soothing cordial of letters to-night !"

The servant brought in letters—Irish letters ; Blanche looked at them, at once with interest and disappointment. He also announced the arrival of Sir Jervis Yates, who requested the honour of immediately seeing the Countess.

"There is surely some wondrous cause for the unusual hour my cousin selects ; but I fancy he has just arrived from the country to enter upon his Parliamentary duties. . . . What an easy trade that of legislation seems to be. It is the only one which gentlemen take up at their own hand. Before I go, dear friend, there is one point of my false pride that you have spared, and on which I am about to be tried—my Irish failure." She hesitated, and played with the huge packet, addressed in her Irish agent's handwriting. "Read this before I return, and do not spare me ; tell me the truth and the whole truth. We have had discouraging news, but I anticipate worse."

"I regret your disappointment—the damping of the too sanguine hopes of a young generous spirit—but I see no failure, no probability of it."

"Thank you for that ; your sympathy is all needed at present. Here is Sir Jervis come to exult (the very least) over the ill success of my rash experiments as a reforming landowner."

"Were thy kinsman so ungenerous, he hath no cause of triumph. If with thy glowing love, thy large faith in humanity, thou hast not coolly, and all at once, reckoned upon the existing amount of ignorance and prejudice thou hadst to overcome, as well as the actual destitution thou hadst to alleviate, shalt thou for that be dismayed, or falter in thy generous work ? I do not fear false pride here ; and however thou mayst falter on points of false opinion, regarding the delicacy of conduct required of women, it is error on the safe side ; but thou wilt not shrink from the duties and responsibilities undertaken for thy poor Irish tenantry."

"In the strength of Heaven, no ! But learn from these dispatches the worst we have to expect, while I see Sir Jervis."

The attempts which that gentleman made to disguise the vivacity and exultation of his thoughts, under a long and serious face, did not deceive his fair relative.

"You have news for me, Sir Jervis ; Irish intelligence—bad, perhaps—certainly painful ; I have unread letters myself. What has happened since the firing of the new chapel by the Orangemen ? I have taken measures to pay the tithes, and other obnoxious public burdens, myself, to prevent the possibility of bad blood and fatal conflicts ; but yet I fear."

"The more you do, the more you will get to do, madam, that is the nature of Paddy ; especially with us English Protestants whom their priests incite them to hate."

"Not the priests whom I know, at any rate," returned Blanche ; "they have been the most zealous auxiliaries of the magistrates in preserving order and suppressing the spirit of outrage, which, I regret to think, has spread even into my neighbourhood."

Your neighbourhood, madam ! are you aware that the Barony of Delamere Upper is alleged to be the focus of the entire mischief. In those mountain-farms every man is a sworn White-boy—sworn over the dead body of the murdered proctor, laid out in the parish priest's barn. Here is my authority ; a private letter from a most active, respectable, and loyal Protestant magistrate, Squire Corbyn of Corbyn Grove—an extensive proprietor, and very large middleman."

"I know whom you mean," said Blanche ; "and I hope this gentleman's information may be altogether incorrect—part of it must be so. Some of my generous if mistaken friends, feeling themselves beginning to be comfortable in their holdings, only from their own industry, have, I fear, been tempted to try to help their neighbours also 'to right themselves,' as they call it."

"Right themselves by spoliation and murder, Countess ! And their ingratitude ! They have warned your Scotch agent to take his departure before next rent-day, on penalty of cropped ears for the first offence ; and Irish warnings are no jokes."

"You try to alarm me, now ; but I shall never believe this until I ask the people themselves, and hear them own it ?"

"Ask them, my Lady, to confess their guilt ? you cannot be serious."

"Never was more so. If they are capable, from any degree of ignorance, of acting so wickedly, with such entire disregard to their own interests and to consequences, it will go near to break my heart ; yet how could I expect that my neighbourhood should all at once be a scene of virtue, prosperity, and peace, surrounded as it is ? Excuse me now, Sir Jervis ; will you take any refreshment ? I am eager to peruse my head agent's letters."

"I have posted to town, Countess, to volunteer my poor services in suppressing these disgraceful outrages, and endeavouring to settle your Irish estates upon some scheme that will give you tranquillity on that score. I will procure a party of military at Enniskillen."

"Many thanks, Sir Jervis ; but I had hoped so much from the basis on which I was endeavouring to settle them—what seemed to me the only fair and just one. I must see my way more clearly before I consent to trouble you or any one with these matters ; which will come right, depend on it. The last season was a severe one ; and, notwithstanding all I have been able to effect in the way of alleviating the general distress, it has been very great. This naturally generates those discontents of which there are spirits of evil ever ready to take advantage in poor Ireland. How much more strongly do I feel every day the extreme difficulty of doing any good there !"

"Let well alone, Countess ; that is my maxim. The rents of the Donegal estates were trebled during the long life of the late Countess, turbulent as the tenantry always were. I believe the Steel-boys and Hearts-of-Oak were first heard of on your family estates."

"I am sorry and yet proud to hear it. If I live a few years I shall realize more advantage from that property than my grandmother ever actually did, racked and swollen out as her nominal rent-roll had become. But that at present is my least concern. I shall go over immediately and talk with them ; and when I have once touched their kind and grateful hearts, I shall not despair of enlightening their understandings."

"Not to be thought of, madam—that hopeful mission. Trust yourself among assassins and incendiaries ? Fancy the ungrateful wretches offering to fire your Marine Cottage, and actually turning up the turf of the lawn, and destroying all the young trees and shrubs—those rhododendrons and arbutuses of which you were so proud, from the size which they had attained in the open air in that soft climate."

"I will not believe that any one of my own friends did so !" exclaimed Blanche, looking distressed. "It were sacrilege against human nature to fancy this possible. Those shrubs and flowers, the finest ornaments of my little home, were planted by the hands of their own girls and boys in their presence and mine ;—they were a covenant between us. I have the heart's frank-pledge for their safety. It would half break my heart to find it violated, but never lead me to desist, in my attempts to benefit them, and raise them to a better state of feeling. Surely those whose worst crimes are so closely allied to the warmest feelings of the human heart afford a fair field to Christian effort ?"

I will not, Sir Jervis, send troops nor police to my poor friends. If they are so misguided as you represent, I will, nevertheless, throw myself upon their generosity. I will meet them face to face, and hear their complaints, and what cannot be all at once redressed, will, I am confident, be cheerfully borne."

"You will, my Lady!—your sex, your age?"

"Never mind my age; I am old enough to have held these estates in absolute possession for nearly four years; and if women may hold large landed possessions, they must, in common sense, be assumed capable of the duties connected with such important trusts."

"You will at least accept my escort."

"I had much rather go among them with my family, as I wont to do, with no protection save their kind feelings for me. This root of bitterness which has sprung up, I can trace it now."

This was, indeed, as very a trifle as most of the pretexts or proximate causes of Irish outrages always are, however deeply the true reason may lie and rankle. On the Delamere property, there stood, by a mountain lake, a ruined chapel, which the Catholic population of the neighbouring country sometimes visited in summer, on a kind of pleasure-pilgrimage; the aged animated by devotion not of the most ascetic character—the young for recreation and amusement. A promiscuous, and rather merry if not riotous group, had been taking their way to this spot one day in the last summer, when a party of Orangemen overarched a narrow part of the mountain-road or pass with memorials to the glorious and Immortal Memory, in the form of Orange flags, lilies, &c., surrounding a grim effigy of King William, which each pilgrim was compelled to pass under; thus by implication doing homage, or being kept back from the shrine, or place of devotion. Nor would this have caused more than a skirmish, terminating in a few broken heads, save that the Orange guards of the pass boasted that their flowers and banners had been the gift of the Lady of the Manor, the young Ban Tierna, through her agents and servants. A desperate conflict had ensued under those insulting trophies, which were trampled under foot, and the pilgrims had forced their way. But not soon did the wound inflicted, as was imagined, by so unlooked-for a hand, cease to rankle. It was whispered at many a fireside that winter, that the Saxons were all alike, fair and false; and what had they or their children to look for at her hands more than from those who went before her. The sentiment was not yet general, but it was spreading in the district; and laying a foundation for all manner of misrepresentation and bad feeling.

"My own presence, and the language of truth, spoken in faith and love, will at once dissipate the shadow which has fallen upon us," said Blanche. "I will set out to-morrow, if need be. Meanwhile, those jewels, cousin—But, pray, be sure that it is not to veil my poverty or disgrace from the world you make the purchase. With your offer I am quite satisfied; and they will be a handsome bridal gift to—may I whisper—Lady Sarah Devereux, whom I understand I am to have the honour of calling kinswoman?"

"That affair is entirely off, Countess; which, indeed, was never properly on. It is not so easy as you ladies fancy to move us cautious old bachelors," returned Sir Jervis, smartly. "At my age, new habits are ill to acquire, and sometimes sit with ill grace. I am more desirous to see you, my fair cousin, properly established, than occupied with any matrimonial projects of my own."

"You are very kind, I am sure, Sir Jervis," replied Blanche, laughing.

"I begin to fancy you were all along right about that Devereux—a half superannuated dandy. You might do better. What is he but a younger son, though I own with fair prospects?"

"Of his brother dying, Sir Jervis?"

"Why, your younger son, madam, your second, ay, your third son, might be a more important personage than the future Earl of Fanfaronade. What is a barren title though a baron's title? You were quite right about Devereux."

"I always fancied I was. I was certainly right in knowing that I never loved, never esteemed, and consequently never ought to have married him."

"Oh, of course; but the late proposal.—Ah, your blushes eloquently speak, Countess! as the poet says. Weil, well—I do not press the delicate topic; only I don't care if all the world know that I choose for my heir the third son of a certain Marchioness that is to be. The elder, of course, inherits his grandfather's, the Duke's, title and fortune; and, for the second, the Delamere titles and estates ought to content any reasonable ambition; but the third, my boy, Countess—Jervis Yates de Buble, if I may venture to christen him beforehand!"

Blanche was at a loss whether to frown or smile. She instinctively did something between. This absurdity was too pitiable and humiliating to be heartily laughed at. She told her friend that she had lost the expected customer for her trinkets. A hitch seemed to have taken place between Sir Jervis and the Fanfaronade family after the matrimonial negotiation had been, by fashionable report, all but concluded.

"I think some member of the family must have let him see rather openly that they despised him; and worthy Sir Jervis does not want pride in any kind save the true kind. But my Irish letters?"

"Gloomy enough. Insurrection, or what borders on it, all around; and these sympathetic people, strongly excited by kindred suffering, seem ever to blaze up together

'Like fire to heather set.'

Your agent's letters are, indeed, quite desponding."

"I am going to Ireland—will you? But I don't ask it. Some of your pupils, my maidens, I will take with me; as many as volunteer; and Eleanor, poor child!—the excursion will benefit us all. They say my pretty cottage is destroyed, but we could pitch a tent in the very midst of them, as I did while it was building, and find in every man a defender. Would not that be a better way of conquering the insurgents, think you, than going among them with soldiers and constables?"

"I will not counsel this, but I will follow whithersoever thy strong faith leads thee. No one believes that the outrages on your new and modest dwelling, have been committed by persons near the place: in short, all is doubt and mystery, as is ever the case in everything Irish. But read for yourself."

"My reading shall not alter my resolution. I have but to provide for my young friends here till the period of their apprenticeships or studies shall be terminated, and for their fair start in life; after which, towards them, my duty closes—my affection never will terminate. Some of these girls are dear to me as younger sisters. Had heaven decreed that I should remain a single woman, by sending no Frederick Leighton into the world, then I can conceive of no life so happy or respectable as to continue in the superintendence of my St Cyr. But I have, with infinite satisfaction to myself, dropped a few good seeds in favourable ground; others may yet continue the successive harvests, and reap abundantly—and now to fresh fields."

The Countess made her arrangements and preparations with her wonted promptitude or vehemence, where her heart was interested. Her jewels were disposed of next day, and the price placed at the disposal of her friend and Dr Hayley, for the use of her pupils; and now she had only to give them a long-promised farewell holiday, to be celebrated by a breakfast at the villa, a boating party on the Thames, and a collation on the grass; to be followed by a concert in the beautiful grounds which they proposed to visit—a concert so far only as the party themselves could supply musicians. It consisted of one friend invited by each of the pupils, with their masters, and some artists, and dealers in works of art, interested in their studies, and desirous of promoting the views of their benevolent patroness. Beneath a summer's sun, in fine weather, any boatful of young English girls will look pretty and picturesque; and the barge, occupied by the Countess and her companions, attracted universal attention and admiration, as, after a happy day spent in rambling in the woods and meadows, its wild-flower laden nymphs sailed homeward; while glad choral strains, and bursts of young mirth rose from its bosom. The Countess alone looked sometimes, if not sad, yet abstracted. Her thoughts were wandering pensively away, even into the future of the young creatures now rejoicing in their own glad feelings and in her smile. Four of them were to accompany her to Ireland for a few months. Two, who were draughtswomen, for improvement in their profession; one because change and native air had been recommended for her; and the fourth—she was a little plain-looking girl—Magdalene Leighton, the half-cousin of Frederick; but there was in the thrilling pathetic tones of her rich deep voice, a spiritual power, which, in those late months, had often created a sudden flutter in the heart of Blanche, or sent a rush of tears to her eyes. While Magdalene, in the gloom of twilight, sung those simple and affecting north-country ballads, which Blanche had first listened to in childhood, from his lips, it seemed as if his spirit communed with her's in music and poetry. This was become another of her unnering indulgences, and it had not eluded the observation of her watchful Friend, who would say, in gentle expostulation—

"Thou art never merry when thou hear'st sweet music. Get thee gone, Magdalene, with thy woful ballads." And this was said once more when Blanche was recalled from reverie by the darkening hour, and the duty of saying farewell.

The farewell was affecting, almost solemn, which she took of her young sisters as she affectionately named the girls she had befriended. "Her sweet and amiable sisters, whose society had been so sustaining, so delightful to her; whose future well-doing would be the cause of such joy and pride!" And as she kissed each weeping girl, she gave and exacted a solemn pledge, that if ever, in any of those calamities or trying turns of fortune which lie in every woman's path, any one should be condemned to suffer what sympathy could soften, or be tempted to submit to what was unworthy of her, she should then frankly confide her trials and difficulties, or her errors, to her sisters, and be assured, that there was pity and love for her in all circumstances, and probable help in many.

"Let us never forget the obligations of our Sisterhood," was her parting injunction; "they are only such as will beneficially exercise our virtues and affections—render our orphanage less desolate, and a single life, if such be our choice, or our fate, less solitary, selfish, and dull; if they do not make it, as rightly understood they ought, useful, social, and cheerful."

The Lady Blanche had merited solace and reward by her manifold exertions to promote the happiness of others on this day; and they awaited her to fulness on returning to London, on the eve of her journey to her "insurrectionary provinces."

"Letters from Frederick! and he is coming!" she cried, running breathlessly into her friend's apartment; "in three months—perhaps less—by the packet after next!—Before I can be back from Ireland. But you shall have them—have the journal, I mean—'Cato's is not an ear for a love tale.' He has been in Cuba, and St Domingo, and the United States, since we heard of him last. What journeying! Many letters must be either lost or delayed. He could not return to us, he says, tempted as he was, without again revisiting the plantations, to see how the poor blacks went on as their own masters and managers. They are doing admirably in their joint-stock concern ; and it does rejoice me ! Dr Leighton told them that he must leave them. I had given them freedom, and would give them work, and lend them money, or send stores, if they chose to continue on the plantations ; otherwise the land must be sold, and the people dispersed. I would not consent to work my estates with slaves. Their continuing to work as free labourers might, he thought, be a mutual obligation and advantage ; but they were free to act for themselves. Many grand palavers were held. Would we could have overheard them ! Some were too rash in their grateful generosity, and would insist 'on working for Missy, who make 'em free, for love.' Others were as selfish ; and a few longed to return to realize some fondly cherished vision of a reed-cabin, and plaintain trees and groves, and little brothers and sisters at play, on the fatal evening when the man-tigers had sprung forth to tear them away ; but, finally, they agreed to be, in the meanwhile, my tenants at will, cultivating the plantations with my capital, but under the superintendence of managers and overseers chosen by popular election from their own numbers. Leighton was astonished, when he returned, at what he found had been the good sense and orderliness of their proceedings, and the judiciousness of their selection of leaders. But remember the motive. Good-will and energy, and direct personal interest, have accomplished far more than the brutal lash ever could compel. The lazy have been shamed and compelled to exert themselves by the good rule, that those who will not work —. I fancy there is still a touch of despotism in the power of the overseers, but then they may be displaced at the end of every crop, or oftener, upon an emergency. And in this last year, the culture has been better and more cheaply managed, and the crops larger, than in any former season. They will be able to pay me too much of rent. I can have no fair claim to the large surplus they offer me, but Fred. advises that I should take it, were it but to tempt my neighbours, even through their cupidity, to follow my example, to try something more human than their present practices. I do not despair of having yet wealthy black tenants and of selling land or granting leases to negroes. Their worst present difficulties arise from the jealousy of the planters, and the diabolical tribe of attorneys, overseers, and drivers. This I fear will long continue, and not allow the hopeful experiment anything like fair play. . . . But I am out of breath, and you out of patience."

The Quakeress, who had gone early to bed, in prospect of her Irish journey, sat up, mingling adoration with thanksgiving, while grateful tears filled her eyes.

"I will not congratulate thee, dearest One—thy present rapturous feelings are happiness enough ; but I will pray God to strengthen thee more and more for future good works. They bring their own blessing."

It was in light and refreshed if not gay spirits, that Blanche set out with her household for Ireland. They travelled leisurely ; for she had tender consideration for its two aged members, and there was to herself ever-springing enjoyment in the pleasure which the young girls derived from the new scenes and objects they saw ; nor is it easy to decide whether witnessing the rapid unfolding of an ingenuous and intelligent young mind, placed in exciting and novel circumstances, be not as delightful as watching the gradual development of the dawning faculties of childhood. No situation can be more favourable for observing temper and natural character ; and, with a little placid indulgence for weakness, and some amusement at affectation, the Lady Blanche reaped both pleasure and improvement from the strict observation of her juvenile companions, on the journey :—from one, in particular, who, after an absence of four years, was returning with the Countess to all she had ever known of home, her foster-mother's cabin in the sheltering bay, where Blanche had reared her marine lodge. She was the orphan of the schoolmaster and his wife—"a genteel and decent young couple, though not of these parts—who had been cut off together in the fever." Their child was maintained by a subscription of about two shillings a-week from the farmers, until taken to London to be taught to earn her bread. The Irish character was beautifully revealed in the tears and petulant bursts of passion, and vehemence of protestation with which Marcella Boyle vindicated the very worst of her countrymen from the bare possibility of having touched or harmed, "were it but the poorest rush in the bog she (the Countess) ever set her foot upon." The letters met at Dublin did not bear out Marcella quite so far ; but they conveyed no tidings to damp the courage of the Countess, though she was rather pleased when she succeeded in persuading Dr Hayley to remain, about some antiquarian piece of learned research, in Dublin for a few weeks.

The morning of the tenth day brought them within sight of that mountain range for which, though on the other side of the island, and she a geographer, Marcella had watched, ever since they had come in sight of the Hill of Howth. She now begged to ride outside ; and twenty times during the day, she asked the Countess, or rather assured her, "That must surely be Slieve Fanau now, madam."

Blanche was more familiar with the landmarks ; and, as the day was drawing to a close, and the journey to an end, she felt uneasy and depressed. At the inns, in the few places they passed through, the accounts of the state of the county were contradictory and doubtful ; and for the few newspapers found at these hostleries, Blanche needed only to look to their titles to know the credence due to their varying reports. She saw they were reaching a critical turn of the road, but she would not deprive Marcella of the rapture of surprise. It was remarked by her companions that Marcella, who had long laboured hard and successfully to exterminate her brogue, now exclaimed—

"The say! the say! the lodge! the bawn! the boys! och, Mi Lady!"

And she sobbed and wept, and hugged little Eleanor, who sat next her. The Lodge stood there, sure enough, its chimneys, "those wind-pipes of good hospitality"—sending their light turf-smoke to heaven. If the sward of the lawn had ever been damaged, it was smooth, and trim, and green as an emerald, now; and the boys—their joyous hurrahs sunk into respectful silence as the carriages approached, and twenty young fellows bounded forward to hold wider the open gate—a silence which enabled the Quakeress to overhear the whispered—

"It's My Lady Countess herself, it is."

"No, faith it; it's little Margy Boyle. I knowed the black rogue eyes of her, big as she grew. And if my Lady has made a first-rate gentlewoman of her, poor coleen!—bringing her home in her own coach, and munchipate the niggers, is she going to be a tyrant, like the ould one, to the poor decent creatures born and bred on her lands? Never a bone of myself will believe it, Terry."

"Hurrah, then," shouted the other; "she is past now, long life and glory to her and a good husband!—and so I may let go my manners—hurrah, boys!" and the cheering became general and loud.

"Faix, if she does not get the ten thousand welcomes, Slieve Vanau, there, is a big liar, for he is repating them too."

All the mountain echoes were indeed repeating the welcome, as Blanche, unable to conceal her glad weeping, was respectfully handed into the house by her Scotch agent, and left alone with him.

"It seems to me to have been all calumny and nonsense about our poor friends, Mr Wardlaw."

"Much of it, no doubt, madam, but not all."

"I have met with a reception which shames my suspicions. How have you so speedily been able to restore a good and right understanding?"

"I had the powerful influence of an old friend, madam, in whom they have confidence."

There was a peculiar smile, or rather the faintest ghost of a smile of suppressed humour fluttering about the left corner of the mouth of the Scotchman, had Blanche been able to perceive it.

"That Squire Corbyn, I suppose?" inquired the lady, in not the most grateful tone.

"Not he, madam—a friend of your Ladyship's, who, on a former occasion, gained the confidence of the tenantry by doing them justice. But I promised to let Dr Leighton know as soon as you arrived. He has ridden up to the priest's on business. Ah, here he is!"

Blanche did not shriek nor faint, but she caught at the back of the sofa by which she stood, as the agent withdrew and gently shut the door, whispering to the Quakeress still in the vestibule.

"The packet in which Dr Leighton came had rough weather in the Channel. He got off in a pilot-boat, and, learning our bad state, came to us at once. He has been here for three days."

"There is to be no bridesmaid save Eleanor, after all," said Marcella Boyle to her London companions; "so we need not be jealous about it now. We will all be at the wedding, though, and all the young girls and boys on the estates or in the county, if they choose. It is to be celebrated in Stoke Delamere Church; and then they return to dear Ireland again—return to winter here; yes winter—brave the storms of the Atlantic, I heard a grand lady call it; as if our sea-breeze was not as good as London fog any day."

"But wont the mourning for Sir Jervis Yates, who has left the Countess such a fortune, delay the wedding, Marcella?"

"Not a bit of it; sure, does she not rather need a husband the more to comfort her. And she wont touch a penny of the fortune. She considers herself his trustee in behalf of neglected relations and the people of the factory, who made it all—the factory of Bonny Dale on her own English estate."

"Of Beau Ideal you mean, Marcella."

"I'm sure the other name is as pretty," said Marcella, pettishly.

"As pretty, but not right," returned Magdalen, mildly.

"There is no harm in pretty things, I suppose, Miss Magdalen."

"Oh, no; and Beau Ideal or Bonny Dale must be both, before the Countess is satisfied."

And here, for the present, closes, as of right, with a marriage, our history of Blanche, Countess of Delamere. The privilege of relating the success of her benevolent experiments in Bonny Dale Factory, and in her mountain colonies in Donegal and Sligo, we however retain until some farther opportunity.

Dr Lang's Letters on New Zealand.

Dr Lang, whose works on the colony of New South Wales have gained him considerable reputation, and who has had excellent opportunities of obtaining accurate information about what is likely to become the most important of our southern colonies, has addressed four letters to the Earl of Durham upon the present condition of New Zealand, and the best means of colonizing

it, with due attention to the interests of Great Britain, and to the rights and interests of the natives. The warning is just in time. The mania, or earth-hunger, recently excited by the Swan River Settlement and South Australia, has broken forth in tenfold violence in the newer South-Land Scheme. Nor is this surprising, when the great natural superiority of this fine region is considered. Though addressing his Letters to Lord Durham, Dr

Lang is decidedly inimical to certain operations of the Great New-Zealand Land-Company, of which his Lordship is the Governor. He recommends that the Government should assume the lead in colonizing New Zealand, by exercising the Queen's right of pre-emption, and he has no more faith in the pious missionaries than in the land sharks; and, indeed, little apparent reason for trusting either. Dr Lang recognises the right of the natives to all the lands in the New Zealand islands, and the principle of no settlers going there without their consent, and without having fairly purchased whatever lands they obtain, which can only be under the sanction of Government. He allows no purchase to be valid, whether past, present, or future, which is not sanctioned either by the Home Government or by Commissioners acting for it, and, at the same time, as the protectors of the Aborigines. All past or future purchases otherwise made, he would treat as a violation of her Majesty's right of pre-emption; and by consequence would, we suppose, despoil Mr Fairbairn and the other Christian missionaries, together with "Mr Polack, the Jew," among others, of their princely and cheaply acquired territories. Dr Lang is by no means measly-mouthed about those sacred personages. A zealous Presbyterian clergyman himself, he seems to have been most unfortunate in his experiences of South-Sea Church and Methodist missionaries. These devout persons seem to have carried matters with a high hand in despoiling the heathen of New Zealand; though we hope Dr Lang is sure of his ground ere he ventures to allege that,

The missionaries of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand, utterly incredible as it may appear in England, have actually been the principals in the grand conspiracy of the European inhabitants of the island to rob and plunder the natives of their land!

I was credibly informed on the island that there is scarcely one of them who has not managed in this way to secure for himself or his children in perpetuity a large extent of valuable territory.

Mr Shepherd, for example, a lay missionary from New South Wales, and the son of a respectable emancipist, residing at Kissing Point, on the Parramatta River in that colony, bought a large tract of eligible land from the natives, having a frontage of from four to five miles on one of the navigable rivers in the Bay of Islands—for two check shirts and an iron pot, or go-ashore, as it is called by the natives! I was credibly informed, moreover, in New Zealand, that Captain Blenkinsop, the master of a South Sea whaler, who was afterwards unfortunately drowned by the upsetting of a whale-boat in Encounter Bay, in the province of South Australia, along with Sir John Jeffcott, the first judge of that colony, had, in entire ignorance of Mr Shepherd's previous purchase, purchased the very same tract from some other person, who, it seems, pretended to be its proprietor. During his absence on the south coast of New Holland, Captain Blenkinsop's agent at the Bay of Islands, erected a house on the land, agreeably to the instructions of his principal, who intended to settle in New Zealand on his return; but no sooner was the house finished, than Mr Shepherd gave Captain B.'s agent notice to quit, and produced his own deeds. On the agent's remonstrating with Mr Shepherd for allowing him, in such circumstances, to go on with the building of the house, Mr S. coolly replied, that the erection of the house rendered the land the more valuable to himself. I refrain from making any remarks on this transaction; but Mr Shepherd, your Lordship will observe, is a native of Botany Bay, who has exported, in his own person, a portion of the surplus Christianity, forsooth, of his native land, for the moral advancement of the Aborigines of New Zealand. I have reason to believe also that Mr Shepherd has another estate, procured in a similar way, towards the North Cape, where he is at present stationed as a missionary.

Mr Fairbairn, who was merely a journeyman coach-maker, and by no means of apostolic character either, in the village of Parramatta, in New South Wales, where he was engaged as a lay-missionary for New Zealand by the late Rev. Samuel Marsden, has purchased, forsooth, from the natives, a tract of land, to the northward of the River Thames, having a frontage of from thirty-five to forty miles on the east coast of the island towards the Pacific Ocean. I could not learn how far back from the sea Mr Fairbairn goes, or what the valuable consideration had been for this princely estate.

The Rev. Mr Williams, formerly a lieutenant in the Royal Navy, but now the ordained head of the New Zealand Mission, has a large tract of land, in conjunction with Mr Fairbairn, adjoining the society's settlement at Paihihi, in the Bay of Islands, and stretching along the left bank of the Kauakaua River.

Messrs Clark and Davis, who were originally sent out as missionary agriculturists on the civilizing system, have selected their domains on a somewhat similar scale with those of the Shepherd and Fairbairn estates, towards the Hokianga River, on the west coast; while those of Messrs Kemp and King are situated towards the North Cape.

In short, the largest seigniories in New Zealand, are the property of the Church Missionaries and their sons; and the poor ignorant and deluded natives have thus, my Lord, been "scattered and peeled" by the very men who ought to have been their natural protectors, and to have remonstrated and protested to the British Government again and again, against any attempt, on the part of the British subjects, to obtain possession of any part of their land, without the express consent and authority of the British Government.

Now, Dr Lang would have Government interfere to set aside these sweeping transactions, and others of a like character, effected by the great Company of which Lord Durham is the nominal head, and the colony founded upon those principles of international justice and equity, which he lays down. Government has announced an intention of interfering, but when? The titles of the Company Dr Lang considers no better than those of the missionaries. They have purchased from those who, having no rights themselves, could have none to convey to others.

The Company have acquired titles to certain large tracts of land in various parts of the island; the same land having been previously held by private individuals, on deeds of sale from the natives, but since disposed of by these individuals to the Company: and the Company propose to resell this land to intending emigrants or capitalists at the rate of one pound per acre, and to allow the purchasers three-fourths of their purchase-money in the conveyance of industrious emigrants of the humbler classes of society to New Zealand; the remainder of the purchase-money being appropriated for the payment of the cost price of the land, and the maintenance of the general establishment of the Company.

In regard, therefore, to the tenure on which the Company hold their land, they stand precisely in the same situation as any European adventurer—such as Mr Fairbairn, the Christian, or Mr Polack, the Jew—who buy land from the natives for the merest trifle, and perhaps cheat them in the payment. The Company do not even know whether the lands they have bought have been honestly come by—whether the natives have been fairly dealt with in the purchase of them or not. They do not even profess to guarantee the titles they promise to give to the purchasers of their land. These titles will doubtless be as good as the Company's own title; but the less, I apprehend, that is said about the validity of the Company's title the better. Now, I conceive, my Lord, it is impossible that the public can have the requisite degree of confidence in an undertaking which rests on so uncertain a foundation; nay, it is anything but desirable that they should."

But so much confidence has the public in the Company, that there is, it is said, in some London papers—we know not with what truth—quite a mania prevailing in the metropolis for giving it a pound per acre for those lands of which miles were obtained for a pot or a shirt; and the purchasers will certainly have some reason to complain of Government winking at transactions passing under its very nose, unless it has the intention of winking on, letting every rogue scramble for himself, and the dupes take their chance. The adventurers from Van Diemen's Land, who discovered and purchased, for a trifle, large tracts in the neighbourhood of Port Philip, were not, it is true, permitted to retain their territory, Government insisting upon the claim of pre-emption; but the New Zealand Company consists of noblemen, Members of Parliament, and other powerful and well-patronised persons, both Whig and Tory; so the case of the New Zealand estates is not so identical with those near Port Philip as Dr Lang may imagine. But allowing that the Company possess, and can therefore give good titles to the lands, Dr Lang deems it folly to purchase from them at the high price they have affixed to land; and, for these reasons,

"Instead of purchasing that land at a pound per acre, the capitalist or intending emigrant can go to New Zealand himself and purchase a tract from the natives, quite as good as the Company's, and perhaps adjoining their boundary line, at probably not more than five farthings per acre, payable in British goods, moreover, on which the capitalist will realize a profit of at least fifty per cent. But if the Company should inform the capitalist, or intending emigrant, that three-fourths of the purchase-money of the land they dispose of are paid back to the purchaser in the conveyance of valuable labour to the Colony, the capitalist can reply, that for one-fourth of that amount he can import the same quantity of labour from the colonies of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land: in short, I conceive there can be no possible inducement at present for any capitalist or intending emigrant to purchase the Company's land.

But whether the Company should succeed in disposing of a large portion of their land or not, the mere existence of such a Company will produce an immediate and powerful effect in New Zealand and the Australian colonies, whenever the fact comes to be generally known, and will exert a reflex and superlatively evil influence on the unfortunate New Zealanders. The fact, which the existence and operations of the Company will sufficiently proclaim, of its being practicable to purchase land in that island, perhaps even at a penny an acre to-day, and to sell it at a pound to-morrow, will immediately excite the cupidity of a whole host of speculators and adventurers in these regions; and the scramble for land in New Zealand, which is at present active and unprincipled enough, will consequently be increased tenfold, and be generally characterised by a total disregard of all moral principle, and of the rights of humanity. So far from discountenancing such procedure, the formation and acts of the Company will only give it character and respectability; as the titles to all the land which the Company have purchased in the island are merely the titles of individuals who, in all probability, have been despoiling the natives in precisely the same manner. The march of injustice and oppression, of demoralization and extinction, on the part of the European towards the unfortunate natives, will thus be prodigiously accelerated, and the consummation which has been already realized in Van Diemen's Land, will perhaps, ere long, be realized also in New Zealand—I mean the complete extermination of the Aboriginal race. We are accustomed to talk, my Lord, with virtuous indignation and abhorrence, of the brutal atrocities of Cortez and Pizarro, and of the gaol-gang of Spanish ruffians that followed these bandit chiefs in Mexico and Peru; but we forget that even in the nineteenth century we have ourselves, as a civilized and colonizing nation, been acting over again the same bloody tragedy on a different field. Why, my Lord, it has only taken the same period of time—about thirty short years—to exterminate the Aborigines of Van Diemen's Land, under the mild sway of Britain, that it took to exterminate the Aborigines of Hispaniola, under the iron rod of Ferdinand and Isabella. . . .

NO. LXIX.—VOL. VI.

Lord Glenelg strongly recommended, some time ago, that an asylum should be given them at Port Phillip on the south coast of New Holland, the expense of their maintenance to be paid by Van Diemen's Land. But even this miserable boon, my Lord, has been refused them—on the ground of their not being sufficiently civilized and Christianized yet—by a cold-blooded committee of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, with a Protestant Bishop for their chairman! Nay, as the law in that colony has recently been taking cognizance of certain murderous outrages lately committed on the defenceless Aborigines of New South Wales, by the convict-stockmen of the country, aided and abetted by their wealthy colonial masters, individuals wearing the garb of gentleman and, utterly disgracing the British name, have recently been giving out in the colony, that they will henceforth take a quieter mode of getting rid of the black natives, whose grievous wrongs, my Lord, do sometimes, I confess, render them troublesome at the distant cattle-stations—viz., by giving them wheaten bread, of which they are exceedingly fond, steeped in a solution of arsenic!

Now, my Lord, the very individuals who have been perpetrating these atrocities upon the Aborigines of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land for the last twenty years, are now swarming in New Zealand; and the formation of the New Zealand Land Company, conjoined with the sanction which the British Government is at present indirectly giving to all sorts of aggression upon the unfortunate natives of that island, will only increase their number, and their nefarious operations, tenfold. It is vain to talk either of the Company or of the Missionaries being able, from their influence of any kind, to prevent such proceedings. The private adventurers will point to the Company's and the Missionaries' estates in New Zealand; and when they ask, Why they should not have as good a right to plunder the natives as others? I confess, my Lord, I am utterly unable to divine what answer either the Company or the Missionaries can give them.

Finally, Dr Lang exhorts Lord Durham and the Company to surrender their present native or other titles, placing them at the discretion of her Majesty's Government, upon a certain understanding—which proceeding would greatly strengthen the hands of the Government, at the outset of the colony, in carrying out the principle of pre-emption. The Company need have no great objection to this nominal surrender, which, strong as they are, would, we think, rather benefit than injure their interests; but it is not so clear how the Messieurs Polack and Fairbairn, and Marsden, who have neither Parliamentary nor family interest, would relish the idea of subjecting their titles to strict revision. No colony that Great Britain has established, if we except America, promises to become so important in the history of mankind as this of New Zealand. How desirable, then, is it, that it should be begun without blunders, and proceed without backcasts; and, above all, be exempt from the attendant cruelty and injustice which have marked the settlement of nearly all our colonies. But for certain apprehensions, though not exactly of being roasted and eaten, this beautiful, fertile, and healthful region is by far the most tempting country to a British emigrant that is now open, or that can be opened to his enterprise. A false step here would be a positive national calamity; and there is little time for delay.

Memoirs of Celebrated Medical Men, &c., &c.

2 volumes. Pp. 760. With Portraits.

The author of this Medical Sketch-Book has gleaned his facts, as he states, in no fewer than four hundred volumes. It accordingly contains a vast mass and variety of miscellaneous if somewhat crude and ill-sifted information, and forms, at least, an index to the profession. There is a full and amusing chapter upon Eccentric Medical Men, closing with Abernethy. This chapter might very well be divided; and one half more appropriately entitled "the affected eccentricity and quack-manners assumed by certain medical men." A rather interesting chapter is entitled The Early Struggles of Eminent Medical Men. Dr Baillie, "with all his advantages," (of relationship to the Hunters, we suppose,) was forty years of age before he was completely established. Dr Munro and Dr Parry were among the strugglers; and, whatever Dr William Hunter may affirm, great medical success, at the beginning of life, appears, in many instances, to be the result of the merest caprice or accident. This holds good, especially in fashionable practice. There is an amusing chapter on quackery; and, altogether, the work is a useful and creditable piece of book-making. The sketches of Eminent Living Physicians give a more favourable view of Sir Henry Hallford's kindness of heart than recent circumstances have inclined the public to take.

The name of Sir James Clark is at present up; and he forms the subject of a few gossiping pages of these memoirs. He is the son of a farmer in Banffshire, and studied in Edinburgh. After graduating, Dr Clark, in 1817, obtained the appointment of travelling physician to a nobleman, and settled at Rome, where he became, among the English, a famous "lung-doctor," or curer of the English complaint, consumption. This memoir states, that it was in consequence of "his unparalleled success in curing consumption," (which we had fancied incurable,) "and other affections of the lungs, that the English nobility and gentry signed a requisition requesting him to leave Rome, and settle in London." This, to Dr Clark, towards gaining a fashionable practice, was a diploma worth all the medical degrees of all the Universities or Medical Faculties in Europe. As a "lung-doctor," Dr Clark at once took root, and flourished in London, and became physician to the Duchess of Kent. When the Princess Victoria ascended the throne, he was ordered by her Majesty, at whose suggestion is not said, to make out a list of the physicians and surgeons of the Court for her inspection, which he did, placing himself first on the list. Sir Henry Hallford, as physician to the late King, President of the College of Physicians, and private physician to Lord Melbourne, fancied himself entitled to take precedence of the Duchess of Kent's physician. But not so thought Dr Clark. Poor Lord Melbourne, who, between the dames and the doctors, has not of late led altogether the "easy life" which he is said to love, was appealed to in this delicate dilemma; but Dr Clark would take no second place. It was aut Caesar aut nihil. If not at the very head, then he would figure at the very bottom of the list! He would take no middle or intermediate station. In the toss up, it should be heads or tails; and, when he and Lord Melbourne both appealed to the young Queen, Sir James, if he was then Sir James, carried his grand point; and the Hallfords, Chamberses, and Brights, &c., &c., accordingly form his sequence. Such was his ambition, and her Majesty's will. The Queen expressed her resolute determination to have her wishes complied with. She observed—"As I am now Queen, I expect that my views and private feelings should be consulted. Sir James Clark has always been my physician, and shall remain so in spite of every opposition, from whatever quarter it may originate." So Lord Melbourne "bowed submission to the royal mandate," and the triumphant

Sir James was gazetted first physician to Victoria I. The disgraceful and never-to-be-forgotten affair of Lady Flora Hastings is noticed in the book, and Sir James Clark exonerated from all blame—but at what a price! "Had it not been his anxious wish to avoid doing anything to compromise the Queen, he would long since have vindicated himself from the aspersions levelled against his character." Who has aspersed his character? or, if it has been aspersed, is his professional reputation and personal honour of less consideration than his appointment of first Court Physician? Sir James, it was lately reported, "had been permitted by her Majesty to travel on the Continent;" but this writer "is able to assert that there is no truth in the statement." At all events, Sir James has wisely declined to use such gracious permission—if the leave of exile was really ever tendered. His London practice is chiefly in affections of the lungs; and his late unfortunate courtly practice is not likely, we fear, to extend the reputation of the Queen's first physician in female complaints—an important class of ailments to a fashionable practitioner. This gentleman may, after all, be the victim of the bad feelings of others; but a blameless self-respecting individual can never be found consenting to his own victimizing, on points which involve personal honour and professional character. That "no blame can justly be imputed to Sir James Clark for the part he took" in those disgraceful and painful transactions is obviously absurd. The most courtly of court physicians must have higher duties to consult than fulfilling the pleasure of his royal patron; but charity may go so far as to believe that, in a man of feeling, remorse must have been sufficient punishment for rash error; and that he must have paid the full penalty of his desire for the rank of first physician. Rather flattering notices are given of the most noted of the living London practitioners—indeed, our author is a little addicted to gentle buttering; or, at any rate, to taking the most favourable view of men and things.

He is not an infallible authority on any one point. His advice about medical Emigration, in particular, would require to be very maturely considered. When people write books, they should bear in mind that there may be other people simple enough to act upon their counsels.

It is worthy of notice how great a majority of the present medical celebrities of London are graduates of Edinburgh, if not natives of Scotland. There is now considerable "division of labour" introduced into the profession. Sir James Clarke is "a lung doctor"—Dr James Johnson, a stomach and liver doctor—Dr Hope is the "heart doctor"—while Dr Davies combines heart and lungs—and Dr Henry Davies is eminent in another very delicate department. Among the eminent medical men enumerated is Dr Philip, whose original name was Wilson; which we are gravely told he was compelled to change "on his becoming the chief of his clan in Scotland!" This is a sort of necessity for which we were not prepared: Whereabouts the Clan Philip may be located, we cannot pretend to say; but the Chief, upon compulsion, was born at Sheethall, near Glasgow. We have no doubt whatever, that this is an idle and annoying anecdote, which our author has found in some pamphlet, or been crammed with by some knavish joker, and such things throw discredit on his book.

The Surgeons, as in etiquette bound, come up after the Physicians; and we may be pardoned if nationality leads us to prefer "Bob Liston" among the multitude of the "Random Recollections" of the author of "Physic and the Physicians;" who, by the way, probably knows very little of physic, though he insinuates an examination before Sir Astley Cooper.

"Mr Robert Liston, of the North London Hospital, is one of our great surgical lions. No country practitioner visits the metropolis without being able to say, when he returns to his own quiet town, or retired village, 'I have seen Liston operate.' Not to have done so, would be considered as exhibiting as lamentable a want of curiosity as was manifested by the countryman who left London without seeing the Queen. "Bob Liston," as he is termed in familiar phraseology by his friends in Edinburgh, is the son of a Presbyterian clergyman of great respectability. He is a cousin of Mr Liston the celebrated comedian, [never heard it before,] and is also related to Sir Robert Liston, an officer who has much distinguished himself in the service of his country." There is so much that must be quite new to Scotch readers in this and the subsequent particulars about Liston, that we fear it may be as well to let it alone, lest the quick-handed operator be tempted to run our author through with his scalpel. Mr Liston, we are told, can carve a goose without the aid of a fork, and is remarkable for a feline attachment, exceeding that of old maids. "Who has not seen Liston's favourite cat, Tom? This animal is considered to be an unique specimen of the feline tribe; and so one would think, to see the passionate fondness which he manifests for it. This cat is always perched on Liston's shoulder at breakfast, dinner, and tea—in his carriage and out of his carriage. It is quite ludicrous to witness the devotion which the great operator exhibits towards his favourite." Such is a specimen of the smaller information to be gleaned in these volumes, in which the credulity of the writer has often betrayed his judgment. The unsound nature of the medical profession, as it now exists, is shewn in nothing so strongly as the paltry arts which many respectable practitioners have employed to bring themselves into notice.

Dr Bowring's Minor Morals. Part III.

The First Part of this series we noticed some years since, at considerable length, and in connexion with one of Mrs Howitt's delightful books for young people. That plan was then described which is here more fully developed.

In the years which have elapsed, it may be presumed that Dr Bowring's original readers or pupils have become more matured in understanding, and that they are deemed fit for the higher forms; the present work is accordingly adapted to, we may say, persons of any age. It is Oriental History, description, fiction, and pictures of manners, blended in the form of dialogue, in an instructive and entertaining whole; and is the result of actual observation in the scenes and among the people described. It was optional to Dr Bowring either to publish the results of his travels in those Eastern countries—where the nature of his mission gave him admirable opportunities for close observation—as a formal book of Travels, or as the Sketches of geography, scenery, and manners presented in these Conversations; and happily, for the juvenile world, he has preferred the unambitious walk, and condescended to the honourable if under-rated office of the schoolmaster. Dr Bowring entitles his work Minor Morals, but this portion of the series—and indeed the character is common to all the volumes—inculcates the highest of all morals—Charity; the divine charity which Jesus Christ taught to his disciples, and enjoined on all his followers. Several fine Oriental fictions, quite new to the English reader, lend their attraction to the little volume; and, to crown the whole, George Cruickshank has supplied illustrations, at once truthful and full of his penetrative spirit. This is almost too much. The little people will be spoiled by so many good things being heaped upon them at once. We have been looking out for a specimen of the work, and our choice is made, certainly not upon the best, but the most convenient principle; for all the world, the old as well as the young, are at present talking of Mahomet Ali, and will be interested in hearing what his friend Dr Bowring has to tell of him to the fireside circle.

I should tell you that Mahomet Ali was forty-six years old before he learned either to read or write. This he told me himself. I have heard that he was taught by his favourite wife. But he is fond of reading now; and one day, when I entered his divan unannounced, I found him quite alone, with his spectacles on, reading a Turkish volume, which he was much enjoying, while a considerable pile of books were by his side.

"It is a pleasant relief," said he, "from public business: I was reading some amusing Turkish stories," (probably the Arabian Nights,) "and now let us talk. What have you to tell me?"

There is a great deal of sagacity in Mahomet Ali's conversation, particularly when he knows or discovers, as he usually does, the sort of information which his visitor is most able to give. . . . I do not deny that I feel a great interest in Mahomet Ali, and the more so, because I have had the advantage of seeing him with his children and grandchildren around him; and of talking with him about domestic matters. In the East, it is a very difficult matter to learn much about the private concerns of any Turk, and still less of those of men of high station. Mahomet Ali's great pride is Ibrahim Pacha; a victorious leader is always an object of admiration among Mussulmans, and Ibrahim Pacha's career has been one of brilliant military success. His father is fond of talking of his first-born son and intended successor.

"I did not know him," he said, "I had not an unbounded confidence in him for many, many years; no, not till his beard was almost as long as my own, and even changing its colour; but now I can thoroughly trust him."

On the part of Ibrahim Pacha, though of rank above his father (for the Pacha of the Holy Cities is the first Pacha of the Ottoman Empire,) there is always the utmost deference to Mahomet Ali's will. In the most difficult circumstances of his life, he has always referred to his renowned sire for advice; and whenever he has been pressed by the representatives of the great powers of Europe, he has invariably answered, that he should abide by the instructions he received from his father.

Dr Bowring (in his assumed character of Mr Howard) admires his friend, the potentate of Egypt, much more than we, Mahomet Ali's distant hyperborean acquaintances, are able to do; but the following domestic picture is certainly gentle and sweet:—

"I have been very happy in my children," he said to me one day; "there is not one of them who does not treat me with the utmost deference and respect; except," he added, laughing outright, "that little fellow, the last and the least of all, Mahomet Ali." He was then a boy of five or six years old, called by his father's name—the son of his old age—his Benjamin—his best-beloved. "I see how it is," I said; "Your Highness spoils the boy. You encourage the little rogue." Mahomet Ali laughed again; it was an acknowledgment of a little paternal weakness. Not long after I was in the palace of Shoubra; it was on a Friday, the Mussulman Sabbath, when the Pacha is in the habit of receiving all his family. I found him in the centre of his divan. He was surrounded by all his sons and grandsons, who were then residing at Cairo. He had been listening to the accounts of their studies—of their amusements and their employments. Abbas Pacha, the eldest son of Toussoun Pacha, sat next his grandfather, and the rest of the family were seated on chairs according to their rank and ages. After some conversation Mahomet Ali told his descendants they might now withdraw. One after another they rose, knelt before him, kissed the hem of his garment, and retired. Little Mahomet Ali came last. He was dressed in military costume, with a small-eared scimitar dangling at his side. He advanced towards his father—looked in his face; he saw the accustomed, the involuntary smile; and, when he was about a yard from the Pacha, instead of bending or saluting him, he turned on his heels, and laughingly scampered away like a young colt.

"I see how it is," said I to Mahomet Ali.

The old man shook his head, looked grave for a moment—another smile passed over his countenance.

"Peki, Peki!" said he, in a low tone.

Well, well! but I certainly did not like his Highness the worse for what I had just witnessed.

There is a very interesting account of the Prince of the Druses, and of that singular tribe, and the valleys of Lebanon which they inhabit. The present chief, the Emir Beshir, holds patriarchal sway over about 7,000 families, who do him homage and pay him tribute or taxes, while he in turn, in consequence of recent conquest, acknowledges the Pacha of Egypt as his feudal superior. Dr Bowring assures us that no man living represents the character and supports the dignity of the feudal princes of the middle ages so truly as the Emir Beshir; so we select this picture, which combines Oriental life with feudal state.

His castle, at about half-an-hour's distance from Deir el Kamar, is situated on the top of one of the Lebanon mountains, overlooking a large extent of country of consummate beauty, watered by abundant streams, and producing the richest harvests. It can only be reached by precipitous paths, which seem like huge natural staircases of stone, up and down, broken into the greatest irregularities by perpetual convulsions. One of the fine streams which feed the groves, and plains, and gardens of the Prince, I tracked by the sides of the mountains for many hours, through an artificial channel—a wonderful work of masonry—which conveys it in safety along the slanting bosom of the hills, over deep valleys, and through calcareous rocks, in the midst of which it is sometimes apparently lost. Proceeding through the town, you descend into a deep and broken dell, whence you mount again towards the palace of the Emir, which you enter by a large gate, in which are crowds of attendants; for the table of the princely occupier provides every day for fourteen hundred servants. The horses of travellers and visitors of all sorts, are seen scattered about the outer courts, in which are many superb Arab steeds, tied by the leg, according to Oriental custom, and having a small circle of their own to which they are confined by the rope. The court was echoing with the response of one magnificent charger to another when we entered. Several servants soon appeared, who conveyed us to apartments ever ready for the traveller; and inquiry was made, whether we preferred living in the Oriental or the European style. Curious to see what notions from the Far West had reached an Eastern prince, we chose to be served à la Franco, and tables and chairs were brought in, table-cloth and napkins, knives, forks, spoons, wine, tumblers, glasses; and but for the costumes of the attendants, and the deep and fresh impression of the "pomp and circumstances" around us, we could have fancied ourselves transported to the neighbourhood of our own houses, and receiving the hospitalities of old friends and kindred. Our first visit was to the Emin Emir, the son of the Prince, who received us in the Oriental way, in his own divan. He did not wear a turban, but a flowered silk handkerchief, upon his head, and from his belt there hung a watch-chain, glittering with diamonds. Pipes, coffee, and sherbet were served, as usual, and the conversation turned upon many things and many men; his travels—for the vicissitudes of fortune had once banished his father and himself to Egypt; their eccentric moon-struck neighbour, Lady S—; but he was particularly desirous to hear something of Sir Sydney Smith, whom then and often (both before and afterwards in Palestine) I heard spoken of in terms of the most grateful and remembering affection. (So be the names of our countrymen ever recorded in the minds of strangers!) He gave us many particulars of the culture and produce of Mount Lebanon; and, after this first conversation, for we had many afterwards, desired an attendant to escort us to the baths, (which are among the most costly and complete in the world, inlaid with variegated marble, and wanting in nothing that taste and luxury could suggest;) these he ordered to be prepared for us, if we wished it—to the different apartments and courts of the palace—to the chapel which had been recently built—to the stores where the products of the country were collected in immense abundance—to the kitchen, where huge copper vessels were filled with steaming food for the noon-tide meal of the multitudinous dependants. The Prince, his father, he told us, was indisposed. Handsome beda, with superb coverings, were laid out for us; so that we did not unpack our own.

Mahomet Ali disarmed the Druses, although the Emir Beshir had submitted to him. This was a painful infliction upon those brave mountaineers; and one who had witnessed it gave Dr Bowring a very touching account of the disarming.

Many thousand stand of arms—some of which were very ancient, richly adorned and costly—the heirlooms of the families, the very dearest of the possessions of a warlike people—were collected, and brought into the courtyard of the Prince's palace. There they were broken one by one; and my informant said that, at every crash, he saw fire in the old man's eyes, and a thrill in his frame. I heard that he let fall a remark—"He," (the Prince,) "was not the master there!" Dr Bowring had an interview with this aged chief, and found him more conversant with European affairs than might have been expected from a Prince buried in the recesses of Lebanon. When the strangers spoke of the noble bearing of the peasantry—of the clans, followers, or vassals, so to speak—and of the fine cultivation of the mountain ridges and the valleys, he replied, "God has given me power, and I have sought to use it for the benefit of those around me." To say the truth, as concerns the story, nothing could exhibit the outward look of happiness more than the scenes about us. The waterfalls from the hills above dashing down their clear currents, which make their way into the courts of the palace, feeding the water-courses and supplying the fountains; all sorts of water birds, flapping their wings in the sunshine, or revelling in the streams of the fountain-showers; strangers and attendants, in a hundred different costumes, were around the court, reposing on their carpets, smoking their chiboukhs, or their narghilehs, admiring the tall and graceful columns which supported the roof of the palace, watching the Arab steeds, welcoming new comers, or following with curious inquiry those who departed; for the moment was one of great interest—a portion of the Druses being in insurrection against the Government of Ibrahim Pacha. . . . If there be any place in the world where is exhibited a generous, princely hospitality, it is in the mountains of Lebanon, in the palace of the Prince of the Druses.

Such is a specimen of one sort of the instruction and entertainment which may be expected in Part III. of the "Minor Morals."

Black's Picturesque Tourist of Scotland.

From being more competent to speak with the understanding upon this subject than Southern critics, we advise

* Poor Lady Hester Stanhope, whose death is announced since Dr Bowring's little book appeared.

edly pronounce this an excellent "Scottish Guide-Book," and assume the responsibility of recommending it as faithful, accurate, and comprehensive—fulfilling the true office of a guide without any of the platitudes and eloquent impertinences into which some of those worthy functionaries are occasionally tempted, and in which others of them glory. "Black's Guide-Book" is divided into Fourteen Tours. It contains descriptions of the principal cities and monuments of antiquity, a travelling map and copious itinerary, with well-executed views of remarkable places and of celebrated scenery. It is, to crown all, very reasonable in price.

British History, from the Invasion of the Romans to the Accession of Queen Victoria. By John Wade, author of the "History of the Middle and Lower Classes," &c., &c.

This huge or voluminous tome is arranged chronologically, each reign occupying a chapter, to which a general historical introduction is prefixed, while a general view of the progress of arts and sciences, commerce, manufactures, literature, and manners, intervenes at important epochs. The earlier portion of both the history and chronology, is necessarily dismissed in a summary manner; though every leading fact, and all such changes and events as influenced the progress of civilization, are carefully told. From the reign of Elizabeth, the chronology becomes full; and, from the Revolution of 1688, classification and brevity enable the author to give the events and occurrences with the fulness of an Annual Register or Weekly Journal; while the important reigns of the Princes of the house of Brunswick are treated both historically, and with the minutiae of a chronicle of events. The general spirit of the work is dispassionate and impartial; and it will long remain a monument of the industry and painstaking nature of the English literary drudge. This epithet we use with respect and in sorrow, when we reflect how unlikely it is that the reward will repay the author's labour. Had he done no more than place so vast a body of classified facts connected with the British people in their hands, the task is worthy of thanks and honour. That, in so extensive a design, no inaccuracies should have crept in, was not to be looked for; but a new edition will give opportunity to correct errors, of which we note abundance, and of which probably no one is so sensible as the compiler himself. Tables, and a copious index, add greatly to the value of a work, which, as a book of naked facts, and ready reference, were it no more, is a desideratum to every English reader. It is susceptible of improvement; but, in the meanwhile, we know of no single work that could supply its place.

Dictionary of Printers and Printing; with the Progress of Literature, Ancient and Modern, &c., &c. By C. H. Timperley. Pp. 996.

The appearance of this and the above work at the same time is a coincidence worthy of remark. It is a general history of literature, and a mine of biography and anecdote. To everything which we have said in praise of the General History this work is entitled. It is pre-eminently the book of books, of authors, printers, and booksellers. It is full of interest and entertainment to "the trade," and all connected with it. The accuracy of the information appears to us remarkable; and the author, though holding the liberal opinions which become the historian of the press—the instrument of freedom and civilization—is candid and indulgent. We are prevented from giving any specimen of the work by the mere embarrassment of riches. The author, though glorying in "That glory of a free country," the periodical press, is far from being content with "the present [deplorable state of the newspaper press of the British empire." He thinks it has "ceased to be independent, and descended from its high estate to become the vehicle of party strife and petty feuds in the hands of designing men, who make no shame of being bought and sold like common ware." This is unhappily too true. In point of moral feeling, many newspaper editors, and especially those of the metropolis, are exactly on a par with those lawyers who contend that their duty and business is not to search out and elucidate truth, but simply and at all hazards to serve the interests of their clients. The advocate is as much "bought and sold like common ware" as the editor. The one prostitutes his talents to serve his employer and party, the other does the same. The immorality of the principle is the same in both, with this great difference in effect, that the public is less on its guard in the case of the public writer, than is the opposing counsel in a lawsuit; and that the editor endeavours to mislead a much larger audience, in far more important matters than simple questions between litigants. While the bar claims impunity for sophistry and false statement, or, at least, false glosses intended to blind and deceive, how shall the same privilege be denied the press? "This glory of a free country" may have been as coarse and personal at former periods, but it has never been more corrupt and degraded than under the Whig Ministry. The Government press has three special functions to discharge for its patrons: it has to pave the way for bad measures, to palliate and apologize for them in one set of circumstances, and to swear that black is white at all times where the mere existence of the Government seems to require it. The imperturbable assurance with which it now performs its base office was never before surpassed. Its perversion and degradation merit rebuke even more severe than that which the honest historian of the press has bestowed. Still we bless heaven for the press, even in its worst state, and prize it the more after perusing this faithful and entertaining history. One sentence of literary statistics is all we shall take. The number of periodicals issued monthly from Paternoster Row is 236. There are also thirty-four quarterly publications. The amount of literary pensions—that is, pensions to men of science and literature—was, at the accession of Victoria, £4,340, and of royal and noble pensions, £129,348. We are not regretting the comparative smallness of the literary pensions; far from it, considering literary pauperism the most deplorable and reprehensible of all modes of pauperism, and far more mischievous and derogatory than aristocratic pauperism. Even the fact is not more remarkable than, for example, among a hundred others, a Parliament grant of £70,000, given without a word, to erect additional stables for her Majesty, and £30,000, obtained with difficulty, to educate the ignorant millions of her Majesty's subjects.

Macgillivray's History of British Birds, Indigenous and Migratory. Vol. II. Songsters.

The account which we gave of the first volume of this work was so ample, and so much in detail, that it is at present only necessary to state that it is continued in the same spirit and style. Those who have formerly fancied Mr Macgillivray's manner too poetical or embellished for a work of science, forgetting Buffon, Audubon, and a hundred others, will find no reason to change their opinion; nor will those who prize works on natural history the more for sallies of imagination, find any cause to abate in their admiration. Flights of fancy and the poetry of prose are, at all events, indispensable in a volume devoted to song-birds.

Historical and Descriptive Account of British America.

This work forms the latest addition to that meritorious series, "The Edinburgh Cabinet Library." It is written by Mr Hugh Murray, whose name is a guarantee for full, accurate, and well-concocted information, whatever be the subject he undertakes to elucidate. Mr Murray has been assisted in his labours by different gentlemen, well qualified for the task, from their connexion with Canada. Nearly a half of the third volume is devoted to the zoology, botany, and geology of British America. This portion of the work is contributed by James Wilson, Esq., Professors Greville, Traill, and others. These three compendious volumes contain the essence of all that is known about those important settlements, down to so recent a period as Lord Durham's visit to British America, and also ample advice and information of the kind most useful to emigrants.

John and Alexander Bethune's Practical Economy.

We have been disappointed in this book, but from no fault in the authors. They are brothers, and working men or day-labourers, and we had supposed that their work was really practical, entering into the minutiae of working men's domestic economy, and telling us how they may obtain the greatest command over the necessities and comforts of life from a labourer's small means. Their lectures embrace a higher and wider, but, on the whole, not a more important class of objects. They are partly illustrative of political economy, about which, however, we hear nothing new, but mainly moral essays recommending frugality, the improvement of time, saving money, prudence in marrying, and so forth; and, as such, they are highly creditable to the intelligence and ingenuity of the writers. This we say without meaning to approve of many of the opinions of the Messrs Bethune, which are sometimes based on narrow or erroneous data.

Stories for the Fireside; or Moral Improvement Illustrated. By Miss Ragnale.

It is a great pity that these juvenile stories are given to the public in so ungainly a form, in the lesser matter of paper and print; for they are of a character very superior to the common run of school-room or nursery literature. This objection got over—and it would have been none when Miss Edgeworth's Tales or Mrs Lancaster's School were first published, and, moreover, gives the reader the advantage of a most liberal bargain in quantity—there is much to commend. The little stories are of the most unpretending kind, and each inculcates, in plain language, and with evident knowledge and experience of the characters of children, an obvious moral. Truth, sincerity, economy, order, diligence, and so on, are the respective texts of each story.

Dr Sigmond on the Moral and Medicinal Effects of Tea.

This small volume forms the substance of the usual introductory address delivered at the opening of the Royal Medico-Botanical Society, in which Dr Sigmond is the Professor of Materia Medica. The recent and very important discovery of the tea-plant growing spontaneously in British India, turned the Professor's attention more particularly to a subject which he has treated with care and ability, both in the historical and medical department. Before the Assam tea attracted attention, the Dutch were attempting to naturalize the tea-plant in Java, and with some appearance of success. Judges have pronounced the Java tea excellent, and very nearly equal to that of China. The success obtained in Java will be another stimulus to exertion in British India; and Assam offers very superior advantages for cultivation over that island. Dr Sigmond's opinions of the uses and abuses of tea are temperate and judicious. He is, on the whole, very friendly to "the cups that cheer but not inebriate," which he rather prefers to coffee as a daily beverage. He recommends tea as a drink or a sip—Chinese fashion—during the day, especially in warm weather, instead of ices and the other beverages in common use; and both tea and coffee, when taken after dinner as a diluent, he recommends to be made weak. Where the light wines only are drunk, as in France, coffee, in a strong infusion, may be used as an assistant to digestion; but where port, sherry, or Madeira have been taken, strong coffee is considered injurious. The damp and uncertain states of the atmosphere of this country, in Dr Sigmond's opinion, and in that of every man of common sense and observation, point out the necessity of obtaining artificial bodily heat; hence the use of fermented liquors and warm beverages; so the Doctor, though a great admirer of tea and a decided enemy to intemperance, is not quite a tea-totaler.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

PENNY POSTAGE.—As we anticipated at the time the Melbourne Ministry was restored to office, the only generally useful measure of the Session which has been obtained, is the Penny Postage Act, now fortunately the law of the land. The difficulty with which it was carried, proves, that without the most strenuous efforts of the People, it would, like many other good measures, have been strangled. The history of this Bill shews, in a clear manner, in what sort of a manner the People of this country are governed. There was no one out of Parliament, at least, who read Mr Rowland Hill's pamphlet attentively, but was convinced of the practicability of the measure; and the slightest perusal of the evidence collected by the Committee of the House of Commons, evinced the necessity of its being adopted; for the evasion of the Post-Office revenue, exceeded anything ever conjectured in any department, while the Post-Office officials themselves declared, that any attempt to stop the smuggling, or even check it, was hopeless, and that prosecutions for the illicit conveyance of letters had ceased. It has long been a settled point, and it is acted upon in our present tariff, that a duty of more than thirty per cent. cannot be collected, because that is simply sufficient to cover the risk of smuggling the commodity; and in truth it has been demonstrated by Dr Bowring, as well as by other inquirers on such subjects, that if the article be of small bulk, compared to its value, such as watches, jewellery, silks, laces, ten per cent. ad valorem is the maximum duty which can be collected, for the obvious reason, that smugglers will deliver the article in this country, not receiving the money till delivered, if ten per cent. in addition to the price on the Continent be paid them. But the postage of a letter from London to Edinburgh is 13d., whereas the expense of carriage is only the thirty-sixth part of a penny; and the conveyance of letters from the other parts of the kingdom is in proportion; so that, whatever might have been done before these facts were known, it was plainly impossible afterwards to attempt to keep up the existing system. Yet, instead of Parliament at once removing so serious a grievance—from which they themselves were, by the privilege of franking, exempted—they shewed every inclination to throw it out if they durst, the Tory leaders fairly admitting that it was with the greatest reluctance they allowed it to pass.

CAUSES OF POLITICAL EXCITEMENT.—We have above a complete explanation of the cause of the political excitement which has constantly, for many years, pervaded the country. Parliament is constitutionally intrusted with the management of the People's affairs; but the People have learned, from bitter experience, that it is unworthy of the trust, and that, when it ceases to be watched, it is sure to betray it. Parliament never waits for petitions from the People to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, to pass Coercion Bills, to lay on taxes, to grant immense revenues to Queens and Queen-Dowagers, to build royal palaces and stables, to throw away money on Judges or other officials; but if any measure useful to the People is wanted, Parliament is totally deaf till roused by petitions in thousands, and by meetings of the People in hundreds of thousands. The slightest whisper of the oppressors of the People is heard by every Member of both Houses as soon as it issues from their lips; but the friends of the People cannot be heard except in the voice of thunder, accompanied by physical demonstrations which can neither be overlooked nor despised. In this way was the Catholic Relief Bill carried; in this the Reform Bill; in this the House-duty repeal, and every other measure which has of late years promised benefit to the masses. To nothing else are we indebted for the Penny Postage Bill. We do not owe it to the wisdom of Parliament, to their sense of the injustice of taxing every other class, while they themselves were free, but to the hundreds of thousands of petitioners, and to their seeing the impossibility of preserving this branch of the revenue, after its iniquities, and the ease and safety with which it could be evaded, were spread throughout the land. In the present political excitement in the country, the Legislature is to blame—not the Whigs only, but Whigs and Tories in Parliament assembled. They have taught the People that no concession is to be made to reason—to a sense of justice—in short, to moral force; but everything to numbers, to intimidation, and to physical force.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.—In such circumstances, we are glad that the murder—for it would have been nothing else, however cloaked under the forms of a court of law—of the three Chartists has not been committed. We do not conceive that, under any circumstances whatever, even in revenge for the most deliberate murder, man is entitled to imbrue his hands in the blood of his fellow-man. Under no theory of government or of civil society, that we ever heard of, is such an act permissible. A man has no right to put himself to death: suicides are punishable as murderers by the existing laws; and, if a man has no right to dispose of his own life, how can he, under any theory of civil society, transfer, as it is pretended he does, that right to another? We are well aware that Judges, when they have to assume the hideous duty of condemning their fellow-creature to death, appeal to the authority of the Mosaic law, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man let his blood be shed;" but this is merely one branch of the lex talionis, or law of retaliation of which we have other specimens in the Old Testament. This law was plainly abrogated by the New Testament; and the law of retaliation has long been scouted from the practice of every civilized nation. It is disgraceful to Britain, when we have abandoned (if indeed we ever practised) that law, as well as many other commands of the Mosaic law, that we should still adhere to the rescinded precept—"Blood for blood."
